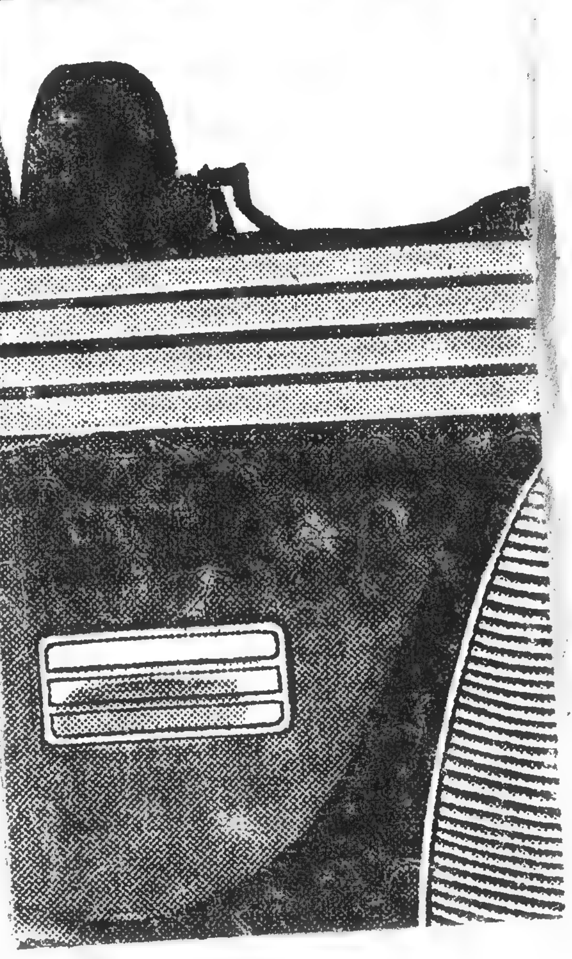
If this were done, and coupled with sound and skillful diplomacy, the position of musical unionism would gradually become invincible. It could elevate musical standards and not, as in too many present cases, depress them in the name of economic equality. Suppose that when a conductor asked for a first horn he were told that in plain fact no man good enough for the first horn's position was at present available; that as a substitute, if strictly necessary, a man of somewhat inferior tone and technic could be supplied until a person of the proper caliber were found, and that the union machinery would set at once to work to find him. Suppose that, the minimum wage established, there were grades of ability and experience which had to be attained before the union would permit a player to enter the more highly paid class of performers. Suppose the union had not only its own training schools, but some modern equivalent of an apprentice and journeyman's system whereby the younger members gradually gained the knowledge, skill and taste of real artists. Suppose a ruling were made against a man who knew nothing but the methods and the technic of jazz being just as available as another man for a position in a symphony orchestra. Suppose that the union and employers with whom it has dealings could meet together, as others have done, in a way of mutual accommodation, not to see what could be squeezed out or squeezed down when it came to financial arrangements, but to find ways and means, not impossible, whereby longer engagements for players and more liberal agreements regarding time for the rehearsing of finished performances could be arranged.

* * *

There are plenty of other "supposes." It costs nothing to speak of that which can be dismissed as impractical or entirely Utopian. But the glory of artistic achievement and the payment of a wage that insures a life worth living are not incompatible. Greatly desired changes, in one form or another, will take place, in a time when all sorts of adjustments are occurring, slowly in comparison to the need, rapidly in comparison with the tempo of the former century. They are due to be felt in music as in all the other ways that affect living. In the meantime a merely intelligent, therefore artistic as well as practical, objective on the part of every one concerned with music would work for the benefit of business, and art, and the public.



SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the sixth pair of concerts of its season in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 12 and 13. Jacques Fevrier, a French pianist as yet unheard in this country, will appear as soloist in Ravel's Pianoforte Concerto for the Left Hand. M. Fevrier, who made a special study of the score with Ravel, performed it a fortnight ago in Paris with outstanding success, Ravel being present. He has been invited to come to America and appear in the work with this orchestra in Boston and New York. The concerto was written for Paul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, and had its first American performances by him under Koussevitzky's direction in 1934.

The little symphony in A major (K. 201) which Mozart wrote at the age of 18, and which was introduced at these concerts last season, will be repeated. The program will conclude with Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 1 - 1937

Mrs. Davenport to Entertain Boston Symphony Sponsors At Tea Next Monday

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will entertain the members of the committee at a tea at her home, No. 40-A Monroe place, next Monday. This is the opening tea meeting of the 1937-38 season at which plans will be completed for the series of five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which will begin on Friday evening, Nov. 19.

Other concerts in the series, marking the fifty-second season of the orchestra in Brooklyn, will be given on Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday, Feb. 10; Friday, March 11 and Friday, April 1.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, vice-chairman of the Brooklyn committee in charge of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, now chairman of the Junior League committeee will make reports at the tea meeting.

The concert will be presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good are the vice-chairmen of the latter committee.

Eight new members have accepted the invitation to serve on the Brooklyn committee. They are: Mrs. Ernest Ash, Theodore Fitch, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Maud B. Wood, Miss Elizabeth Wright and Edward J. A. Zeiner.

Members of the Junior League committee include: Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Miss Ruth Warren.

Serving on the committee of distinguished borough residents sponsoring the concerts are: Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Hon. William R. Bayes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Miss Anne Chapman, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Miss Frances H. Coutts, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Walter H. Cittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Dr. John H. Denbigh, former Justice Norman S. Dike, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy Du Val, S. Raymond Estey, Sumner Ford, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. Alvard Finn, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles W. Franklin, Theodore L. Frothingham, Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Charles R. Gay, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingfiraham, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanus, Ralp Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. Hans V. Kaltenborn, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lecster, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Miss Althea McCammon, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr., Mrs. Frank Melville, Jr., Miss Lillie Maurer, Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Irene Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mr. James H. Post, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Miss Jessie Righter, Mrs. Donald Ross M,rs. F. F. Schepmoes, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Miss Gertrude Van Brunt, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George Whittlesey, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Mrs. William H. Whitton, Surrogate George Albert Wingate, Mrs. Harry Michael Wingle, R. Huntington Woodman and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
OCT [illegible] 1937

Enjoy 'Commuters Matinee'

Boston Symphony Delights Audience in First Program of Seriese

BY ESTHER M. GUILFOY.

BOSTON, Oct. 26—Maintaining its tradition for expert musicianship, the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in its 57th season, delighted large numbers of music lovers from every state in New England who practically filled Symphony hall this afternoon for the first in a series of "Commuters' matinees," presented under the able leadership of the orchestra's noted conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Painting delightful musical pictures, sometimes brilliant, sometimes subdued and sometimes strongly dramatic in hue, the orchestra was warmly acclaimed for its three artistic offerings.

Opening the program with the beautiful "Symphony in G Major, No. 88" by Haydn, the orchestra acquitted itself ably as it conveyed the lively brilliance, the pleasant recurring variations and the minor strains of "Adagio: Allegro" and "Largo," then swept into the cheerful "Menuetto; Trio" with its rustic dance strains and hurdy-gurdy drones; and finally into the "Finale: Allegro con spirito," in which the musicians played vividly the movement in rondo form, emphasizing its rolling blares, little staccato touches and quiet pianissimo gradually growing to a powerful conclusion.

First Time in U. S.

Presented for the first time in this country, the second number, "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestra Suite, Op. 60, by Prokofieff, proved a delightful innovation. Ethereal music backstage which developed into a cornet fanfare followed by a military drum tattoo and the shrill song of the fife introduced the "Birth of Kije" in spectacular fashion, which was followed by the "Romance" in which Max Kunze played the excellent double bass solo. "Kije's Wedding," a melodic movement was quickly followed by Troika, a rhythmic tavern song interspersed with the gay pealing of sleighbells.

The "Burial of Kije," who happened to be only an imaginary lieutenant, was carried out in cheerful vein with only an occasional plaintive touch, as the orchestra summed up his career by repeating the cornet fanfare which had introduced him, the themes which had characterized his romance and wedding and the muted cornet strains, gradually dwindling into significance as Kije was returned to the insubstantial medium of his birth.

The program was brought to a striking climax with "Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43" by Sibelius, in which the orchestra played with great exuberance. Commencing with the sighing pulsation of the "Allegretto," the many elements were fused into a gradually mounting climax as the orchestra portrayed the drama with great crescendo effect. The lugubrious quality of "Tempo andante, ma rubato," with its stormy scales and undercurrent of whirring figures was cleverly carried by the orchestra which then launched the "Vivacissimo; Lento e suave," a tumultuous offering characterized by sharp but soft drum taps, and softly-rounded notes. The orchestra then with fire attacked "Finale: Allegro moderato," in zestful fashion, building up the melody into a striking display of musical fireworks.

The personnel of the orchestra is wide in range, the off-stage trumpet being played by 18-year-old Roger Boison, a full-fledged member of the orchestra, and the great crashing horn sounds in the big double quartet by 72-year-old Henry Lorbeer, for 50 years one of the nation's leading players of the horn.

During the intermission guests enjoyed visiting the various Symphony hall galleries in which were the interesting permanent collection of authentic old musical instruments ranging from the oldtime lute and hurdy-gurdy to the bass viol controlled with the knee grip. In another gallery were displayed summer paintings and wood carvings of Karoly Fulop as well as a collection of musical scores, original manuscripts and letters pertaining to composers whose works are being played at this time by the orchestra.

Prov Journal
Nov 7

Providence Woman Symphony Soloist

Martha Baird to Play Mozart Concerto With Boston Orchestra Tuesday Night in Second Concert of Season

WITH Martha Baird, noted Providence pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns for its second concert of the season Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre. At the Rhode Island School of Design Museum, the Musical Art Quartet will play five chamber music programs, completing the historical series inaugurated last week.

Miss Baird (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen) has appeared with the Boston Symphony before in other cities, and with the principal orchestras in London, Berlin and elsewhere on the continent. In solo recitals and with orchestras she has made several tours of this country. She was born in California and first took up her professional career as an infant prodigy. Later she completed her studies with Artur Schnabel in Berlin.

On her return to the concert platform Tuesday night Miss Baird will play, with the orchestra, Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D-minor which will be the second ot the two works occupying the first half of the program. For his opening number Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Schubert's beloved "Unfinished" Symphony, and for the whole of the second half, Sibelius's Second Symphony, in D-major. The program follows:

Symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished" Schubert
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante con moto
Concerto for Piano in D-minor (K. 466) Mozart
I. Allegro
II. Romanza
III. Rondo
Symphony No. 2 in D-major, opus 43 Sibelius
I. Allegretto
II. Tempo andante, ma rubato
III. Vivacissimo; Lento e suave
IV. Finale: Allegro moderato

◆ ◆ ◆

dence Public Library. Gertrude Joseffy Chase will illustrate themes, etc., on the piano. The public is invited.

◆ ◆ ◆

British Choir Boys

The English Boy Choristers, a group chosen from a number of churches in England, will give a program of sacred and secular music at St. Martin's Church the evening of Nov. 15. Carlton Borrow is the director.

◆ ◆ ◆

WPA Orchestra Concert

The WPA Concert Orchestra, Edouard Caffier, conductor, will give a concert in the Playhouse this evening at 8:30 o'clock, with Erno Balogh, pianist, as soloist. A new tone poem, "Francis of Assisi," by Fr. Leo Rowlands, will be played under the leadership of the composer.

On the Concert Calendar

Today—Musical Art Quartet, School of Design Museum, 3:30 p. m.

Tomorrow—Musical Art Quartet, School of Design Museum, 8:30 p. m.

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Martha Baird, pianist, soloist; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m. Musical Art Quaret, School of Design Museum, 3:30 p. m.

Wednesday—Musical Art Quartet, School of Design Museum, 8:30 p. m.

Thursday—Musical Art Quartet, School of Design Museum, 8:30 p. m.

Friday—Monte Carlo

Amer
30

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1937

Romantic Symphony Program

Sibelius' 'Tapiola' Shares in Honors At Concert

By RUTH MARSTERS

Romanticism took variable form in the program which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky set before an eagerly appreciative audience at yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sibelius' tone poem, "Tapiola," with its mysterious gloom, its dark forboding, its spaciousness, is well worth the time it takes in any program.

One of the composer's later works, it was written in 1926 at the request of Walter Damrosch.

Whether or not Sibelius had the Kalevala directly in mind, "Tapiola" is steeped in the mythological atmosphere. It could not be other than Finnish music. The roots of Sibelius' nationalism go deep.

* * *

Following this the novelty was Kodaly's "Ballet Music" which was given its first American performance on this occasion.

Intensely rhythmical with a colorful orchestration which often is used for a chuckle on its own, this ballet music would scarcely leave the most unimaginative of choreographers at sea.

In the Tchaikovsky Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," the orchestra began to get in its stride, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony—the third in A minor, brought the afternoon to a satisfactory conclusion.

The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

* * *

Next week's regular pair of concerts will bring Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, to America for the first time for the performance of Ravel's Piano Concerto for the left hand.

This concerto, it will be remembered, was first heard here with Paul Wittgenstein, for whom it was written, as soloist several years ago.

The program will also include Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. No. 201) and Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben."

SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW JAZZ DANCE

'Romeo and Juliet' by Tchaikovsky Is Superbly Given

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon the audience received somewhat apathetically the sombre "Tapiola" of Sibelius and a new quite jazzy and highly unimportant "Ballet Music" of Kodaly, played for the first time in America, and then rose warmly to singularly vital performances of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony.

The lesson here is not so much that audiences are naturally reactionary as that it advantages a composer greatly to blend his skill with a little melodic inspiration.

SIBELIUS TURNS DULL

Unfortunately, the music which it is perfectly proper for us to enjoy is not always free from dullness, and to this melancholy rule the later Sibelius offers no exception. There is nothing dull about the first two symphonies, but they, it seems, do not quite "get by." Sibelius is not the first composer the number of whose years has been in inverse ratio to his capacity for invention. Commentators like Cecil Gray may well marvel at the constructive power which enables Sibelius to build a symphonic movement out of a single motive, as Beethoven did in the first movement of the Fifth Symphony. But in the case of "Tapiola," the motive itself is not a particularly seizing one.

And what possessed Kodaly, the composer of much diverting and distinguished music, to write the commonplace stuff disclosed to us yesterday? Possibly he felt that sooner or later he should try his hand at what may be called the American idiom; but he did not handle it too adroitly. His ballet music is, however, ingeniously scored and at times exciting to hear, in the sense that any sharply rythmed music is exciting. Dr. Koussevitzky might have done better to revive the delightful "Hary Janos" suite, which was played here in 1928 and then unaccountably dropped.

Tchaikovsky's Overture

Two things only, and they were matters of insignificant detail marred the performance yesterday of Tschaikovsky's "Overture-Fantasia," our orchestra's recent recording of which is now being widely praised. There was just a shade too much English horn in the first statement of the love theme and the cymbals in the music of the bickering families were clashed a bit too noisily.

This current performance of the Overture is a tour-de-force, which through the medium of the discs is spreading the reputation of our orchestra, and so was that of Mendelssohn's Symphony, which closed an afternoon of steadily brilliant playing. The introduction to this symphony is one of the treasurable things in music, and the Scherzo is Mendelssohn at his happiest.

And if in the third and fourth movements the composer does not always hold his end up, Dr. Koussevitsky and his men lent him extraordinary assistance. It is easy to imagine that the symphony had never before been made to sound so well.

What's Going

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A modest novelty included in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth program of the season was Zoltán Kodály's "Ballet Music," which had on Friday afternoon its first performance in the United States. It contains the rhythms and the instrumental colors that have become a commonplace of twentieth-century music. It even contains a theme for saxophone which is reminiscent of a popular song celebrating moonlight. It does not contain the individualizing touch that would make it a significant miniature.

This musical orphan was oddly placed between Sibelius's tone poem, "Tapiola," and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Together they made a rather incoherent first half of a program which concluded with—you'd never guess it—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony.

The "Tapiola" renewed the old impression of brilliance in conception and construction. The Kodály had at all events the virtue of unfamiliarity. The Tchaikovsky item, sufficiently dramatic of itself, became theatrical under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton.

The Mendelssohn "Scotch" Symphony, even with the benefit of his revitalizing reading, remains clearly of its place and period. If it seems today a little naïve, if its emotion appears to us superficial and its posturings unimpressive, we can still enjoy its pages of bright charm and of tender sentiment, even while finding them a little profuse.

There is always comfort, when a Boston Symphony program after a good opening leans to the dull side, in listening to the playing, as apart from what is being played. Then, perhaps more than ordinarily, we can revel in the richness of tone, the subtleties of balance and nuance, the delicacy and the brilliance of technique of a great orchestra greatly directed. L. A. S.

(31)

Koussevitzky the Magician Evokes Racial Pictures

Compositions Representative of a Diversity of Peoples Are Enjoyed by Receptive Audience

By Redfern Mason

Like a wizard in the "Thousand and One Nights Entertainments," Serge Koussevitzky raises his baton and brings before the imagination tonal images that are as real as anything we read in the poets.

Yesterday afternoon, with the Symphony to illustrate what was in his mind, he ranged over half a dozen countries, beginning with Finland as seen through the eyes of Sibelius and ending with Scotland as interpreted by the German Jew, Mendelssohn. Between times he gave us glimpses of Hungary and the Italy of Shakespeare as it appeared to the mind of Tschaikovsky.

Music of a melancholy beauty swept over us in the "Tapiola" of Jan Sibelius, who is probably the most racial of contemporary composers. He is a Northern Pan, who makes the wind sigh through the reeds for Syrinx, who is Finland. A theorist would note with pleasure how insistently he harps on a brief strain, causing it to sing with almost multitudinous instrumental diversity. The work is a pure tone-poem, an idyll, if you like the term better, but an idyll with grandiose sonorities in it.

To this work the orchestra gave itself con amore. It may be that some of the players have ideas about Finland which would not harmonize with the vision of Sibelius. They might want the country to be Russian or Germanic. But, when it comes to interpreting music, they put all chauvinism on one side and play for the sheer delight of creating beauty. And, in doing that, they probably look down a little on mere ordinary mortals whose only pleasure in music is that of the listener. At the same time they remember that on the quality of the audience largely depends the merit of their own performance. "To understand is to equal," says the Frenchman, and Koussevitzky and his henchmen are happy in the fact that they have hearers who are worthy of what is played for them.

After Sibelius we came under the spell of the Hungarian Kodaly. But the composer's Hungary is different, he does not employ the gypsy tinsel of Liszt; there is nothing of the tzigane about Kodaly. His Ballet Music, which, by the way, was only written a year ago, suggests a program; but what it was nobody seems to know. But you could not hear those lacerating trumpet calls and screeching reeds without being sure that there was nothing "absolute" about the score. The work awoke a Berseker strain in Mr. Koussevitzky's make-up. "When you scratch a Berseker you find a Tartar" as Arminius Vambery once said, and the director's subliminal self was on the warpath.

The "Romeo and Juliet" of Tschaikovsky was the last work before the interval. Curious how these Muscovites have always loved. Shakespeare, too, is one of their most popular poets. But then genius is in a sense international, nay cosmopolitan. We of the audience sat back in our seats and listened to and loved the glorious music, for gloriously it was played. Peter Ilyitch calls it an overture-fantasia. Leigh Hunt once compared Edmund Kean's acting to "reading Shakespeare by flashes of lightning." The phrase not inaptly describes Tschaikovsky's tonal portrayal of the story of the lovers of Verona. The plain chant hymn at the beginning recalls the story of the "star crossed" lovers at the beginning of the overture; the strife of the Montagues and Capulets is pictured as vividly as if it were an old chronicle; there are lyric moments in which the lovers "snatch a fearful joy" in the midst of so much trouble. In a word the music reveals the composer at his best, as indeed it did both conductor and orchestra.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony concluded the concert. It is as melodious as the Lieder ohne Worte, which, indeed, it often suggests; but the symphony, in the hands of the gifted composer, became formal. Mendelssohn indeed, as Wagner noted, was a "landscapist," and time and again in this symphony you feel the true self of the composer trying to liberate itself from the Procrustean bed of form. For a few moments he seems to succeed; but the ghost of sonata form intimidates him and he does not dare to be his real self.

Yet the "Scotch" Symphony is gracious music, limpid, fluent, ever flowing in sweet melody. And as such the audience enjoyed it. I fancy they enjoyed the concluding movement best of all, for in that the academic shackles are almost released. Some of the listeners sighed. For Felix was unfortunate in being too fortunate. He was rich; his family life was happy; success attended him on every hand. If only some wicked witch had put sorrow into his cradle, what a mighty composer might have been. But it was not to be.

NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER
OCT 27 1937

Local People Subscribe To Symphony

BOSTON — Residents of this district and every other point of the compass throughout New England will journey to Symphony Hall, Boston, today. Their object will be to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, open a series of six "commuters' matinees." These concerts will be played monthly on Tuesday, omitting November. For the special benefit of out-of-towners, the performances will not begin until three o'clock. Subscribers to Tuesday's concert from this district are: Mrs. Lyman F. Bigelow, Mr. Charles Hastings Brown, and Mrs. Charles Caverly of Norwood; Mrs. Ralph P. Kent of Attleboro.

Music just played for the first time in the United States will be on this Tuesday's program. It is the amusing Suite from the Soviet Film "Lieutenant Kije." The work is by the celebrated living Russian composer, Sergei Prokofieff. He gives musical expression to a legend. This tells how a Czar, in reading a dispatch jumbled some words so as to form the non-existent name of "Lieutenant Kije." Since the courtiers dared not correct the Czar, they invented details of the birth, marriage and death of the imaginary officer. Koussevitzky will open the program with a delightful early example of the symphony, Haydn's Symphony Number Eighty-Eight. The Russian work will follow. The entire second half of the program will be devoted to the powerful Second Symphony of the illustrious contemporary Finnish master, Sibelius.

Nov 7 '37

est Sunday Circulation in New England

Makes Its Bost

Humor Touches The Symphony

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

IT WAS a program decidedly tinged with romanticism in which Sibelius, Mendelssohn, Kodaly, and Tschaikovsky consorted to the evident delight of Boston Symphony audiences this week-end.

Kodaly's "Ballet Music," which was given its first performance in the United States at the Friday concert, did its small bit to point up the afternoon with a touch of humor—a pert and contagious humor of its own.

Its rhythm, often syncopated, is intensely defined and thoroughly stimulating.

Though Kodaly is most widely known through his chamber music works, he has, it appears, a virtuoso technique in the handling of the larger medium of the orchestra as well.

The "Ballet Music" is extremely short. Within its one movement it progresses from andante commodo to molto allegro and returns, taking only just time enough for a gargoyle to disengage itself from the serenity of its Gothic background, to disport itself with sly grins and ribald grimaces, and then to slip back again into its accustomed groove before being caught at it.

It is, in short, zestful music and though slight is accomplished with skill.

* * *

SIBELIUS' tone poem, "Tapiola" with which Dr. Koussevitsky opened the program, has been said by Ernest Newman to contain, with the last four symphonies, "the secret of what Sibelius is driving at."

The poem affixed to the score beginning, "Widespread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests, —ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams," both describes the "atmosphere" of "Tapiola" and explains Sibelius' essential nationalism. (It is often quoted precisely for this reason.)

"Tapiola" has sounded better than in the Friday performance. The orchestra ran more smoothly in Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Finally the performance of the "Scotch" Symphony left nothing to be desired.

Both the latter works had the benefit of the youthful glow, the poetic ardor with which Dr. Koussevitzky customarily infuses such scores. Everybody went home feeling very happy.

Boston

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fifth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Sibelius ..."Tapiola," Tone Poem Op. 112
Kodaly.................Ballet Music
Tchaikovsky..."Romeo and Juliet," Overture-Fantasia
Mendelssohn......Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56

Dr. Koussevitzky acted shrewdly when he changed the program from what had originally been announced. Mendelssohn's lovely 'Fingal's Cave" Overture might have reacted unfavorably on the less perfect Scotch Symphony. Kodaly's Ballet Music, which was heard for the first time in the United States, came at a seasonal moment when many of us have the subject of ballet on the brain.

Kodaly's music is not as familiar as it ought to be with Boston audiences, for the simple reason that his best work is choral. An audience that knew the Psalmus Hungaricus and the recent Te Deum would have listened yesterday with greater respect to the Hungarian composer's experiment with ballet music. Clearly Kodaly had some more or less well-defined program in mind, since the music is both simple in construction and sharply characterized. An English reviewer, hearing it at a Promenade concert last August, thought that a ballet to the music would be both sensuous and something to shudder at. The action, probably, would be of brief and sudden violence. By itself Kodaly's music is not unconventional, but it has the individuality which this composer has always been able to instil into his creations.

A listener has to be in exactly the right mood for Sibelius' "Tapiola," though the concluding pages can never fail to be hair-raising. It is possible to find the tone poem monotonous, and it is equally possible to find the very monotony a stimulus to the imagination. Like many works of art "Tapiola" has two faces.

The orchestra and conductor were in fine form for all the works on yesterday's program. They have received particular praise recently for a recording of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." This music is such that a listener can hardly be in two minds about it. He either finds its very Tchaikovskyan gloom and fire and sentimentality to his taste or he does not. We do not happen to vote with the "ayes" on this issue, though that is not a matter of much importance. "Romeo and Juliet" is the kind of music to which you return with renewed interest when you are least aware that your attitude could ever have changed. At least that is a reasonable guess!

Mendelssohn was a charming letter writer and drew and sketched with talent, besides being a composer of sometimes fatal facility. These qualities of mind are all exemplified in the Scotch Symphony. The slow movement would be twice as effective if Mendelssohn had not gone on writing until his thought became stale. Yet the scherzo is delightful; and indeed scherzos almost always show him at his happiest and most fertile. The symphony as a whole reflects the personality of the composer more than it does the characteristics of Scotland. It is a work that should be heard occasionally; yesterday the performance was thoroughly sympathetic and alive.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Jacques Fevrier, pianist, will be heard in Ravel's Concerto for the left hand; and the other numbers will be Mozart's early Symphony in A major and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

Globe Nov

R 6, 1937

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Serge Koussevitzky altered the program for the Boston Symphony concerts this week, substituting for the previously announced "Hebrides" Overture of Mendelssohn, a brief specimen of present-day composition by the Hungarian Zoltan Kodaly. "Ballet Music," as Kodaly calls his piece, was performed yesterday afternoon for the first time in the United States. The program begins with Sibelius' tone poem "Tapiola," and includes the "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia by Tchaikovsky, and the "Scotch" Symphony of Mendelssohn.

Just what sort of dancing would properly accompany this "Ballet Music" devised by Kodaly puts rather a strain upon esthetic imagination, since the composer starts with variegated instrumental snorts heard over a rhythmic ground bass of the rum-ta-ta-tum-tum order. This mood continues for a few moments, giving way to a more reposeful section characterized by persistent disagreement among the strings. The earlier mood returns, and all ends with a bang.

In short, this fragment from the distinguished creator of a modern choral masterpiece, "Psalmus Hungaricus," is neither Hungarian nor a masterpiece. A suspicion remains that it is the least worthy new music to fall upon Bostonian ears in quite some time.

Dr Koussevitzky is to be thanked for periodic repetition of "Tapiola" in the past few years. It is a marvelously fanciful work, representative of Sibelius at his best, and bears the qualities of both a musical and a poetic masterpiece. As Mr Burk in the program book quotes Ernest Newman as saying, "Tapiola" may be listened to both as pure tonal patterns and as music inspired by poetic imagery. It is constructed with the superb logic and undeviating continuity of a master of form. If one listens after reading the fascinating quatrain which Sibelius inscribed in the score, speaking of the forest god, Tapio, and wood sprites dwelling in the dark and awesome forests of Finland, "Tapiola" may be considered a tone poem of the finest sort. But no matter what the point of view, here is original and deeply emotional music, certain to endure. It ought to be played until it is as familiar as Sibelius' Fifth and Second Symphonies.

Tchaikovsky has been much abused by some of academic mind for the unrestrained passion that is really the dominating element of all that he wrote. This was true whether he was in ecstasy or writing under the darkest despair; the gifted Russian expressed himself usually with extreme intensity, even in the slow movement of the Fifth Symphony. Because he possessed melodic invention of great individuality, the result was music whose appeal to the heart overcame formal weakness and texture that was, for the 19th century, relatively thin.

Such passion Tchaikovsky put to fruitful use in "Romeo and Juliet," capturing a vivid tone picture of the main points of Shakespeare's play. Of course he was melodramatic, but so is the drama. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra played it in irresistible, even rousing fashion, yesterday.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony had not been played in this series of concerts for almost five years, and therefore was ripe to be heard again. Length and reiteration need not blind any to the fact that Mendelssohn was a musician with two aspects: one the spinner of lush tunes, the other a consummate technician, who created according to his own sensibilities vital and organic symphonies.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Jacques Fevrier, a French musician new to this country, will be soloist in Ravel's Piano Concerto for Left Hand. A youthful Symphony in A (K 201) by Mozart, and Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" will be played.

C. W. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
NOV 6 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS CONCERTS HERE NOV. 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season of five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 18 and 20. Serge Koussevitzky announces for the evening program the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, in D major.

At the matinee, Jacques Fevrier, the French pianist now making his first visit to this country at the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear in the "Concerto for the Left Hand," by Ravel. M. Fevrier made a close study of the work with its composer, and performed it with success in Paris last month. The program will open with Prokofieff's suite from incidental music which he wrote for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije." It will close with Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenlebem."

(32)

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 31 1937

In The World Of Music . . . .

By H. Earle Johnson

SOMETHING different! Something new! So runs the cry of concert managers and the public each year in order that annual series may continue to be interesting and profitable. A routine of Rachmaninofs and Kreislers must be offset by the reigning success of the year, or visiting artists from abroad. There are not always sensations enough to go around; Flagstads do not occur every season, nor should it be necessary that one be a smashing sensation to deserve widespread attention through the country.

A pleasant phase of the concert activity during this season is the introduction of two ensemble groups to liven the scene. These are the Salzburg Opera Guild and the Wagnerian Festival Singers. Both groups have appeared twice in New England in the course of the week, creating no end of enthusiasm. The Wagnerian singers are gathered from European Opera houses by Richard Hageman, composer of "Caponsacchi" and former conductor at The Metropolitan. (Mr. Hageman came to New Haven as accompanist for Charles Kullmann three seasons ago.)

FESTIVAL SINGERS

Now the difficulties of opera singers in the presentation of Wagnerian selections in the concert hall are apparent. One misses the surge of the great Wagnerian Orchestra which is hardly replaced by two grand pianos and a portable organ. Furthermore Wagnerian voices, accustomed to triumph over the orchestral background, may show roughnesses of tone and what amounts to a continual shouting in the concert hall. The Festival Singers did all these things, to be sure, but they succeeded handsomely in creating vast excitement among the populace assembled and achieved a dramatic effect.

Mme. Hilda Konetzni's soprano quite puts Mme. Flagstad's to shame as respects volume, but there the comparison ceases. Mr. Joel Berglund is the baritone, Mr. Heinrich Noort, a Dutchman, the excellent tenor, and slight Mlle. Marta Krasova, the full-voiced contralto. Star of the group is Alexander Kipnis, basso, in the prime of his powers. Mr. Kipnis sings the robustly massive scenes by Wagner, or the tender songs by Schumann and Schubert as effectively as he does the roistering arias by Mozart, holding the listener spellbound by the perfection of a superb interpretative art.

Any evening of singing by a group such as this is a memorable one, and artistically rewarding. Today they are singing in Washington with the full National Symphony Orchestra behind them and Wagner's "Die Walkeure" as the task at hand. In such a setting the results should be overwhelming.

SALZBURGERS

Professionalism must be carefully disguised in the production of Mozart's gay operas. It must be there, however, for amateurs cannot hope to sing them. If you have witnessed the stately—and portly!—ladies of the opera struggle to be kittenish with "Figaro" at The Metropolitan, you will understand that youth and spirit are prime requisites for properly putting "Gosi fan tutti" across.

The Salzburg Opera Guild is an ensemble of young persons from Central Europe who have devoted more than a year to rehearsals of a repertory which includes unusual works. They are now in America and will play in New York within a fortnight. There is no point in listing the singing, for you have heard none of them; they are not stars, nor are they likely to be, but the voices are well-trained and blend perfectly, they are clever actors and actresses, and the Mozartian spirit rolls from their finger-tips like the proverbial water off a leaf. In watching them sing "Cosi fan tutte" (So do they all) it is like hearing Mozart sung for the first time.

Boston

The repertory includes these works: "The Coronation of Poppea," by Claudio Monteverdi, "Cosi fan tutte." by Mozart, "The Poor Sailor" by Milhaud, "Angelique" by Jacques Ibert, and "The Matrimonial Market" by Rossini. A refreshing list of novelties this! If the Mozart is a sample of the entire repertory, one may anticipate a genuine delight in watching this new company tour the country.

BOSTONIA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has successfully introduced a new series of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. Replacing the former young people's series, these will have an effect equally comprehensive since the works chosen are from the standard repertory. The objective of the orchestra management is to attract visitors from out-of-town for the series of six concerts; one may have the day to shop and arrive at Symphony Hall by 3 o'clock. A survey of present lists indicate that subscribers come from as far north as Castine and Bar Harbor, Maine; as far east as Hyannis, as far west as Pittsfield, and as far to the southwest as Waterbury, Connecticut. No regular New Haven subscriber to any of the Boston series is reported, although there are several among the "Friends of the B. S. O." which helps in meeting the inevitable deficit.

Dr. Koussevitsky's first pair of concerts drew near-capacity houses for a program which included a Haydn Symphony, a Suite from a Soviet film by Sergei Prokofieff, and Sibelius' Second Symphony. It was a magnificent affair, well worth a special trip to Boston from New Haven or farther. The next concert in this series falls on the two days almost immediately after Christmas, December 27 and 28; and New Haveners are invited to consider the offer of the series.

KANSAS CITY

The Philharmonic Orchestra of that Western city last week opened to a sell-out business. Extra workers were added to the staff to count the money which came in for season tickets. An increased budget tentatively made to care for necessary improvements in the orchestra and for the engagament of prominent soloists was more than justified by public response immediately upon announcement. Karl Krueger, well received abroad this summer, is returned as conductor.

1-2

Piarre Monteux, remembered in the East for tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony in the days immediately preceding those of Dr. Koussevitsky, is now in his third season with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. One half of one per cent of the city tax is "donated to maintain the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra," a favor returned by one free city concert a year and six performances, with ballet, the city supplying the dancers. Audiences of 2,500 are approximately the same as those which might be accommodated at the concerts by the New Haven Orchestra Association.

A FIRM FOUNDATION

The Metropolitan Opera is putting on finishing touches to the house and opening the box-office for a start in full-voice on November 29th. Subscription seats are now on sale for the 16-week season; mail orders and renewals thus far are reported to be the heaviest in several years. The stage has been entirely rebuilt and other accommodations made for the facilitation of production activities if not for the convenience of the artists. The audience may fancy it needs a new auditorium in which to enjoy the operas, but the most dire need is for increased space backstage in which to handle and store the productions. At present the sidewalk on Sixth Avenue is likely to offer the prospect alternately of Egypt, Valhalla, or Japan, depending on the next opera to be performed. On rainy days the weather is particularly hard on what is fancifully called the scenic investiture.

Further improvements are reported to be made in the orchestral personnel and in the acquirement of secondary singers for the casts. The day of student speculation is over, thank heaven, since the public and press have emphatically maintained that professionalism is as beneficial in opera as amateur standing is in football.

A list of new operas to be unfolded during the season was contained in this column a fortnight ago.

PHILHARMONIC

This afternoon Mr. Barbirolli conducts the Philharmonic-Symphony Society in a program notable for the inclusion of Bela Bartok's latest score. It is a decade since any major orchestra has performed one of his works in New York and anything which the noted Hungarian offers is assured of an attentive public.

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Vladimir Golschmann, opens its 58th season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with a program including Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and Sibelius' Second Symphony. This orchestra is the third oldest in the country, the next older than our own, which is fourth.

CONTEST EXTENDED

The Chicago Opera Company has extended the limit of its contest date for a one-act opera to September of next year. More than three months are ordinarily taken to compose such a work, and inquiries have indicated to the management that quite a number of bright people are interested in trying if sufficient time is given. The theme is required to be a romance of the Civil War era. The prize is a guarantee of premiere with that organization in the course of the annual season.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 29 1937

First Tuesday at Boston Symphony

Commuters' Series Opens; Patrons from New England Cities Attend

That the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has sent out invitations to New England newspapers in the territory served by a widely distributed list of subscribers to the Tuesday afternoon series of concerts by one hundred and nine virtuosos conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky calls for some retrospective history. The opening concert of the Tuesday matinees, beginning at three(rather than as on Friday at 2:30) to accommodate out-of-town patrons, was the occasion, and the idea behind the courtesy was that various communities might be informed of the advantages of this so-called "commuters' series."

Inquiries, following the program Tuesday afternoon, on the general subscription, found that the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts are subscribed almost to the record of pre-depression days when a relinquished seat was quickly taken up. In fact, applicants are now told that the "rush" seats are their only hope on Friday.

Supplementary Demand

It was because the pressure was so insistent that a shorter supplementary series for Monday evenings was instituted—possibly ten years ago. Often, the novelties of the regular pair of concerts were repeated at the next of the Monday series and Monday night Symphony came to be considered as the one of most finished performance.

Then classical Tuesdays were instituted. The accepted composers were represented and generally the programs followed a planned chronological or special trend course. Some of us who do not have to learn to like olives have looked upon the Tuesday ladies as reactionaries. Now a new system is announced. The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon programs will be identical.

At each of the remaining five of this shorter series of six paired concerts, falling monthly (with the exception of November) through April, there will be some soloist feature. Raya Garbousova, brilliant young Russian 'cellist who played in the Friday and Saturday series two years ago, will be soloist at the next of the short series—Dec. 27, 28. Robert Casadesus, French pianist of the family of virtuosos on ancient instruments, will make his first appearance with the orchestra. Orlando Barbera, the Italian violinist, is a distinguished newcomer. Daniele Amfitheatrof, the conductor of Russian birth and Italian training, yet to be heard in America, will be guest conductor of the January pair of concerts. Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti, first chairs in violin and 'cello of the orchestra, will be heard in Brahms' Double Concerto for Violin and Violincello.

Typical New England

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now that this supplementary series accommodates new subscribers, is becoming in essence the New England Symphony Orchestra. Ask for the makeup of its Monday and Tuesday patrons, and card index groups are pulled out indicating that there are substantial monthly pilgrimages to Symphony Hall, Boston shrine of the arts, from Vermont and New Hampshire towns; from Worcetser, Fall River, Plymouth, Gloucester and other localities. Plattsburg, New York, is the subscription town farthest removed.

The audience has a character of its own. They are "nice" people, intelligent people, but they are not the familiar types of old Bostonians, who attend on tradition and inheritance of location, with whom one has rubbed elbows for years on Friday afternoons. There are in particular, fewer debutante girls. College students, unable to secure reasonable seats for the original series, resort to the Tuesday matinees. There are many teachers listed. After study of types in auditorium and corridors Tuesday afternoon, it was realized that this audience is more genuinely representative of intellectual New England than, let us say, the present Saturday night throng.

The Program

For the first commuters' matinee, the program offered three distinct styles in music—the 17th century Haydn of the G major, No. 88; Prokofieff's gay, lightly taken "Lieutenant Kiji," Op. 60 and Sibelius' great Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 45.

Dr. Koussevitzky, whose infinitude of indicative gesture is one of the especial pleasures of attendance, played every shading of the Haydn so illuminatively in curve of arm or decisive drop; in summons and release; in a subtle moulding that seemed to have a single instrument obedient to his mind that one could fancy a musician deprived of hearing could sit, score in hand, before this performance with intense appreciation. There was a refinement of variation on the repeated theme of the Adagio, the treatment of the Menuetto as a semblance of conversational argument and a final turn of the hand that said: "n' import." Haydn's constant return to the beautiful theme of the Largo was one of the happy features of this symphony of essentially sunny aspect.

Prokofieff, grounded in the classics, is giving the world much light, rhythmic music with yet an air of aristocratic grace. For the wit of his scuttling measures that tell the life story of an officer who never existed save by an error made by Czar Paul I in reading a military report, we must thank a Soviet film that afforded opportunity for this incidental suite, deliciously inconsequential in its disposition of a diplomatically awkward incident. There is satirically military use of cornet, fife and drums.

A profoundly sympathetic reading of the Sibelius Second Symphony proved again Dr. Koussevitzky's renown as interpreter of the Finnish composer. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays Sibelius, we know one worthy of place with the great symphonists of past generations is being gloriously presented and perpetuated. To a neighboring Russian, there must be instinctive understanding of the mighty winds that sweep through the four movements—from tentative Allegretto to majestic Finale. Dr. Koussevitzky reveals the voice of a country. That he maintains so superbly the balance of choirs is a chief factor in the persuasive grandeur he brings out in the Allegro Moderato. In Tuesday's performance, as never before, one realized the molten gold of devotion given out by the brasses, yet never outplaying the cumulative mass; and the woodwinds gleamed unclouded through the sound texture.

New England commuters had inspiring memories of a felicitously made program to take on their homeward way.

A. C. R.

Brockton Enterprise
Oct. 27, 1937

Commuters' Concert Draws From Brockton

Many Brocktonians on Tuesday attended the first programme in the series of "commuters' matinees" being sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Series includes six such matinees to be presented monthly on Tuesday, omitting November, and the performances do not begin until 3 o'clock for the benefit of out-of-towners.

It was an ardent audience of music lovers that packed Symphony Hall to hear the great master, Serge Koussevitsky, and his 109 musicians open the group with Hadyn's Symphony No. 88.

That delightful early example of the symphony was followed by a work which had its first American performance by the Boston Symphony only a few weeks ago. It is the amusing suite from the soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije." The score is by Serge Prokofieff, a contemporary Russian. He gives musical expression to a legend which relates how a czar, in misreading the report of his military aide jumbled some words so as to form the non-existent name of "Lieutenant Kije." Since the courtiers dared not correct the czar, they invented details of the birth, marriage and death of the imaginary officer.

The creation of Kije in the first movement is symbolized by a cornet fanfare off stage, followed by a parade-like strut of the fife and drum. The second and third movements characterize his romance and wedding and finally his brief career is summed up in the movement entitled "The Burial of Kije." The vanishing voice of the muted cornet symbolically concludes Kije's, brief, riotous life. The introduction of this Russian composition was very popularly met.

The entire second half of the programme was devoted to the powerful Second Symphony of the great Finnish master, Sibelius. Both Haydn and Sibelius are popularly repeated on the symphony programmes, but the audience finds them equally stirring at each repetition.

The second matinee in the commuter series will be on Dec. 28 when Raya Garbousova, the young Russian 'cellist, will be soloist.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
OCT 27 '37

Enjoy "Commuters' Matinee"

Boston Symphony Opens Novel Series

BY ESTHER M. GUILFOY.

BOSTON, Oct. 26—Maintaining its tradition for expert musicianship, the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in its 57th season, delighted large numbers of music lovers from every state in New England who practically filled Symphony hall this afternoon for the first in a series of "Commuters' matinees," presented under the able leadership of the orchestra's noted conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. Painting delightful musical pictures, sometimes brilliant, sometimes subdued and sometimes strongly dramatic in hue, the orchestra was warmly acclaimed for its three artistic offerings.

Opening the program with the beautiful "Symphony in G Major, No. 88" by Haydn, the orchestra acquitted itself ably as it conveyed the lively brilliance, the pleasant recurring variations and the minor strains of "Adagio: Allegro" and "Largo," then swept into the cheerful "Menuetto; Trio" with its rustic dance strains and hurdy-gurdy drones; and finally into the "Finale: Allegro con spirito," in which the musicians played vividly the movement in rondo form, emphasizing its rolling blares, little staccato touches and quiet pianissimo gradually growing to a powerful conclusion.

First Time in U. S.

Presented for the first time in this country, the second number, "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestra Suite, Op. 60, by Prokofieff, proved a delightful innovation. Ethereal music backstage which developed into a cornet fanfare followed by a military drum tattoo and the shrill song of the fife introduced the "Birth of Kije" in spectacular fashion, which was followed by the "Romance" in which Max Kunze played the excellent double bass solo. "Kije's Wedding," a melodic movement was quickly followed by Troika, a rhythmic tavern song interspersed with the gay pealing of sleighbells.

The "Burial of Kije," who happened to be only an imaginary lieutenant, was carried out in cheerful vein with only an occasional plaintive touch, as the orchestra summed up his career by repeating the cornet fanfare which had introduced him, the themes which had characterized his romance and wedding and the muted cornet strains, gradually dwindling into insignficance as Kije is returned to the insubstantial medium of his birth.

The program was brought to a striking climax with "Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43" by Sibelius, in which the orchestra played with great exhuberance. Commencing with the sighing pulsation of the "Allegretto," the many elements were fused into a gradually mounting climax as the orchestra portrayed the drama with great crescendo effect. The lugubrious quality of "Tempo andante, ma rubato," with its stormy scales and undercurrent of whirring figures was cleverly carried by stormy scales and undercurrent of whirring figures was cleverly carried by the orchestra which then launched the "Vivacissimo; Lento e sauve," a tumultuous offering characterized by sharp but soft drum taps, and softly-rounded notes. The orchestra then with fire attacked "Finals: Allegro moderato," in zestful fashion, building up the melody into a striking display of musical fireworks.

The personnel of the orchestra is wide in range, the off-stage trumpet being played by 18-year-old Roger Boison, a full-fledged member of the orchestra, and the great crashing horn sounds in the big double quartet by 72-year-old Henry Lorbeer, for 50 years one of the nation's leading players of the horn.

During the intermission guests enjoyed visiting the various Symphony hall galleries in which were the interesting permanent collection of authentic old musical instruments ranging from the oldtime lute and hurdy-gurdy to the bass viol controlled with the knee grip. In another gallery were displayed summer paintings and wood carvings of Karoly Fulop as well as a collection of musical scores, original manuscripts and letters pertaining to composers whose works are being played at this time by the orchestra.

New Symphony Orchestra on the Pittsburgh Scene

Nov. 8/37

Josef Hofmann, Soloist, Begins His Jubilee Tour as Otto Klemperer, Conductor, Departs

By Moses Smith

Pittsburgh (By air mail)—The art of playing symphonic music in America does not begin and end in the three capitals of the Atlantic seaboard—Boston, New York and Philadelphia—where the art has been developed to a superlative degree. Of this we are inevitably made aware by the almost ceaseless issue of sound from the loud-speakers of radio boxes or by the steadily-widening circulation of phonograph records. Fortunately for the health of the art of music, people are still curious to see—and hear—in the flesh performers with whom an acquaintance has been made via an electrical apparatus. For this reason the early and seemingly justified fear of the competition between radio and the concert hall has been steadily diminishing, just as it had previously in the case of the phonograph. On the contrary, those who have the major control of our musical institutions have begun to realize that the widespread electrical reproduction of music actually helps business in the concert hall, because it has tended to stimulate a desire to frequent concerts in many people who had never previously been inside of a concert hall.

For whatever reason, symphony orchestras are flourishing in this country more than ever, in spite of the recent depression and in spite of (or because of, as the case may be) the radio and phonograph. Pittsburgh is a case in point. For seven years some sort of symphony society had been cultivated under the direction of Antonio Moderelli. In the face of initial public apathy, insufficient funds and the other expected difficulties he had succeeded in bringing the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra to such a stage of development that the "right people" began to notice its existence. They went further: decided the orchestra wanted re-organization, enlargement and general betterment; undertook the usual American procedure in such matters, including a "drive." The result emerged in the form of a good-sized orchestra of ninety musicians, on a basis of sixteen first violins and eight double basses.

A New Orchestra

In the process and for a reason too complicated and controversial to demand our present attention Mr. Moderelli resigned from the conductorship. He was replaced not by a single individual but by a whole series of conductors for the present season. The first three pairs of Thursday evening and Friday afternoon concerts, ending during the week just past, have been presided over by Otto Klemperer. The remaining eleven pairs are variously divided among Carlos Chavez, Michel Gusikoff (who is also the concert master); Eugene Goossens, Fritz Reiner, Walter Damrosch and Georges Enesco.

Mr. Klemperer had also been entrusted with the formation of the substantially new orchestra. For some months he has been busied in hearing and selecting musicians, and, for three weeks before the season began, in training and rehearsing the ensemble. How many and varied were his problems in the difficult local scene need not, again, concern us. Of the old orchestra finally only a relative few were left; the great majority of the new orchestra consists of new men, many of them from out of town.

Mr. Klemperer has evidently not been handicapped by some of the prevalent prejudices and limitations. For on Thursday night last, in the Syria Mosque, where the evening concerts are held, no fewer than four women's (or girls') heads were visible on stage—the two harpists, one of the first violins and even a French horn. The orchestral personnel, seated on a flat stage, seemed to vary in age from almost extreme youth to advanced maturity.

An estimate of the technical skill, beauty of tone and other musical qualities of the ensemble must be necessarily qualified by a number of considerations. One can scarcely hope to make an accurate appraisal on the basis of a single concert. One wants to know what the same conductor might accomplish, in the same program, with a familiar orchestra. The auditorium, a huge affair seating 3700 persons, and far wider than it is deep, obviously has tricky acoustics, which a reflecting shell, erected behind the musicians at Mr. Klemperer's wish, was designed to correct. The result is at best a compromise in favor of numbers, since Carnegie Music Hall, where the Friday afternoon concerts are played, a much more suitable and resonant concert auditorium, has a seating capacity of only 2000. Certainly on last Thursday night the almost preternatural prominence of the tone of double basses could not have been entirely due to the predilection the conductor.

Remarkable Achievement

In any event it was apparent that Mr. Klemperer has done a remakable job in six weeks. In a program that consisted of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, "Don Juan" by Strauss and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the orchestra revealed an excellent rhythmic ensemble, more than commendable technical proficiency and surprisingly good balance between the choirs and instruments. The intonation of the wind instruments was not flawless, but it was good. In general the wind instruments are not as secure as the strings; but such a disparity is to be expected at this stage. The degree of precision does not guarantee the sensitively rhythmic flow which is something more than a matter of simultaneous attack and release. But one is certainly an essential preparation for the other.

The best orchestral playing of the evening was in the accompaniment of the Beethoven Concerto, for which Josef Hofmann, beginning his Jubilee tour to mark a remarkable pianistic career of half a century in this country, was the solo pianist. It is late in the day to speak of Mr. Hofmann's tremendous musical and pianistic excellences. For the sake of the record it may be set down that they were once more revealed at this concert.

The quality of the accompaniment, though, was not so expected. Under Klemperer's direction there was an orchestral response uncannily accurate and sympathetic to every inflection of the piano voice. Here was the finest indication of Klemperer's own superlative musicianship and competence. He was conducting the entire program from memory—a procedure that has been much abused in recent years. But when it is done with the sureness and lack of self-consciousness that Klemperer displayed, its advantages are obvious. Klemperer was "with" the pianist at every moment; and because of him, so, too, was the orchestra. The resultant performance came as closely to achieving an ideal fusion of solo instrument and orchestra as this writer can readily recall.

Toward Reconciliation

Klemperer's "interpretations" of the successive numbers on the program were, for this writer, matters of less import than his general approach to musical performance. The most exciting was that of "Don Juan," even though the demands that work made on the musicians were the least fulfilled of any on the program. A slight heaviness in the first movement of the Mozart Symphony was the single serious cause for disagreement with Klemperer's version (though one was assured that Toscanini's way with the music is the same). The Debussy poem was definitely too heavy, though here the matter of orchestral tone and experience explains a good deal. But beyond this, Debussy seemed to have become Teutonized. The management of tempi and dynamics in the Wagner Prelude was a miracle of control and of concern for line and movement.

So far as one may judge from a single concert it may be said that Klemperer's concern is in general less with emphasizing contrasts in dynamics, pace and color than in reconciling them. He is, above all, a master of formal design and of the art of making design clear to the listener. This does not mean that he is a mere kapellmeister; it does mean, though, that he shies away from anything approaching distortion. He is, in fine, an extraordinarily sincere, gifted, proficient and profound master of the orchestra and of music written for it.

The audience that almost filled the large auditorium, which it would stretch the imagination to call a concert hall, was engrossed by the proceedings and gave vociferous and turbulent indication at the end of the concert that it was loathe to permit the conductor to depart, after his short beginning, to his "own" orchestra in Los Angeles. Closing one eye to the scene one might almost have mistaken the audience, from its demeanor and deportment, as the kind of aggregation one meets in Symphony Hall in Boston. Ambition for musical culture, one was happy to discover, is not confined to the middle Atlantic seaboard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Morning Telegraph

NOV 7 - 193

HubSymphony Sets Program

Orchestra Opens Season With Carnegie Hall Concerts November 18, 20.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season of five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 18 and 20. Serge Koussevitzky announces for the evening program the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven and the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major.

At this matinee, Jacques Fevrier, the French pianist now making his first visit to this country at the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear in the Concerto for the Left Hand, by Ravel. M. Fevrier made a close study of the work with its composer, and performed it with conspicuous success in Paris last month. The program will open with Prokofieff's Suite from incidental music which he wrote for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije." It will close with Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

SLONIMSKY'S BOOK VERY UNUSUAL

Post Nov. 7

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE art of music may or may not have gone upward in the past 37 years, but in certain respects it has gone onward with amazing speed. A staggeringly complete record of this extraordinarily interesting, if not necessarily fruitful period has now appeared in a volume entitled "Music Since 1900," by Nicolas Slonimsky of this city, and published by W. W. Norton & Co., Inc. It would be difficult to find any authority on music better qualified to summarize and comment upon the music of the 20th century than Mr. Slonimsky. For several years he has been collecting his material, and if any event of any consequence has been overlooked, it is not easy to put one's finger upon it off-hand.

Those who are familiar with Mr. Slonimsky's occasional writings and with his activities as conductor and concert-giver know that the range of his interests is wide. Consequently, we need not be surprised to find in his chronology such diverse items as these: "5 December 1901: Walt Disney, originator of the Silly Symphonies, cinematographic animated cartoons with a synchronized musical score, as well as the inventor of the famous character, Mickey Mouse, is born in Chicago."; "4 April 1936: Thirteen centuries have elapsed since the death of Isidor of Seville, who said that never could musical sounds be reproduced on paper in precise notation (scribi non possunt)."; "28 July 1901: Rudy Vallee (Herbert Prior Vallee), American protagonist of crooning (singing in head-tones, with blandly suggestive expression), is born in Vermont." and "1 January 1925: Fritz Klein-Linz publishes in 'Die Musik' an article, 'Frontiers of the Semitone World,' as part of his theory of 'musical statics,' suggesting new ways of combining tones and intervals, and giving the formula for a 'mother-chord' (Mutterakkord), which includes all twelve tones and all eleven different intervals, in the following invertible row, in semitones: 11, 8, 9, 10, 7, 6, 5, 2, 3, 4, 1. This row is not the only matrix; the combination 3, 7, 4, 2, 1, 6, 9, 5, 8, 10, 11 also gives an invertible mother-chord."

No musical chronicler would be expected to keep such a volume as this entirely free from bias and predilections, but we can readily excuse in Mr. Slonimsky a touch of partisanship in view of his lively interest in everything musical and in everything pertaining to music. We are reminded in his pages of the ridiculous pother over Strauss' "Salome" and of the various and unfortunately successful attempts to ban that opera in Boston. And there is much material on such matters as the ferocious baiting of Dr. Muck and of Hitler's attitude toward Jewish musicians.

A stickler for accuracy, Mr. Slonimsky has corrected date after date as given in various lexicons. Yet is it not a case of being penny-punctilious and pound-careless to point out that something happened not on Dec. 11 but on Dec. 12 and then to place the Funeral March in Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" in "Siegfried"? And if we are to be pernicketty, the key of the First Symphony of Josef Suk, the son-in-law of Dvorak, is not in E flat but E.

Mr. Slonimsky can say much in little. An indictment of modern civilization is concealed within the limits of this touching item: "5 August 1916: George Butterworth, English composer of the orchestral poem 'A Shropshire Lad' and other national-romantic music, is killed in action, as lieutenant of the Durham Light Infantry, after successfully taking an enemy trench at the head of a bombing party, 24 days after his 31st birthday."

Continued on Page 31

office, large store for rent

MUSIC NEWS

Continued from Page 27

Besides this chronology, always valuable and often fascinating, Mr. Slonimsky's book contains a concise biographical dictionary, which seemingly omits no name of any importance, and a collection of letters and documents which includes, among other things, the "Motu Proprio of Pope Pius X. on Sacred Music," with the appended black list of disapproved music and "The Ideological Platform of the Russian Association of Proletarian Musicians." The letters are from Bernard Shaw, Arnold Schoenberg and the president of the Composers' League of Japan.

MUSIC

Martha Baird Is Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra in Excellent Concert.—Debussy, Rachmaninoff Chamber Works Heard

By G. F. Loveridge

Mighty deeds of music were accomplished by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the command of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Metropolitan Theatre last night. It was the second concert of the orchestra's Providence season. The program was a good one, and the theatre was well filled.

The soloist was Martha Baird, of this city. She played the Mozart piano concerto in D-minor, and was received with gratifying enthusiasm by an audience that numbered many of her close friends and hundreds of other persons delighted to hear a Providence artist as soloist with so distinguished an orchestra. Miss Baird, who in private life is Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, was recalled five times to acknowledge the applause.

The concerto is not a difficult one, as far as playing the notes goes, but it requires refinement, grace and delicacy in the execution of it, and these qualities Miss Baird brought to it in abundance. At no time did she try to make it seem heavily dramatic or otherwise cloud and conceal the lucid flow of it. Minor key or no minor key, Eric Blom or no Eric Blom, we are unable to see much storm and stress in this concerto; it is wistful in season, and it has that nostalgia for imagined places that is pat of the strength of Mozart, but mostly it ripples and purls and dances.

There is no lack of supple vigor in this music. It must be played evenly and surely, and that is the way Miss Baird played it, with humor, too, and with affection. At times her turns were not sufficiently fluent and the tone was occasionally hard, but the impression was distinctly that of an artistic success.

Miss Baird played the Beethoven cadenzas very ably. It is our feeling, very likely unreasonable, that cadenzas ought to be done away with, that they add nothing essential to the performance, but rather hinder it. However, it is somewhat late to change so venerable a custom, and if we must have cadenzas, let them by all means be written by Beethoven.

The romanza received particularly gracious treatment at Miss Baird's hands. We should have liked to hear it over, for it is the sort of thing that Mozart could do better than anybody else and that Miss Baird sets forth with charm and distinction.

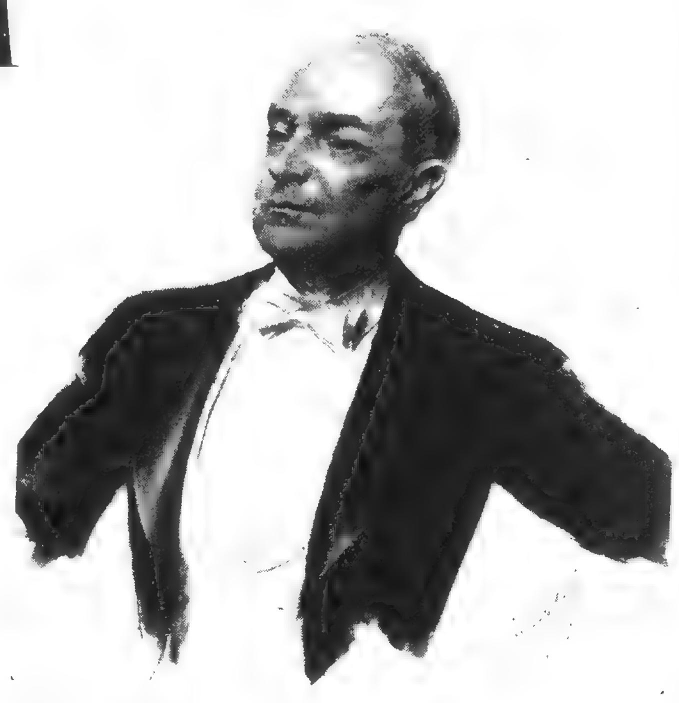
And what orchestral support! A famous violinist once said to us, after soloing with the Bostonians, "They hand it to you on a golden platter." And so they do.

There were two symphonies on the program, the Unfinished of Schubert, and the second of Sibelius. If the Unfinished has ever been played better than it was last night, one would surely have to hear it to believe it. Immediately, in the suave whisper of the 'cellos and the hushed voices of a score of violins playing as one, the quality of this orchestra was apparent. As fragile as a dream was this music wrought by Dr. Koussevitzky from the tones of strings, woodwinds, horns. These are the kind of moments that people go to concerts for. They make one forget taxes, politics and peace treaties. They prove that the 20th century can offer something nobler than the hamburger sandwich.

How odd a contrast was the Sibelius! The Boston Orchestra has been a powerful advocate of Sibelius for years and years, and gets the utmost from his music. We shall have to join the outcasts who find nothing of sunny Italy in this symphony, but prefer to feel northern winds, and hear the rude crashing of arctic seas. Sibelius declines to offer a program for his symphonies, so it would be indecorous of anybody else to do so, but doesn't one hear giants in this mysterious work, and feel the long, brooding darkness of the north? Artists often express a particular fondness for a small corner of some expansive painting, and so in this music one may find many favorite corners, such as the melody of oboes in the third movement, and that part of the finale where the bass players try to tear the strings off the instruments.

A Boston Symphony climax is like being tossed in blanket. One rises rhythmically higher and higher, and finally seems to hang suspended for a moment in the very clouds. What brings one down in blanket-tossing is gravity; what bring one to earth after a concert is the traffic jam. Apparently both are immutable.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

Five Concerts

Friday Evening ....November 19
Friday Evening ....January 7
Thursday Evening ....February 10
Friday Evening ....March 11
Friday Evening ....April 1

SUBSCRIPTION
Reserved Seat Tickets for the Series
$12.50, $10.00, $8.00, $7.00, $6.00, $5.00
Boxes: $15.00, $10.00, $8.00
NO TAX

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
OPERA HOUSE AT 8:30

SEASON
1937-1938

Series Tickets may be purchased at the Institute Box Office.
Mail Orders will be given prompt attention.

BULLETIN
OF THE
BROOKLYN INSTITUTE
of ARTS and SCIENCES

NOVEMBER 6, 1937 NUMBE

M. Robert Rogers

KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTING

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 7 - 1937

Boxholders for Boston Symphony Season Here

Box holders for the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn are announced by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman. Mrs. Edward C. Blum, a vice-chairman of the Brooklyn committee, is chairman of boxes.

Mrs. Davenport will entertain members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a tea at her home, 48 Monroe Place, tomorrow, to complete plans for the series of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. At the tea meeting, Mrs. Blum, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, new chairman of the Junior League committee, will make reports.

Box holders for the 52d season include: Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. James Maclay, Miss Florence Logan and Miss Mary E. Mills.

The series of five philanthropic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee.

The 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will open Friday evening, Nov. 19. The other dates in the series are Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday evening, Feb. 10; Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1.

Eight new members of the Brooklyn committee are Mrs. Ernest Ash, Theodore Fitch, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Maud B. Wood, Miss Elizabeth Wright and Edward J. A. Zeiner.

Members of Mrs. Badger's Junior League committee include Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Miss Edith Warren.

CONCERTS AT INSTITUTE

ymphony Orchestra. For [illegible]ury Brooklyn audiences have had the pleasure of listening to one of the great symphony orchestras of the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now in its fifty-seventh season, it continues to present with superb performances an epitome of the best music. Under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky it has, if it is possible, attained to new heights in the symphonic world. Each of the instrumentalists is a virtuoso in his own right, although only when a solo part falls to their lot does the general audience fully realize their flawless mastery.

Serge Koussevitzky's extraordinary powers of sympathetic and inspired interpretation are a byword to the musically initiated. And the layman, if he does not understand the difference between a symphony and a Strauss waltz, cannot but feel the magic of Koussevitzky's baton. Here is a conductor notorious for his belief that a classic is not something a composer has written in a glass cage. It is something to be perpetually rediscovered, something perpetually new. As Koussevitzky himself has said, "We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop what we sense there."

The program with which the Boston Symphony opens its Brooklyn series, Friday evening, November 19, reflects Dr. Koussevitzky's genius for selecting music that brings out the full tone of his orchestra. He will direct Haydn's "Symphony in G Major" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Jacques Février, guest sololist, will play Ravel's "Concerto for the Left Hand," the same concerto in which he gained so much applause at the Paris Conservatoire last October. His technical brilliance has won the acclaim of Ravel himself. This composition was written in 1931 for the Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm in the world war. Février has made an intimate study of the score with the composer. His rendering of this piano concerto is marked by his usual power and by the especial fidelity of a musician who shares the confidence of the composer.

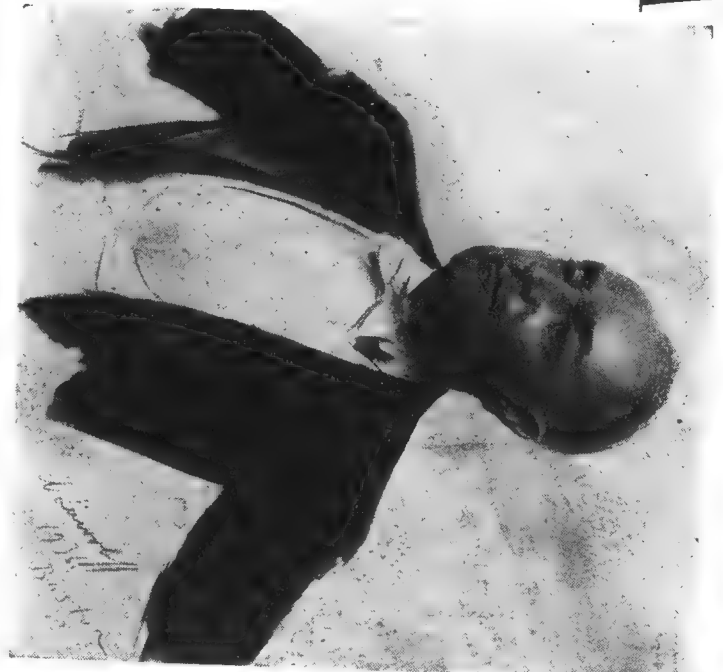
When Koussevitzky introduced Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," catcalls greeted what was called his audacity. It was largely through his efforts that Ravel's compositions were presented in America; if, like Debussy, Ravel is no longer a center of conflicting opinion but has an assured place in music, it is another tribute to Koussevitzky's tireless energy and vision. Sibelius, too, owes Dr. Koussevitzky a debt of gratitude for initial performances and for the manner in which his work has been performed. For Sibelius regards him as his most faithful interpreter.

In 1906, Dr. Koussevitzky had convinced the musical world that the double bass could be a virtuoso's instrument. Another colorful episode in the life of a great musician.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Five Concerts

Friday Evening	November 19
Friday Evening	January 7
Thursday Evening	February 10
Friday Evening	March 11
Friday Evening	April 1



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

SUBSCRIPTION
Reserved Seat Tickets for the Series
$12.50, $10.00, $8.00, $7.00, $6.00, $5.00
Boxes: $15.00, $10.00, $8.00
NO TAX

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
OPERA HOUSE AT 8:30

SEASON
1937-1938

Series Tickets may be purchased at the Institute Box Office.
Mail Orders will be given prompt attention.

BULLETIN
OF THE
BROOKLYN INSTITUTE of ARTS and SCIENCES

NOVEMBER 6, 1937 NUMBE

M. Robert Rogers

KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTING

BULLETIN OF BROOKLYN
INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

CONCERTS AT THE INSTITUTE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra. For over half a century Brooklyn audiences have had the pleasure of listening to one of the great symphony orchestras of the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now in its fifty-seventh season, it continues to present with superb performances an epitome of the best music. Under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky it has, if it is possible, attained to new heights in the symphonic world. Each of the instrumentalists is a virtuoso in his own right, although only when a solo part falls to their lot does the general audience fully realize their flawless mastery.

Serge Koussevitzky's extraordinary powers of sympathetic and inspired interpretation are a byword to the musically initiated. And the layman, if he does not understand the difference between a symphony and a Strauss waltz, cannot but feel the magic of Koussevitzky's baton. Here is a conductor notorious for his belief that a classic is not something a composer has written in a glass cage. It is something to be perpetually rediscovered, something perpetually new. As Koussevitzky himself has said, "We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop what we sense there."

The program with which the Boston Symphony opens its Brooklyn series, Friday evening, November 19, reflects Dr. Koussevitzky's genius for selecting music that brings out the full tone of his orchestra. He will direct Haydn's "Symphony in G Major" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Jacques Février, guest sololist, will play Ravel's "Concerto for the Left Hand," the same concerto in which he gained so much applause at the Paris Conservatoire last October. His technical brilliance has won the acclaim of Ravel himself. This composition was written in 1931 for the Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm in the world war. Février has made an intimate study of the score with the composer. His rendering of this piano concerto is marked by his usual power and by the especial fidelity of a musician who shares the confidence of the composer.

When Koussevitzky introduced Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," catcalls greeted what was called his audacity. It was largely through his efforts that Ravel's compositions were presented in America; if, like Debussy, Ravel is no longer a center of conflicting opinion but has an assured place in music, it is another tribute to Koussevitzky's tireless energy and vision. Sibelius, too, owes Dr. Koussevitzky a debt of gratitude for initial performances and for the manner in which his work has been performed. For Sibelius regards him as his most faithful interpreter.

In 1906, Dr. Koussevitzky had convinced the musical world that the double bass could be a virtuoso's instrument. Another colorful episode in the life of a great musician.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 7 - 1937

Boxholders f… Symphony

Box holders for the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn are announced by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman. Mrs. Edward C. Blum, a vice-chairman of the Brooklyn committee, is chairman of boxes.

Mrs. Davenport will entertain members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a tea at her home, 48 Monroe Place, tomorrow, to complete plans for the series of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. At the tea meeting, Mrs. Blum, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, new chairman of the Junior League committee, will make reports.

Box holders for the 52d season include: Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. James Maclay, Miss Florence Logan and Miss Mary E. Mills.

The series of five philanthropic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee.

The 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will open Friday evening, Nov. 19. The other dates in the series are Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday evening, Feb. 10; Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1.

Eight new members of the Brooklyn committee are Mrs. Ernest Ash, Theodore Fitch, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Maud B. Wood, Miss Elizabeth Wright and Edward J. A. Zeiner.

Members of Mrs. Badger's Junior League committee include Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Miss Edith Warren.

Reagan, Miss
Mrs. John F. H
Others act
Miss Josephine
F. Flanigan, Mrs.
Mrs. William A.
guerite McArdle,

Goossens in Traditional City of Music

Cincinnati Orchestra in Light Program with Richard Crooks as Soloist

By Moses Smith

CINCINNATI (By Air Mail)—The richness of musical tradition possessed by the "Gateway to the South" strikes a responsive chord on the visitor from the East. More than a century ago Cincinnati's musical culture was sufficient to cause foreign visitors to compare it with Boston's. The city itself, once one is out of the magnificent modern railroad terminal, suggests to the casual observer something of the easy-going attitude that spells established tradition. The ready, carefully-managed flow of vehicular traffic does not obscure the older buildings, of the American rococco period and even an earlier day, that are still the heart of downtown Cincinnati.

Music Hall, to which the concerts of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra have returned during the past two seasons, after an interregnum of twenty-five years in the new and smaller Emery Auditorium, is itself typical of the best and worst of the older style. The exterior, in red brick, frightens the approaching stranger with its warehouse-like ugliness. The interior, or that part which serves for concert-hall, has the old-time grandeur, ornateness and spaciousness of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York city, which it resembles somewhat. Its capacity is about 3600, even after a portion of the building has been given over to exhibitions like the auto show that caused an almost entire rerouting of the traffic of patrons to the concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

EUGENE GOOSSENS

Conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra since 1931

The Cincinnati Orchestra, conducted since 1931 by Eugene Goossens, and the Cincinnati May Festival, which has had a close association with it, were not late-comers to the American musical scene. The Festivals began in 1873 under Theodore Thomas, and have continued since then on a biennial basis. The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra was not founded until twenty-two years later, and it did not become the official orchestra of the Festival (which has a separate management and control) until 1905.

There have been some eminent names among the conductors of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Beginning with Frank Van der Stucken, the list has included successively Leopold Stokowski, Ernst Kunwald, Eugen Ysaye and Fritz Reiner. Like Mr. Goossens, several of these have also been conductors of the May Festival. The Orchestra has had varied financial fortunes in a little more than forty years. Because of difficulties with the Musical Union the controlling association discontinued concerts for a couple of seasons early in the century. The financial depression that began in 1929 affected the Cincinnati Orchestra as adversely as it did other musical organizations elsewhere. During the past two seasons, however, there has been a remarkable resurgence of popular support. The ticket sales have increased 79 per cent in that time; and not satisfied with a subscription list of over 5000 names, the organizing committee has set 6000 as its goal.

That explains why the audience of last Friday substantially filled the auditorium on a wet day that was not conducive to concert-going and that appreciably affected the usual sale of single tickets at the window. This audience looked and acted more or less like a similar assemblage at a matinee concert in Symphony Hall, Boston. Predominantly it consisted of women, of course. But there was perhaps a larger ratio of young persons than in the case of the Boston matinees. If the interest of an audience in the proceedings may be judged by its applause, this Cincinnati audience was as apathetic as a Boston audience can be, until the soloist, Richard Crooks, appeared on the stage. Thereafter its response was more animated; and its applause at the end of the tenor's second group of songs was sufficient to determine the insertion of an extra song by Strauss in spite of the note in the program which not only promised "no encores" but underlined the promise with "positively."

For the concert Mr. Goossens had assembled a program which he frankly characterized as light. It was none the less engaging, so far as the visitor was concerned. It began with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," which was delightfully played, and ended with Chabrier's "Espana." It also contained an unfamiliar Symphony in A major by Boccherini, slightly revised by Karl Geiringer and performed at this concert, it was believed in Cincinnati, for the first time in America. It turned out to be a piece worthy of the careful, refined ministrations lavished upon it by Mr. Goossens. A sort of "symphony concertant," it contained frequent dialogues between solo instruments and the rest of the ensemble, including a particularly ingratiating one in the slow minuet.

The other purely orchestral number was also unfamiliar: Turina's "Sinfonia Sevillana," a light but enjoyable suite of three movements with titles, for clues, "Panorama," "By the Guadalquivir" and "Fiesta at San Juan de Aznalfarache." Just before the performance began, immediately after intermission, Mr. Goossens made what was said to be one of his rare speeches. Someone evidently had objected to insertion of Spanish music at a time of bitter internal strife in Spain, with the intimation that it indicated, on the part of the conductor, taking sides. The conductor's brief and apt remarks were, in turn, devoted to disillusioning the possessor of any such notion.

Mr. Crooks, for his part, sang in excellent voice and appropriate style an air by Bach in English ("If Thou Be Near"), Beethooven's "Adelaide" and two airs from Massenet's "Manon" ("Le reve" and "Ah, fuyez, douce image!"). The quality of his voice, singing and intelligent interpretation was such as to justify his high place on the contemporary operatic and concert stages.

Mr. Goossens is an admirable conductor and he has the assistance of an excellent orchestra, which, unfortunately, has not yet recovered from the depression "cuts," and which, at less than eighty men, is not only considerably smaller than the big orchetras of the East but also too small for the large hall where it now plays. The violins, of which there are only twenty-four in the two sections, are, of course, the least adequate in number, though in technical proficiency and variety of style they were not at all inadequate on Friday. Similarly, almost man for man, the rest of the orchestra seemed to be a most efficient company on a standard comparable with that of the best eastern orchestras. In a work like Chabrier's Rhapsody it did not achieve the required sonority because, in addition to the handicap of numbers, it was playing in a large auditorium. The latter condition also operated to cut down the effectiveness of the orchestra in the other numbers, which were almost in a chamber music style. Here especially the orchestra would have sounded very well in a smaller auditorium.

Without any grandiloquent show of authority Mr. Goossens was nevertheless a most authoritative conductor (as may be recalled from his guest appearances with the Boston Symphor Orchestra some years ago).

The Morning After

With the graceful talented playing of Martha Baird, familiar to Providence society as Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, supplementing its own inspiring performance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its second Providence concert of the season last night in the Metropolitan Theatre.

Playing Mozart's "Concerto in D-minor for Pianoforte", Miss Baird showed her talents in the most accomplished rendition of technical and beautiful passages. Blending back and forth with the orchestra in the utmost grace, her playing of the Romanza transformed the music into incomparable sweetness. After being called back to the stage five times, Miss Baird, overflowing with enthusiasm for the orchestra, declared it to be the "greatest orchestra in the world . . . I have played with orchestras throughout this country and in Europe and no other plays this with such beauty as Koussevitzky"

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" thrilled the audience just as it has in every one of it's presentations and as it will in countless concerts in the future. From the first cello crescendo imperceptibly breaking into audibility, through the gentle bouncing of the melody among the various sections into the final beautiful notes, it is a symphony which, while only partly composed, is probably more successful than any of Schubert's others.

Closing the program with Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Koussevitzky brought once again to this country the work of a Finnish composer, thoroughly imbibed (?) with a loyalty and native spirit of Finland. A contemporary writer, his music is filled with the surprises of modern life. Jumping from subdued and serious passages he skips into a round of theme throughout the orchestra. Opening with a magnificent movement, indicating the composer's happy life at that time, the symphony then seems to move into a mystic interpretation of a power behind life, out of reach of gratuitous pleadings, but yet leading the world in its beautiful spirit. From this, it turns into an exultant mood, rejoicing in things as they are and closes with a movement of pondering and reflection on the general beauty of nature.

Received as enthusiastically as usual, the Boston Symphony gave its Providence subscribers a magnificent performance, and leaves the city until its third concert on January 25.

—C. T. F.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish Advocate

By JULES WOLFFERS

Nov. 12/37

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music and clothes have this much in common: both are subject to fads and fashions, modes and outmodes. Mendelssohn, for example, after a long period of comparative neglect, seems to be coming back to favor, one might almost say, seems to be coming back in style. To sneer at a composer because he is not a Bach or Beethoven is about as senseless as to despise all dramatists except Shakespeare. There are those who feel that Mendelssohn is a fine composer, that he has much to say, and that he says most of it every well indeed. To these the fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must have been most welcome, containing as it did Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony." This work is pleasant, interesting, lively and gracious—gracious with that typically Mendelssohnian suavity of expression. True, it falls a little short of the heights, but not too far short to cause any misgivings, not to say lifted eyebrows, on the part of music-lovers without prejudice of one kind or another.

It is sometimes our bad habit to put the last first. To keep the record straight, Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with "Tapiola"—that "mysterious, brooding" Tone Poem in which Sibelius musically shows his mastery of structural technique, emotionally carries us to his beloved Finnish woods. Next we heard the first performance in the United States of "Ballet Music" by the Hungarian composer, Kodaly. This is not meant to be serious music, in fact, quite the reverse. Kodaly had in mind, we imagine, an eccentric-satirical-mocking-humorous ballet of modern times. A welcome addition to musicomedy, this, almost as good as the "Lieutenant Kije" heard earlier in the season. Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture received a marvelous reading by the conductor to close the first portion of the program. The Mendelssohn, of course, was the final number of an interesting and brilliantly executed concert.

State Symphony Orchestra

Swing, and real swing at that, invaded the somewhat staid atmosphere of Sanders Theatre last Sunday evening, when a Fugue and Variations written by Bertram Colter for swing band received its first hearing in transcribed concert form. Alexander Thiede took the role of Benny Goodman (without the clarinet) and his men took a fling at night-club life with the assistance of a sprinkling of professional swingsters come to show these here symphony men up. Talk about rhythm! This fugue sets the feet going plenty. But seriously, this piece is a fine example of American music written by a man of considerable ingenuity, and so we leave swing and come to Wagner.

The dramatic soprano, Rosamund Chapin, was soloist in Santa's Ballad from the "Flying Dutchman," and in the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Mrs. Chapin has a good voice and an excellent Wagner style. Tschaikowsky's Fifth

(Continued on page 14)

MUSIC IN REVIEW

(Continued from page 12)

Symphony brought an enjoyable concert to a close.

This was the best performance by the State Symphony Orchestra this season. Continued work of this quality will do much to keep the Federal Music Project a vital force in the musical life of Boston.

Walter Mills

Last Tuesday evening at Jordan Hall, Walter Mills, baritone, was heard in a well chosen program containing three Handel arias, a group of Brahms lieder, Russian songs (sung in English) by Gretchaninoff and Rachmaninoff, and a group of English and American songs.

Mr. Mills has some decidedly good vocal qualities together with commendably clear diction and an easy platform presence. He is, however, somewhat too emphatic in his interpretations, leaving nothing to the imagination and overstating the obvious. A simple, unassuming style of singing is entirely suitable to Mr. Mills' voice and to his gentlemanly personality: a more restrained manner would, furthermore, never run the risk of being termed in bad taste. But there is no doubt that the recital left us with a good impression in Mr. Mills' abilities, particularly with his Brahms which was treated in an entirely sympathetic manner.

Alderson Mowbray was the effective accompanist.

Goossens in Traditional City of Music

Cincinnati Orchestra in Light Program with Richard Crooks as Soloist

By Moses Smith

EUGENE GOOSSENS

Conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra since 1931

CINCINNATI (By Air Mail)—The richness of musical tradition possessed by the "Gateway to the South" strikes a responsive chord on the visitor from the East. More than a century ago Cincinnati's musical culture was sufficient to cause foreign visitors to compare it with Boston's. The city itself, once one is out of the magnificent modern railroad terminal, suggests to the casual observer something of the easy-going attitude that spells established tradition. The ready, carefully-managed flow of vehicular traffic does not obscure the older buildings, of the American rococco period and even an earlier day, that are still the heart of downtown Cincinnati.

Music Hall, to which the concerts of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra have returned during the past two seasons, after an interregnum of twenty-five years in the new and smaller Emery Auditorium, is itself typical of the best and worst of the older style. The exterior, in red brick, frightens the approaching stranger with its warehouse-like ugliness. The interior, or that part which serves for concert-hall, has the old-time grandeur, ornateness and spaciousness of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York city, which it resembles somewhat. Its capacity is about 3600, even after a portion of the building has been given over to exhibitions like the auto show that caused an almost entire rerouting of the traffic of patrons to the concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The Cincinnati Orchestra, conducted since 1931 by Eugene Goossens, and the Cincinnati May Festival, which has had a close association with it, were not late-comers to the American musical scene. The Festivals began in 1873 under Theodore Thomas, and have continued since then on a biennial basis. The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra was not founded until twenty-two years later, and it did not become the official orchestra of the Festival (which has a separate management and control) until 1905.

There have been some eminent names among the conductors of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Beginning with Frank Van der Stucken, the list has included successively Leopold Stokowski, Ernst Kunwald, Eugen Ysaye and Fritz Reiner. Like Mr. Goossens, several of these have also been conductors of the May Festival. The Orchestra has had varied financial fortunes in a little more than forty years. Because of difficulties with the Musical Union the controlling association discontinued concerts for a couple of seasons early in the century. The financial depression that began in 1929 affected the Cincinnati Orchestra as adversely as it did other musical organizations elsewhere. During the past two seasons, however, there has been a remarkable resurgence of popular support. The ticket sales have increased 79 per cent in that time; and not satisfied with a subscription list of over 5000 names, the organizing committee has set 6000 as its goal.

That explains why the audience of last Friday substantially filled the auditorium on a wet day that was not conducive to concert-going and that appreciably affected the usual sale of single tickets at the window. This audience looked and acted more or less like a similar assemblage at a matinee concert in Symphony Hall, Boston. Predominantly it consisted of women, of course. But there was perhaps a larger ratio of young persons than in the case of the Boston matinees. If the interest of an audience in the proceedings may be judged by its applause, this Cincinnati audience was as apathetic as a Boston audience can be, until the soloist, Richard Crooks, appeared on the stage. Thereafter its response was more animated; and its applause at the end of the tenor's second group of songs was sufficient to determine the insertion of an extra song by Strauss in spite of the note in the program which not only promised "no encores" but underlined the promise with "positively."

For the concert Mr. Goossens had assembled a program which he frankly characterized as light. It was none the less engaging, so far as the visitor was concerned. It began with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," which was delightfully played, and ended with Chabrier's "Espana." It also contained an unfamiliar Symphony in A major by Boccherini, slightly revised by Karl Geiringer and performed at this concert, it was believed in Cincinnati, for the first time in America. It turned out to be a piece worthy of the careful, refined ministrations lavished upon it by Mr. Goossens. A sort of "symphony concertant," it contained frequent dialogues between solo instruments and the rest of the ensemble, including a particularly ingratiating one in the slow minuet.

The other purely orchestral number was also unfamiliar: Turina's "Sinfonia Sevillana," a light but enjoyable suite of three movements with titles, for clues, "Panorama," "By the Guadalquivir" and "Fiesta at San Juan de Aznalfarache." Just before the performance began, immediately after intermission, Mr. Goossens made what was said to be one of his rare speeches. Someone evidently had objected to insertion of Spanish music at a time of bitter internal strife in Spain, with the intimation that it indicated, on the part of the conductor, taking sides. The conductor's brief and apt remarks were, in turn, devoted to disillusioning the possessor of any such notion.

Mr. Crooks, for his part, sang in excellent voice and appropriate style an air by Bach in English ("If Thou Be Near"), Beethooven's "Adelaide" and two airs from Massenet's "Manon" ("Le reve" and "Ah, fuyez, douce image!"). The quality of his voice, singing and intelligent interpretation was such as to justify his high place on the contemporary operatic and concert stages.

Mr. Goossens is an admirable conductor and he has the assistance of an excellent orchestra, which, unfortunately, has not yet recovered from the depression "cuts," and which, at less than eighty men, is not only considerably smaller than the big orchetras of the East but also too small for the large hall where it now plays. The violins, of which there are only twenty-four in the two sections are, of course, the least adequate in number, though in technical proficiency and variety of style they were not at all inadequate on Friday. Similarly, almost man for man, the rest of the orchestra seemed to be a most efficient company on a standard comparable with that of the best eastern orchestras. In a work like Chabrier's Rhapsody it did not achieve the required sonority because, in addition to the handicap of numbers, it was playing in a large auditorium. The latter condition also operated to cut down the effectiveness of the orchestra in the other numbers, which were almost in a chamber music style. Here especially the orchestra would have sounded very well in a smaller auditorium.

Without any grandiloquent show of authority Mr. Goossens was nevertheless a most authoritative conductor (as may be recalled from his guest appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago).

The Morning After

With the graceful talented playing of Martha Baird, familiar to Providence society as Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, supplementing its own inspiring performance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its second Providence concert of the season last night in the Metropolitan Theatre.

Playing Mozart's "Concerto in D-minor for Pianoforte", Miss Baird showed her talents in the most accomplished rendition of technical and beautiful passages. Blending back and forth with the orchestra in the utmost grace, her playing of the Romanza transformed the music into incomparable sweetness. After being called back to the stage five times, Miss Baird, overflowing with enthusiasm for the orchestra, declared it to be the "greatest orchestra in the world . . . I have played with orchestras throughout this country and in Europe and no other plays this with such beauty as Koussevitzky"

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" thrilled the audience just as it has in every one of it's presentations and as it will in countless concerts in the future. From the first cello crescendo imperceptibly breaking into audibility, through the gentle bouncing of the melody among the various sections into the final beautiful notes, it is a symphony which, while only partly composed, is probably more successful than any of Schubert's others.

Closing the program with Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Koussevitzky brought once again to this country the work of a Finnish composer, thoroughly imbibed (?) with a loyalty and native spirit of Finland. A contemporary writer, his music is filled with the surprises of modern life. Jumping from subdued and serious passages he skips into a round of theme throughout the orchestra. Opening with a magnificent movement, indicating the composer's happy life at that time, the symphony then seems to move into a mystic interpretation of a power behind life, out of reach of gratuitous pleadings, but yet leading the world in its beautiful spirit. From this, it turns into an exultant mood, rejoicing in things as they are and closes with a movement of pondering and reflection on the general beauty of nature.

Received as enthusiastically as usual, the Boston Symphony gave its Providence subscribers a magnificent performance, and leaves the city until its third concert on January 25.

—C. T. F.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish Advocate

By JULES WOLFFERS

Nov. 12/37

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music and clothes have this much in common: both are subject to fads and fashions, modes and outmodes. Mendelssohn, for example, after a long period of comparative neglect, seems to be coming back to favor, one might almost say, seems to be coming back in style. To sneer at a composer because he is not a Bach or Beethoven is about as senseless as to despise all dramatists except Shakespeare. There are those who feel that Mendelssohn is a fine composer, that he has much to say, and that he says most of it every well indeed. To these the fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must have been most welcome, containing as it did Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony." This work is pleasant, interesting, lively and gracious—gracious with that typically Mendelssohnian suavity of expression. True, it falls a little short of the heights, but not too far short to cause any misgivings, not to say lifted eyebrows, on the part of music-lovers without prejudice of one kind or another.

It is sometimes our bad habit to put the last first. To keep the record straight, Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with "Tapiola"—that "mysterious, brooding" Tone Poem in which Sibelius musically shows his mastery of structural technique, emotionally carries us to his beloved Finnish woods. Next we heard the first performance in the United States of "Ballet Music" by the Hungarian composer, Kodaly. This is not meant to be serious music, in fact, quite the reverse. Kodaly had in mind, we imagine, an eccentric-satirical-mocking-humorous ballet of modern times. A welcome addition to musicomedy, this, almost as good as the "Lieutenant Kije" heard earlier in the season. Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture received a marvelous reading by the conductor to close the first portion of the program. The Mendelssohn, of course, was the final number of an interesting and brilliantly executed concert.

State Symphony Orchestra

Swing, and real swing at that, invaded the somewhat staid atmosphere of Sanders Theatre last Sunday evening, when a Fugue and Variations written by Bertram Colter for swing band received its first hearing in transcribed concert form. Alexander Thiede took the role of Benny Goodman (without the clarinet) and his men took a fling at night-club life with the assistance of a sprinkling of professional swingsters come to show these here symphony men up. Talk about rhythm! This fugue sets the feet going plenty. But seriously, this piece is a fine example of American music written by a man of considerable ingenuity, and so we leave swing and come to Wagner.

The dramatic soprano, Rosamund Chapin, was soloist in Santa's Ballad from the "Flying Dutchman," and in the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Mrs. Chapin has a good voice and an excellent Wagner style. Tschaikowsky's Fifth

(Continued on page 14)

MUSIC IN REVIEW

(Continued from page 12)

Symphony brought an enjoyable concert to a close.

This was the best performance by the State Symphony Orchestra this season. Continued work of this quality will do much to keep the Federal Music Project a vital force in the musical life of Boston.

Walter Mills

Last Tuesday evening at Jordan Hall, Walter Mills, baritone, was heard in a well chosen program containing three Handel arias, a group of Brahms lieder, Russian songs (sung in English) by Gretchaninoff and Rachmaninoff, and a group of English and American songs.

Mr. Mills has some decidedly good vocal qualities together with commendably clear diction and an easy platform presence. He is, however, somewhat too emphatic in his interpretations, leaving nothing to the imagination and overstating the obvious. A simple, unassuming style of singing is entirely suitable to Mr. Mills' voice and to his gentlemanly personality: a more restrained manner would, furthermore, never run the risk of being termed in bad taste. But there is no doubt that the recital left us with a good impression in Mr. Mills' abilities, particularly with his Brahms which was treated in an entirely sympathetic manner.

Alderson Mowbray was the effective accompanist.

36

Finely Contrasted Program Stirs Symphony Audience

Trans. Nov. 13/37

Jacques Fevrier Gives a Notable Reading of Ravel Concerto, "Heldenleben" Thrilling

By Redfern Mason

It almost seemed as if the Symphony audience were determined to destroy once for all the superstition that Bostonians are an unresponsive audience. They may not be easy to please, it is true, but the applause with which they rewarded Jacques Fevrier after the Ravel left-hand Concerto, and the enthusiasm they manifested at the close of "Heldenleben" proved, if it needs to be proved, that the real instrument upon which music is made is, in the last analysis, the audience. And that instrument, here in Boston, is not unworthy of our magnificent orchestra and of Serge Koussevitzky, its director.

The program was a stimulating, a provocative one. It began with the youthful Mozart of the A major Symphony (K. 201); it became contemporary with the Ravel, and it waxed Olympian with the musical autobiography of Richard Strauss.

It was the real Mozart who wrote that symphony, although he was only a lad of eighteen when he composed it; the real Wolfgang Amadeus is in it from end to end. There was one sad moment, however, when some interloper, who had got by the sentries, let a door slam. Koussevitzky rapped with his baton; the orchestra ceased playing and for a few seconds there was an awful silence. Then our musical Napoleon began again, and the music moved on with Mozartean fluidity and grace, just as if nothing had happened. The irritated gods were appeared.

Here the audience was placidly complacent. The Mozart pleased them, and they were content. But they were not wrought up to warm demonstration. It was only when Mr. Fevrier was seated at the keyboard and the bass reeds intoned crytic harmonies that they were stirred. I think they were wondering whether the work would prove the usual cheval de bataille that composers write when they are building up a work with a pianist of the left hand for soloist. But they were happily disappointed. True, the Concerto had been played here before by the one-armed pianist for whom it was composed. But here was an artist who, with the normal manual equipment, chose to do what is commonly regarded as a "stunt," and prove it something more important.

Fevrier is Gallic to the core; he makes good the old saying of Madame de Stael that "what is not clear is not French." And he has distinction. This quality enables him to be masculine even in soft passages; he has the gentleness of power; he can make a pianissimo rich with significance.

And Ravel has given him music that has meat in it. Those Debussyan progressions have become almost native with him, and today they constitute a declaration of independence from Teutonic influence that will prove more enduring than the excesses of the Treaty of Versailles. Ravel's music is of today; yet, at the same time, it is never rampageously modernistic. It is contemporary; the exasperation of a troubled world is in it; yet there is a poise which seems to suggest that we shall "muddle through" our troubles and perhaps emerge the better for our sorrowings.

There are American reactions in this music. I remember how thrilled by jazz Ravel was when he visited the Pacific Coast, and how delighted he was when a player in a darkey band extracted from a bent saw a sound that tore through the music with a steely blare. "I shall put that into a composition of my own," he said and, with the aid of the trumpet, he has done it here.

The audience was delighted alike with the soloist and with the composition.

Last and most glorious of all came "Heldenleben," that battle between the creative artist and the Philistines. Wonderful, Dionysian music begins it, with a smack of "Don Juan" in the principle melody. It is youth pouring out its dreams. But the pedants who snarled at Beethoven and Wagner in their time are not long silent. The Beckmessers of reactionaryism voice their querulous protests through the reeds. It almost seems, for a moment, as if the composer were disconcerted. Then comes the voice of the violin, like another Beatrice inspiring her poet with the Beatific vision. Nobly Richard Burgin played that music and I am sure that the audience was grateful to him. Idylic music is heard again, only to be followed, after a time, by the grumbling brass, with the critics expressing the deadness of their souls in open fifths. The score is a veritable battle between the cohorts of light and darkness.

The composer comforts himself with reminiscences of moments in which Minerva was kind to him and the candle of genius burned bright. He calls to mind one of his loveliest songs, "Tran durch die Daemmerung"; he recalls the grandeurs of "Tod und Verklarung." The birds of evil augury keep up their clamor; but, as is the case in "Die Meistersinger," the voice of the multitude, which obeys honest instincts and is not blinded by pedantry, drowns out all opposition, and the end is the peace of heroic self realization.

If ever there was a satisfied audience, it was that of yesterday afternoon, and their applause must have been music in the ears of Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Boston's Best Publicity Is the Symphony

Its Quality Is a Cultural Advertisement Which Carries the Fame of New England All Round the World

Trans. Nov. 13/37

By REDFERN MASON

If Henry Lee Higginson, a successful business man as well as a lover of music, had not founded the Symphony, Boston might today lack its best advertisement. Emerson, Thoreau and Oliver Wendel Holmes made the city free of the world of humanism; the Widener Library at Harvard brings pilgrims from other lands to consult volumes which Europe could not afford to keep, but the Symphony has brought orchestral supremacy to the New World.

Just as Americans feel that they owe themselves a knowledge of the culture of the Old World, so today the tide of European tourism is setting westward and people come from every land to hear the Boston Symphony. A generation ago foreigners were loath to believe that any good culturally could come out of the United States. They admitted our ability in the realm of commerce; they admired our achievements in invention; but they were slow to confess that we had done anything admirable in the arts. We were "dollar princes" just as our women folk were "dollar princesses"; but it took a man of the stature of Henry Lee Higginson to demonstrate to their satisfaction that an American could be a Maecenas.

And, curious to relate, though today the Old World is paying belated tribute to what the Boston Symphony has accomplished, many of our men of affairs fail to recognize that this great orchestra is one of the best assets that New England possesses. They may vaguely be conscious that at every concert of the Symphony people are present from every State in New England, from New York and from Pennsylvania; but they seem strangely unaware of the fact that these strangers within the gate spend money here, that they carry the fame of Boston afar, that, in a way, they become missionaries of one of the best phases of the Boston spirit. If they knew how Boston is envied for her musical prestige; if they were alive to the value of the publicity which the Symphony has given the city all over the world, they would recognize their indebtedness in act, and, like good providers, make a subscription an annual investment.

More than that, they would themselves attend the concerts. For the business man whose mind is never off his books, his eyes always glued to the tape, is like a field which is never allowed to lie fallow. He becomes a mere slave of business routine, a piler up of capital which he can never enjoy to the full. The late George Eastman confessed to the writer that he had the good luck to find out before it was too late the error of too close application to business. "I found that the fellows about me, my clerks and associates, were getting something out of life which I, for all my wealth, was missing. They liked music, and they came to work fresh and invigorated because they sang or played an instrument and went to concerts." So he installed an organ in his home and got a man to play it for him and tell him what the music was all about. He soon grew interested, and later he brought together a string quartet. He attended the rehearsals; he gave recitals for his friends. Slowly but surely the conviction came over him that music was a socializing force; he found out that money invested by cities in bands, orchestra and choral societies lessened the expenditure in police and courts. Eventually he invested $13,000,000 in founding a school of music, and today that school brings students to Rochester, N. Y., from all parts of the United States.

Such is the experience of one of America's leading industrialists. Otto Kahn told a similar tale.

Reflect for a moment on the idealism, the infinite pains it has taken to make the Boston Symphony what it is. Not only had a great orchestra to be created, but a public had to be taught to enjoy the great things it did. When Gericke came in 1888, he found "some musicians, but hardly an orchestra." He it was who engaged Franz Kneisel as concert master and initiated the regime under which, to quote the words of Philip Hale, "the orchestra is a virtuoso." When Nikisch arrived he exclaimed, when he heard the men play: "All I have to do is to poetize." Richard Strauss, hearing his works played better than he could hear them in Europe, cried out in delight: "I wish I could have this orchestra in Europe to perform all the Beethoven symphonies."

Karl Muck, magician of the most sensitive beat of our generation, stopped in the middle of a Beethoven symphony and let the orchestra play without director. Rabaud imparted Gallic delicacy; but Mr. Higginson remarked that "only a Wiener Kind can play Schubert." Another Frenchman, Pierre Monteux, broke away somewhat from the classic tradition. He performed works by Bax and Holst, Respighi, Moussorgsky and Stravinski, the Spaniards Albeniz and De Falla, such Americans as Griffes, Loeffler and Burlingame Hill. He even had the courage to play the "Sacre du Printemps," and H. T. P. was able to describe him as "the savior of an illustrious orchestra." Today we have Serge Koussevitzky, of whom Ernest Newman said: "He aims at the superman." He it is who gave us the glorious performance of the Bach St. Matthew Passion. If he could have made the audience join the chorales, he would have raised Boston to the choral excellence of Bethlehem, Pa., where the whole populace sings.

In 1915 the Symphony visited San Francisco and gave daily concerts for a couple of weeks. The city had a symphony of its own, a poor one, and the director, Henry Hadley, was a better composer than leader. That series of concerts had a radical effect on public taste. Alfred Hertz was engaged as director and today the baton is wielded by Pierre Monteux. So notable has been the educational effect of the orchestra that today the people of San Francisco pay a tax which partly covers the inevitable deficit.

Could it be that Mayor-elect Tobin, who is young and presumably open to ideas which are, locally at least, new, though they are old in Europe, will induce the citizens of Boston to come to the aid of our Symphony through the rates? It would suffice if they paid the deficit. Of course, the government of the orchestra must be kept out of politics. Still, the Mayor might ex officio be one of the governors.

Tardy Arrivals Irk Koussevitzky; He Halts Music; They All but Swoon

Late comers to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday all but swooned with chagrin as the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, abruptly stopped the orchestra and waited until they were seated. The group had managed to tiptoe past the vigilant ushers after a movement of a Mozart symphony had begun. Dr. Koussevitzky became aware of them, slapped the music before him with his baton, and stood with his arms folded until all was quiet.

Although it is understood with all major orchestras throughout the world that the conductor has absolute power that extends to audiences as well as the personnel of his orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky has never taken advantage of this to address a reprimand to an audience in Symphony Hall or elsewhere. Conductor Leopold Stokowski of Philadelphia has been known to give his listeners tart lectures on punctuality as has Sir Thomas Beecham of London.

The protest of the folded arms and the hushed orchestra has been used so seldom by the conductor of the Boston Symphony that members of his faithful audiences have the occasions by heart. The last time Dr. Koussevitzky did this was at the beginning of last season when a tardy photographer took a picture with a flash bulb as the orchestra had begun to play the first measure of a symphony.

Transcript, Sat, Nov 13/37

Symphony's Pianist Soloist Wins Praise

Am. Feb. 13/37

By RUTH MARSTERS

The music making at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon revolved upon the personalities of Mozart, Ravel, Strauss, Koussevitzky, and Fevrier with results not lacking in effectiveness.

Though new to Boston, the pianistic skill of Jacques Fevrier has made the diffident young Frenchman a more or less prominent figure in his native musical circle. (He has been chosen on more than one occasion by such composers as Florence Schmitt and Stravinsky for the precious task of introducing their works.)

A shy, slight, person whose horn rimmed glasses hint of the professorial rather than the artistic type, Mr. Fevrier's appearance as he comes upon the stage is anything but prepossessing. This, however, it must be said at once, is utterly belied as soon as he begins to play when he becomes immediately transformed into a dynamo of rhythmic energy and tonal audacity.

* * *

The Ravel Concerto for the left hand obviously requires a fabulous technique on the part of the soloist, and Mr. Fevrier's role was one made more exacting on still another count.

For the Ravel Concerto is not, like Mr. Fevrier, new to Boston. It was played on a previous occasion which few will forget by that eminently brilliant virtuoso, Paul Wittgenstein, for whom it was expressly written. It was, in short, such a performance as to put s ceeding interpreters in a spot.

That Mr. Fevrier contended victoriously with the double difficulty is reason enough for congratulations.

His playing is energetic, clean cut, and—in this—dazzlingly skillful. The quality of tone was never sharp even in the highest octaves of the keyboard. Which is a feat for the left hand in any case even when the tone produced is not as limpid as Mr. Fevrier's.

The orchestra gave its usual fine cooperation under Dr. Koussevitzky's persuasive prompting.

* * *

Enjoyment of Mozart's Symphony in A Major (K. 201) was marred when the usual cordial relationship between conductor and audience was exploded in the second movement.

The gentle Andante was only just begun when its progress was halted abruptly by the vehement command of Dr. Koussevitzky whose baton suddenly made peremptory contact with the score. The untimely rustlers in the audience subsided, a hush of quiet ensued, and the performance was resumed. Such tactics have not heretofore been found necessary.

Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," which brought the concert to its close was given a glowing performance that lent interest to music inclined to idle upon its way. (Nothing was lost, really. Strauss manages to be charming even when dilatory.)

The performance as a whole was greatly enhanced by the manner of Richard Burgin's playing of the solo passages. He was in excellent vein and should have been rewarded with some applause all his own.

An Authoritative Survey: "Music Since 1900"

Her Nov. 18/37

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

Any one who has ever written about music has often had occasion to cry out in despair for an accurate record of recent events from which he may quote a date or a fact with the reasonable assumption that he will not receive angry letters pointing out a mistake and suggesting that there has been a serious breach of trust. For a time, starting this month, we may breathe a little easier for the manner in which Mr. Nicolas Slonimsky has smoothed the scholastic road from Jan. 1, 1900, down to Sept. 19, 1937 ("Music Since 1900" by Nicolas Slonimsky; W. W. Norton and Company. New York; price, $4.75).

This book is chiefly remarkable for the thoroughness and punctilious impartiality with which the author has sorted his material and verified his facts. His task must have been a labor of incredible patience and could only have been undertaken by one with a profound interest in and love of his subject. Mr. Slonimsky, of course, is one of our leading exponents in modern music, as scholar, interpreter and experimenter. If he take the trouble to list chronologically all the events of the least importance in the history of modern music, it is because he feels that there is a real need to have the subject properly documented.

In his endeavor to be honest and to include everything Mr. Slonimsky can be called pedantic. Still, he intended to provide a book of dependable reference where pedantry is not out of place. As a volume to read "Music Since 1900" has less to offer by way of entertainment than lexicons with more biographical material. Mr. Slonimsky has certainly uncovered a good many unusual facts and included some interesting statements by various individuals and organizations, but the book will still be valuable as a work of reference for the library shelf. In fact it will be indispensable until some larger compendium swallows it up in future years.

Mr. Slonimsky, no more than Dr. Johnson, could keep his personality entirely out of his dictionary. We find it in a passion for exactitude of dates down to the day and hour. For example, he writes, when he gets in the course of his calendar to March 15, 1918, that Lili Boulanger "dies in her native Paris at the early age of 24 years 6 months and 3 weeks—4 years 8 months and 9 days after she received the award" (the Grand Prix de Rome). And that is his regular technique. There is a useful appendix wherein certain of the more famous dictionaries are corrected on points of fact, including the most recent editions of Grove and Riemann and, overwhelmingly, the unfortunate Hull ("A Dictionary of Modern Music and Musicians").

A less amiable trait in Mr. Slonimsky's style is his passion for regimentation. Every composer is squeezed into some category either on family broad lines or in the narrower wake of some previous composer. These sometimes reach quite fantastic limits. Thus Nicolas Nabokov, who will be remembered by the average public at present for his ballet "Union Pacific," is described as a "Russian composer in the neo-Dargomizhskian style." Vladimir Dukelsky is "neo-Glinkian"; Pierre Octave Ferroud is "neo-Schmittian" and so on. What purpose Mr. Slonimsky thinks he serves by such constricted classification we cannot imagine. So few people have ever heard in this country any of Dargomizhsky's music, that it is no great help to us to be told flatly that is Nabokov's style and no other.

There can be no denying that Mr. Slonimsky has now and then been unable to suppress a love of the ponderous phrase. Thus Busoni's "Turandot", we learn, is "quite western in texture, diatonic or chromatic, free from pseudo-sinological pentatonicity." Malipiero's Sinfonia of the four seasons is "in a neo-pastoral idiom, pan-diatonically ornamented." These, however, are merely amusing idiocryncrasies in a job that has been extremely well done. Mr. Slonimsky's preoccupation with accuracy has extended to his own proofreading. We only noticed three obviously unintentional errors; on page 77 Briggs Fair instead of Brigg Fair; on page 213 Morat instead of Morax; on page 246 Borro instead Boito. Those slips are not repeated.

We suspect that "Music Since 1900" will be extremely interesting to look back on after another 30 years. How will Mr. Slonimsky's selection of material then emerge? The pre-war period had a brilliant operatic activity, with Strauss, Debussy, Puccini and Rimsky-Korsakov creating works of undeniable importance. Which of these will be most prominent in the future? Will the operas of Berg, Hindemith, Malipiero and other moderns, none of which does the general public get a chance to hear, survive? In Mr. Slonimsky's book we span symphonically the development of the tone poem under Strauss, impressionism under Debussy, Dukas and others, the ballets of Stravinsky, the numerous post-war "isms," of the concertos of Prokofieff, the later symphonies of Roussel, the austere compositions of Stravinsky and many other diverse activities. It has been an interesting period; and Mr. Slonimsky's day-by-day record of it will be useful in its own right and will serve as a model of sound compilation for scholars to come.

BURGIN TO LEAD 7TH SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall will be given a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 26 and 27 (preceded by the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening). During the coming week the orchestra will make its first trip to New York of the season, also appearing in Hartford, New Haven and Brooklyn.

Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts in Cambridge and Boston, giving the same program in both places. He will present for the first time in this country the Symphony of Marcel Poot, the Flemish composer. The program will open with the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for strings. The edition of Felix Mottl will be used, in which the solo parts are written concertante for two violas and three 'cellos. The closing number will be the Symphony of Ernest Chausson.

Février Symphony Soloist

Monitor The Arts in Boston Nov. 13/37

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completes this week the first quarter of its season with an interesting program made up of Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201), Ravel's Pianoforte Concerto for the left hand and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

The Mozart symphony is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's "novelties" of last season, which was first heard here a little over a year ago and was evidently regarded by him as fresh enough and characteristic enough to warrant its repetition so soon. There can be no quarrel with him on that score. Written when the composer was 18, the piece is delightful, and it was delightfully played except for heavy-handedness in the solo horn. Early in the slow movement Dr. Koussevitzky halted the performance when he was disturbed by the admission of a latecomer. When quiet was restored he began the movement again. This kind of interruption is rare at the symphony concerts. It probably will not occur soon again.

Ravel's Concerto for the left hand was introduced to Boston three years ago by Paul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, to whom it is dedicated. Yesterday the soloist was Jacques Février, who rested his right hand in his lap while he played. A second hearing confirmed a first impression that this composition is far more than a stunt piece. It has definite musical values in both solo and orchestral parts. Indeed the orchestral "accompaniment," from the hand of this master orchestrator, becomes the center of interest more than once. Apparently Ravel was so carried away with it that he forgot at times that he had a piano to deal with too. Although you think of various modern masters as you listen, the stamp of Ravel is on the score, even on the measures of jazz. The orchestral pages alone repay listening to.

Nevertheless, there are plenty of opportunities for the pianist to display his skill. There are chords and arpeggios and runs that demand tremendous power and dexterity. There are lyric passages that call for delicate legato and subtle phrasing. Mr. Février—who is the son of Henri Février, composer of "Monna Vanna," which was given by the Boston Opera 24 years ago—took full advantage of his opportunities and met all demands upon him—except that of making himself heard against the full orchestra, and that, we believe, nobody could have done. Besides a complete technique, he has a strong rhythmic sense and a feeling for ensemble playing. He was warmly received.

To close, a masterpiece by another master orchestrator, Richard Strauss, in an interpretation and performance that realized the musical as well as the literary content of the score—a score which, although spotty, contains imperishable music.

L. A. S.

Koussevitzky Halts His Orchestra As Rebuke to Folk Coming in Late

Some of the oldest inhabitants who attend the Friday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra gasped yesterday when Dr Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, stopped the orchestra abruptly. It was all because a group of late comers entered the hall, after a movement of a Mozart symphony had begun.

Dr Koussevitzky saw them, slapped the music before him with his baton, and waited, arms folded, until all was quiet.

Only once or twice before has this happened with the Boston conductor, it is said.

Far different from Philadelphia, where Symphony audiences have been known to be scolded by Conductor Leopold Stokowski!

New Symphony Orchestra on the Pittsburgh Scene

Trans

Josef Hofmann, Soloist, Begins His Jubilee Tour as Otto Klemperer, Conductor, Departs

By Moses Smith

Pittsburgh (By air mail)—The art of playing symphonic music in America does not begin and end in the three capitals of the Atlantic seaboard—Boston, New York and Philadelphia—where the art has been developed to a superlative degree. Of this we are inevitably made aware by the almost ceaseless issue of sound from the loud-speakers of radio boxes or by the steadily-widening circulation of phonograph records. Fortunately for the health of the art of music, people are still curious to see—and hear—in the flesh performers with whom an acquaintance has been made via an electrical apparatus. For this reason the early and seemingly justified fear of the competition between radio and the concert hall has been steadily diminishing, just as it had previously in the case of the phonograph. On the contrary, those who have the major control of our musical institutions have begun to realize that the widespread electrical reproduction of music actually helps business in the concert hall, because it has tended to stimulate a desire to frequent concerts in many people who had never previously been inside of a concert hall.

For whatever reason, symphony orchestras are flourishing in this country more than ever, in spite of the recent depression and in spite of (or because of, as the case may be) the radio and phonograph. Pittsburgh is a case in point. For seven years some sort of symphony society had been cultivated under the direction of Antonio Moderelli. In the face of initial public apathy, insufficient funds and the other expected difficulties he had succeeded in bringing the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra to such a stage of development that the "right people" began to notice its existence. They went further: decided the orchestra wanted re-organization, enlargement and general betterment; undertook the usual American procedure in such matters, including a "drive." The result emerged in the form of a good-sized orchestra of ninety musicians, on a basis of sixteen first violins and eight double basses.

A New Orchestra

In the process and for a reason too complicated and controversial to demand our present attention Mr. Moderelli resigned from the conductorship. He was replaced not by a single individual but by a whole series of conductors for the present season. The first three pairs of Thursday evening and Friday afternoon concerts, ending during the week just past, have been presided over by Otto Klemperer. The remaining eleven pairs are variously divided among Carlos Chavez, Michel Gusikoff (who is also the concert master); Eugene Goossens, Fritz Reiner, Walter Damrosch and Georges Enesco.

Mr. Klemperer had also been entrusted with the formation of the substantially new orchestra. For some months he has been busied in hearing and selecting musicians, and, for three weeks before the season began, in training and rehearsing the ensemble. How many and varied were his problems in the difficult local scene need not, again, concern us. Of the old orchestra finally only a relative few were left; the great majority of the new orchestra consists of new men, many of them from out of town.

Mr. Klemperer has evidently not been handicapped by some of the prevalent prejudices and limitations. For on Thursday night last, in the Syria Mosque, where the evening concerts are held, no fewer than four women's (or girls') heads were visible on stage—the two harpists, one of the first violins and even a French horn. The orchestral personnel, seated on a flat stage, seemed to vary in age from almost extreme youth to advanced maturity.

An estimate of the technical skill, beauty of tone and other musical qualities of the ensemble must be necessarily qualified by a number of considerations. One can scarcely hope to make an accurate appraisal on the basis of a single concert. One wants to know what the same conductor might accomplish, in the same program, with a familiar orchestra. The auditorium, a huge affair seating 3700 persons, and far wider than it is deep, obviously has tricky acoustics, which a reflecting shell, erected behind the musicians at Mr. Klemperer's wish, was designed to correct. The result is at best a compromise in favor of numbers, since Carnegie Music Hall, where the Friday afternoon concerts are played, a much more suitable and resonant concert auditorium, has a seating capacity of only 2000. Certainly on last Thursday night the almost preternatural prominence of the tone of double basses could not have been entirely due to the predilection of the conductor.

Remarkable Achievement

In any event it was apparent that Mr. Klemperer has done a remakable job in six weeks. In a program that consisted of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, "Don Juan" by Strauss and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the p33

38

Houston Orchestra Plays Under a Boston Conductor

Trans. — Nov. 13/37

Beginning of the Second Year of Ernst Hoffmann with a Reorganized Band

By Moses Smith

HOUSTON, Tex. (By Air Mail)—The relative character of the musical season is well illustrated by the concert here on Monday evening, when Ernst Hoffmann, familiar figure to Bostonians, began his second season in charge of the Houston Symphony Orchestra. Our so-called serious musical endeavors in the Northeast are suspended during the warm-weather months, when, it is assumed, no one wants to listen to a "heavy" program. Here, in the deep South, the calendar is observed in the same way, except that the season of arts is likely to begin even later. Yet the November day here was as warm as the average midsummer day in Boston. And an evening like the one on which a couple of thousand Bostonians might listen to a Pops program in Symphony Hall with an obbligato of beer and pretzels finds about 4000 residents of Houston and adjacent Texas communities crowded into the Municipal Auditorium to hear a program of music by Weber, Richard Strauss, Chabrier and Rachmaninov.

It is an audience and a scene that interest the visitor. It assembles early in a huge theater that was never intended to be a concert hall, as its curious assortment of reverberations and dead spots has made clear in rehearsal and will reconfirm in the concert to come. "Society" is evidently out in force; and as each motor car disgorges an important family, the members are greeted with the exploding flash bulbs of the newspaper photographers, while "society" editors make rapid notes. The opening concert of the symphonic season takes on, in fact, something of the surface glamour of a movie premier in Hollywood; or the beginning of an opera season at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York or, closer home, the Boston Opera House. Another year or two and the opening symphonic matinee of the season in Symphony Hall will be equally glamorous. The photographers have already discovered it.

The rest of this Houston audience, like audiences elsewhere, is you-and-me. There is a sprinkling of evening clothes in the seats before and behind the circle of boxes. But most of the patrons come in the summer attire of the street. Children are rather more numerous than at Boston evening concerts. The average age, too, of the audience is somewhat below that of a Boston Symphony Orchestra audience.

On the whole, it was a surprisingly attentive and well-behaved audience. It broke out into applause as the main portion of the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance" was completed and before the musicians could resume with the epilogue. But it is a fair guess that the far more experienced listeners of the Boston concerts would not refrain entirely from the same mistaken interruption. This Houston audience, on the other hand, sat quietly through the lengths and ardors of "Don Juan" by Strauss. And not a handclap disturbed the desired silence between movements of the extensive and discursive Symphony in E minor by Rachmaninov.

But it was an audience which, whatever its previous acquaintance with symphonic music, clearly knew what it liked. The applause following the performance of the Weber waltz was perfunctory. It was a little warmer after "Don Juan," although still somewhat tentative. But Chabrier's "Espana," which ended the first half of the program, evoked the first really excited demonstration. At the close of the final number, Rachmaninov's Symphony, which might have been expected to leave most people here cold, the applause was longest and loudest and was even mingled with some cheers. This was a heartening thing for the visitor from the North and East; and so, too, was the obvious demonstration of the audience's affection for the conductor.

The program was played by an orchestra of about seventy musicians that had been assembled partly from the existing nucleus of the Houston Symphony Orchestra and partly from musicians that Mr. Hoffman had engaged from out of town, particularly Boston. The process of reorganization naturally has not been an easy one, but its account may be postponed for another day. The result is that the present personnel is, musician for musician, about as good as—perhaps slightly better than—the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston in its best days. It has a strikingly large representation of women, of whom there are twelve.

On the basis of the single concert and two of the preceding rehearsals that this writer was able to hear and watch, it may be said that the general standard of performance, at the beginning of Mr. Hoffmann's second season in charge, is at least as good as that of the People's Symphony at its best. The present Houston Orchestra may lack some of the fire of the People's Orchestra when Fabian Sevitzky was its conductor. This lack is due partly to the varying temperaments of the two conductors and partly to Mr. Hoffmann's method of procedure., which demands slow, careful, painstaking preparation and instruction of the musicians before they be permitted to take wing.

As it is, each of the instrumental sections of the Houston Orchestra has a degree of competence that insures the reproduction of the more important surface substance of the various scores. The notes are correctly played, in time and usually in tune. (An understandable nervousness at the beginning of the concert produced some effect on the intonation of the wood-winds.) The most proficient section is naturally the strings. But there are capable players among the wood-winds; and their ensemble will naturally improve as the conductor devotes to them attention he has lavished, thus far this season, on the strings. The brass section was surprisingly reliable, if not agile; while its tone-quality was remarkably pure and even beautiful, practically on a par with that heard at the concerts of the big eastern orchestras. The latter fact is largely due, no doubt, to the kind of instruments that Mr. Hoffmann has induced the members of the trumpet and trombone sections to use; and in addition, of course, to his own careful up-building of the players' abilities.

The Weber waltz was least well performed, though it was superficially the easiest; perhaps because the musicians were not at ease. The Strauss tone-poem came off surprisingly clear in a performance which, technically and musically, could be favorably compared with that which the present writer heard a few nights earlier at the hands of the reorganized Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under Otto Klemperer. The best, and on the whole, most really symphonic playing of the evening came in the performance of the Rachmaninov Symphony, when the musicians were presumably most relaxed. The tone-quality of the brass was here lovely; and the wood-wind section had improved notably.

How much better the Orchestra plays now than it did when Mr. Hoffmann first took charge a little more than a year ago a stranger in town cannot say. Nor can he predict how well the replacements that have been made this season will eventually be fused in the symphonic ensemble. But the answers may very likely be made from inferences. This year's opening program was more difficult than the patchwork collection that opened last season. And one who has watched Mr. Hoffmann through the stages of his remarkable transformation of a Boston W P A Orchestra knows that he is slow to give his musicians rein. It is a fair assumption, where a youthful orchestra and Mr. Hoffmann are concerned, that the more difficult the program the orchestra is assigned, the greater its competence.

Mr. Hoffmann's way with the several numbers is of less concern to Bostonians at the moment, partly because it is largely familiar from his appearances in Boston and largely because it is to a considerable degree determined by the facility of his musicians. Thus, "Espana" was played much too slowly; but it was almost obvious that Mr. Hoffman was determined to get precision at the expense of excitement. The same reason could not have operated in the case of the Weber waltz, because here Mr. Hoffmann's variations in tempo made the music harder for the musicians to play. Most of us are accustomed to a more straightforward presentation, which the present writer would have preferred. Little or no fault could be found with Mr. Hoffmann's version of "Don Juan," which seems to be the result of careful and sympathetic study. And the minor changes of pace employed in the case of the Rachmaninov Symphony were both less important and more logical than in the case of Weber's music. The symphony's broad outlines, on the other hand, were admirably shaped by the conductor.

A review of a single concert by the present Houston Orchestra can scarcely indicate the full nature and variety of the many problems—musical, administrative and political—with which Mr. Hoffman has had to deal. Nor can it contain more than a passing reference to the zeal, energy and ability with which a group of Houston citizens, under the dynamic leadership of Walter H. Walne, have undertaken to build a symphony orchestra worthy of the name. The telling of these things and others must wait for another day.

Zeal of the Pioneer

ERNST HOFFMANN
Beginning his second season as conductor of the Houston (Texas) Symphony Orchestra

---

Globe MUSIC Nov. 13/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Convention was upset to some extent at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. In the first place, there was a two-handed pianist making his American debut with a left-handed concerto. And in the second, a group of latecomers—entering after the slow movement of a Mozart symphony had begun—were psychically chastised when Dr Koussevitzky slapped the open score before him with his baton, bringing the orchestra to an abrupt stop. Not until absolute quiet had been resumed did the conductor signal to begin again. He was perfectly justified; as a rule Dr Koussevitzky is eminently patient when latecomers enter between movements. But the inevitable noise created is disturbing to audience and players alike once the music is started.

The two-handed pianist of the week is Jacques Fevrier of Paris, a son of the composer Henri Fevrier. The left-handed concerto is that which Maurice Ravel wrote in 1930 for the Austrian, Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm in the war. It stands midway on a program which begins with a youthful Symphony, in A major (K 201) by Mozart, and which ends with the tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss.

If one's memory may be trusted after three years, Ravel's work sounded much more substantial yesterday than when Mr Wittgenstein introduced it here in November, 1914. Perhaps the approach of the soloist was largely responsible. Where Mr Wittgenstein achieved a brilliant tour de force with the technically difficult part for left hand, Mr Fevrier was content to play in a more restrained fashion. Hence he brought out the pervading sentiment which so astonished the French critics when they first heard the concerto.

Just as pleasure means one thing to Smith and another to Brown, so the quality of sentiment, where Ravel is concerned, does not mean languishing or fervid music. He is probably incapable of either. His sentiment is rather a sustained gentle mood, emphasis upon melody, together with complete absence of the irony and cold brilliance proverbially associated with this technical wizard. This also is not to say there are no fireworks in the Concerto for Left Hand; indeed the orchestral and solo portions are frequently most striking, especially those measures where a rhythmic undercurrent recalls the famous "Bolero."

Mr Fevrier's musicianly performance won him more applause than is customary with the Friday audience. He was recalled to the stage several times, sharing favor with Dr Koussevitzky, who part in the proceedings likewise deserved audible commendation.

"Ein Heldenleben" can be played heroically or it can be treated as a grandiose essay in orchestral writing and conducting. Dr Koussevitzky has fortunately been conspicuous for his understanding of Strauss' music, and for the skill with which he reads it. With him "Ein Heldenleben" is a hero's life, and no mistake about that. Frank sentimentality, expansive emotion, the tumult of battle all receive just treatment from him and the great orchestra who gather weekly in Symphony Hall. Furthermore, he invariably presents the Strauss tone poems with the vast and sculptured outline which is so vital a part of the Strassian conception.

Once again "Ein Heldenleben" soundel like the grand music it is, vulgarities and all. Such measures as the hero's battle may be a tonal three-ring circus, but all is stirring and irresistible. Strauss has had his faults, but he has written vital, enduring music. That is alone important. The performance of Mozart's Symphony, a product of his late adolescence when he was yet in Salzburg, had much to admire, though the finale was a little rough.

This program will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra goes to New York. Richard Burgin will conduct the Symphony Hall concerts Nov 26 and 27.

C. W. D.

Boston

Her. — Nov. 13/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mozart's enchanting little Symphony in A major, which was "discovered" last season and very properly repeated yesterday, is one of those perfect works that never tarnish with time. The flowing lyricism of the first movement, the tender melancholy of the andante, the sparkling finale are born of the union of consummate craftsmanship and spontaneous invention. It is really an adorable work. What it needs in performance is precision and an exquisite sonority, for the slightest carelessness is instantly detected, and that was just the interpretation that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave it. Dr. Koussevitzky was also quite justified in stopping the andante as a rebuke to the noise made by late-comers and then starting it again when complete silence had been restored.

Ravel's Concerto for the left hand is a work of stunning brilliance. It is constructed with amazing cleverness and orchestrated with genius. No doubt it will never be considered music of the first importance, for it is a work of display for both soloist and orchestra and is showy even when solemn in mood. Furthermore the fact that it is for the left hand alone may handicap it aesthetically with those who regard it only as a stunt.

There are many examples in music of works that are not of the first flight in imagination, originality or inspiration, but which are nevertheless effective. This is one of those works, and it is exhilarating so long as people do not look in it for qualities of which it never pretended to boast. Ravel borrows, either consciously or not, whenever he needs a certain technique. We can recognize the influence of jazz and the Russians, but their characteristics are molded into Ravel's own brilliant style.

There will be those who will not scruple to term this Concerto cheap; but cheapness can be a spice that is legitimate flavoring to a work of art. Richard Strauss is frequently horribly vulgar in his compositions, though that quality does not necessarily detract from their value. Its effect, we believe, is not vicious in Ravel's Concerto. M. Fevrier gave an extraordinarily fine performance of this difficult work. He played, of course, only with his left hand as Ravel directed. The phrasing would probably suffer if split between two hands. At any rate his playing was a model of clean technique and strong rhythmic feeling. It would unquestionably be rewarding to hear him in a concerto for the normal pair of hands. He was very cordially received by the audience.

Cont

The reader, if he has proceeded so far, will have noticed that the name of Richard Strauss and the problem of vulgarity have already been slyly introduced in a comparison with the radically different Concerto of Ravel. The reason for that will presently appear. For some reason Dr. Koussevitzky has given us this season two of the more pretentious works of Strauss, "Tod und Verklaerung" and "Ein Heldenleben." Now, the vulgarity that is inherent in "Zarathustra" for example, is subtly identified with the composer's plan, which comes off successfully. But the monumental vulgarity of the other two tone poems does not quite succeed.

All this may sound like a distinction without a difference, were it not that a critic has to do something to justify his dislikes. The easy inference that we dislike "Ein Heldenleben" is correct. The opening section is splendid, the battle and the works of peace are effective, the adversaries can be endured, but never, while we have typewriter or pen to say so, the Hero's helpmate! The performance, as was to be expected with the orchestra's high standards, was a superb realization of the score.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be in New York. The concerts of Nov. 26 and 27 will be conducted by Richard Burgin in a program offering Bach's 6th Brandenburg Concerto, a new Symphony by Marcel Poot and Chausson's Symphony in B flat major.

(269)

STRAUSS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Post Nov 12

Piano Concerto for Left Hand Novelty of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two unusual occurences marked the Symphony Concert of yesterday: the performance of a piano concerto for the left hand by a pianist who had two hands at his disposal, and the peremptory stopping of the orchestra by Dr. Koussevitzky when late-comers were inadvisedly admitted to the hall.

SON OF COMPOSER

The concerto in question was that which Ravel wrote especially for Paul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, who played it here three years ago. The pianist yesterday was Jacques Fevrier, son of Henri Fevrier, whose "Monna Vanna" was once heard at our Opera House with Mary Garden in the title role. The incident of the halting of the orchestra occurred just after the beginning of the Andante of Mozart's early Symphony in A Major, the four movements of which run so brief a course that Dr. Koussevitzky had evidently counted upon playing them without interruption.

In addition to these works the programme offered Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," in lieu of the "Symphonia Domestica," which had been announced for performance at one of the first six pairs of concerts.

Charm and Virtuosity

To return to the concerto, despite the abundant charm and engaging liveliness of the music, the virtuosity of both composer and pianist, whose tasks were both formidable, there was the feeling yesterday that the thing was a stunt, an impression by no means created when the concerto was played by the war-crippled Wittgenstein. One was reminded of Paganini's deliberate cutting of three fiddle strings and continuing to play on the one which remained. Of course the audience received the richly deserving Mr. Fevrier with unbounded enthusiasm; and if it had been pointed out that he would play with four fingers instead of five, the applause would have been even greater.

The exceptionally high level of orchestral performance in the first five concerts was maintained yesterday: in the concerto, which presents difficulties for the orchestra as well as for the soloist, in the captivating symphony of the 18-year-old Mozart, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us last season, and in "Ein Heldenleben."

Great Tonal Beauty

The performance of the last named, a performance noteworthy for tonal beauty, clarity in the exposure of the complicated tonal web and sharpness of characterization, prompted certain reflections upon the place of the symphonic Strauss in a world very different from that in which the tone-poems from "Macbeth" through the "Symphonia Domestica" were created.

In particular, the later tone-poems are magnificent musical edifices, which tower above most contempory compositions as the great cathedral towers above the parish church, the skyscraper above the corner store. But they were built upon the sands; the sands of programme music, a species of composition not only completely outmoded today, but actually distasteful to many people. So far, the winds and the floods have hurt them not; but of their ultimate fate no one can speak with certainty.

Speaks for Itself

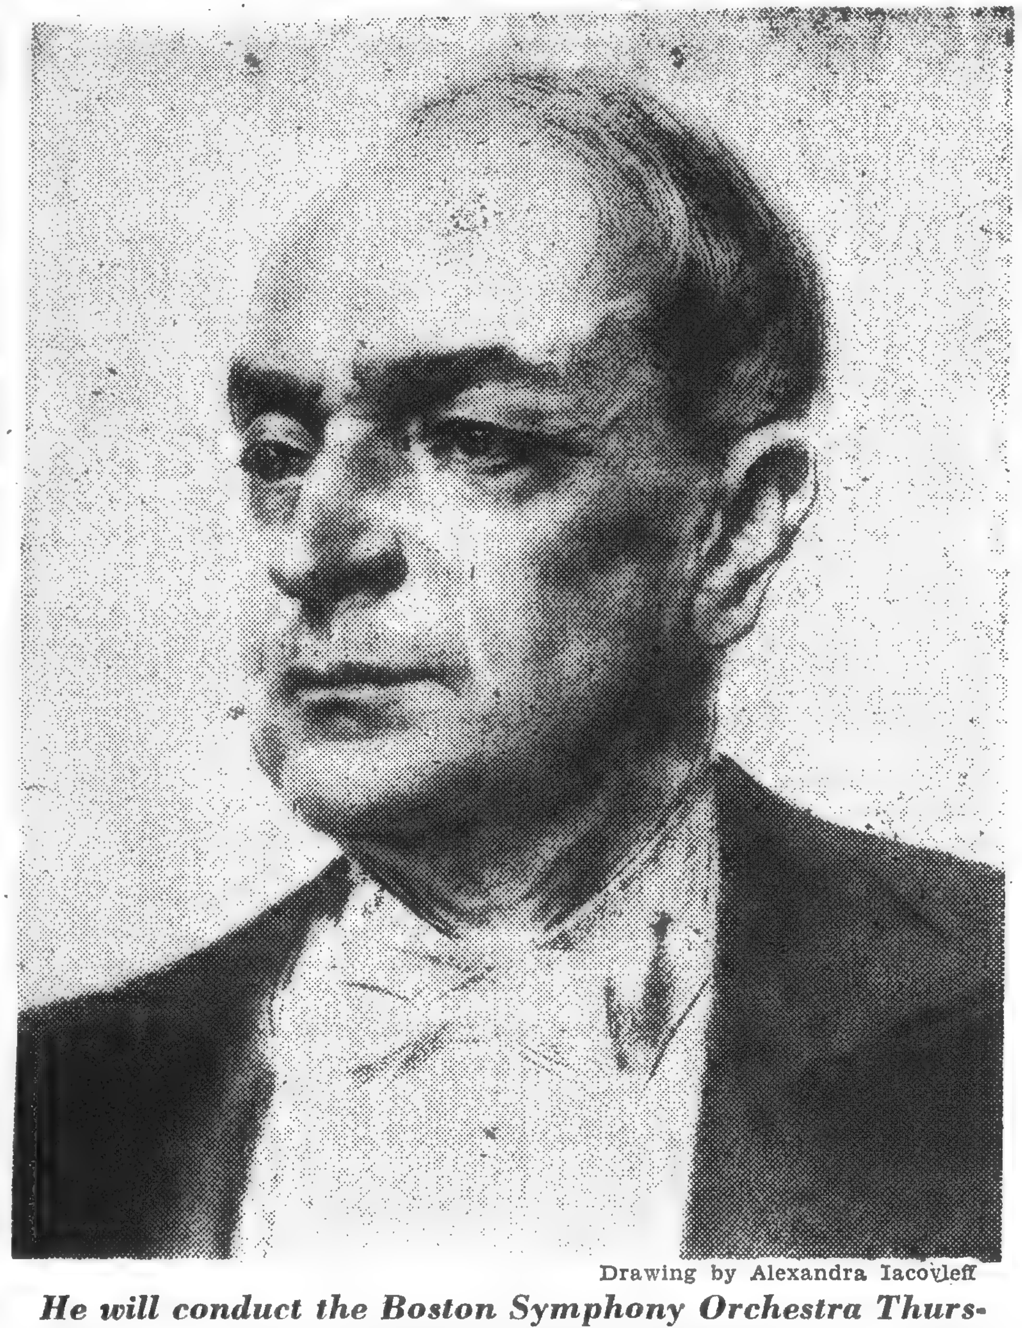
The salutary procedure for the modern listener is to ignore the programme, save when the recognition of it is absolutely essential to the composer's purpose. In the case of "Ein Heldenleben" we need only realize that the cast of characters consists of a hero, his helpmate and his adversaries; and with this much knowledge the music

---

Nov 14

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Serge Koussevitzky



Drawing by Alexandra Iacovleff

He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall and Friday in Brooklyn

---

Boston Symphony Opens Its New York Season

Her. Tribune - Nov. 14/37

THE ORCHESTRAS

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fifty-seventh season, and its thirteenth season under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, will pay its first New York visit of the season this week, playing in Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon and in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Thursday, a repetition of the music offered in the opening Boston concerts of October 8 and 9, is familiar, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and the second symphony of Sibelius. In the Brooklyn concert Jacques Février, a French pianist visiting here at the Boston Symphony's invitation, will make his local debut as soloist in Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand, which was introduced to New York by the Bostonians with Paul Wittgenstein as soloist on November 17, 1934. The program opens with Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13 (88) and closes with the Sibelius symphony.

Mr. Février, who is the son of Henri Février, composer of "Monna Vanna," also will play the Ravel concerto Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a suite of Prokofieff's music for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije" and close the program with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben." The music, composed in 1933, is described as light and satiric in character, like the film. The lieutenant of the title is an imaginary figure, derived from a remark of a military aide to the Czar which the ruler misunderstood. The courtier, rather than correcting the Czar, invents an officer named Kije.

Plays Mason Symphony

According to the usual practice when the Boston Symphony comes to town, the Phiharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will give its midweek evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday instead of Thursday. Daniel Gregory Mason's "A Lincoln Symphony," his third work in this form, will be played for the first time in public. The soloist on John Barbirolli's program

(Continued on page 8, column 3)

Cambridge Sentinel - Nov. 13/37

SYMPHONY HALL!

Culture, as expressed in the art of music, has its highest manifestation hereabouts in Symphony Hall. It is the apex of art in the great community that clusters about Boston. Politically it is divided, but in matters of art, there are no frontiers. Cambridge people, responsive to the elusive appeal of music, take just as much pride in the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the most enlightened Back Bayite. Age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of aesthetic pleasure that this world-renowned instrumental group provides. To see and hear this orchestra, under the dynamic direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, interpret the glorious harmonies and melodies of symphonic music, is to be present at a rare demonstration of great art; yet the orchestra is not and never has been self-supporting. To carry on, the appreciative generosity of volunteer aid is annually necessary. Many European orchestras of lesser power are state aided. English speaking countries lack the art acumen to sense the cultural need of keeping a great orchestra a going concern in the interest of music as a higher education. Even the state in the mercenary spirit of old Shylock exacts its pound of flesh by levying a large tax on the Symphony Hall property.

It is by personal aid, through ready and generous donations by "Symphony" lovers, that the yearly deficit is liquidated.

There is a society called the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that acts as a clearing house, to receive gifts in money to support this great cultural institution.

Shakespeare somewhere remarks that "fine spirits are attuned only to fine issues." Here is an issue whose fineness may not be doubted. which should responsively bring out the fineness latent in a great intercity community, intelligently proud of Symphony Hall, and what it represents in American music. A ready response will be indicative of the interest of Greater Boston to maintain a fine community institution dedicated to art.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1937

Lowell - Courier Citizen

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

~~Developing the college musical resources, has been influential in arranging a concert course in which the Boston Symphony and eminent artists will appear.~~

Boston Programs.

The first half of the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week will be devoted to the Fifth Symphony in C-sharp minor of Mahler, an impressive work which has not been heard there of late. Excerpts from the Wagner music-dramas will comprise the second half of the program, including the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere" and Wotan's Farewell and the Fire Music from the same opera in which Mark Harrell, baritone, will be the soloist.

On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon of next week occur the first of the supplementary concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This season the programs in each series will be identical. As was announced in these columns on Monday, these two series with concerts occuring monthly, offer unusual advantages to commuters who do not wish to subscribe for the longer regular series but who do want to hear the orchestra on occasion. There are seats available for each series at extremely moderate prices. The programs next week will include the Double Concerto of Brahms for violin and cello with Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti as the featured artists.

The concert in Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon will be given by the newly assembled Wagnerian Singers who made their American debut as a group in New York the other day.

Trans Nov. 15

Symphony Visit to New York

The next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will be given a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Nov. 26 and 27 (preceded by the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening). During the coming week the orchestra will make its first trip to New York of the season, also appearing in Hartford, New Haven and Brooklyn.

Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts in Cambridge and Boston, giving the same program in both places. He will present for the first time in this country the Symphony of Marcel Poot, the Flemish composer. The program will open with the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for strings. The edition of Felix Mottl will be used in which the solo parts are written concertante for two violas and three 'cellos. The closing number will be the Symphony of Ernest Chausson.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER

PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK

Season's First Visit of Boston Symphony—Ensembles and Recitalists

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season with three concerts here this week. The orchestra will be heard at Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, and will give a Friday night performance at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Complete opera and concert programs for the current week follow:

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Jacques Fevrier, piano.

Symphony in G, No. 88 (B. and H. 13), ... Haydn
Pianoforte concerto for the left hand. Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43 ...... Sibelius

Saturday

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Jacques Fevrier, piano.

"Lieutenant Kije," orchestral suite, Op. 60 .... Prokofieff
Pianoforte concerto .... Ravel
"Ein Heldenleben," Op. 40 .... Strauss

Symphony Hall, Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

"SHORT SERIES"
TICKETS NOW
Six Monday Evenings
Six Tuesday Matinees at 3
OCT. 25-26, DEC. 27-28,
JAN. 17-18, FEB. 21-22,
MARCH 21-22, APRIL 18-19

Noted Soloists

SEASON TICKETS
Mondays, $12 and $15.
Tuesdays, $6, $9, $12, $15
No Tax

STRAUSS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

297

Nov 12

Piano Concerto for Left Hand Novelty of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two unusual occurences marked the Symphony Concert of yesterday: the performance of a piano concerto for the left hand by a pianist who had two hands at his disposal, and the peremptory stopping of the orchestra by Dr. Koussevitzky when late-comers were inadvisedly admitted to the hall.

SON OF COMPOSER

The concerto in question was that which Ravel wrote especially for Paul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, who played it here three years ago. The pianist yesterday was Jacques Fevrier, son of Henri Fevrier, whose "Monna Vanna" was once heard at our Opera House with Mary Garden in the title role. The incident of the halting of the orchestra occurred just after the beginning of the Andante of Mozart's early Symphony in A Major, the four movements of which run so brief a course that Dr. Koussevitzky had evidently counted upon playing them without interruption.

In addition to these works the programme offered Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," in lieu of the "Symphonia Domestica," which had been announced for performance at one of the first six pairs of concerts.

Charm and Virtuosity

To return to the concerto, despite the abundant charm and engaging liveliness of the music, the virtuosity of both composer and pianist, whose tasks were both formidable, there was the feeling yesterday that the thing was a stunt, an impression by no means created when the concerto was played by the war-crippled Wittgenstein. One was reminded of Paganini's deliberate cutting of three fiddle strings and continuing to play on the one which remained. Of course the audience received the richly deserving Mr. Fevrier with unbounded enthusiasm; and if it had been pointed out that he would play with four fingers instead of five, the applause would have been even greater.

The exceptionally high level of orchestral performance in the first five concerts was maintained yesterday: in the concerto, which presents difficulties for the orchestra as well as for the soloist, in the captivating symphony of the 18-year-old Mozart, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us last season, and in "Ein Heldenleben."

Great Tonal Beauty

The performance of the last named, a performance noteworthy for tonal beauty, clarity in the exposure of the complicated tonal web and sharpness of characterization, prompted certain reflections upon the place of the symphonic Strauss in a world very different from that in which the tone-poems from "Macbeth" through the "Symphonia Domestica" were created.

In particular, the later tone-poems are magnificent musical edifices, which tower above most contempory compositions as the great cathedral towers above the parish church, the skyscraper above the corner store. But they were built upon the sands; the sands of programme music, a species of composition not only completely outmoded today, but actually distasteful to many people. So far, the winds and the floods have hurt them not; but of their ultimate fate no one can speak with certainty.

Speaks for Itself

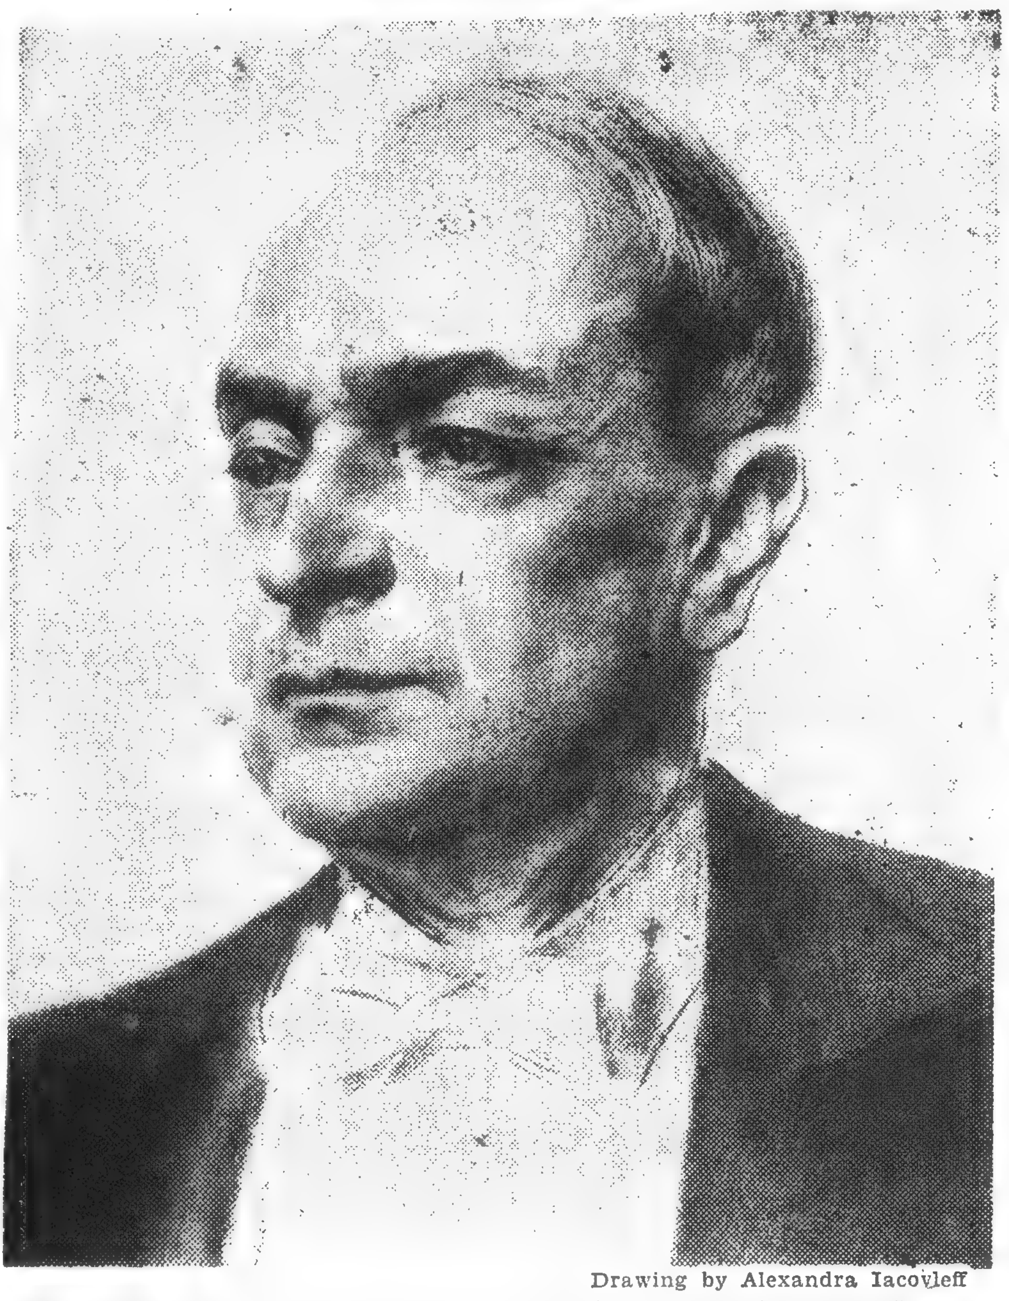
The salutary procedure for the modern listener is to ignore the programme, save when the recognition of it is absolutely essential to the composer's purpose. In the case of "Ein Heldenleben" we need only realize that the cast of characters consists of a hero, his helpmate and his adversaries: and with this much knowledge the music

---

Nov 14

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Serge Koussevitzky



Drawing by Alexandra Iacovleff

He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall and Friday in Brooklyn

---

Boston Symphony Opens Its New York Season

Her. Tribune - Nov. 14/37

THE ORCHESTRAS

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fifty-seventh season, and its thirteenth season under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, will pay its first New York visit of the season this week, playing in Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon and in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Thursday, a repetition of the music offered in the opening Boston concerts of October 8 and 9, is familiar, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and the second symphony of Sibelius. In the Brooklyn concert Jacques Février, a French pianist visiting here at the Boston Symphony's invitation, will make his local debut as soloist in Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand, which was introduced to New York by the Bostonians with Paul Wittgenstein as soloist on November 17, 1934. The program opens with Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13 (88) and closes with the Sibelius symphony.

Mr. Février, who is the son of Henri Février, composer of "Monna Vanna," also will play the Ravel concerto Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a suite of Prokofieff's music for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije" and close the program with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben." The music, composed in 1933, is described as light and satiric in character, like the film. The lieutenant of the title is an imaginary figure, derived from a remark of a military aide to the Czar which the ruler misunderstood. The courtier, rather than correcting the Czar, invents an officer named Kije.

Plays Mason Symphony

According to the usual practice when the Boston Symphony comes to town, the Phiharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will give its mid-week evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday instead of Thursday. Daniel Gregory Mason's "A Lincoln Symphony," his third work in this form, will be played for the first time in public. The soloist on John Barbirolli's program

(Continued on page 8, column 3)

SYMPHONY · HALL!

Cambridge Sentinel - Nov. 13/37

Culture, as expressed in the art of music, has its highest manifestation hereabouts in Symphony Hall. It is the apex of art in the great community that clusters about Boston. Politically it is divided, but in matters of art, there are no frontiers. Cambridge people, responsive to the elusive appeal of music, take just as much pride in the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the most enlightened Back Bayite. Age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of aesthetic pleasure that this world-renowned instrumental group provides. To see and hear this orchestra, under the dynamic direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, interpret the glorious harmonies and melodies of symphonic music, is to be present at a rare demonstration of great art; yet the orchestra is not and never has been self-supporting. To carry on, the appreciative generosity of volunteer aid is annually necessary. Many European orchestras of lesser power are state aided. English speaking countries lack the art acumen to sense the cultural need of keeping a great orchestra a going concern in the interest of music as a higher education. Even the state in the mercenary spirit of old Shylock exacts its pound of flesh by levying a large tax on the Symphony Hall property.

It is by personal aid, through ready and generous donations by "Symphony" lovers, that the yearly deficit is liquidated.

There is a society called the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that acts as a clearing house, to receive gifts in money to support this great cultural institution.

Shakespeare somewhere remarks that "fine spirits are attuned only to fine issues." Here is an issue whose fineness may not be doubted. which should responsively bring out the fineness latent in a great intercity community, intelligently proud of Symphony Hall, and what it represents in American music. A ready response will be indicative of the interest of Greater Boston to maintain a fine community institution dedicated to art.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1937

Lowell - Courier Citizen

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

~~developing the college musical resources, has been influential in arranging a concert course in which the Boston Symphony and eminent artists will appear.~~

Boston Programs.

The first half of the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week will be devoted to the Fifth Symphony in C-sharp minor of Mahler, an impressive work which has not been heard there of late. Excerpts from the Wagner music-dramas will comprise the second half of the program, including the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere" and Wotan's Farewell and the Fire Music from the same opera in which Mark Harrell, baritone, will be the soloist.

On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon of next week occur the first of the supplementary concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This season the programs in each series will be identical. As was announced in these columns on Monday, these two series with concerts occuring monthly, offer unusual advantages to commuters who do not wish to subscribe for the longer regular series but who do want to hear the orchestra on occasion. There are seats available for each series at extremely moderate prices. The programs next week will include the Double Concerto of Brahms for violin and cello with Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti as the featured artists.

The concert in Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon will be given by the newly assembled Wagnerian Singers who made their American debut as a group in New York the other day.

[illegible] Nov 18

Symphony Visit to New York

The next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will be given a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Nov. 26 and 27 (preceded by the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening). During the coming week the orchestra will make its first trip to New York of the season, also appearing in Hartford, New Haven and Brooklyn.

Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts in Cambridge and Boston, giving the same program in both places. He will present for the first time in this country the Symphony of Marcel Poot, the Flemish composer. The program will open with the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for strings. The edition of Felix Mottl will be used in which the solo parts are written concertante for two violas and three 'cellos. The closing number will be the Symphony of Ernest Chausson.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER

PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK

Season's First Visit of Boston Symphony—Ensembles and Recitalists

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season with three concerts here this week. The orchestra will be heard at Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, and will give a Friday night performance at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Complete opera and concert programs for the current week follow:

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Jacques Fevrier, piano.

Symphony in G, No. 88 (B. and H. 13), ...Haydn
Pianoforte concerto for the left hand.Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43......Sibelius

Saturday

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Jacques Fevrier, piano.

"Lieutenant Kije," orchestral suite, Op. 60 ....Prokofieff
Pianoforte concerto....................Ravel
"Ein Heldenleben," Op. 40........Strauss

Symphony Hall, Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra

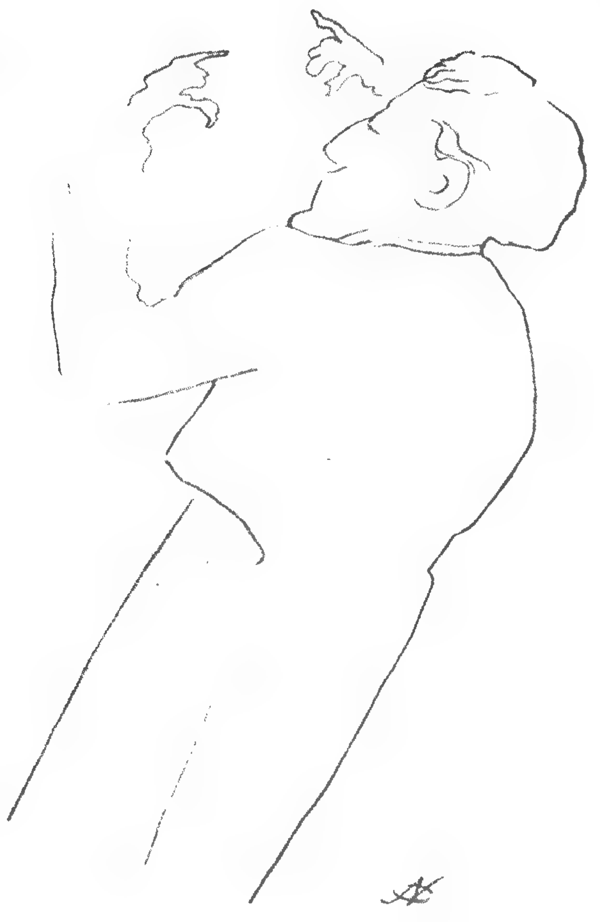
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

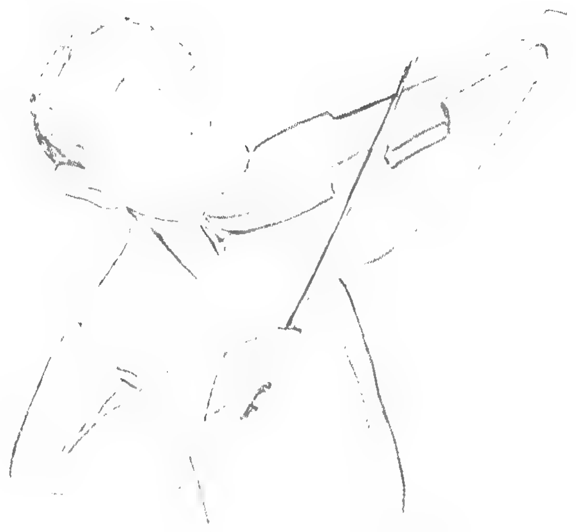
"SHORT SERIES"
TICKETS NOW
Six Monday Evenings
Six Tuesday Matinees at 3
OCT. 25-26, DEC. 27-28,
JAN. 17-18, FEB. 21-22,
MARCH 21-22, APRIL 18-19

Noted Soloists

SEASON TICKETS
Mondays, $12 and $15.
Tuesdays, $6, $9, $12, $15
No Tax

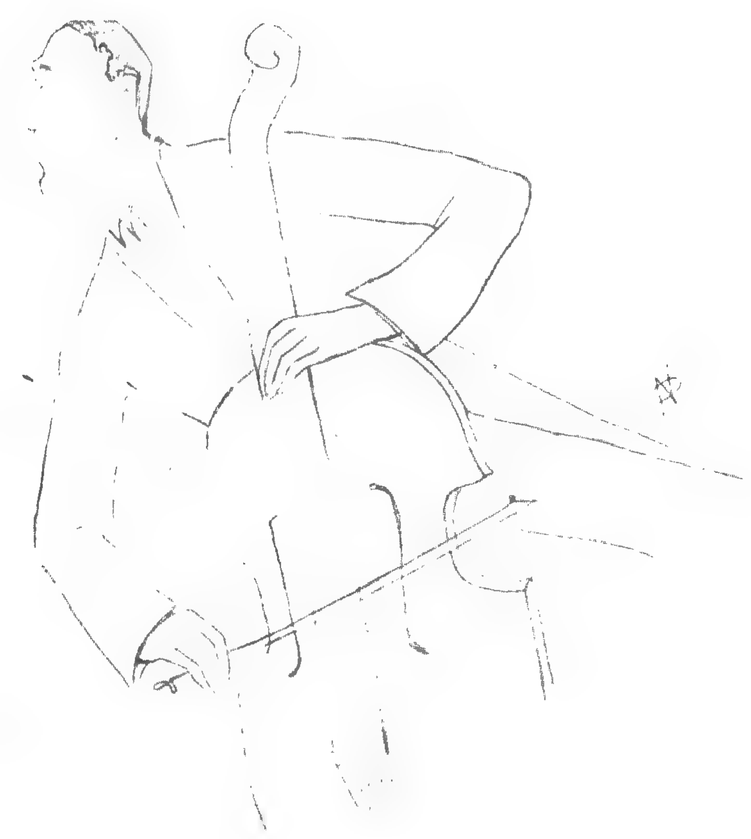
40

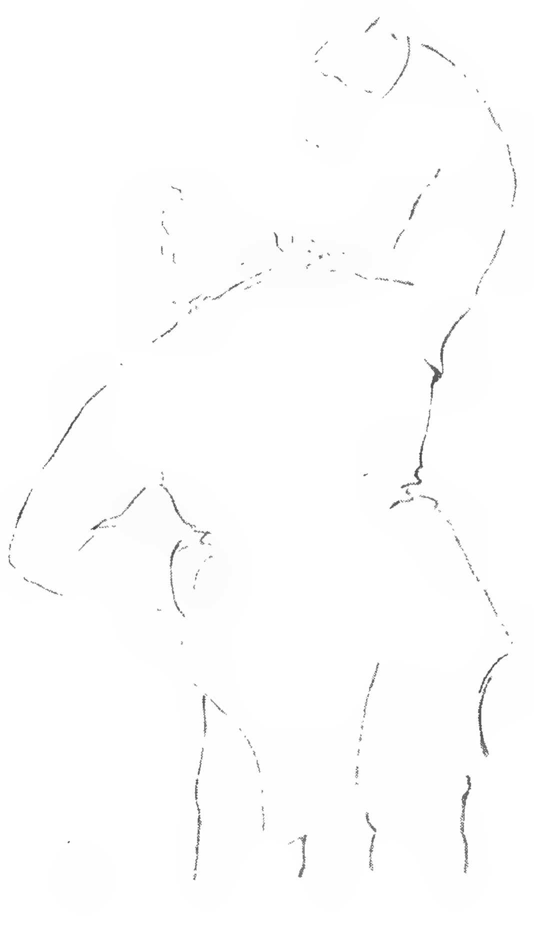


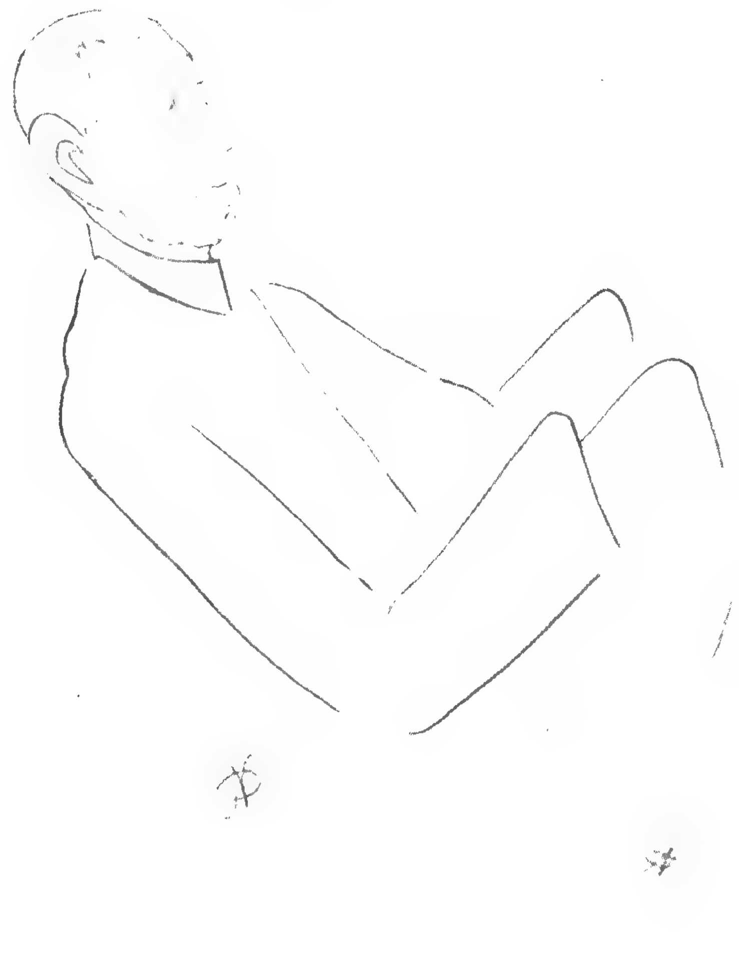


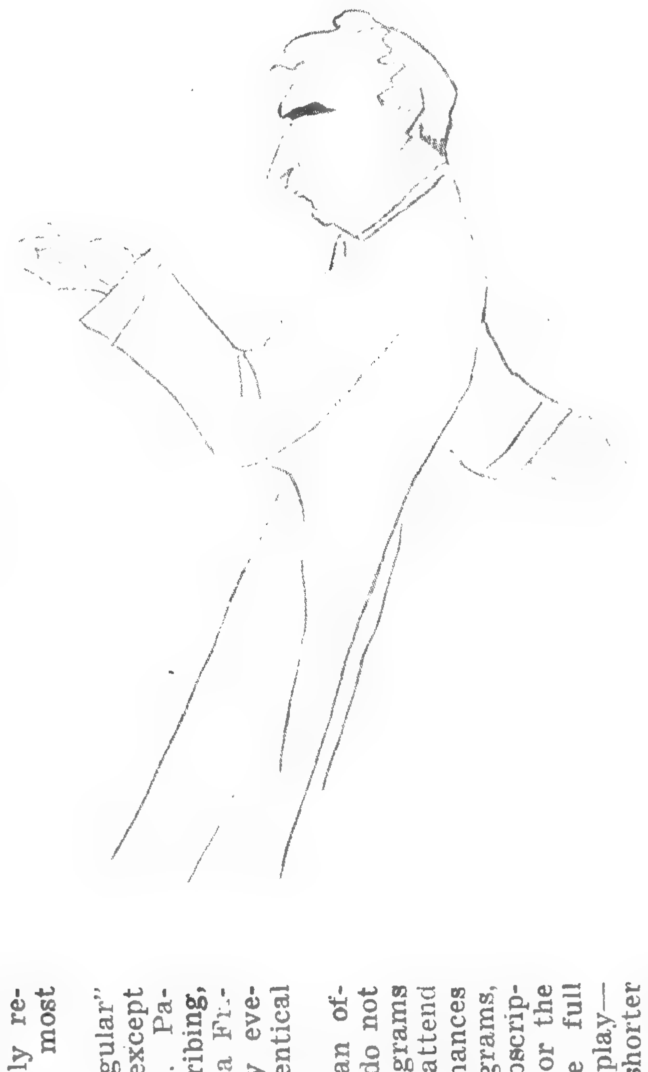
FOLLOW THE LEADER

These moments crystallized from the careers of seven musical magicians are by Olga Naoumoff, small golden-haired secretary of Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, who has never had a drawing lesson in her life. Starting at the top and swinging around counter-clockwise, the first is Rodzinski, Dalmatian leader of the Cleveland orchestra. Next, Leopold Stokowski, who has become ensnared by Hollywood. He was one of the hundred men in "One Hundred Men and a Girl," the girl being Deanna Durbin. The movies have caught Heifetz too. He will star in color in "The Great Music Festival" for the great Mr. Goldwyn. Piatigorsky was overtaken by matrimony. It was Jacqueline de Rothschild, daughter of Baron Edouard de Rothschild, at Ann Arbor. Rachmaninoff will do a series of concerts during the winter under the auspices of the NBC Artists Service (not broadcast). Koussevitzky is brooding on the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. After playing Die Valkyrie to an obbligato of thunder and lightning that was not Wotan's, he now hopes for a permanent shelter there. Lastly, the great maestro himself, who on Christmas Eve makes his startling debut as a symphony conductor of the radio.









Lowell Courier-
Citizen
Oct 18

'COMMUTERS' PLAN' FOR HUB SYMPHONY

Persons May Attend Concerts Monthly under New Plan of Conductor

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the orchestra, generally regarded as the greatest and most aristocratic in the world.

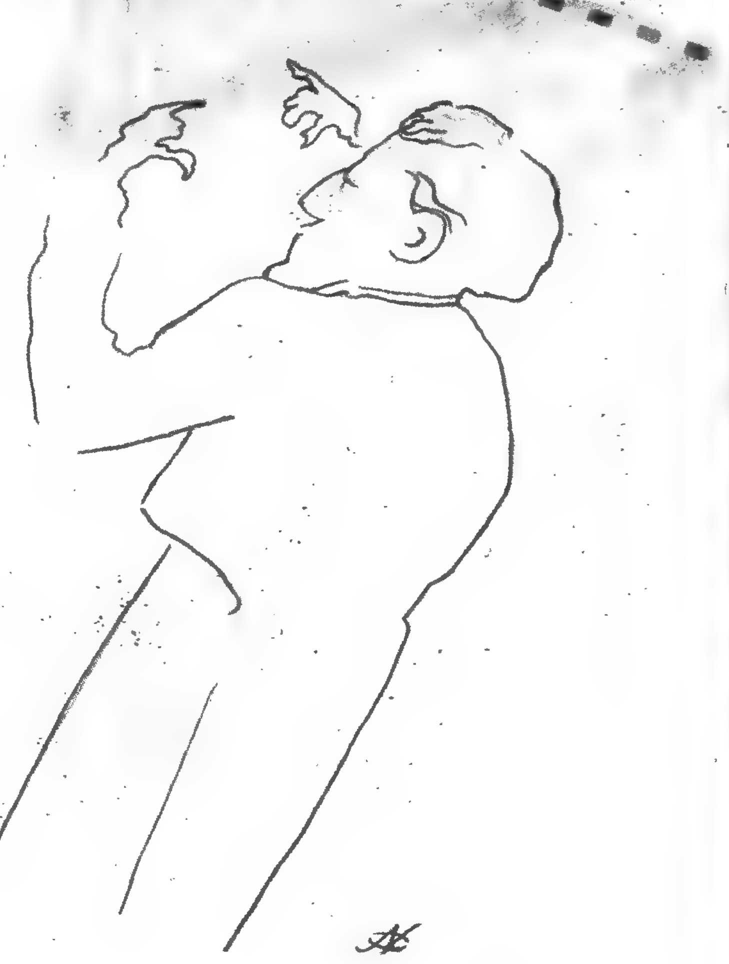
The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening performance of an identical program.

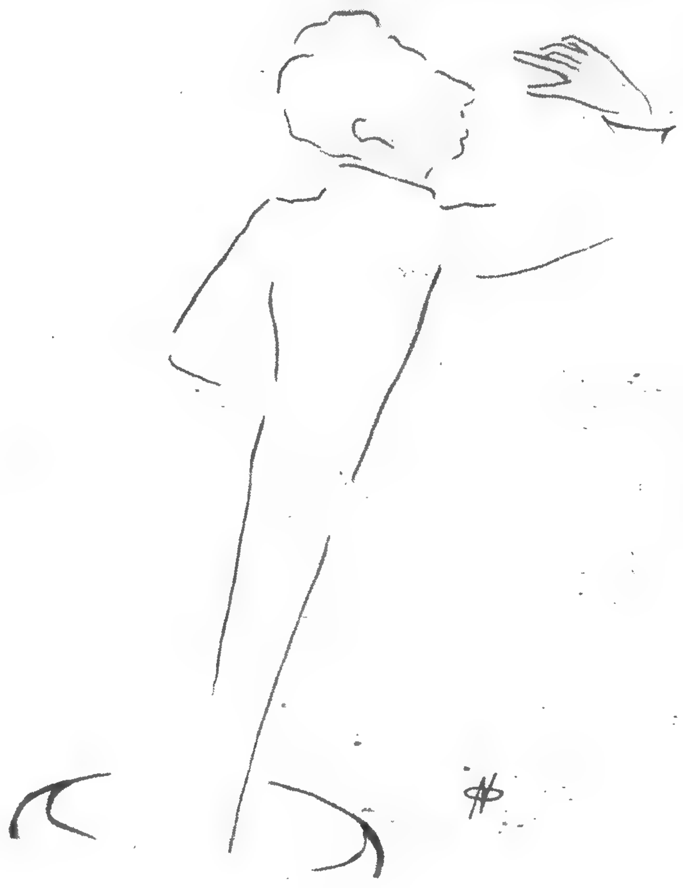
Mr. Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—110 men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings, or six on Tuesday evenings, with an identical program.

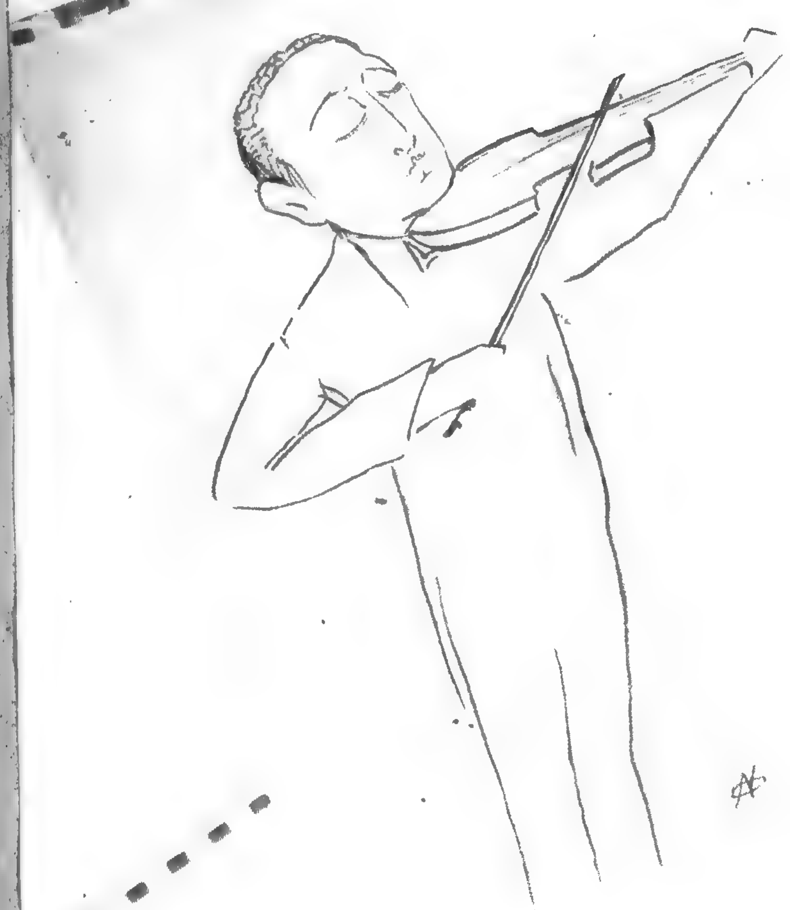
To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until 3 o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in midafternoon to Symphony Hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the magnificent playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: October 25, December 27, January 17, February 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are: October 26, December 28, January 18, February 22, March 22, April 19.

A census of Boston Symphony subscribers shows patronage extending far beyond Boston. Matinee audiences in traveling to Symphony Hall for a single concert cover the equivalent of twice the distance around the world. Every Friday afternoon, listeners come from as far north as Castine and Bar Harbor, Me.; as far east as Hyannis, Mass.; as far west as Pittsfield, Mass.; as far south as New Bedford, Mass.; and as far to the southwest as Waterbury, Conn. Subscribers are residents of 216 communities in Massachusetts.

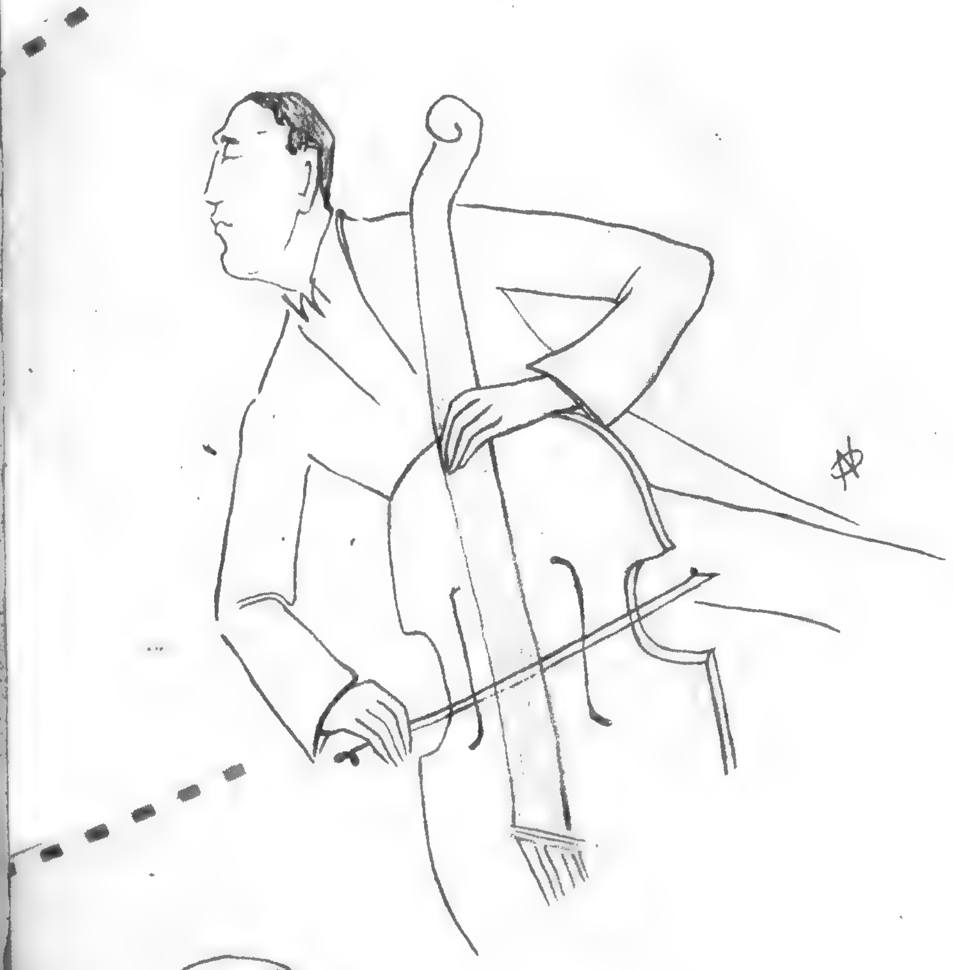


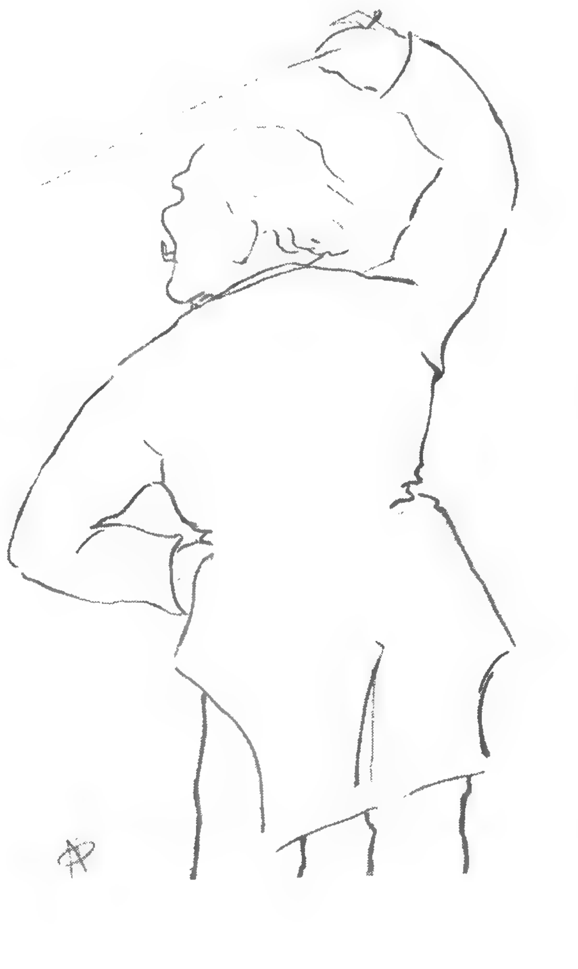


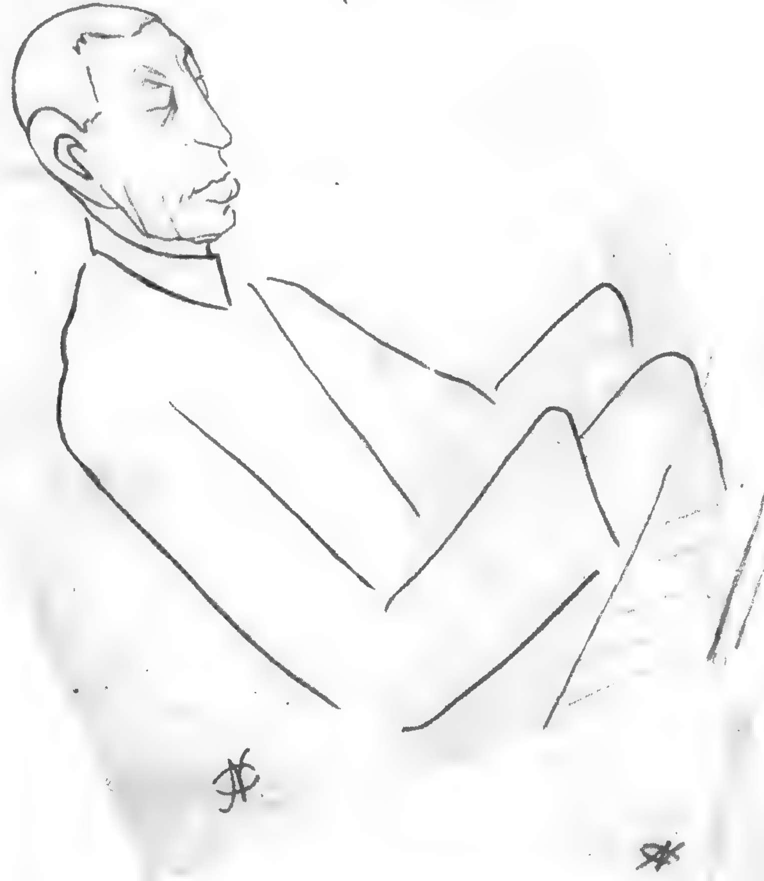


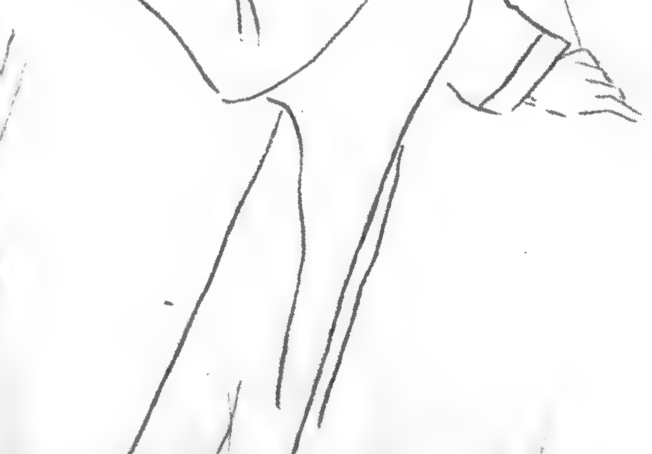
FOLLOW THE LEADER

These moments crystallized from the careers of seven musical magicians are by Olga Naoumoff, small golden-haired secretary of Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, who has never had a drawing lesson in her life. Starting at the top and swinging around counter-clockwise, the first is Rodzinski, Dalmatian leader of the Cleveland orchestra. Next, Leopold Stokowski, who has become ensnared by Hollywood. He was one of the hundred men in "One Hundred Men and a Girl," the girl being Deanna Durbin. The movies have caught Heifetz too. He will star in color in "The Great Music Festival" for the great Mr. Goldwyn. Piatigorsky was overtaken by matrimony. It was Jacqueline de Rothschild, daughter of Baron Edouard de Rothschild, at Ann Arbor. Rachmaninoff will do a series of concerts during the winter under the auspices of the NBC Artists Service (not broadcast). Koussevitzky is brooding on the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. After playing Die Valkyrie to an obbligato of thunder and lightning that was not Wotan's, he now hopes for a permanent shelter there. Lastly, the great maestro himself, who on Christmas Eve makes his startling debut as a symphony conductor of the radio.









Lowell Courier-Citizen
Oct 18

'COMMUTERS' PLAN' FOR HUB SYMPHONY

Persons May Attend Concerts Monthly under New Plan of Conductor

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the orchestra, generally regarded as the greatest and most aristocratic in the world.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening performance of an identical program.

Mr. Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—110 men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings, or six on Tuesday evenings, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until 3 o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony Hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the magnificent playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: October 25, December 27, January 17, February 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are: October 26, December 28, January 18, February 22, March 22, April 19.

A census of Boston Symphony subscribers shows patronage extending far beyond Boston. Matinee audiences in traveling to Symphony Hall for a single concert cover the equivalent of twice the distance around the world. Every Friday afternoon, listeners come from as far north as Castine and Bar Harbor, Me.; as far east as Hyannis, Mass.; as far west as Pittsfield, Mass.; as far south as New Bedford, Mass.; and as far to the southwest as Waterbury, Conn. Subscribers are residents of 216 communities in Massachusetts.

From Bank to Temple of Music . . . Overnight!

The music of Haydn . . . Tchaikovsky . . . Schubert . . . Wagner . . . rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, resounded throughout the length and breadth of the bank floor on Columbus Day, October 12, as the Bank entertained delegates to the American Bankers Association and their guests, to the number of 3500.

(Story and pictures pages 4-7)

about The FIRST - November - 1937

GLIMPSES BEHIND THE SCENES

XLIX. The Bank Gives a Party

On Columbus Day, October 12, the Bank entertained delegates to the American Bankers Association Convention and their guests, to the number of 3500, at a recital by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the main floor and with refreshments on the two lower floors.

Only twice before in its history since Symphony Hall was built in 1900 has the Orchestra played in Boston outside of its own home. The first occasion was in 1914 on the 80th birthday of its founder, Major Henry L. Higginson, at the Copley-Plaza Hotel, and the other was in 1916 for the Shakespeare Tercentenary at the Boston Opera House. The Orchestra's—

Cont above right

Trustees consented to this third exception because of the representative character of the audience from all parts of the United States and voted that it be for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Institution.

Boston's Great Orchestra gives a Recital at the Bank, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

It was a highly successful occasion. The tumultuous applause which greeted Dr. Koussevitzky and his Orchestra at the conclusion of the recital came from an audience who for the most part had never before had the opportunity of attending a concert by the great Orchestra of which Boston is so proud.

The success of this unique event was the result of months of planning and preparation on the part of many people. Between the close of business Monday night and four o'clock the next afternoon the bank floor was transformed into a temple of music, and the street and safe deposit floors were converted into refreshment quarters of great attraction, manned with a staff of 201 servitors. The morning after the party the Bank opened for business as usual with all traces of the evening's festivities removed as if by magic. Credit for these complicated transformations goes to Superintendent Nichols, his lieutenants and able staff of carpenters, electricians and porters, who toiled long hours to work this seeming miracle. Their notable accomplishments were the removal of all desks and bronze tables from the bank floor, the installing of a huge platform of the same color as the bank paneling to hold the Orchestra of 111 pieces, the arranging of over 1500 gold and green chairs for the concert audience, and the removal of the grilles from the tellers' cages downstairs to permit coat checking facilities and the serving of refreshments.

The catering was in charge of Mr. Glenwood J. Sherrard, managing director of the Parker House. It was on a scale rarely attempted in Boston and functioned perfectly from start to finish. An idea of the magnitude may be had from the following statistics of food consumed: 10,000 small fishballs, 12,000 scallops, 13,250 appetizer sausages, 8,000 anchovy canapes, 12,000 finger sandwiches, 175 pounds of lobster meat and 100 gallons of pop corn.

The guests were most generous in their praise of the whole affair and since their return home hundreds of letters have poured in from all parts of the country expressing keen appreciation of the Bank's hospitality.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Morning Star-Telegram

Costly Toscanini Symphony Fails to Excite Critics

NEW YORK, Nov. 6 (AP).—Considerably to the astonishment of many people about town, the famous new Toscanini symphony orchestra was almost stillborn, this week.

Created at a cost of $250,000, and likely to cost a lot more before the bills are all in, this magnificent body of players was given a dress rehearsal last Tuesday, and instead of the critical hullabaloo that normally would follow, there was practically silence.

Polite mention was the rule in the press; although there has been more than polite mention in the musical circles which presumably know.

There it is said that the new orchestra is as good as any on earth, and better than many. This is probably too strong praise—the orchestra as it sounded Tuesday under Artur Rodzinski was probably not as brilliant as the Boston symphony, not as luscious of tone as the Philadelphia when Leopold Stokowski conducts.

Like N. Y. Orchestra.

It sounded much like the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York—which is strange, for not a man was taken from the Philharmonic, although most of the remaining major symphonies lost one or more men.

The whole "dress rehearsal" idea was a little strange anyway. It is rumored that it was offered Rodzinski as reward for his arduous labor as drillmaster and breaker-in. Otherwise he might not have gotten credit for this back-breaking job, since the first concerts of the series over the air are to be directed by Pierre Monteux.

The orchestra's reception may also be a hangover from the debate over the ethical position of Toscanini in returning to America, and over the doubtful practicality of giving the now famous Toscanini broadcasts on Saturday night, when half the symphony orchestras in the country are playing in their own halls. Now it also is a possibility that records may be made by the group, under Toscanini.

Many Familiar Faces.

People who heard the "rehearsal" in NBC's big studio saw a good many familiar faces.

One was Mischa Mischakoff's. Now concert master of the new orchestra, Mischakoff was most recently in the same post for the Chicago Symphony. Besides playing concerts and chambermusic galore, he has been with Walter Damrosch in the old New York symphony, and with Stokowski in Philadelphia.

Remo Bolognini, once assistant concert master of the Philharmonic, and Arcady Birkenholz are among the first violins; Carlton Cooley, for years a mainstay of the Cleveland orchestra, and William Primrose, once of the now disbanded London string quartet, are in the viola section. And so it goes.

Aside from which the event of the week was Heifetz's first recital last Wednesday, ~~not ev~~en the opening of the horse show in Madison Square Gardon could dim the event or lessen the audience, although it may have removed a few social lights therefrom.

The capacity house and the standees heard a departure in the way of Heifetz programs. Lately he has been playing programs of uncompromising severity; this one contained nothing from the lowbrow department, but likewise nothing abstruse.

There was even a vieuxtemps concerto in D Minor) which Heifetz made to sound almost great. And the sweetmeat section after intermission contained some bits of fluff by Joseph Achron, originally intended as a children's suite, for piano, and arranged by Heifetz for fiddle.

From Bank to Temple of Music . . . Overnight!

The music of Haydn . . . Tchaikovsky . . . Schubert . . . Wagner . . . rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, resounded throughout the length and breadth of the bank floor on Columbus Day, October 12, as the Bank entertained delegates to the American Bankers Association and their guests, to the number of 3500.

(Story and pictures pages 4-7)

---

about

The FIRST- November - 1937

GLIMPSES BEHIND THE SCENES

XLIX. The Bank Gives a Party

On Columbus Day, October 12, the Bank entertained delegates to the American Bankers Association Convention and their guests, to the number of 3500, at a recital by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the main floor and with refreshments on the two lower floors.

Only twice before in its history since Symphony Hall was built in 1900 has the Orchestra played in Boston outside of its own home. The first occasion was in 1914 on the 80th birthday of its founder, Major Henry L. Higginson, at the Copley-Plaza Hotel, and the other was in 1916 for the Shakespeare Tercentenary at the Boston Opera House. The Orchestra's— Cont above right

Boston's Great Orchestra gives a Recital at the Bank, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Trustees consented to this third exception because of the representative character of the audience from all parts of the United States and voted that it be for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Institution.

It was a highly successful occasion. The tumultuous applause which greeted Dr. Koussevitzky and his Orchestra at the conclusion of the recital came from an audience who for the most part had never before had the opportunity of attending a concert by the great Orchestra of which Boston is so proud.

The success of this unique event was the result of months of planning and preparation on the part of many people. Between the close of business Monday night and four o'clock the next afternoon the bank floor was transformed into a temple of music, and the street and safe deposit floors were converted into refreshment quarters of great attraction, manned with a staff of 201 servitors. The morning after the party the Bank opened for business as usual with all traces of the evening's festivities removed as if by magic. Credit for these complicated transformations goes to Superintendent Nichols, his lieutenants and able staff of carpenters, electricians and porters, who toiled long hours to work this seeming miracle. Their notable accomplishments were the removal of all desks and bronze tables from the bank floor, the installing of a huge platform of the same color as the bank paneling to hold the Orchestra of 111 pieces, the arranging of over 1500 gold and green chairs for the concert audience, and the removal of the grilles from the tellers' cages downstairs to permit coat checking facilities and the serving of refreshments.

The catering was in charge of Mr. Glenwood J. Sherrard, managing director of the Parker House. It was on a scale rarely attempted in Boston and functioned perfectly from start to finish. An idea of the magnitude may be had from the following statistics of food consumed: 10,000 small fishballs, 12,000 scallops, 13,250 appetizer sausages, 8,000 anchovy canapes, 12,000 finger sandwiches, 175 pounds of lobster meat and 100 gallons of pop corn.

The guests were most generous in their praise of the whole affair and since their return home hundreds of letters have poured in from all parts of the country expressing keen appreciation of the Bank's hospitality.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Morning Star-Telegram

NOV 7 - 1937

Costly Toscanini Symphony Fails to Excite Critics

NEW YORK, Nov. 6 (AP).—Considerably to the astonishment of many people about town, the famous new Toscanini symphony orchestra was almost stillborn, this week.

Created at a cost of $250,000, and likely to cost a lot more before the bills are all in, this magnificent body of players was given a dress rehearsal last Tuesday, and instead of the critical hullabaloo that normally would follow, there was practically silence.

Polite mention was the rule in the press; although there has been more than polite mention in the musical circles which presumably know.

There it is said that the new orchestra is as good as any on earth, and better than many. This is probably too strong praise—the orchestra as it sounded Tuesday under Artur Rodzinski was probably not as brilliant as the Boston symphony, not as luscious of tone as the Philadelphia when Leopold Stokowski conducts.

Like N. Y. Orchestra.

It sounded much like the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York—which is strange, for not a man was taken from the Philharmonic, although most of the remaining major symphonies lost one or more men.

The whole "dress rehearsal" idea was a little strange anyway. It is rumored that it was offered Rodzinski as reward for his arduous labor as drillmaster and breaker-in. Otherwise he might not have gotten credit for this back-breaking job, since the first concerts of the series over the air are to be directed by Pierre Monteux.

The orchestra's reception may also be a hangover from the debate over the ethical position of Toscanini in returning to America, and over the doubtful practicality of giving the now famous Toscanini broadcasts on Saturday night, when half the symphony orchestras in the country are playing in their own halls. Now it also is a possibility that records may be made by the group, under Toscanini.

Many Familiar Faces.

People who heard the "rehearsal" in NBC's big studio saw a good many familiar faces.

One was Mischa Mischakoff's. Now concert master of the new orchestra, Mischakoff was most recently in the same post for the Chicago Symphony. Besides playing concerts and chambermusic galore, he has been with Walter Damrosch in the old New York symphony, and with Stokowski in Philadelphia.

Remo Bolognini, once assistant concert master of the Philharmonic, and Arcady Birkenholz are among the first violins; Carlton Cooley, for years a mainstay of the Cleveland orchestra, and William Primrose, once of the now disbanded London string quartet, are in the viola section. And so it goes.

Aside from which the event of the week was Heifetz's first recital last Wednesday, [illegible]en the opening of the horse show in Madison Square Gardon could dim the event or lessen the audience, although it may have removed a few social lights therefrom.

The capacity house and the standees heard a departure in the way of Heifetz programs. Lately he has been playing programs of uncompromising severity; this one contained nothing from the lowbrow department, but likewise nothing abstruse.

There was even a vieuxtemps concerto in D Minor) which Heifetz made to sound almost great. And the sweetmeat section after intermission contained some bits of fluff by Joseph Achron, originally intended as a children's suite, for piano, and arranged by Heifetz for fiddle.

42

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

OCT 31 1937

Roussel Will Be Honored by Koussevitzky

By Cecil M. Smith.

IN BOSTON this week-end Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Albert Roussel's Symphony in G Minor at the Symphony hall concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The scheduling of this symphony is a tribute to the memory of one of the major figures in modern French music.

Roussel died in Paris last August at the age of 68. Except for Maurice Ravel, who is alive but inactive, and Florent Schmitt, who is both alive and active, Roussel was the last survivor of a magnificent older generation of composers whose achievements earned for modern French music the high popular regard in which it is now held.

Chicago Symphony Owes Roussel an Apology.

As the chief musical institution of Chicago, the Chicago Symphony orchestra owes the memory of Roussel an apology for neglecting him both during his lifetime and after his death. One movement of the oriental suite "Evocations" was played eighteen seasons ago. The orchestral fragments from the ballet "The Spider's Banquet" were belatedly played in 1926, two years after Henri Verbrugghen had introduced them here with the Minneapolis orchestra.

This is the sum total of the orchestra's gesture toward the composer of four of the most distinguished symphonies in the modern répertoire; of the opera - ballet "Padmavâti," which Edward Burlingame Hill calls "the most striking manifestation of penetrating exotic inspiration in the whole range of French music"; of the "Evocations," about which the celebrated critic Georges Jean-Aubry has written, "Albert Roussel's 'Evocations' are one of the seven or eight symphonic works composed during twenty years which will insure, for a long time to come, the future of French music."

Roussel's Early Career Was Exceedingly Colorful.

The early career of Roussel was exceedingly colorful. Intended by his parents for a career in the navy, he sailed to Cochin China on the armored cruiser Styx. On this long trip the life of the sea got on his nerves, while the sound of oriental music got into his blood. Back in Paris, he determined to make a composer of himself. At 28, therefore, he entered the Schola Cantorum, where for ten years [what American composer would undertake such a discipline?] he sat at the feet of Vincent d'Indy.

In 1909 a pleasure trip to the orient furnished material for his two great oriental works, the mystically lovely "Evocations" and the fierce primitive drama of oriental love and treachery in the thirteenth century, "Padmavâti."

The most remarkable aspect of Roussel's rich musical personality, however, was his capacity for growth. No sooner had these oriental works brought him acclaim than he abandoned their style to join with younger men like Stravinsky, Honegger, and Milhaud in the exploration of the expressive possibilities of dissonant music. Less headlong and better balanced than Stravinsky, he achieved in the four symphonies and in the orchestral prelude "Pour une Fête de Printemps" a beautifully tempered use of clashing polyharmonies.

Roussel's Music Is Unknown in Chicago.

We do not know Roussel's music in Chicago. The following tabulation of the Chicago Symphony orchestra's total performances of compositions by Roussel and his contemporaries points its own moral:

Debussy, 80; Ravel, 61; d'Indy, 51; Chausson, 33; Dukas, 26; Schmitt, 11; Roussel, 2.

One of Roussel's lesser contemporaries, Gustave Charpentier, is represented in the program Dr. Frederick Stock has chosen for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra hall concerts Thursday evening and Friday afternoon.

Charpentier is a curious figure in the world of music, for he has written only two good things, the opera "Louise," a popular feature of Chicago opera seasons when Mary Garden was with the company, and the orchestral suite "Impressions of Italy," to be revived this week after a silence of five years. I have examined the opera "Julien," written as a sequel to "Louise," and some of Charpentier's smaller works, and I can assure you that you are missing nothing. The "Impressions of Italy," on the other hand, are colorful, charming, and quite worth playing again.

Walter Gieseking Is to Be Piano Soloist.

The complete program, with Walter Gieseking as piano soloist, is as follows:

Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann" ....Strauss
Suite, "Impressions of Italy"..Charpentier
Concerto No. 1, D minor..........Brahms

The season's second popular concert will be played by the orchestra Saturday night, also in Orchestra hall:

Overture to "Fra Diavolo"..........Auber
Symphony No. 5, E minor..Tschaikowsky
"L'Arlésienne" Suite No. 2..........Bizet
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau"..Smetana
"Sailors' Dance," from "The Red Poppy"..........................Glière

At the Great Northern theater this afternoon the Illinois Symphony orchestra continues its policy of mixing familiar items with music not yet heard in Chicago. Albert Goldberg will conduct the first local performance of Sibelius' Third Symphony, and Beatrice Eppstein, pianist, will play the Scriabin concerto:

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"..Berlioz
Symphony No. 3, C major..........Sibelius
[First time in Chicago.]
Concerto for piano and orchestra, opus 20..........................Scriabin
[First time in Chicago.]
Intermezzo from "The Betrothal" ....Eric DeLamarter
[First time.]
Rhapsody, "España"..............Chabrier

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

OCT 31 1937

New Recording Fine Memorial For Gershwin

Victor Releases 'Rhapsody' as Played By Boston 'Pops' Orchestra.

The Boston "Pops" Orchestra, which Victor has been using a lot lately for its recordings of lighter music, came out with two releases this month, one of which is particularly interesting for its material and its soloist.

In a two-record album (M-358) there is a new recording of George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," the most popular work of the late composer. This release, no doubt, is intended as a kind of memorial to the gifted creator of tunes. They say Gershwin heard the recording before his death last July, and was enthusiastic about it.

He was enthusiastic, too, undoubtedly, over the fact that the solo piano part in this version was carried by no one less than the Boston Symphony Orchestra's own pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. Sanroma has been playing many serious things recently, not only in Boston, but also in New York and over the radio. So he is prepared to lend no small amount of distinction to the performance of one of Gershwin's most serious undertakings.

The original "Rhapsody in Blue" recording was done by Gershwin himself, and Paul Whiteman's Orchestra. Yet, because of the great improvements in record methods; because the "Rhapsody" was re-orchestrated for a full symphony; because Mr. Sanroma and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra play the "Rhapsody together here for something like the 100th time, this new set should provide very worthwhile listening. Then there is also another reason; selections from "Strike Up the Band" appear on the second of the records.

"The Pops Orchestra turn in yet another record performance this month. On disk 12043 there is vigorous and colorful music made of von Weber's overture "Oberon."—J. W.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 14 1937

Jacques Fevrier

French pianist who will make his New York debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Nov. 19

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 31 1937

TEA TO FETE GROUP IN AID OF CONCERTS

Brooklyn Committee in Behalf of Boston Symphony Series to Be Guests Nov. 8

MRS. DAVENPORT HOSTESS

Orchestra to Open Season on Nov. 19—Ballet Russe to Be Seen Tomorrow Night

The members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be guests at a tea to be given by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman, at her home, 40A Monroe Place, Brooklyn, on Nov 8.

The series of five philharmonic concerts by the Boston Orchestra, of which Serge Koussevitzky is conductor, will be held at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Nov. 19 and the nights of Jan. 7, Feb. 10, March 11 and April 1.

The series is presented under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn ocmmittee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Davenport acting chairman. Mrs. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good are vice chairmen of the latter committee.

At the tea meeting Mrs. Blum, who is in charge of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the junior league committee, will make reports.

Mrs. Davenport announced the acceptance of seven new members of the Brooklyn committee as follows: Mrs. Ernest Ash, Theodore Fitch, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Maud B. Wood and Miss Elizabeth Wright.

Members of Mrs. Badger's Junior League committee include Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Miss Edith Warren.

The Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, the second in the Brooklyn Institute's series, "Music and the Dance," will perform tomorrow night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will be "A Hundred Kisses," created by Bronislava Nijinska; "Francesca da Rimini," Lichine-Tchaikovsky-Oliver Messel, and "Boutique Fantasque," Massine's ballet on Rossini's music.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 24 1937

The Perennial Hold Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ALTHOUGH TO Serge Koussevitzky and his one hundred and ten master musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra season does not begin until the eighth of October, this is the height of the season to one department of the orchestra's organization.

Day in and day out, now, people come to Symphony Hall from every point in Boston, and from more than two hundred other communities scattered through New England, although not a note of any musical instrument may be heard in the building. They peer into the deserted expanse of the famous auditorium, seek out certain seats, and occupy them with animated interest as they survey the empty stage this way and that.

These visitors who keep the concertless hall busy these days are intent on assuring themselves of season tickets. Some of them are merely paying for their reservations. They may have had the same seat for many seasons before. But they like to go in and sit a moment in the familiar location, while in fancy they review memorable performances they have heard there by Koussevitzky and his men. Mentally they visualize the masculinely graceful gestures of Koussevitzky, the marvelous expressiveness of his left hand, an occasional fleeting glimpse of the sensitive pantomime of his face. Meanwhile, they hear in imagination the far-famed tone and virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a tone which visiting European critics say can be infinitely subtle, or of breath-taking power; a tone that even in its power is irridescent with the clear colors of the individual sounds of the instruments, balanced and fused to perfection.

A perennial fascination seems to grip those who become season ticket holders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of the tickets are passed along in the same families among heirlooms handed down from Bostonian ancestors who occupy niches in history. You will always see a representative of certain families in certain particular seats. And so, probably, will the children of persons observing them there. During the great business depression, these tickets often were the last possession to be liquidated.

There was one family drama in which a man and his wife held on to a pair of tickets long after they had sacrificed other assets. Finally they sorrowfully agreed that they must give them up. But at the last moment, the husband refused to deprive his wife of hers, and with some heroism preserved it for her.

So much does a regular membership in the audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra mean to one woman, that she commutes yearly from England. Actually, she has been owner of a season ticket to all four series of concerts played in Symphony Hall—twenty-four each on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights, and six each on Tuesday afternoons and Monday nights. She arrives in Boston a little after the season starts, lives in a Boston hotel until the last concert, the last of April, then returns to England.

Due to the existence of concert series both in the daytime and the night, both weekly, and monthly, it is possible for a music lover near or far, or variously situated financially, to meet his individual needs in becoming a season ticket holder. In a way, one may go shopping for symphonic enjoyment.

And right now, the market hall is alive with shoppers.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 6 - 1937

..Music and

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will pay its second visit to Providence Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Theatre. The occasion, always important, is doubly so because Martha Baird, pianist (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen of Providence), will appear as soloist.

Martha Baird is a native of California and appeared in public as a child prodigy. She completed her studies with Artur Schnabel in Berlin and subsequently toured Europe, playing with the principal orchestras of London, Berlin and other cities. She has also made tours of this country. She has appeared with the Boston Symphony in other cities than Providence and her playing of the Mozart Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (K. 466) will be a rare treat.

The orchestra will play first Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in B minor and close it with the "Second Symphony" of Sibelius in D major.

The two movements of the "Unfinished Symphony" were written in October, 1822, and first played in Vienna in 1865, some 37 years after his death. The manuscript was accidentally discovered at the home of a friend of Schubert's. In the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde of Vienna, in addition to the manuscript notes of the third movement, a scherzo which ends with the middle portion of a trio. Apart from the first nine measures orchestrated by Schubert the remainder is a sort of manuscript note for piano solo. The ravishing beauty of the melodies of the two movements completed suggest the thought that such music is not of this earth.

Sibelius, the musical giant of Finland, is the composer now living who will be most likely to go down in history with the great masters. His style is not too easy to grasp, but his music is full of the grandeur and beauty of his country. His Symphony No. 2 was written in 1902.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 20 1937

KOUSSEVITSKY'S BANK AUDISH

Boston, Oct. 19.

First National Bank of Boston went Hollywood in a grandiose gesture of hospitality for bankers from all over the country visiting the city for the 63rd annual convention of the American Bankers Assn.

Officials of the bank were hosts at a cocktail hour Tuesday (12) to which delegates were invited. For music, they gave the guest bankers Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing on the main banking floor. Grille work, tables and furniture and fixtures were entirely removed from the lower banking floor to provide space for the bar and dinner service.

Local bankers heard that many of the visiting delegates wanted to hear the famous orchestra. There was no concert scheduled during the convention, so the First National staged one.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS

NOV 7 - 1937

Symphony Aids Poor in B'klyn

Prominent Brooklynites will again take boxes for the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Symphony will give five concerts during the Winter season, the first on Nov. 19. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn. Receipts go to charity.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 7 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL OPEN NOV. 19

Boxholders Listed for the 52d Season by Mrs. Davenport, Brooklyn Committee Head

ARION REHEARSALS BEGIN

Concert Is Scheduled for Dec. 5 —Dr. Guenther to Lecture on Goethe and Schubert

Boxholders for the fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn were announced yesterday by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

Mrs. Davenport will entertain members of the committee at a tea in her home at 48 Monroe Place, Brooklyn, tomorrow to complete plans for the series of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. At the gathering Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League committee, will make reports.

The boxholders include Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. James Maclay, Miss Florence Logan and Miss Mary E. Mills.

New members of the Brooklyn committee for the concerts are Mrs. Ernest Ash, Theodore Fitch, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Maud B. Wood, Miss Elizabeth Wright and Edward J. A. Zeiner. Members of the Junior League committee include Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Miss Edith Warren.

The concerts will be held on Friday night, Nov. 19, and on the nights of Jan. 7, Feb. 10, March 11 and April 1. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn committee.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 8 1937

Mus

Historical Survey of Cha School of Design—Co and Tchaikovsky He Pictures Place

By G. Y. Loveridge

The historical survey of chamber music continued yesterday afternoon in the Rhode Island School of Design Museum with a string sextet in B-flat major by Brahms and a trio in A-minor by Tchaikovsky.

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," the D-minor concerto for piano by Mozart and the first symphony of Sibelius are to be played.

Martha Baird (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen) will perform the concerto with the orchestra. It is one of the better known of the many Mozart wrote, and is melodious and delightful, like all his works. It is a particular favorite with Miss Baird. She has chosen the Beethoven cadenzas for the performance.

The Schubert symphony has the wearing qualities of true poetry. It is always being played, by all sorts of orchestras, and it has been on the stage and in the movies, and no doubt a good many people are rather tired of it. Yet there are probably plenty of people who have never heard it at all, just as there are many people who have never read a play by Shakespeare—at least under their own power. This is an opportunity for those who haven't heard it and those who have to hear it at its best.

Written early in the 1820's, it was not performed until 1865, long after Schubert was dead. Whether it is truly an "unfinished" symphony is often questioned. There are only two movements. A sketch for a third movement has been found, but most listeners find the two completed parts a complete and satisfactory experience.

The symphony by Sibelius is often referred to as the last of its kind, in the tradition of the great masters of the 19th Century. The composer was a young man when he wrote it, and had not yet found his own style. The symphony shows the influence of Tchaikovsky.

Curiously, the first American performance of the symphony was by the Boston Orchestra, in 1907. Since that time, the orchestra has been one of the foremost in bringing the great Finnish master's works to the public.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 9 - 1937

Boston Symphony Sponsors Meet At Mrs. Davenport's Home; Tea Precedes Talk on Koussevitzky

The life of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was the subject of a talk given by Mrs. Sylvia Dreyfus of Boston yesterday at the first autumn meeting of the Brooklyn committee for the orchestra's 52d annual series of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The meeting was held at the home of the acting chairman of the borough group, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, of No. 40A Monroe place.

Miss Frances Coutts was named to represent the group as hostess in the committee box at the opening Brooklyn concert on Friday evening, Nov. 19. Miss Irene Miles, acting director of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, spoke briefly, paying tribute to the women who have had so large a share in bringing music to Brooklyn.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, a vice-chairman of the committee and the chairman of boxes for the concerts, and Mrs. Benjamin Prince, president of the Brooklyn Music School Settlement, presided at the tea table preceding the meeting.

The concert series is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committe, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman. Mrs. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good are the vice-chairmen of the committee.

Among those attending the meeting were: Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. Trafton C. Badger, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, James H. Post, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. Joseph Dana Allen, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Lewis Francis, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Miss Elizabeth Wright, Mrs. John D. Schultz, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Ernest Ash and Theodore Fitch.

LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE

NOV 8 - 1937

TOSCANINI HEADS A NEW ORCHESTRA

New York Symphony Is Mentioned Politely But Critics Are Bit Cool

New York (AP)—Considerably to the astonishment of many people about town, the famous new Toscanini Symphony Orchestra was almost stilborn, last week.

Created at a cost of $250,000, and likely to cost a lot more before the bills are all in, this magnificent body of players was given a dress rehearsal last Tuesday, and instead of the critical hullabaloo that normally would follow, there was practically silence.

Polite mention was the rule in the press; although there has been more than polite mention in the musical circles which presumably know.

There it is said that the new orchestra is as good as any on earth, and better than many. This is probably too strong praise—the orchestra as it sounded under Artur Rodzinski was probably not as brilliant as the Boston Symphony, not as luscious of tone as the Philadelphia when Leopold Stokowski conducts.

It sounded much like the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York —which is strange, for not a man was taken from the philharmonic, although most of the remaining major symphonies lost one or more men.

The whole "dress rehearsal" idea was a little strange anyway. It is rumored that it was offered Rodzinski as reward for his arduous labor as drillmaster and breaker-in. Otherwise he might not have gotten credit for this back-breaking job, since the first concerts of the series over the air are to be directed by Pierre Monteaux.

The orchestra's reception may also be a hangover from the debate over the ethical position of Toscanini in returning to America, and over the doubtful practicability of giving the now famous Toscanini broadcasts on Saturday night, when half the symphony orchestras in the country are playing in their own halls. Now it also is a possibility that records may be made by the group, under Toscanini.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER

NOV 8 - 1937

Capital of Music

If an orchestra is known by the company it keeps, the New Haven Symphony-Civic orchestra which New Haveners will hear again tonight is tops. You have to go into the history of the soloist a little bit to understand that, though if you're sophisticated in the musically eminent, that isn't necessary. For Orrea Pernel is by way of being one of the prime violinists of the time; a rating to which her appearance four days before we are to see her, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra would attest, if her playing didn't, as it will. New Haven, in brief, in showing her, testifies to its renown as a capital of music.

It's among the pleasant circumstances of this new and local musical experiment that the merger of the one venerable and the other much younger orchestral companies in New Haven is proving more popular than the two together before the union. New Haven, its musical tastes cultivated by the excellent School of Music programs at Woolsey Hall, has been equipped to take this newer group to its appreciative heart. We are by way of being unique in cities of our size for our artistic achievements, anyhow; such a concert as we are to hear combining wich the Ballet Russe at the Shubert later in the week to emphasize that.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 8 - 1937

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here on Nov. 18

5 Evening and 5 Afternoon Concerts in Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first New York visit of the season next week, beginning its usual series of five evening and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Saturday, November 18 and 20, and the Brooklyn series of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 19.

For the Thursday evening program in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will repeat the opening list of his Boston season, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and the second symphony of Sibelius. On Saturday afternoon, Jacques Fevrier, a French pianist making his first visit here at the orchestra's invitation, will be the soloist in Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand. Serge Prokofieff's suite from his incidental music for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije," will be performed for the first time here, and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" will close the list. The program scheduled for Brooklyn includes Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, the Ravel concerto and Sibelius symphony.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 9 - 1937

Symphony

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport Entertains Group at Tea-Meeting

The Brooklyn Committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held the first meeting of the Fall yesterday at the home of Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, 40a Monroe Place, who is acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, a vice chairman of the Brooklyn committee and chairman of boxes, and Mrs. Benjamin Prince, president of the Brooklyn Music School Settlement, presided at the tea table.

Mrs. Sylvia Dreyfus gave a talk on Koussevitzky's life before coming to America in 1924. "Koussevitzky," Mrs. Rreyfus said, "conducted his first orchestra at the age of 12 and at the age of 14 left home to make his way in the world as a musician." Dr. Koussevitzky stayed in Russia during the World War and left after the revolution to live in Paris. In 1924 he was invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Committee chairmen for the season are: Mrs. Blum, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, new chairman of the Junior League committee.

Miss Irene Miles, acting director of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, gave a report.

Among those attending the tea were: Mrs. Blum, Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. P. Badger, Mrs. Prince, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, James H. Post, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. Joseph Dana Allen, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Lewis Francis, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Mrs. Otis Swan Carrol, Miss Elizabeth Wright, Mrs. John D. Schulz, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Ernest Ash and Theodore Fitch.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 10 1937

Martha Baird Gets Ovation As Hub Symphony Soloist

PROVIDENCE, Nov. 10—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, with Martha Baird of Providence as soloist, received an ovation last evening at the second concert of the series.

Metropolitan Theatre was filled with an enthusiastic audience which was thrilled by the beauty of Martha Baird's performance of the Mozart Concerto for piano in D minor. She interpreted this concerto with the utmost fidelity. Every phrase was perfectly turned with choice tone quality. Scale passages were crystalline and the absolute simplicity of style and forthright expression of ideas gave a charm to her playing which was admirably complemented by the orchestra accompaniment. In the Romanza, the fascinating melody was most expressively played and at its final reprise the extraordinary delicacy of her touch made this an outstanding part of the performance. The Rondo sparkled with joyous phrases and at the final section in D major, the music was fairly jovial.

SPONTANEOUS APPLAUSE.

Some of the warmth of the reception Martha Baird received was undoubtedly due to the fact that she belongs to Providence but the major portion of it was genuine and spontaneous apprecition of her artistic and musicianly interpretation of Mozart. We are proud to claim so able a musician.

Schubert's Symphony in B minor opened the program. This is pleasant music and when the Boston Symphony plays Schubert there is never a doubt that his lyric phrases will each receive their just due. From the plaintive opening phrase of basses and 'cellos, followed the delicate violin passage of repeated notes. Then came the forte chord and the modulation in the bassoon part to the familiar 'cello strain, which was most expressively played. Here one can sit back and let the lovely music float across the footlights and be grateful that Schubert did not make his symphonies too involved. The orchestra played the Schubert with most delicate shading and nothing could have refined the atmosphere so well for the hearing of Mozart, as did this pure melodic work so delightfully played.

CONDUCTOR'S FAVORITE.

After intermission, the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 43 was given a magnificent performance. Serge Koussevitsky believes in Sibelius and by his splendid interpretations has done as much as any conductor in America to increase interest in this Finnish composer.

Sibelius writes vigorous music. He has a sinewy texture to his orchestration and with a deliberate restriction of thematic material he builds a tremendous structure solidly by his sheer genius. The beauty of his melodic contour can scarcely be excelled. His favorite device is to give a melody to one choir to play in octaves until it is indelibly impressed on one's consciousness. The music of Sibelius is universal in its appeal. It has in the strength and inspiration of his homeland but he writes of life and issues a challenge to accept it and be glad.

No one section of the Boston Symphony can be singled out for special praise. The brass choir gave a most stirring performance, the reed section had delightful sonority and the strings were both expressive and powerful. Altogether this Sibelius ended an inspiring evening most successfully and we are indebted to Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony for another of their memorable concerts.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 11 19

Next Wednesday

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY . . . favorite at Woolsey Hall, he comes back next Wednesday night to conduct the Boston Symphony. His program will include Haydn, Prokofieff and Strauss.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 11 1937

It has been our custom every time we hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to look through the ranks to locate Robert Gundersen Valerio, our local clarinet in the orchestra, can't make much change of seat though one hears his salary is far from static but tagging Gundersen, another New Bedford member, is a game of stepping down. Way up top among the first violins some few years back (and starting among the second violins at that) he has been placed at the end and gradually descended in seat but ascended in rating till for some years now he has been bowing away immediately behind Theodorowicz, who sits next the concert meister, Burgin. At the "Pops" he often acts as concert meister.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 13 1937

FRIDAY OPENS SEASON OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Orchestra to Inaugurate 52nd Brooklyn Series at Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn next Friday evening, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the program, which consists of Haydn's Symphony in G major No. 88, Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major and Ravel's Piano Concerto for the left hand with Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, as soloist.

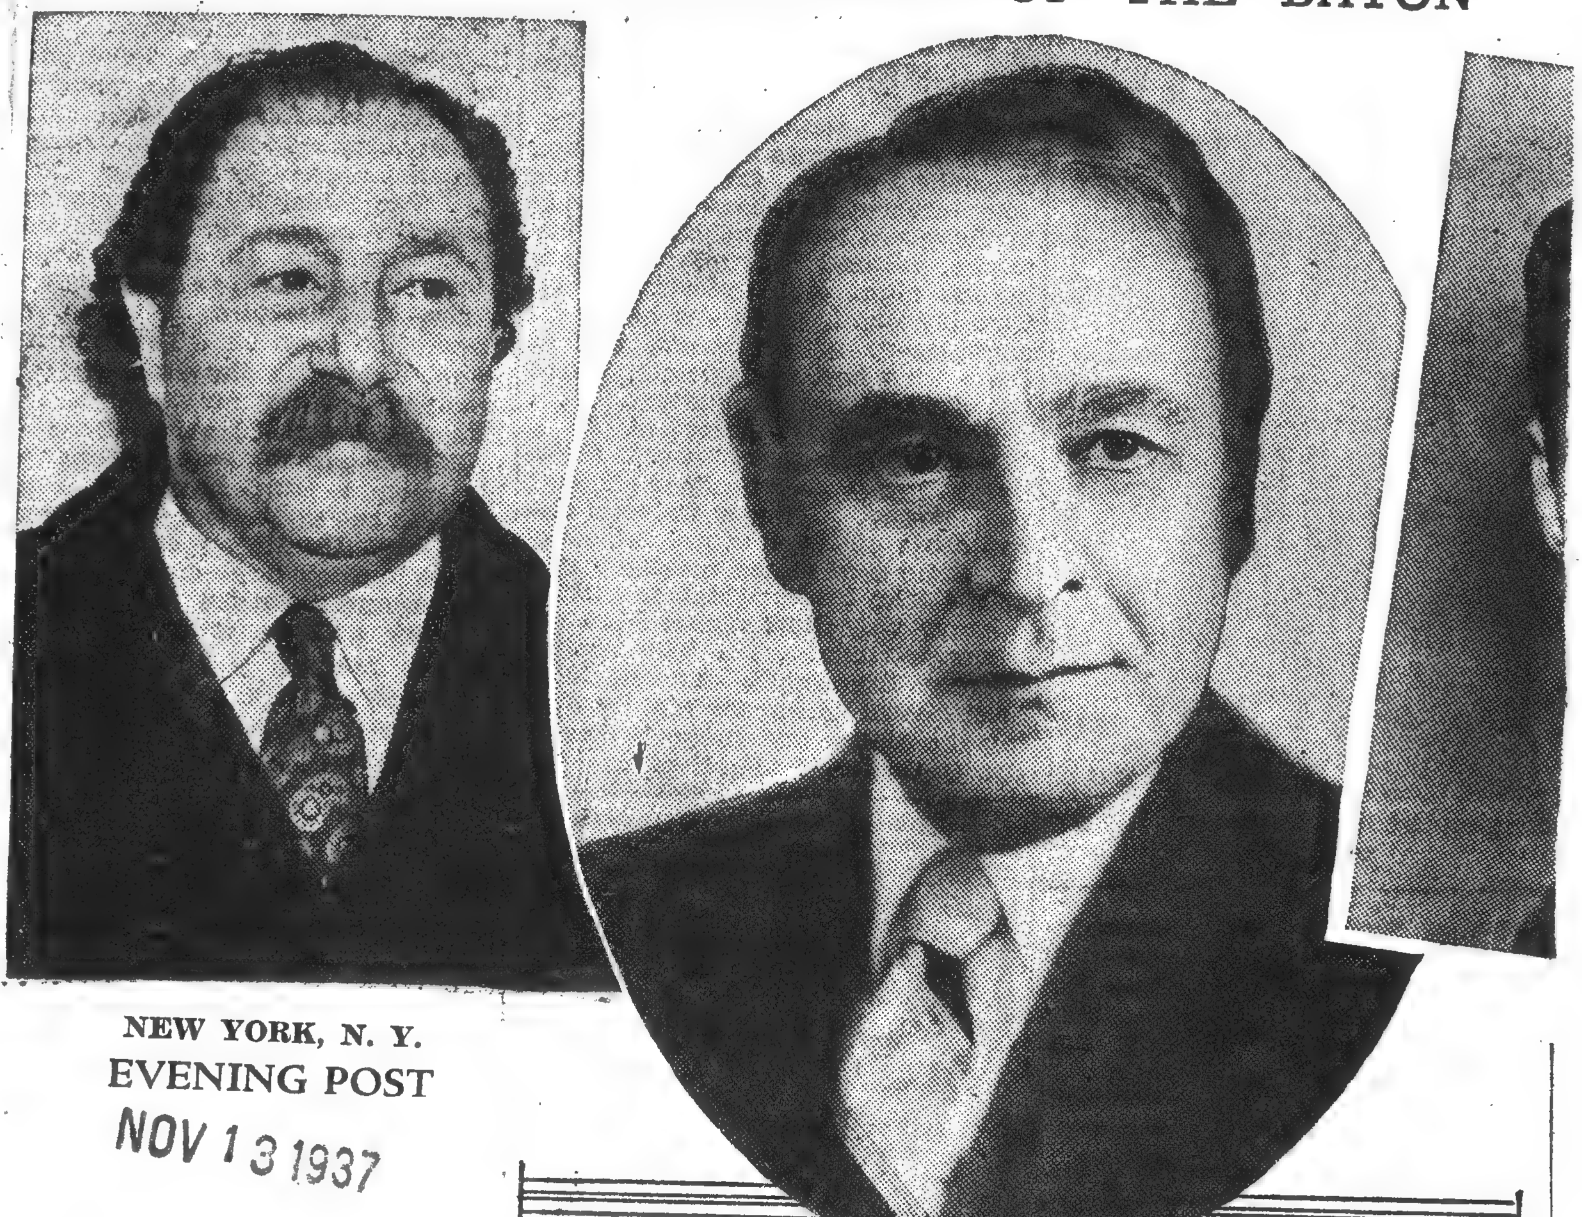
The playing of the Ravel Concerto will mark M. Fevrier's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the metropolitan area. The composer wrote this Concerto originally for Paul Wittgenstein, noted Austrian pianist who lost his right arm in the World War. Composed and published in 1931, the piece was performed by Wittgenstein in various European cities and in Paris on Jan. 17, 1933, with Ravel conducting. Wittgenstein also performed the work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during his visit to this country in the season of 1934-35. The Concerto was revived in October, by M. Fevrier at the concerts of the Paris Conservatoire under the direction of Philippe Gubaert. M. Fevrier had made a close study of the score with Ravel and performed it in the presence of the composer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky will give five concerts during the present Brooklyn season. The dates of the remaining four are: Friday evening, Jan. 7, Thursday evening, Feb. 10, Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1. These concerts are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences together with the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committee.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 13 1937

GENTLEMEN OF THE BATON



Conductors who make their first appearances of the season during the coming week. Left to right: Pierre Monteux, who will direct the new NBC Symphony Orchestra in its first performance tonight; Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony, which plays at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon; Leon Barzin, who will direct the National Orchestral Association at Carnegie Hall on Monday evening.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 13 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS CARNEGIE HALL SERIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, at 8:45, and Saturday afternoon, at 2:30. Serge Koussevitzky announces the following program for the evening concert: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

At the afternoon concert, Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of te suits which Prokofieff wrote for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije." Ravel's Piano Concerto for the Left Hand will be played, with Jacques Fevrier as soloist. The concluding number will be Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 13 1937

THE WEEK

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct his Boston Symphony Orchestra in two concerts at Carnegie Hall next week—Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 18 and 20.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 14 1937

Plan Symphony Series

Mrs. Joseph Dana Allen, Mrs. Benjamin Prince and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, discuss plans for the series at tea at Mrs. Davenport's home. The first concert will be given Friday evening at the Academy of Music.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

NOV 13 1937

Koussevitzky Does 'A Stokowski' as Audience is Late

Boston, Nov. 12 (INS)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today served warning on late arrivals to his concerts.

After a movement of a Mozart symphony had begun last night, a group of late comers entered Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the music, folded his arms, and waited until all was quiet.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

NOV 13 1937

Koussevitzky Gives Late Comers Notice

BOSTON, Nov. 13—(I. N. S.).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conuctor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, served warning on late arrivals to his concerts. After a Mozart symphony had begun last night, a group of late comers entered Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the music, folded his arms and waited until all was quiet.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 1 4 1937

45

Music Recording Apparatus Weighs Tons But Is Cheaper To Move Than Artists; Matching Sections Is Job For An Expert

By JOHN SELBY.

New York, November 13—(AP)—The phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious. Much music has been done four times already—once in the old mechanical method, once when this method had been improved, once when electrical recording came in, and again recently, because electric recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there is no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

Television may likewise do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long-playing record may be produced. And so on.

Recording is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording studio was as fixed as a mountain—artists were brought to it from all corners of the world.

Studios still are maintained in strategic locations, of course—New York, Chicago, and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But it can be taken places, and it generally is cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

It weighs several tons—nobody seems to have thought to weigh it exactly. Mostly it can go by express. The more delicate parts are carried by the recording crew as personal baggage.

As a matter of fact, each man has his favorite recorder, which he values much as Heifetz values his two best violins. These recorders are adjusted to infinitisimal precision; certain recording experts prefer one adjustment, others another.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being 13 inches in diameter and 1½ inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" to do the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for the Victor Company, and Charles O'Connell; who does everything from conducting symphony orchestras to figuring record lengths on important jobs.

The performance was being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with a Boston chorus and, of course, the Boston Symphony. But there was only one performance, since it was all a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund, and it was necessary to record with the audience in the hall.

Four recorders were set up, working in pairs. Mr. O'Connell did the delicate job of dividing the work into record-length sections, and found there would be 54 of these. He arranged for the records to end, as often as possible, on a tonic chord—or at least a chord not too tantalizing to the ear. It looked like a snap, on paper, once the job was done. The trouble was that of the 54 "sides," only two worked out exactly. Slight delays, changes of tempo, soloists a little slow in getting under way threw the whole thing out of gear.

The job was done in one sitting however, and if it had been made the usual way, five recording sessions would have been needed. When the work is released around the end of the year, the most experienced listeners will not know that on one record the factory found exactly one-half of one-eighth note. This bit of sound was not only transferred to the next record, but in exact time.

The recorders do not use electric motors, these being subject to slight speed fluctuations. Gravity motors are used, and lugging the huge weights for these about the land is one reason why equipment is so heavy.

Recording men insist there is nothing in the musical world surer than the pitch of a given tone on a record; always it will reproduce truly if the machine is turning at the correct speed.

This matter of pitch also does its tricks. One day the Beethoven Eighth Symphony was being done at Boston. The first two movements were completed one day; next morning the third, or Scherzo, was recorded.

Koussevitzky listened to the playback on the Scherzo, and exclaimed: "It's a half-tone sharp." It was, too.

This was corrected immediately, and the result played once more for Koussevitzky. "Yes," said he, "the pitch is right, but that's not my tempo. It's a shade slow."

He was correct again, although probably not one musician in a thousand could have told it.

Much recording is done in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where the orchestra plays in the empty hall, using the regular stage set designed for it by Leopold Stokowski. No acoustical doctoring is necessary, though in Symphony Hall, Boston, and Carnegie Hall, New York, curtains and such like are sometimes hung.

Carnegie Hall sees little recording, although Messrs. Wallerstein and O'Connell recall ruefully one experience there with Toscanini. A lot of money had been spent to record a few things with the spike-moustached little Italian. When he heard the playback he refused to approve a single thing.

Microphone placement is often as tricky as anything else. There are two kinds of mikes—unidirectional, which means the mike absorbs the sound as it sweeps in a straight line from the performer; velocity, which focuses on particular sections of the whole.

Probably the trickiest problem with mikes was recording the enormous Wanamaker organ in Philadelphia. This is so large that 20 symphony orchestras could be seated in the space it requires. It is built into a store, on several floors, with a rotunda to complicate the course of the sound waves.

At first the records were filled with mysterisu sounds like doors opening and shutting, squeaks, and so on. These were only the usual small noises around a big organ, but they insisted on recording themselves. Finally, by a long course of experiments, the microphones were placed so as to pick up tone and not noise—fortunately, the result was like an organ playing in a great cathedral, instead of a retail store.

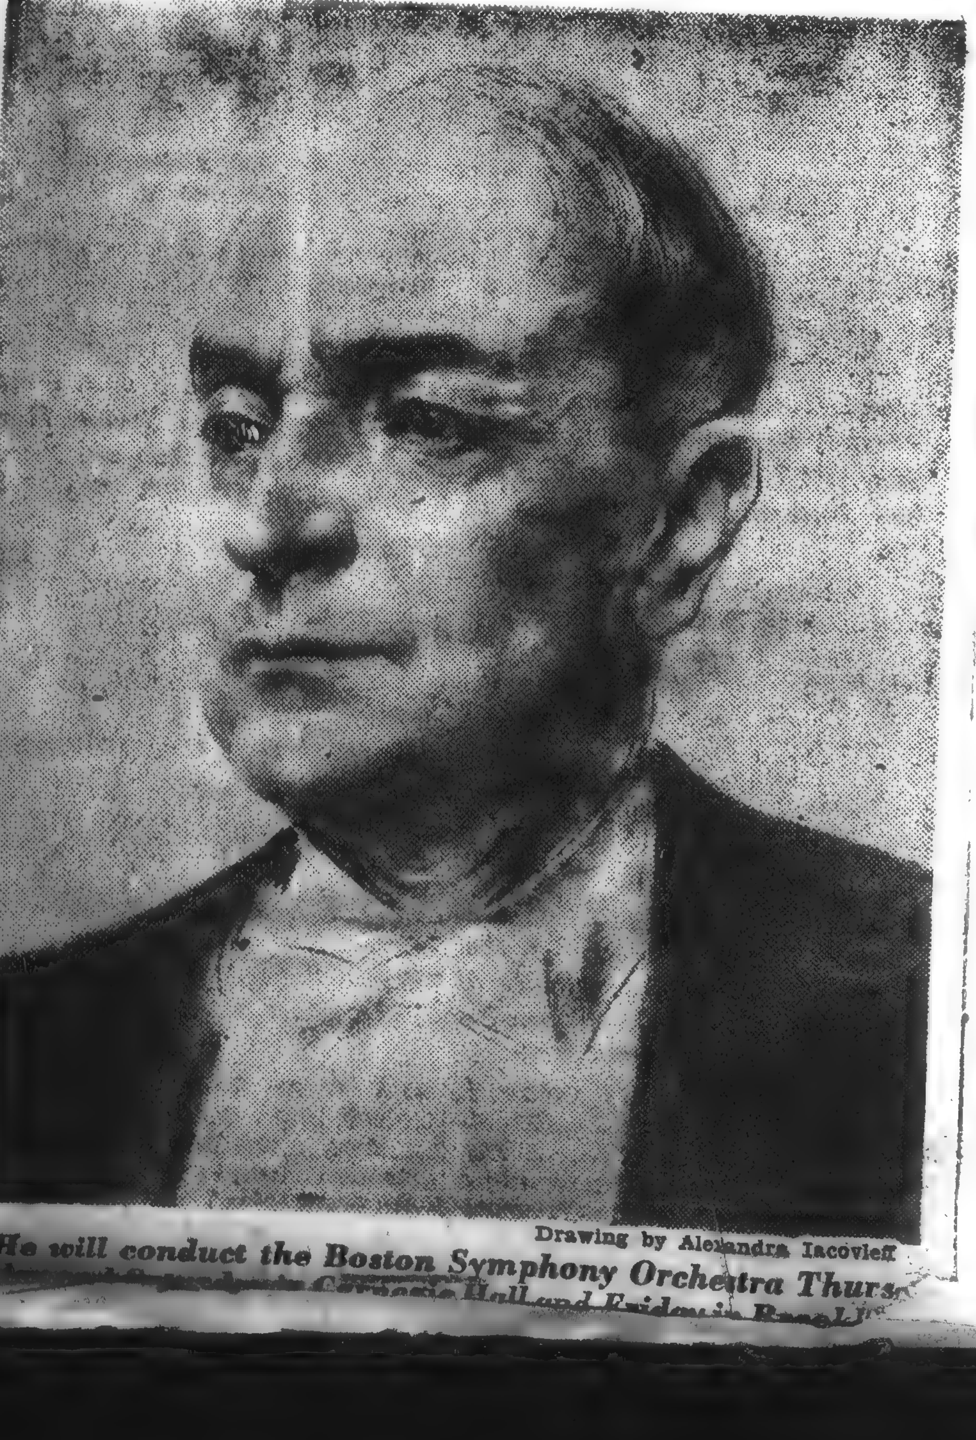
The technical principles of manufacturing records have been improved, yet remain basically the same as old. What most people do not realize is, however, that their records are never stamped from the master matrix, once this is completed.

This is never used for anything but making stamps from which, in turn, records are pressed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 1 4 1937

Serge Koussevitzky



Drawing by Alexandra Iacovleff

He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thurs- [illegible] Carnegie Hall and Friday in Brookl

---

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

NOV 1 3 1937

Temperamental Serge

BOSTON, Nov. 13 (INS)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today served warning on late arrivals to his concerts.

After a movement of a Mozart symphony had begun last night, a group of late comers entered Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the music, folded his arms, and waited until all was quiet.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

NOV 1 . 1937

Late Arrivals Warned By Symphony Leader

BOSTON, Nov. 13.—(INS.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today served warning on late arrivals to his concerts. After a concert had begun last night, a group of late comers entered. Dr. Koussevitsky stopped the music, folded his arms, and waited until all was quiet.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

NOV 1 4 1937

CHANGES SEEN IN PHONOGRAPH

Industry Enjoying Good Business But Men in Charge Fear Future Inventions.

BY JOHN SELBY.
Associated Press Arts Editor.

NEW YORK, Nov. 13—The phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious. Much music has been done four times already; once in the old mechanical method; once when this method had been improved; once when electrical recording came in; again recently, because electric recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there's no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

Television may likewise do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long playing record may be produced. And so on.

RECORDING CHANGING.

Recording is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording studio was as fixed as a mountain—artists were brought to it from all corners of the world. Studios still are maintained in strategic location, of course—New York, Chicago, and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But it can be taken places, and it is generally cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

It weighs several tons—nobody seems to have thought to weigh it exactly. Mostly it can go by express, the more delicate parts are carried by the recording crew as personal baggage.

As a matter of fact, each man has his favorite recorder, which he values much as Heifetz values his two best violins. These recorders are adjusted to infinitesimal precision; some recording experts prefer one adjustment, some another.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being 13 inches in diameter and 1 1-2 inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" to do, the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

TRICKY JOB.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for the Victor company, and Charles O'Connell, who does everything from conducting symphony orchestras to figuring records lengths on important jobs.

The performance was being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with a Boston chorus and of course the Boston symphony. But there was only one performance, since it was all a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund, and it was necessary to record with the audience in the hall.

Four recorders were set up, working pairs. Mr. O'Connell did the delegate job of dividing the work into record-length sections, and found there would be 54 of these. He arranged for the records to end, as often as possible, on a tonic chord—or at last a chord not too tantalizing to the ear. It looked like a snap, on paper, once the job was done. The trouble was that of the 54 "sides," only two worked out exactly. Slight delays, changes of tempo, soloists a little slow in getting under way threw the whole thing out of gear.

The job was done in one sitting, however, and if it had been made the usual way, five recording sessions would have been needed. When the work is released around the end of the year, the most experienced listeners will not know that on one record the factory found exactly one half of one eighth note. This bit of sound was not only transferred to the next record, but in exact time.

The recorders do not use electric motors, these being subject to slight speed fluctuations. Gravity motors are used, and lugging the huge weights for these about the land is one reason why equipment is so heavy.

Recording men insist there is nothing in the musical world surer than the pitch of a given tone on a record: always it will reproduce truly if the machine is turning at the correct speed.

This match of pitch also does its tricks . One day the Beethoven Eighth Symphony was being done at Boston. The first two movements were completed one day; next morning the third, or sherzo, was recorded.

Koussevitzky listened to the playback on the sherzo, and exclaimed: "It's a half tone sharp." It was, too.

This was corrected immediately, and the result played once more for Koussevitzky. "Yes," said he, "the pitch is right, but that's not my tempo. It's a shade slow."

The was correct again, although probably not one musician in a thousand could have told it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal and American

NOV 1 4 1937

Boston Symphony Season to Begin

Noted Orchestra Will Launch 52nd Series Next Friday

The 52nd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will open next Friday evening for a series of five philharmonic concerts. The series is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Blum, and Mrs. William H. Good are the vice-chairmen of the latter committee.

Mrs. Dreyfus painted a picture of the life of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky which gave the members of the committee a deeper understanding of what goes into the creating of a great symphony conductor. "Koussevitzky," Mrs. Dreyfus said, "conducted his first orchestra at the age of twelve, and at the age of fourteen left home to make his way in the world as a musician."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 1 3 1937

Second Concert By New Friends of Music

The program for the second concert of the New Friends of Music series, to be given in Town Hall at 5:30 P. M. tomorrow, includes Schubert's D Minor Quartet ("Death and the Maiden") and two rarely heard Mozart works, the Sonata for Basson and Cello in B flat (K. 292) and the Serenade for Wind Instruments in C minor (K. 388).

The Kolisch String Quartet will play the Schubert work. The Mozart sonata will be performed by Joseph Schuster, first cellist, and Benjamin Kohon, bassoonist, of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. A group of woodwind players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been especially prepared by Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston "Pops" and the Boston Sinfonietta, for the performance of the serenade.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

KOUSSEVITZKY ANNOYEI

Boston, Nov. 13.—(INS)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today served warning on late arrivals to his concerts. After a movement of a Mozart symphony had begun last night, a group of late comers entered Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the music, folded his arms, and waited until all was quiet.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 14 1937

Symphony Series Opens Friday At the Academy

The first concert of the series of five comprising the 52d season of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be held on Friday evening at the Academy of Music. This series, under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman,, and the Brooklyn Committee. Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey will be hostess in the committee box. Other boxholders announced by Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes, are Rear Admiral and Mrs. O. H. Woodward, Col. and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Miss Florence Logan, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Ives, Mr. and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy and the Junior League of Brooklyn.

Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, new chairman of the Junior League Commiittee, announces the following Junior League subscribers to date: Miss Harriet T. Underwood, Miss Louise Wilson, Miss Betty Harrison, Mrs. B. Duffield Hamilton, Mrs. Thomas Laphan, Miss H. V. Davenport, Miss Catherine E. Rechnagel, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Russell harding, Mrs. John Livingston, Mrs. Frank Sherer and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons.

Mrs. William H. Good is a vice chairman of the Brooklyn committee and Mrs. Preston Goodfellow is chairman of the Membership Committee for the 1937-38 season. Other dates in the current series are Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday evening, Feb. 10; Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1.

Among the subscribers this season are Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Badger, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Theodore Fitch, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, James H. Post, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott.

Also Mrs. H. D. Abbey, Miss Alice D. Abbott, Charles S. Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Miss Alsie W. Atwater, Mrs. Henry C. Badgley, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Agnes M. Barry, Mrs. Alfred Barth, Adolph Beck, Mrs. H. Edward Behr, Dr. A. L. L. Bell, Herbert Benevy, Miss Charlotte M. Berry, Dr. H. L. Berson, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, George M. Billings, Miss E. Blackman, Miss Louise Blake, Dr . Roscoe C. E. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick and Miss Julia Byrne.

Also Mrs. P. D. Carey, Mr. and Mrs. Louis J. Carruthers, Judge Albert Conway, Miss M. H. Fawcett, Miss Margaret DeEilver, Mrs. George S. Frank, Dr. and Mrs. George B. Germann, Mrs. P. R. Gray, Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Miss Harriet Kirby, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Miss Elsie Hepburn, Dr. Alice K. Higgins, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Dr. John F. Ohly, Dr. P. F. Pyburn, Mrs. Charles J. Murphy, Mrs. Ralph Root, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, E. R. Von Nardroff, Richard J. Wulff and Miss Sophie Zollinhofer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 14 1937

SYMPHONY SEASON WILL OPEN FRIDAY

Boston Orchestra to Be Heard in First of 5 Concerts at Brooklyn Academy

PIANO RECITAL TOMORROW

Walter Gieseking to Play in Third of Institute's Series—Russian Chorus Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second Brooklyn season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the program of Haydn's Symphony in G major No. 88, Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 in D major and Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand, with Jacques Février, French pianist, as soloist.

The dates of the other four concerts in the series are the nights of Jan. 7, Feb. 10, March 11 and April 1. The series is arranged by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey will be hostess in the committee box at Friday's concert.

Junior League Subscribers

Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League committee, announced the following Junior League subscribers to date: Miss Harriet T. Underwood, Miss Louise Wilson, Miss Betty Harrison, Mrs. B. Duffield Hamilton, Mrs. Thomas Laphan, Miss H. V. Davenport, Miss Catherine E. Rechnagel, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Russell Harding, Mrs. John Livingston, Mrs. Frank Sherer and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons.

Among the subscribers this season are Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Badger, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Theodore Fitch, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, James H. Post, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott.

Also Mrs. H. D. Abbey, Miss Alice D. Abbott, Charles S. Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Miss Alsie W. Atwater, Mrs. Henry C. Badgley, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Agnes M. Barry, Mrs. Alfred Barth, Adolph Beck, Mrs. H. Edward Behr, Dr. A. L. L. Bell, Herbert Benevy, Miss Charlotte M. Berry, Dr. H. L. Berson, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, George M. Billings, Miss E. Blackman, Miss Louise Blake, Dr. Roscoe C. E. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick and Miss Julia Byrne.

Also Mrs. P. D. Carey, Mr. and Mrs. Louis J. Carruthers, Judge Albert Conway, Miss M. H. Fawcett, Miss Margaret De Silver, Mrs. George S. Frank, Dr. and Mrs. George B. Germann, Mrs. P. R. Gray, Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Miss Harriet Kirby, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Miss Elsie Hepburn, Dr. Alice K. Higgins, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Dr. John F. Ohly, Dr. P. F. Pyburn, Mrs. Charles J. Murphy, Mrs. Ralph Root, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, E. R. Von Nardroff, Richard J. Wulff and Miss Sophie Zollinhofer.

Piano Recital Tomorrow

Walter Gieseking, pianist, will give a recital in the third of the Brooklyn Institute's series "Music and the Dance" tomorrow night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will include Bach's Concerto in the Italian Style, F major; Mozart's Sonata A major; Beethoven's Sonata F minor, Op. 57 (Appassionata); Chopin's Barcarole Op. 60 and Berceuse Op. 57, Debussy's "Pagodas" and "The Engulfed Cathedral," Ravel's "Ondine" and Liszt's "Jeux d'Haux de la Villa d'Este," Petrarca—Sonnet E major and Eighth Hungarian Rhapsody.

The Don Cossack Russian Male Chorus, directed by Serge Jaroff, will give a concert at the Brooklyn Academy under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute on Wednesday night. The program will include folk, devotional and military songs by Kastalsky, Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Bortuiansky, Schvedoff, Pashtschenko, Slaviansky, Jaroff and Debrowen.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
NOV 14 1937

THE ORCHESTRAS

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fifty-seventh season and its thirteenth season under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, will pay its first New York visit of the season this week, playing in Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon and in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Thursday, a repetition of the music offered in the opening Boston concerts of October 8 and 9, is familiar, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and the second symphony of Sibelius. In the Brooklyn concert Jacques Février, a French pianist visiting here at the Boston Symphony's invitation, will make his local debut as soloist in Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand, which was introduced to New York by the Bostonians with Paul Wittgenstein as soloist on November 17, 1934. The program opens with Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13 (88) and closes with the Sibelius symphony.

Mr. Février, who is the son of Henri Février, composer of "Monna Vanna," also will play the Ravel concerto Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a suite of Prokofieff's music for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije" and close the program with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben." The music, composed in 1933, is described as light and satiric in character, like the film. The lieutenant of the title is an imaginary figure, derived from a remark of a military aide to the Czar which the ruler misunderstood. The courtier, rather than correcting the Czar, invents an officer named Kije.

Plays Mason Symphony

According to the usual practice when the Boston Symphony comes to town, the Phiharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will give its midweek evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday instead of Thursday. Daniel Gregory Mason's "A Lincoln Symphony," his third work in this form, will be pl for the first time in public.
soloist on John Barbirolli's p

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
NOV 15 1937

WORDS AND MUSIC

Monteux Returns to Lead NBC Symphony Orchestra

First Full-Sized Radio Group Plays Brilliantly and Sensitively at Debut

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Saturday night an invited audience of music-lovers assembled in the National Broadcasting Company's largest studio in Radio City for the first concert of the newly formed N. B. C. symphony orchestra. At 10 o'clock, precisely, the invisible voice of Mr. Milton Cross announced to them and presumably to the great audience of listeners-in all over the world the salient fact about this historic event—that for the first time in its history radio had created a full-size symphony orchestra and engaged celebrated conductors for the express purpose of transmitting great music through the air.

This done, the voice introduced Mr. Pierre Monteux, a French conductor familiar to New York as one-time leader of the Metropolitan Opera House and Boston Symphony Orchestras and the present musical director of the San Francisco Orchestra, who is here to conduct three of the N. B. C. Symphony's series of Saturday evening broadcasts. Mr. Monteux, short, thick-set and benevolent-looking, then appeared, and the orchestra rose to its feet in the traditional concert manner. The audience, aware of the importance of the time element in broadcasting, tendered the conductor a brief yet hearty welcome. A moment later conductor and orchestra were embarked on the Bach-Respighi C minor "Passacaglia."

Since radio studios are built for the sole purpose of transmitting sound, it was not to be expected that the acoustical properties of the N. B. C. auditorium would flatter the orchestra as a hall constructed for concert purposes would. Nevertheless, the qualities of the new orchestra were speedily apprehended. Slightly nervous and somewhat inflexible during the opening number, the players gained in confidence in the second and third numbers—Mozart's "Haffner" symphony and a movement from Franck's "Psyche." With Debussy's "Iberia" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which brought the program to a close, they came into their stride, playing sensitively or brilliantly as the music dictated and with the virtuosity of a first-rate, experienced symphonic band.

That an orchestra should achieve a measure of tonal beauty, sonority and balance and become responsive to the musical personality of its leader in so short a time seems well-nigh incredible. Yet the explanation may be found in the high merits and the long experience of the individual players, who had been chosen, it is rumored, with the utmost care, and in their painstaking eagerness to realize the ideals of ensemble playing. Rome may not have been built in a day, but the N. B. C orchestra actually was created in six weeks.

Mr. Monteux returns to us after too long an absence a mature musician and a deft and sensible conductor. It would be interesting to know why he did certain things the way he did—the long pause, for example, he injected between the first and second sections of the "Menuett" in the Mozart Symphony or the sudden slow pacing of some light and inconsequential measures in "Till Eulenspiegel." Yet on the whole he indulged in fewer "liberties" than other celebrated conductors do. Whether it was because he felt more at ease toward the end of the broadcast or because the rollicking splendors of "Till" are easier to convey than the subtleties of Mozart and Debussy, it was with the Strauss piece that Mr. Monteux achieved his greatest success.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH
Nov. 15 /37

Our Own Orchestra First

J. Fred Lissfelt, music critic of the Sun-Telegraph, has raised an important question by interviewing prominent music lovers on the effect that visiting symphony orchestras may have on the success of the newly reorganized Pittsburgh Symphony.

The consensus of opinion is that our own orchestra is now so good that there is no need of concerts by out-of-town organizations such as existed up until this year.

It is felt, moreover, that the competition of visiting orchestras may cause some financial support to be withheld from the local orchestra which otherwise would be given it. And it requires all the support possible.

During the years when Pittsburgh had no symphony organization the visits by the Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago and other orchestras were a godsend.

They were not unwelcome when our orchestra was a part-time organization not yet trained to give the finest performance.

But the Pittsburgh Orchestra today is perfectly satisfactory. One can hear no better rendition of the symphonies anywhere.

If our orchestra were richly endowed and its future forever secure, it would be pleasant to have orchestras come here from other cities, too.

But such is not the situation. The continued maintenance of the Pittsburgh Orchestra will involve a struggle.

And in the struggle for existence our own orchestra must come first.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 14 1937

Symphony Series Opens Friday At the Academy

The first concert of the series of five comprising the 52d season of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be hel on Friday evening at the Academy of Music. This series, under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman,, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey will be hostess in the committee box. Other boxholders announced by Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes, are Rear Admiral and Mrs. O. H. Woodward, Col. and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Miss Florence Logan, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Ives, Mr. and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy and the Junior League of Brooklyn.

Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, new chairman of the Junior League Commiittee, announces the following Junior League subscribers to date: Miss Harriet T. Underwood, Miss Louise Wilson, Miss Betty Harrison, Mrs. B. Duffield Hamilton, Mrs. Thomas Laphan, Miss H. V. Davenport, Miss Catherine E. Rechnagel, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Russell harding, Mrs. John Livingston, Mrs. Frank Sherer and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons.

Mrs. William H. Good is a vice chairman of the Brooklyn committee and Mrs. Preston Goodfellow is chairman of the Membership Committee for the 1937-38 season. Other dates in the current series are Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday evening, Feb. 10; Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1.

Among the subscribers this season are Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Badger, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Theodore Fitch, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, James H. Post, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott.

Also Mrs. H. D. Abbey, Miss Alice D. Abbott, Charles S. Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Miss Alsie W. Atwater, Mrs. Henry C. Badgley, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Agnes M. Barry, Mrs. Alfred Barth, Adolph Beck, Mrs. H. Edward Behr, Dr. A. L. L. Bell, Herbert Benevy, Miss Charlotte M. Berry, Dr. H. L. Berson, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, George M. Billings, Miss E. Blackman, Miss Louise Blake, Dr. Roscoe C. E. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick and Miss Julia Byrne.

Also Mrs. P. D. Carey, Mr. and Mrs. Louis J. Carruthers, Judge Albert Conway, Miss M. H. Fawcett, Miss Margaret DeEilver, Mrs. George S. Frank, Dr. and Mrs. George B. Germann, Mrs. P. R. Gray, Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Miss Harriet Kirby, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Miss Elsie Hepburn, Dr. Alice K. Higgins, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Dr. John F. Ohly, Dr. P. F. Pyburn, Mrs. Charles J. Murphy, Mrs. Ralph Root, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, E. R. Von Nardroff, Richard J. Wulff and Miss Sophie Zollinhofer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 14 1937

SYMPHONY SEASON WILL OPEN FRIDAY

Boston Orchestra to Be Heard in First of 5 Concerts at Brooklyn Academy

PIANO RECITAL TOMORROW

Walter Gieseking to Play in Third of Institute's Series—Russian Chorus Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second Brooklyn season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the program of Haydn's Symphony in G major No. 88, Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 in D major and Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand, with Jacques Février, French pianist, as soloist.

The dates of the other four concerts in the series are the nights of Jan. 7, Feb. 10, March 11 and April 1. The series is arranged by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey will be hostess in the committee box at Friday's concert.

Junior League Subscribers

Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League committee, announced the following Junior League subscribers to date; Miss Harriet T. Underwood, Miss Louise Wilson, Miss Betty Harrison, Mrs. B. Duffield Hamilton, Mrs. Thomas Laphan, Miss H. V. Davenport, Miss Catherine E. Rechnagel, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Russell Harding, Mrs. John Livingston, Mrs. Frank Sherer and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons.

Among the subscribers this season are Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Badger, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Theodore Fitch, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, James H. Post, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott.

Also Mrs. H. D. Abbey, Miss Alice D. Abbott, Charles S. Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Miss Alsie W. Atwater, Mrs. Henry C. Badgley, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Agnes M. Barry, Mrs. Alfred Barth, Adolph Beck, Mrs. H. Edward Behr, Dr. A. L. L. Bell, Herbert Benevy, Miss Charlotte M. Berry, Dr. H. L. Berson, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, George M. Billings, Miss E. Blackman, Miss Louise Blake, Dr. Roscoe C. E. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick and Miss Julia Byrne.

Also Mrs. P. D. Carey, Mr. and Mrs. Louis J. Carruthers, Judge Albert Conway, Miss M. H. Fawcett, Miss Margaret De Silver, Mrs. George S. Frank, Dr. and Mrs. George B. Germann, Mrs. P. R. Gray, Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Miss Harriet Kirby, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Miss Elsie Hepburn, Dr. Alice K. Higgins, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Dr. John F. Ohly, Dr. P. F. Pyburn, Mrs. Charles J. Murphy, Mrs. Ralph Root, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, E. R. Von Nardroff, Richard J. Wulff and Miss Sophie Zollinhofer.

Piano Recital Tomorrow

Walter Gieseking, pianist, will give a recital in the third of the Brooklyn Institute's series "Music and the Dance" tomorrow night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will include Bach's Concerto in the Italian Style, F major; Mozart's Sonata A major; Beethoven's Sonata F minor, Op. 57 (Appassionata); Chopin's Barcarole Op. 60 and Berceuse Op. 57, Debussy's "Pagodas" and "The Engulfed Cathedral," Ravel's "Ondine" and Liszt's "Jeux d'Haux de la Villa d'Este," Petrarca—Sonnet E major and Eighth Hungarian Rhapsody.

The Don Cossack Russian Male Chorus, directed by Serge Jaroff, will give a concert at the Brooklyn Academy under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute on Wednesday night. The program will include folk, devotional and military songs by Kastalsky, Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Bortuiansky, Schvedoff, Pashtschenko, Slaviansky, Jaroff and Debrowen.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
NOV 14 1937

THE ORCHESTRAS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fifty-seventh season and its thirteenth season under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship will pay its first New York visit of the season this week, playing in Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon and in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Thursday, a repetition of the music offered in the opening Boston concerts of October 8 and 9, is familiar, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and the second symphony of Sibelius. In the Brooklyn concert Jacques Février, a French pianist visiting here at the Boston Symphony's invitation, will make his local debut as soloist in Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand, which was introduced to New York by the Bostonians with Paul Wittgenstein as soloist on November 17, 1934. The program opens with Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13 (88) and closes with the Sibelius symphony.

Mr. Février, who is the son of Henri Février, composer of "Monna Vanna," also will play the Ravel concerto Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a suite of Prokofieff's music for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije" and close the program with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben." The music, composed in 1933, is described as light and satiric in character, like the film. The lieutenant of the title is an imaginary figure, derived from a remark of a military aide to the Czar which the ruler misunderstood. The courtier, rather than correcting the Czar, invents an officer named Kije.

Plays Mason Symphony

According to the usual practice when the Boston Symphony comes to town, the Phiharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will give its midweek evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday instead of Thursday. Daniel Gregory Mason's "A Lincoln Symphony," his third work in this form, will be pl for the first time in public, soloist on John Barbirolli's p

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
NOV 15 1937

WORDS AND MUSIC

Monteux Returns to Lead NBC Symphony Orchestra

First Full-Sized Radio Group Plays Brilliantly and Sensitively at Debut

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Saturday night an invited audience of music-lovers assembled in the National Broadcasting Company's largest studio in Radio City for the first concert of the newly formed N. B. C. symphony orchestra. At 10 o'clock, precisely, the invisible voice of Mr. Milton Cross announced to them and presumably to the great audience of listeners-in all over the world the salient fact about this historic event—that for the first time in its history radio had created a full-size symphony orchestra and engaged celebrated conductors for the express purpose of transmitting great music through the air.

This done, the voice introduced Mr. Pierre Monteux, a French conductor familiar to New York as one-time leader of the Metropolitan Opera House and Boston Symphony Orchestras and the present musical director of the San Francisco Orchestra, who is here to conduct three of the N. B. C. Symphony's series of Saturday evening broadcasts. Mr. Monteux, short, thick-set and benevolent-looking, then appeared, and the orchestra rose to its feet in the traditional concert manner. The audience, aware of the importance of the time element in broadcasting, tendered the conductor a brief yet hearty welcome. A moment later conductor and orchestra were embarked on the Bach-Respighi C minor "Passacaglia."

Since radio studios are built for the sole purpose of transmitting sound, it was not to be expected that the acoustical properties of the N. B. C. auditorium would flatter the orchestra as a hall constructed for concert purposes would. Nevertheless, the qualities of the new orchestra were speedily apprehended. Slightly nervous and somewhat inflexible during the opening number, the players gained in confidence in the second and third numbers—Mozart's "Haffner" symphony and a movement from Franck's "Psyche." With Debussy's "Iberia" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which brought the program to a close, they came into their stride, playing sensitively or brilliantly as the music dictated and with the virtuosity of a first-rate, experienced symphonic band.

That an orchestra should achieve a measure of tonal beauty, sonority and balance and become responsive to the musical personality of its leader in so short a time seems well-nigh incredible. Yet the explanation may be found in the high merits and the long experience of the individual players, who had been chosen, it is rumored, with the utmost care, and in their painstaking eagerness to realize the ideals of ensemble playing. Rome may not have been built in a day, but the N. B. C orchestra actually was created in six weeks.

Mr. Monteux returns to us after too long an absence a mature musician and a deft and sensible conductor. It would be interesting to know why he did certain things the way he did—the long pause, for example, he injected between the first and second sections of the "Menuett" in the Mozart Symphony or the sudden slow pacing of some light and inconsequential measures in "Till Eulenspiegel." Yet on the whole he indulged in fewer "liberties" than other celebrated conductors do. Whether it was because he felt more at ease toward the end of the broadcast or because the rollicking splendors of "Till" are easier to convey than the subtleties of Mozart and Debussy, it was with the Strauss piece that Mr. Monteux achieved his greatest success.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH
Nov. 15 / 37

Our Own Orchestra First

J. Fred Lissfelt, music critic of the Sun-Telegraph, has raised an important question by interviewing prominent music lovers on the effect that visiting symphony orchestras may have on the success of the newly reorganized Pittsburgh Symphony.

The consensus of opinion is that our own orchestra is now so good that there is no need of concerts by out-of-town organizations such as existed up until this year.

It is felt, moreover, that the competition of visiting orchestras may cause some financial support to be withheld from the local orchestra which otherwise would be given it. And it requires all the support possible.

During the years when Pittsburgh had no symphony organization the visits by the Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago and other orchestras were a godsend.

They were not unwelcome when our orchestra was a part-time organization not yet trained to give the finest performance.

But the Pittsburgh Orchestra today is perfectly satisfactory. One can hear no better rendition of the symphonies anywhere.

If our orchestra were richly endowed and its future forever secure, it would be pleasant to have orchestras come here from other cities, too.

But such is not the situation. The continued maintenance of the Pittsburgh Orchestra will involve a struggle.

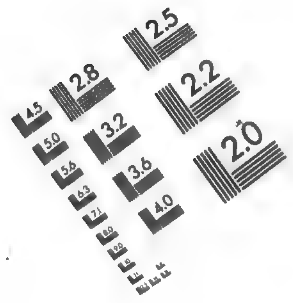
And in the struggle for existence our own orchestra must come first.

REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

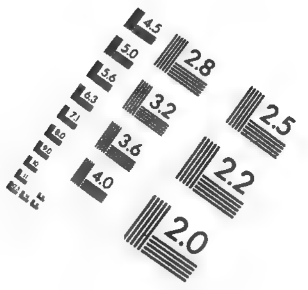
2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

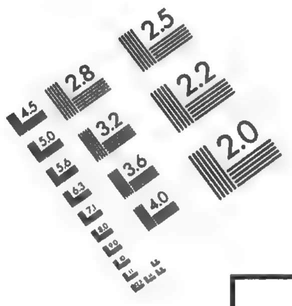


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
4.5
5.0
3.6
2.0
4.0

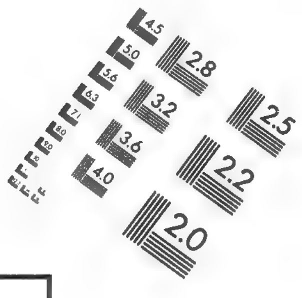


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
4.0
2.2
2.0

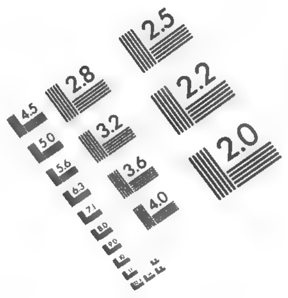
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



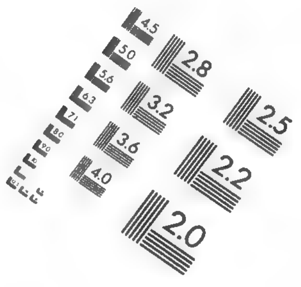
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
4.0
2.2
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

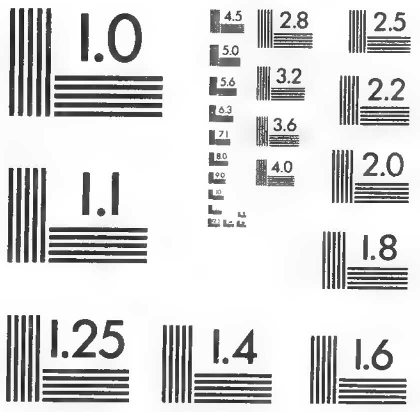


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
4.0
2.2
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
3.2
2.2
5.6
6.3
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

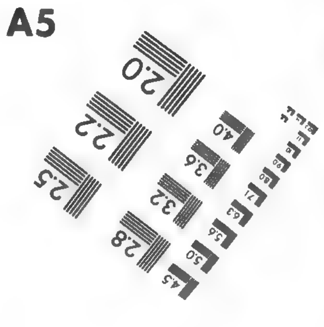
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
2.5 mm

A5

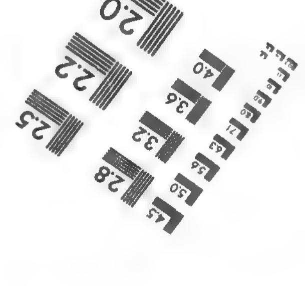


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

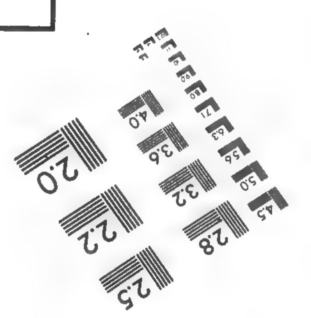
A4

A3



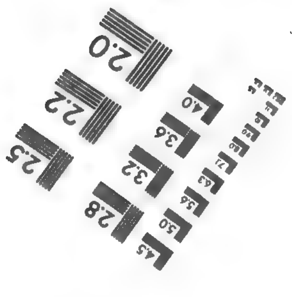
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

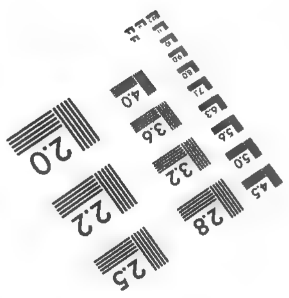


4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

47

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 14 1937

New York Times Studio photos

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various stages of a rehearsal.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 15 1937

Mrs. Thomas Casey to Entertain At Boston Symphony Concert; Season Opens Here Friday

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey will be hostess in the box of the sponsoring committee when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opens its fifty-second season here on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert will be the first of the annual series of five presented in Brooklyn.

Jacques Fevrier, pianist, will be heard as the soloist in Ravel's "Concerto for the Left Hand." The program will also include Haydn's Symphony in G Major and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of the box committee, has announced the following box holders for the season: Rear Admiral and Mrs. O. H. Woodward, Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Miss Florence Logan, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Ives, Mr. and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy and the Junior League of Brooklyn.

The concerts are given here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger heads the Junior League Committee for the series.

Among the Junior League subscribers are: Miss Harriet T. Underwood, Miss Louise Wilson, Miss Betty Harrison, Mrs. B. Duffield Hamilton, Mrs. Thomas Laphan, Miss H. V. Davenport, Miss Catherine E. Rechnagel, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Russell Harding, Mrs. John Livingston, Mrs. Frank Sherer and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons.

Other subscribers include: Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Badger, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Walter H. Critenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Theodore Fitch, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Thomas H. McClock, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, James H. Post, Mrs. Fred-Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott.

Also Mrs. H. D. Abbey, Miss Alice D. Abbott, Charles S. Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Miss Alsie W. Atwater, Mrs. Henry C. Badgley, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Agnes M. Barry, Mrs. Alfred Barth, Adolph Beck, Mrs. H. Edward Behr, Dr. A. L. L. Bell, Herbert Benevy, Miss Charlotte M. Berry, Dr. H. L. Berson, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, George M. Billings, Miss E. Blackman, Miss Louise Blake, Dr. Roscoe C. E. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick and Miss Julia Byrne.

Also Mrs. P. D. Carey, Mr. and Mrs. Louis J. Carruthers, Judge Albert Conway, Miss M. H. Fawcett, Miss Margaret DeSilver, Mrs. George S. Frank, Dr. and Mrs. George B. Germann, Mrs. P. R. Gray, Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Miss Harriet Kirby, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Miss Elsie Hepburn, Dr. Alice K. Higgins, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Dr. John F. Ohly, Dr. P. F. Pyburn, Mrs. Charles J. Murphy, Mrs. Ralph Root, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, E. R. Von Nardroff, Richard J. Wulff, and Miss Sophie Zollinhofer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 15 1937

PLEASED AUDIENCE HEARS NEW FRIENDS

'Death and the Maiden,' by Schubert, Reveals Kolisch Group at Their Best

MASTER IN A NEW LIGHT

Little-Known Chamber Music by Mozart and Composer's Serenade on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The second concert of chamber compositions by the New Friends of Music took place yesterday afternoon in Town Hall, a concert, like its predecessor, fully patronized, and harkened to by an absorbed audience.

The opening performance of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" quartet, was given by the same Kolisch Players who had functioned at the opening event of this series, but the performance was such a gain over the earlier one in vitality, flexibility and spirit that it almost sounded like the deed of another organization.

On the occasion of that earlier concert this reviewer was moved to opine that playing from memory, when it is undertaken by an ensemble, is unlikely to promote vitality and spontaneity of interpretation. Yesterday's event proved that theories can be one thing, and facts another. The players sounded on this occasion as free and unanimous as if one man were performing extemporaneously.

It was as if the music of Schubert were their one natural speech. Wherefore each man listened to the indescribable loveliness of the simple, pathetic music, and dreamed his dream. And how unaffectedly, profoundly, does Schubert speak! From what a depth of humanity and of sorrowful wisdom does his voice come, now tragic, now unutterably consoling! There is that strange and ominous place in the coda of the first movement, with the sustained, poignant chords that sound as if poor Schubert, in the words of Philip Hale, sensed his rapidly coming end, and knew that the earth was looking impatiently for him.

When you listen to this music you wonder whether the shy, confiding, pathetic and radiant Schubert was not the greatest musician of them all, though he had not the counterpoint of a Bach, the concision and force of a Beethoven, the philosophy and sophistication of a Wagner. His nature was that of beauty; his spirit made him marvelously acquainted with the needs of the human heart. For with that simplest of men, who conversed on equal terms with the gods, the humblest and the mightiest were equal, and equally deserving of the heavenly consolations of his music. Schubert's greatest quartet, played by four admirable musicians, in love with their task, sounded like that.

Then came some little-known chamber compositions for wind instruments by Mozart; first, a sonata for 'cello and bassoon, composed, as Mr. Kolodin's notes pointed out, for the excellent Baron Thaddeus von Durnitz—or was he the lord of Thunder-Ten-Tronckh? It is urged that he himself was no mean bassoonist, as the part that Mozart wrote for him would indicate. It is also true, as advanced by the program annotations, that in this uncomplicated piece Mozart shows his mastery of two-part counterpoint. It is as true as can be, which, being said, causes one to invoke the popular method of inquiry, "So what?" The Baron must have been ponderous, respectable, and fond of beer. Mozart, when he had to, could also be a polite boor.

This was followed by a much finer work, to wit, the Serenade for wind instruments that Mozart wrote at his father's request for the Haffners, before the composition of the Haffner" symphony. The performers of the sonata were those accomplished gentlemen, Joseph Shuster, 'cellist, and Benjamin Kohon, bassoonist. The performers of the Serenade, which had been rehearsed by Arthur Fiedler, were players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Messrs. Speyer and Divergie, oboists; Polatschek and Valeria, clarinets; Allard and Panenka, bassoons; Valkenier and MacDonald, horns—admirable artists upon their instruments, whose performances were greatly enjoyed.

The next concert of this series will be given Dec. 5 by the Musical Art Quartet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
NOV 17 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS THURSDAY

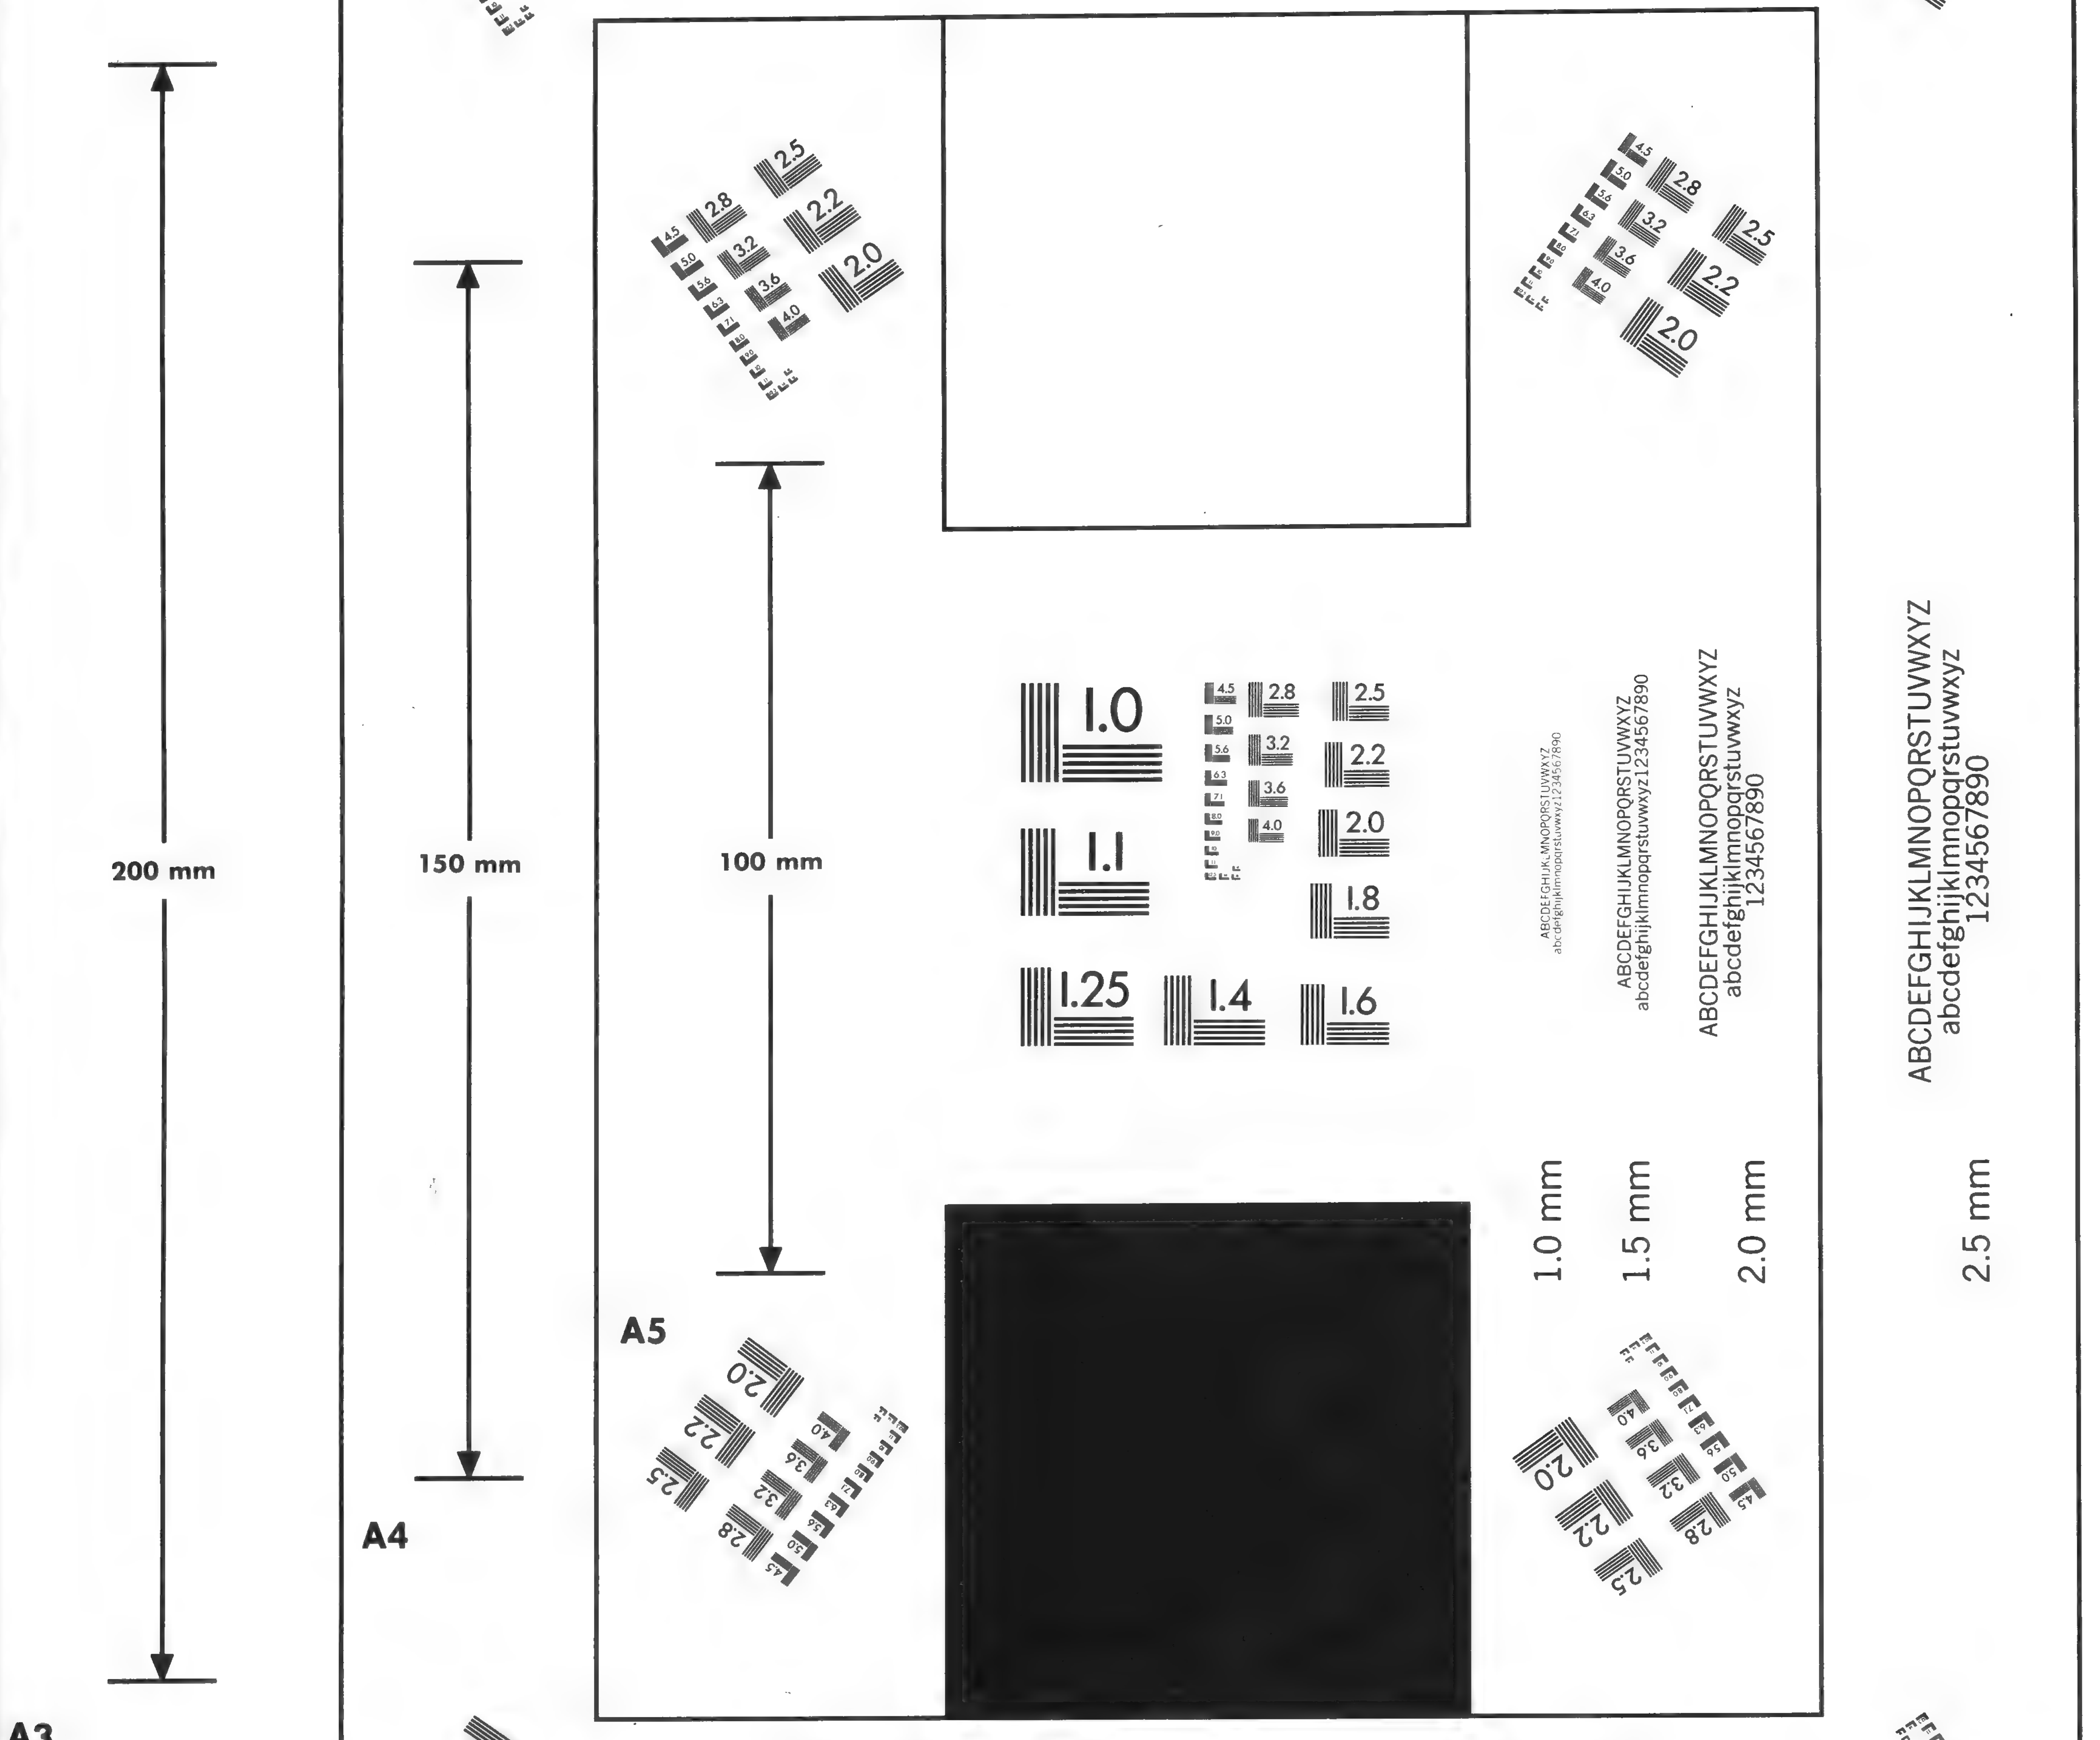
The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five New York concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony (No. 3, E flat), and the second symphony of Sibelius. On Saturday he will give the first New York performance of a suite derived from Prokofieff's incidental music to a film: "Lieutenant Kije." Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, will make his debut in Ravel's concerto for the left hand. Strauss' tone-poem: "Ein Heldenleben ("A Hero's Life") will conclude this pair of concerts.

PORTLAND, ME.
NEWS
1937

Mrs. Chester B. Humphrey of Boston is among the subscribers to the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Bernard Zighera.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

47

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 14 1937

New York Times Studio photos

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various stages of a rehearsal.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 15 1937

Mrs. Thomas Casey to Entertain At Boston Symphony Concert; Season Opens Here Friday

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey will be hostess in the box of the sponsoring committee when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opens its fifty-second season here on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert will be the first of the annual series of five presented in Brooklyn.

Jacques Fevrier, pianist, will be heard as the soloist in Ravel's "Concerto for the Left Hand." The program will also include Haydn's Symphony in G Major and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of the box committee, has announced the following box holders for the season: Rear Admiral and Mrs. O. H. Woodward, Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Miss Florence Logan, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Ives, Mr. and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy and the Junior League of Brooklyn.

The concerts are given here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger heads the Junior League Committee for the series.

Among the Junior League subscribers are: Miss Harriet T. Underwood, Miss Louise Wilson, Miss Betty Harrison, Mrs. B. Duffield Hamilton, Mrs. Thomas Laphan, Miss H. V. Davenport, Miss Catherine E. Rechnagel, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Russell Harding, Mrs. John Livingston, Mrs. Frank Sherer and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons.

Other subscribers include: Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 15 1937

PLEASED AUDIENCE HEARS NEW FRIENDS

'Death and the Maiden,' by Schubert, Reveals Kolisch Group at Their Best

MASTER IN A NEW LIGHT

Little-Known Chamber Music by Mozart and Composer's Serenade on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The second concert of chamber compositions by the New Friends of Music took place yesterday afternoon in Town Hall, a concert, like its predecessor, fully patronized, and harkened to by an absorbed audience.

The opening performance of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" quartet, was given by the same Kolisch Players who had functioned at the opening event of this series, but the performance was such a gain over the earlier one in vitality, flexibility and spirit that it almost sounded like the deed of another organization.

On the occasion of that earlier concert this reviewer was moved to opine that playing from memory, when it is undertaken by an ensemble, is unlikely to promote vitality and spontaneity of interpretation. Yesterday's event proved that theories can be one thing, and facts another. The players sounded on this occasion as free and unanimous as if one man were performing extemporaneously.

It was as if the music of Schubert were their one natural speech. Wherefore each man listened to the indescribable loveliness of the simple, pathetic music, and dreamed his dream. And how unaffectedly, profoundly, does Schubert speak! From what a depth of humanity and of sorrowful wisdom does his voice come, now tragic, now unutterably consoling! There is that strange and ominous place in the coda of the first movement, with the sustained, poignant chords that sound as if poor Schubert, in the words of Philip Hale, sensed his rapidly coming end, and knew that the earth was looking impatiently for him.

When you listen to this music you wonder whether the shy, confiding, pathetic and radiant Schubert was not the greatest musician of them all, though he had not the counterpoint of a Bach, the concision and force of a Beethoven, the philosophy and sophistication of a Wagner. His nature was that of beauty; his spirit made him marvelously acquainted with the needs of the human heart. For with that simplest of men, who conversed on equal terms with the gods, the humblest and the mightiest were equal, and equally deserving of the heavenly consolations of his music. Schubert's greatest quartet, played by four admirable musicians, in love with their task, sounded like that.

Then came some little-known chamber compositions for wind instruments by Mozart; first, a sonata for 'cello and bassoon, composed, as Mr. Kolodin's notes pointed out, for the excellent Baron Thaddeus von Durnitz—or was he the lord of Thunder-Ten-Tronckh? It is urged that he himself was no mean bassoonist, as the part that Mozart wrote for him would indicate. It is also true, as advanced by the program annotations, that in this uncomplicated piece Mozart shows his mastery of two-part counterpoint. It is as true as can be, which, being said, causes one to invoke the popular method of inquiry, "So what?" The Baron must have been ponderous, respectable, and fond of beer. Mozart, when he had to, could also be a polite boor.

This was followed by a much finer work, to wit, the Serenade for wind instruments that Mozart wrote at his father's request for the Haffners, before the composition of the Haffner" symphony. The performers of the sonata were those accomplished gentlemen, Joseph Shuster, 'cellist, and Benjamin Kohon, bassoonist. The performers of the Serenade, which had been rehearsed by Arthur Fiedler, were players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Messrs. Speyer and Divergie, oboists; Polatschek and Valeria, clarinets; Allard and Panenka, bassoons; Valkenier and MacDonald, horns—admirable artists upon their instruments, whose performances were greatly enjoyed.

The next concert of this series will be given Dec. 5 by the Musical Art Quartet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
NOV 17 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS THURSDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five New York concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony (No. 3, E flat), and the second symphony of Sibelius. On Saturday he will give the first New York performance of a suite derived from Prokofieff's incidental music to a film: "Lieutenant Kije." Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, will make his debut in Ravel's concerto for the left hand. Strauss' tone-poem: "Ein Heldenleben ("A Hero's Life") will conclude this pair of concerts.

PORTLAND, ME.
NEWS
NOV 1 3 1937

Mrs. Chester B. Humphrey of Boston is among the subscribers to the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Bernard Zighera.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

CITIZEN

NOV 15 1937

Mrs. Thomas Casey to Entertain At Boston Symphony Concert; Season Opens Here Friday

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey will be hostess in the box of the sponsoring committee when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opens its fifty-second season here on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert will be the first of the annual series of five presented in Brooklyn.

Jacques Fevrier, pianist, will be heard as the soloist in Ravel's "Concerto for the Left Hand." The program will also include Haydn's Symphony in G Major and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of the box committee, has announced the following box holders for the season: Rear Admiral and Mrs. O. H. Woodward, Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Frank Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Miss Florence Logan, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Robert Ives, Mr. and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy and the Junior League of Brooklyn.

The concerts are given here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger heads the Junior League Committee for the series.

Among the Junior League subscribers are: Miss Harriet T. Underwood, Miss Louise Wilson, Miss Betty Harrison, Mrs. B. Duffield Hamilton, Mrs. Thomas Laphan, Miss H. V. Davenport, Miss Catherine E. Rechnagel, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Russell Harding, Mrs. John Livingston, Mrs. Frank Sherer and Mrs. H. Rutledge Simmons.

Other subscribers include: Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Badger, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Walter H. Critenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Theodore Fitch, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Thomas H. McClock, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, James H. Post, Mrs. Fred-Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott.

Also Mrs. H. D. Abbey, Miss Alice D. Abbott, Charles S. Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Miss Alsie W. Atwater, Mrs. Henry C. Badgley, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Agnes M. Barry, Mrs. Alfred Barth, Adolph Beck, Mrs. H. Edward Behr, Dr. A. L. L. Bell, Herbert Benevy, Miss Charlotte M. Berry, Dr. H. L. Berson, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, George M. Billings, Miss E. Blackman, Miss Louise Blake, Dr. Roscoe C. E. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick and Miss Julia Byrne.

Also Mrs. P. D. Carey, Mr. and Mrs. Louis J. Carruthers, Judge Albert Conway, Miss M. H. Fawcett, Miss Margaret DeSilver, Mrs. George S. Frank, Dr. and Mrs. George B. Germann, Mrs. P. R. Gray, Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Miss Harriet Kirby, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Miss Elsie Hepburn, Dr. Alice K. Higgins, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Dr. John F. Ohly, Dr. P. F. Pyburn, Mrs. Charles J. Murphy, Mrs. Ralph Root, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, E. R. Von Nardroff, Richard J. Wulff, and Miss Sophie Zollinhofer.

HEARS NEW FRIENDS

'Death and the Maiden,' by Schubert, Reveals Kolisch Group at Their Best

MASTER IN A NEW LIGHT

Little-Known Chamber Music by Mozart and Composer's Serenade on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The second concert of chamber compositions by the New Friends of Music took place yesterday afternoon in Town Hall, a concert, like its predecessor, fully patronized, and harkened to by an absorbed audience.

The opening performance of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" quartet, was given by the same Kolisch Players who had functioned at the opening event of this series, but the performance was such a gain over the earlier one in vitality, flexibility and spirit that it almost sounded like the deed of another organization.

On the occasion of that earlier concert this reviewer was moved to opine that playing from memory, when it is undertaken by an ensemble, is unlikely to promote vitality and spontaneity of interpretation. Yesterday's event proved that theories can be one thing, and facts another. The players sounded on this occasion as free and unanimous as if one man were performing extemporaneously.

It was as if the music of Schubert were their one natural speech. Wherefore each man listened to the indescribable loveliness of the simple, pathetic music, and dreamed his dream. And how unaffectedly, and of sorrowful wisdom does the voice come, now tragic, now unutterably consoling! There is that strange and ominous place in the coda of the first movement, with the sustained, poignant chords that sound as if poor Schubert, in the words of Philip Hale, sensed his rapidly coming end, and knew that the earth was looking impatiently for him.

When you listen to this music you wonder whether the shy, confiding, pathetic and radiant Schubert was not the greatest musician of them all, though he had not the counterpoint of a Bach, the concision and force of a Beethoven, the philosophy and sophistication of a Wagner. His nature was that of beauty; his spirit made him marvelously acquainted with the needs of the human heart. For with that simplest of men, who conversed on equal terms with the gods, the humblest and the mightiest were equal, and equally deserving of the heavenly consolations of his music. Schubert's greatest quartet, played by four admirable musicians, in love with their task, sounded like that.

Then came some little-known chamber compositions for wind instruments by Mozart; first, a sonata for 'cello and bassoon, composed, as Mr. Kolodin's notes pointed out, for the excellent Baron Thaddeus von Durnitz—or was he the lord of Thunder-Ten-Tronckh? It is urged that he himself was no mean bassoonist, as the part that Mozart wrote for him would indicate. It is also true, as advanced by the program annotations, that in this uncomplicated piece Mozart shows his mastery of two-part counterpoint. It is as true as can be, which, being said, causes one to invoke the popular method of inquiry, "So what?" The Baron must have been ponderous, respectable, and fond of beer. Mozart, when he had to, could also be a polite boor.

This was followed by a much finer work, to wit, the Serenade for wind instruments that Mozart wrote at his father's request for the Haffners, before the composition of the Haffner" symphony. The performers of the sonata were those accomplished gentlemen, Joseph Shuster, 'cellist, and Benjamin Koplayers from the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Messrs. Speyer and Divergie, oboists; Polatschek and Valeria, clarinets; Allard and Panenka, bassoons; Valkenier and MacDonald, horns—admirable artists upon their instruments, whose performances were greatly enjoyed.

The next concert of this series will be given Dec. 5 by the Musical Art Quartet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

MIRROR

NOV 17 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS THURSDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five New York concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony (No. 3, E flat), and the second symphony of Sibelius. On Saturday he will give the first New York performance of a suite derived from Prokofieff's incidental music to a film: "Lieutenant Kije." Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, will make his debut in Ravel's concerto for the left hand. Strauss' tone-poem: "Ein Heldenleben ("A Hero's Life") will conclude this pair of concerts.

PORTLAND, ME.

NEWS

1937

Mrs. Chester B. Humphrey of Boston is among the subscribers to the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Bernard Zighera.

4

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 15 1937

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Music by Schubert and Mozart at the New Friends' Second Concert

Second concert of The New Friends of Music, Inc., at Town Hall.

Schubert-Mozart Program

I Quartet in D minor (posthumous) Schubert
a. Allegro; b. Andante con moto; c. Allegro molto; d. Presto
II Sonata for bassoon and 'cello, in B flat (K., No. 292)............Mozart
a. Allegro; b. Andante; c. Allegro
III Serenade for wind instruments, in C minor (K., No. 388).........Mozart
a. Allegro; b. Andante; c. Menuetto. In canone (Trio. In canone al rovescio); d. Allegro

Artists—The Kolisch Quartet: Rudolph Kolisch, 1st violin; Felix Khuner, 2d violin; Eugene Lehner, viola; Benar Heifetz, 'cello; Benjamin Kohon, bassoonist; Joseph Schuster, 'cellist. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Prepared for performance by Arthur Fiedler): Louis Speyer, Jean Devergie, eboes; Viktor Polatschek, Manuel Valerio, clarinets; Raymond Allard, Ernst Panenka, bassoons; Willem Valkenier, Walter MacDonald, horns.

Joseph Schuster

Cello soloist with the New Friends of Music

THE New Friends of Music, that valorous chamber-music enterprise which began its existence a year ago with some uncertainty as to the issue, is moving into its second season upon a strong tide of popular favor. Before the Town Hall opened its doors last evening for the second concert of the current season, the entrances to the building were besieged by a crowd that might have been gathering for a recital by Mr. Rachmaninoff or Mr. Kreisler. But those who lacked tickets waited in vain, for every seat in the house was sold. Yet this was to be no thundering exhibition of a virtuoso's keyboard might, or a solo fiddler's magic and personality. Only the long dead ghosts of Mozart and Schubert were to walk, summoned by a group of quiet and unpretentious artists intent upon bringing them momentarily and intimately into the lives of the listeners.

* * *

The listeners were quickly rewarded. The accomplished Kolisch Quartet—again performing without a sheet of printed music on their desks—achieved some playing not soon to be forgotten in the opening number on the program, Schubert's D minor Quartet, with the matchless variations on the theme of "Der Tod und das Mädchen." After a few momentary lapses from ideal purity of intonation, the players found their customary level.

The song that is the basis of the second movement of the Quartet was published 116 years ago. It might have been issued yesterday, if any one were capable of writing it, so limpid and ageless does the music seem. Yet Schubert merely followed his practice, as one of his biographers said, in taking up what lay nearest to his hand, if it happened to serve his purpose. The constituents of this theme of Death "were any composer's every-day material. Essentially, it is nothing but a bass." But Schubert had only to lay hold of it for wonders to flow from it—the sense of death's naturalness, its mercifulness, the serenity that enwraps it.

* * *

It was not, however, until Schubert returned to this theme some years later and wrote his Variations on it for the string quartet in D minor that he turned the music from a masterpiece into a mystery. The song is one of the three greatest in existence. But the Variations of the D minor Quartet are lonely and unpaired. In certain seraphic pages, that which is wordless and beyond belief finds utterance and design, and is written on the viewless air. These Variations are not, as the literal-minded Heuss declared, tonal pictures for a musical Dance of Death. Schubert's imagination in this music is subtler and simpler and profounder than such a purpose would imply. If there were words or pictures that could explain such music it would not have needed to be written.

* * *

As an amusing interlude, in effect a sort of divertissement, two virtuosi from the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra played for us the charming sonata for bassoon and cello that Mozart composed for the Baron Thaddeus von Dürnitz of Munich. Only a modern miracle could turn the bassoon into a solo instrument that a modern audience will listen to without an irrepressible grin; and so the expert and beautiful performance of the felicitous little work was rewarded last evening with an outburst of hearty merriment, mixed with deserved applause.

As a concluding number, the Friends gave us Wolfgang's Serenade in C minor, composed on commission from those public benefactors, the Haffner family of Salzburg. It was superlatively performed by an octet of wind players imported from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

At the concert of next Sunday, November 21, the Friends will present as guest artist the redoubtable Mr. Schorr, the Metropolitan's great barytone, who is billed to sing Schumann's "Liederkreis."

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS BRILLIANTLY AT CARNEGIE

The Boston Symphony is with us again and musical New York signified its joy in the event by turning out last night in gala de gala, filling Carnegie Hall to the last bit of standing room and remaining after the concert's close to cheer Mr. Koussevitzky and his incomparable musicians.

Two staples of the symphonic repertory composed almost a century apart made up the program. They were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Sibelius's Second.

We have heard more heroic interpretations of the "Eroica" than Mr. Koussevitzky's, but he gave last night a closely knit performance with wonderful grasp of Beethoven's architecture and at the same time with the subtilest shading of dynamics and modeling of the melodic line. The dirge of the famous second movement was so restrained as to be almost objective. Yet it achieved a depth that might have been denied to a purely emotional approach, thus proving again that classicism has its place even in the interpretation of Beethoven's so-called romantic works.

In spite of the chronological abyss that separates the Beethoven from the Sibelius, it was interesting last night to see how much they had in common.

The latter work was particularly well designed to show the prowess of the famous Boston winds. Here again Koussevitzky was restrained, cunningly emphasizing the darker colors in the composer's palette until he came to the exultant peroration of the final movement. There at last he unleashed all the orchestral splendor at his disposal, and listeners knew that the Boston Symphony was with us again.

Their next concert is tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

E. D.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

RADIO ORCHESTRA MAKES DEBUT HERE

NBC's New Symphonic Group, Led by Monteux, Is Heard at Radio City Studios

FIRST OF SPECIAL SERIES

Leader's Brilliant Readings and Technical Excellence Distinguish the Event

N. Y. Times Nov. 15/37

By OLIN DOWNES

The new symphony orchestra which the National Broadcasting Company has developed made its debut last night under the leadership of Pierre Monteux in the Radio City studios. This orchestra had been introduced to the public at a rehearsal conducted earlier in the season by Artur Rodzinski, principally responsible for the choice of the players and the assembling of the band.

The decision of the NBC to develop this orchestra followed its engagement for a special series of concerts of Arturo Toscanini and other distinguished conductors. Mr. Monteux had the distinction of opening officially the series of performances.

The concert served immediate notice of the presence of a new symphony orchestra of very high rank, as it also revealed Mr. Monteux at the height of his powers. With the admirable cooperation of the men under him he added to his international reputation on this occasion and made his listeners realize that it has been too long a time since Mr. Monteux has been heard in this city.

Occupied Listening Room

The writer listened to the new orchestra from two different places. He wished to hear it, and he did hear it, in the performance of the Bach-Respighi transcription of the C minor organ passacaglia and the Mozart "Haffner" symphony, from a listening room where he could watch conductors and players, and hear the music as it was heard, presumably, by radio listeners in different parts of the country and the world. Afterward he heard the orchestra from a place in the concert hall, in the performance of a movement from Cesar Franck's "Psyché," the three movements of Debussy's "Iberia," and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The sound of the music over the radio—no doubt with one of the best kind of receiving apparatus—was remarkable for the sonority and the resonance of the tone, and the clearness with which, for the greater part of the time, all the inner parts as well as the main effects of the orchestra were revealed. Sometimes there was a slight preponderance of strings; a chord or two of wind-instruments not perfectly balanced, or at least edged, so that the upper voice was entirely distinct. Sometimes there was a trifle too much of brass. But these things were in all probability the result of the particular way in which that performance was transmitted.

After making all deductions and reservations it is to be said that to hear the orchestra under circumstances not of the concert room was to be astonished at the remarkable qualities of the band itself as was conveyed by radio mechanism.

Had Orchestral Effect

It had the complete and characteristic orchestral effect and many more sonorities and tone colors than were audible over the radio even a few years ago. In the Mozart performance the virtuosity of the strings, the precision and finish of rapid-scale passages and the like and the variety of nuance obtainable from the instruments were impressive.

Then came the opportunity for closer acquaintance with this orchestra in its concert hall or, as it is known in the NBC Building, its studio. This studio, which seats 1,200 and some odd listeners, is made for broadcasting and it has not the resonance of a concert hall especially designed for public performance. The result of this was that the orchestra was put to a very severe test. The strings, which were so vibrant heard from the outside, are dryer in color in the studio. The same thing applies to the brass and in a lesser degree to the woodwind instrument.

So that one heard this orchestra, with the lessened resonance, as if you listened to each instrument under a microscope. If a person who is a little near-sighted and sees all things rather soft-edged and unclear, puts on a pair of good glasses, he gets something of the impression through the eyes that listening to the NBC Orchestra in the studio gives the ears. The orchestra must be a particularly good one, exceptionally accurate and well trained, to meet successfully these conditions.

Orchestra Meets Test

The orchestra met the test triumphantly. With a less glamorous tone than it would have under other circumstances, it played with a finish, clarity and subtlety of tonal values, particularly in the Debussy composition, that were wholly exceptional. We have not heard such a performance of the "Iberia" in a long time. This was due to the qualities of the band and also due to Mr. Monteux's masterly reading.

In the preceding piece, the Franck, the splendid strings and some of the best of the brass instruments had opportunity for particular display. In Debussy's music the wind instruments exhibited the exemplary tone color, technical precision and brilliancy. Strauss's tone poem finished the evening very brilliantly, although, as it happened, there were some slight blemishes in the brass choir. These things can happen without proving the precise abilities of one or another player at an opening concert.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" as a whole was another victory for the leader and the men alike. Perhaps we have advanced in understanding of Mr. Monteux and of orchestral performances in general since he was last in this city. But it is very probably true that he also has ripened and grown as a great musician continually does with the years and experience.

Readings Are Superb

As soon as he settled to his work last night, which was perhaps after the Respighi performance, he was remarkable, not only in his authority and control of the orchestra but in the freedom and musical imagination with which he utilized his power. The Franck, the Debussy, the Strauss were superb performances of modern music.

There will be later occasion to estimate this orchestra in more detail than can be done now, but it is clear at the beginning that the NBC has notably achieved its primary purpose, which was the establishment of an orchestra which in its own right should develop standards of symphonic performance over the air.

Another word should be spoken, for the behavior of the audience. Think of it: an audience, on time; no noise of late-comers; not a sound or a rustle in the hall while the orchestra was playing. That is a new standard for listeners, and we would that it could be applied rigorously in other places than radio studios.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV [illegible] 1937

Wife of Former Conductor Of Boston Symphony Living Next Door to Tanglewood

LENOX, Nov. 17.—Mrs. Pierre Monteaux of Paris, France, and San Francisco, Cal., wife of Pierre Monteaux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, is at the Higginson Farm, West Street, with Mrs. Alexander Weeks of New York for the winter. Mrs. Weeks, who last season was at the gatehouse at Mrs. W. Roscoe Bonsal's estate, has two sons attending the Lenox School for boys. The Higginson farm adjoins Tanglewood, estate given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent home for the Berkshire Music Festival.

Mr. Monteaux conducted the NBC Symphony Orchestra, newest of the world's great symphony orchestras, at the debut Saturday night, and to be conducted later by Toscanini.

Conducted From 1919-'24

Mrs. Monteaux's husband before conducting the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra was conductor of the Boston orchestra from 1919 to 1924. For two years, 1917-1919, he was conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City.

He attended the Paris Conservatory of Music and studied violin with Maruin and Berthelier, solfeggio and harmony with Lavignac and counterpoint and fugue with Lenepveu.

His career began as a viola player and later conducted concerts in leading cities of Europe. He served as a private in the French infantry in the World War, participating in battles at Verdun, Rheims, Soissons and Argonne.

Mrs. Monteaux is the former Germaine Benedictus of Paris. They were married Feb. 6, 1910.

---

18 Nov. 19/37 NEW YORK JOURNAL AND AMERICAN * *

Boston Symphony in Local Bow

By GRENA BENNETT.

A program of rare contrast in symphonic literature was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, the visitors' first local event in the present season. Conductor Serge Koussevitsky offered only two compositions, Beethoven's "Eroica" and Sibelius' Second and in these there was vast matter for comparison and interest.

The "Eroica" was first on the list, the symphony that was planned to glorify Buonaparte as "First Consul," but with the Corsicans' greater ambition to govern an empire the dedication was angrily changed by the composer when Napoleon joined the crowned heads of Europe. The performance was a superb and compellin one, revealing the romantic urge that inspired the work, the mellow, mellifluous language of the great symphonist in his most fertile period. The sentiments of the symphony were artfully captured, avoiding any attempt at sentimentality; compelling passages timed with taste and climaxes achieved with well-judged accent and power.

The Sibelius work, stemming from the musical language of Finnish northland, in the early part of its carreer, had been described as a "gloomy" composition but the composer's sojourn in Italy at the time of its conception, certainly left an indellible mark.

Its pages, now of gentle, melodious trend and again sonorous and passionate, reflecting the traditional and characteristic idioms of its author, were particularly interesting when companioned with the Beethoven. In each of these numbers the performance was one of superlative musicanship, the vigorous, energetic directing of Mr. Koussevitzky being reflected admirably in the response of his men.

The Artistic Musicales, spon-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 15 1937

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Music by Schubert and Mozart at the New Friends' Second Concert

Second concert of The New Friends of Music, Inc., at Town Hall.

Schubert-Mozart Program

I Quartet in D minor (posthumous) ....Schubert
a. Allegro; b. Andante con moto; c. Allegro molto; d. Presto
II Sonata for bassoon and 'cello, in B flat (K., No. 292)..............Mozart
a. Allegro; b. Andante; c. Allegro
III Serenade for wind instruments, in C minor (K., No. 388)..........Mozart
a. Allegro; b. Andante; c. Menuetto. In canone (Trio. In canone al rovescio); d. Allegro

Artists—The Kolisch Quartet: Rudolph Kolisch, 1st violin; Felix Khuner, 2d violin; Eugene Lehner, viola; Benar Heifetz, 'cello; Benjamin Kohon, bassoonist; Joseph Schuster, 'cellist. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Prepared for performance by Arthur Fiedler): Louis Speyer, Jean Devergie, oboes; Viktor Polatschek, Manuel Valerio, clarinets; Raymond Allard, Ernst Panenka, bassoons; Willem Valkenier, Walter MacDonald, horns.

Joseph Schuster

Cello soloist with the New Friends of Music

THE New Friends of Music, that valorous chamber-music enterprise which began its existence a year ago with some uncertainty as to the issue, is moving into its second season upon a strong tide of popular favor. Before the Town Hall opened its doors last evening for the second concert of the current season, the entrances to the building were besieged by a crowd that might have been gathering for a recital by Mr. Rachmaninoff or Mr. Kreisler. But those who lacked tickets waited in vain, for every seat in the house was sold. Yet this was to be no thundering exhibition of a virtuoso's keyboard might, or a solo fiddler's magic and personality. Only the long dead ghosts of Mozart and Schubert were to walk, summoned by a group of quiet and unpretentious artists intent upon bringing them momentarily and intimately into the lives of the listeners.

* * *

The listeners were quickly rewarded. The accomplished Kolisch Quartet—again performing without a sheet of printed music on their desks—achieved some playing not soon to be forgotten in the opening number on the program, Schubert's D minor Quartet, with the matchless variations on the theme of "Der Tod und das Mädchen." After a few momentary lapses from ideal purity of intonation, the players found their customary level.

The song that is the basis of the second movement of the Quartet was published 116 years ago. It might have been issued yesterday, if any one were capable of writing it, so limpid and ageless does the music seem. Yet Schubert merely followed his practice, as one of his biographers said, in taking up what lay nearest to his hand, if it happened to serve his purpose. The constituents of this theme of Death "were any composer's every-day material. Essentially, it is nothing but a bass." But Schubert had only to lay hold of it for wonders to flow from it—the sense of death's naturalness, its mercifulness, the serenity that enwraps it.

* * *

It was not, however, until Schubert returned to this theme some years later and wrote his Variations on it for the string quartet in D minor that he turned the music from a masterpiece into a mystery. The song is one of the three greatest in existence. But the Variations of the D minor Quartet are lonely and unpaired. In certain seraphic pages, that which is wordless and beyond belief finds utterance and design, and is written on the viewless air. These Variations are not, as the literal-minded Heuss declared, tonal pictures for a musical Dance of Death. Schubert's imagination in this music is subtler and simpler and profounder than such a purpose would imply. If there were words or pictures that could explain such music it would not have needed to be written.

* * *

As an amusing interlude, in effect a sort of divertissement, two virtuosi from the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra played for us the charming sonata for bassoon and cello that Mozart composed for the Baron Thaddeus von Dürnitz of Munich. Only a modern miracle could turn the bassoon into a solo instrument that a modern audience will listen to without an irrepressible grin; and so the expert and beautiful performance of the felicitous little work was rewarded last evening with an outburst of hearty merriment, mixed with deserved applause.

As a concluding number, the Friends gave us Wolfgang's Serenade in C minor, composed on commission from those public benefactors, the Haffner family of Salzburg. It was superlatively performed by an octet of wind players imported from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

At the concert of next Sunday, November 21, the Friends will present as guest artist the redoubtable Mr. Schorr, the Metropolitan's great barytone, who is billed to sing Schumann's "Liederkreis."

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS BRILLIANTLY AT CARNEGIE

The Boston Symphony is with us again and musical New York signified its joy in the event by turning out last night in gala de gala, filling Carnegie Hall to the last bit of standing room and remaining after the concert's close to cheer Mr. Koussevitzky and his incomparable musicians.

Two staples of the symphonic repertory composed almost a century apart made up the program. They were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Sibelius's Second.

We have heard more heroic interpretations of the "Eroica" than Mr. Koussevitzky's, but he gave last night a closely knit performance with wonderful grasp of Beethoven's architecture and at the same time with the subtilest shading of dynamics and modeling of the melodic line. The dirge of the famous second movement was so restrained as to be almost objective. Yet it achieved a depth that might have been denied to a purely emotional approach, thus proving again that classicism has its place even in the interpretation of Beethoven's so-called romantic works.

In spite of the chronological abyss that separates the Beethoven from the Sibelius, it was interesting last night to see how much they had in common.

The latter work was particularly well designed to show the prowess of the famous Boston winds. Here again Koussevitzky was restrained, cunningly emphasizing the darker colors in the composer's palette until he came to the exultant peroration of the final movement. There at last he unleashed all the orchestral splendor at his disposal, and listeners knew that the Boston Symphony was with us again.

Their next concert is tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

E. D.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

RADIO ORCHESTRA MAKES DEBUT HERE

NBC's New Symphonic Group, Led by Monteux, Is Heard at Radio City Studios

FIRST OF SPECIAL SERIES

Leader's Brilliant Readings and Technical Excellence Distinguish the Event

N. Y. Times Nov. 15/37

By OLIN DOWNES

The [illegible] Symphony Orchestra which the National Broadcasting Company has developed made its debut last night under the leadership of Pierre Monteux in the Radio City studios. This orchestra had been introduced to the public at a rehearsal conducted earlier in the season by Artur Rodzinski, principally responsible for the choice of the players and the assembling of the band.

The decision of the NBC to develop this orchestra followed its engagement for a special series of concerts of Arturo Toscanini and other distinguished conductors. Mr. Monteux had the distinction of opening officially the series of performances.

The concert served immediate notice of the presence of a new symphony orchestra of very high rank, as it also revealed Mr. Monteux at the height of his powers. With the admirable cooperation of the men under him he added to his international reputation on this occasion and made his listeners realize that it has been too long a time since Mr. Monteux has been heard in this city.

Occupied Listening Room

The writer listened to the new orchestra from two different places. He wished to hear it, and he did hear it, in the performance of the Bach-Respighi transcription of the C minor organ passacaglia and the Mozart "Haffner" symphony, from a listening room where he could watch conductors and players, and hear the music as it was heard, presumably, by radio listeners in different parts of the country and the world. Afterward he heard the orchestra from a place in the concert hall, in the performance of a movement from Cesar Franck's "Psyché," the three movements of Debussy's "Iberia," and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The sound of the music over the radio—no doubt with one of the best kind of receiving apparatus—was remarkable for the sonority and the resonance of the tone, and the clearness with which, for the greater part of the time, all the inner parts as well as the main effects of the orchestra were revealed. Sometimes there was a slight preponderance of strings; a chord or two of wind-instruments not perfectly balanced, or at least edged, so that the upper voice was entirely distinct. Sometimes there was a trifle too much of brass. But these things were in all probability the result of the particular way in which that performance was transmitted.

After making all deductions and reservations it is to be said that to hear the orchestra under circumstances not of the concert room was to be astonished at the remarkable qualities of the band itself as was conveyed by radio mechanism.

Had Orchestral Effect

It had the complete and characteristic orchestral effect and many more sonorities and tone colors than were audible over the radio even a few years ago. In the Mozart performance the virtuosity of the strings, the precision and finish of rapid-scale passages and the like and the variety of nuance obtainable from the instruments were impressive.

Then came the opportunity for closer acquaintance with this orchestra in its concert hall or, as it is known in the NBC Building, its studio. This studio, which seats 1,200 and some odd listeners, is made for broadcasting and it has not the resonance of a concert hall especially designed for public performance. The result of this was that the orchestra was put to a very severe test. The strings, which were so vibrant heard from the outside, are dryer in color in the studio. The same thing applies to the brass and in a lesser degree to the woodwind instrument.

So that one heard this orchestra, with the lessened resonance, as if you listened to each instrument under a microscope. If a person who is a little near-sighted and sees all things rather soft-edged and unclear, puts on a pair of good glasses, he gets something of the impression through the eyes that listening to the NBC Orchestra in the studio gives the ears. The orchestra must be a particularly good one, exceptionally accurate and well trained, to meet successfully these conditions.

Orchestra Meets Test

The orchestra met the test triumphantly. With a less glamorous tone than it would have under other circumstances, it played with a finish, clarity and subtlety of tonal values, particularly in the Debussy composition, that were wholly exceptional. We have not heard such a performance of the "Iberia" in a long time. This was due to the qualities of the band and also due to Mr. Monteux's masterly reading.

In the preceding piece, the Franck, the splendid strings and some of the best of the brass instruments had opportunity for particular display. In Debussy's music the wind instruments exhibited the exemplary tone color, technical precision and brilliancy. Strauss's tone poem finished the evening very brilliantly, although, as it happened, there were some slight blemishes in the brass choir. These things can happen without proving the precise abilities of one or another player at an opening concert.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" as a whole was another victory for the leader and the men alike. Perhaps we have advanced in understanding of Mr. Monteux and of orchestral performances in general since he was last in this city. But it is very probably true that he also has ripened and grown as a great musician continually does with the years and experience.

Readings Are Superb

As soon as he settled to his work last night, which was perhaps after the Respighi performance, he was remarkable, not only in his authority and control of the orchestra but in the freedom and musical imagination with which he utilized his power. The Franck, the Debussy, the Strauss were superb performances of modern music.

There will be later occasion to estimate this orchestra in more detail than can be done now, but it is clear at the beginning that the NBC has notably achieved its primary purpose, which was the establishment of an orchestra which in its own right should develop standards of symphonic performance over the air.

Another word should be spoken, for the behavior of the audience. Think of it: an audience, on time; no noise of late-comers; not a sound or a rustle in the hall while the orchestra was playing. That is a new standard for listeners, and we would that it could be applied rigorously in other places than radio studios.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 17 1937

Wife of Former Conductor Of Boston Symphony Living Next Door to Tanglewood

LENOX, Nov. 17.—Mrs. Pierre Monteaux of Paris, France, and San Francisco, Cal., wife of Pierre Monteaux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, is at the Higginson Farm, West Street, with Mrs. Alexander Weeks of New York for the winter. Mrs. Weeks, who last season was at the gatehouse at Mrs. W. Roscoe Bonsal's estate, has two sons attending the Lenox School for boys. The Higginson farm adjoins Tanglewood, estate given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent home for the Berkshire Music Festival.

Mr. Monteaux conducted the NBC Symphony Orchestra, newest of the world's great symphony orchestras, at the debut Saturday night, and to be conducted later by Toscanini.

Conducted From 1919-'24

Mrs. Monteaux's husband before conducting the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra was conductor of the Boston orchestra from 1919 to 1924. For two years, 1917-1919, he was conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City.

He attended the Paris Conservatory of Music and studied violin with Maruin and Berthelier, solfeggio and harmony with Lavignac and counterpoint and fugue with Lenepveu.

His career began as a viola player and later conducted concerts in leading cities of Europe. He served as a private in the French infantry in the World War, participating in battles at Verdun, Rheims, Soissons and Argonne.

Mrs. Monteaux is the former Germaine Benedictus of Paris. They were married Feb. 6, 1910.

---

18 Nov. 19/37 NEW YORK JOURNAL AND AMERICAN * *

Boston Symphony in Local Bow

By GRENA BENNETT.

A program of rare contrast in symphonic literature was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, the visitors' first local event in the present season. Conductor Serge Koussevitsky offered only two compositions, Beethoven's "Eroica" and Sibelius' Second and in these there was vast matter for comparison and interest.

The "Eroica" was first on the list, the symphony that was planned to glorify Buonaparte as "First Consul," but with the Corsicans' greater ambition to govern an empire the dedication was angrily changed by the composer when Napoleon joined the crowned heads of Europe. The performance was a superb and compellin one, revealing the romantic urge that inspired the work, the mellow, mellifluous language of the great symphonist in his most fertile period. The sentiments of the symphony were artfully captured, avoiding any attempt at sentimentality; compelling passages timed with taste and climaxes achieved with well-judged accent and power.

The Sibelius work, stemming from the musical language of Finnish northland, in the early part of its carreer, had been described as a "gloomy" composition but the composer's sojourn in Italy at the time of its conception, certainly left an indellible mark.

Its pages, now of gentle, melodious trend and again sonorous and passionate, reflecting the traditional and characteristic idioms of its author, were particularly interesting when companioned with the Beethoven. In each of these numbers the performance was one of superlative musicanship, the vigorous, energetic directing of Mr. Koussevitzky being reflected admirably in the response of his men.

The Artistic Musicales, spon-

Koussevitzky Brilliant As Series Opens

Hartford Courant

Bushnell Memorial Symphonic Season Triumphally Launched by Boston Orchestra

Nov. 17/37

BY T. H. PARKER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the first concert of the Bushnell 1937-38 series in the foundation auditorium Tuesday night.

The program:

Symphony in G Major, No. 88	Haydn
Lieutenant Kiji, Orchestral Suite	Prokofieff
Tod und Verklaerung	Strauss
Til Eulenspiegel	Strauss

Setting aside the customary ceremonial programing which tradition assures us befits the beginning of another symphonic year, Dr. Koussevitzky flung open once again at Bushnell Memorial last night the doors of great music played with greatness. Their portals were not hung with the pomposities of Sibelius or the portentiousness of Beethoven as habit would suggest. Instead they were garlanded with laughter and festooned with great and minor gaieties, and the only ritualistic fanfare was the mocking flourish, to which Lieutenant Kije was born and to which he was wafted away again. "C'est a rire." said Dr. Doussevitzky, and not even the cotton-batting clouds of "Tod and Verklaerung" cast a shadow on what was the merriest program with which a season ever opened here.

Thus major music got under way again, and it was good and right to see once more Bushnell's tawny big-top stretched at the marquee and to observe the aurora-boreal lighting effects of the hall, to be jostled along the aisles, to hear the particularly surging applause of a symphony audience, to see the crowded orchestral terrace under a strident cloudbank of tuning-up, and to inhale the scent of perfume mingled with that of mothballs and cough drops phenomenal to concert halls.

But apart from these pleasant inconsequentialities of atmosphere and the exhilirating surprise of so enormously lighthearted a program, what distinguished the opening and the evening was the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky and his resplendent orchestra in a thrilling performance. From the pure sparkling, smiling Haydn to the rowdy "Till," it was as always with the Boston, an event of superb interpretations and miraculous playing.

The Haydn was I think, new to Hartford. It could not have had a superior introduction than Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave it. As an assayer of classicism, Dr. Koussevitzky has gathered new insight and new purities each year. Haydn must be especially dear to his heart for last year he brought this composer to us, and this summer at Tanglewood and again last night, and more crystalline interpretations, more refinement of detailling, more sparkle of form and spirit now seem well nigh impossible. What seems a particularly conclusive evidence of Dr. Koussevitzky's homage to Haydn is the way in which he lets Haydn play his own compositions. To state Haydn with such simplicity, such almost reverential simplicity, such enriching literality, can only be the mark of completest sympathy and understanding between composer and interpreter.

Crammed as the evening was with magnificent playing in scores more complex than Haydn, the Symphony must be accounted the highest attainment orchestrally. The second movement was a marvel of limpidity on the part of the orchestra as it was of honesty in interpretation, and so rhythmic, so sturdy and yet so supple and fleeting were the third and fourth sections that they must remain vivid in memory for a long, long time.

As much as one hated to steal a moment from the music itself, it was worth it to watch Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting. It is difficult to imagine how he could have made less effort of it or exercised more economy of means for such maximum results. Measure after measure flew by with his beat almost imperceptible and no manual dynamic instructions visible. Then at the end of a period a sudden flurry, a whipping of the tempo, a flash and flourish to call up and push back the orchestral strengths, a stabbing signal to some entrance, and then on and on again the orchestra driving along under the magnetism of only a Jovian eye.

Prokofieff's music for the film "Lieutenant Kije" proved to be a simply captivating confection. It flashed and was utterly pungent with wit, and in its tootlings and pipings and tinkling completely ingenious in fabrication. More delightful music, with more beguiling bits of stylization and freshness of manner is hard to imagine. Underneath it all lay a finely founded unity of means and of intentions. All in all it is one of Prokofieff's smartest successes, though novelty it be. What a gay person this unsubstantial Kije must have been in Prokofieff's mind, for even his funeral music conjured up a creature smiling gaily in his beard as he lay in a hearse of pink icing and cellophane drawn along to his grave by horses "truckin' on down." There doubtless his soul floated out in champagne bubbles.

The orchestra performance of "Kije" was completely brilliant in a score which demanded virtuoso endeavor from even the double-bass players. When the audience flung its applause out and Dr. Koussevitzky motioned for solo part players to rise, it seemed as if half the orchestra was called up for credit for special feats.

With the same brilliant investigation and investiture, the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky piled up the musical immensities of the two so-familiar Strauss works. The "Tod und Verklaerung" (translated as "Death and Transportation" in a suburban library recently) however vulgar it may be musically, is a huge undertaking for any orchestra and so well was it done last night that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men almost made you feel there is something to it interiorally. The fantastic orchestrations of "Til" were set out in grand mockery, and the rowdy tale blown up as big as the giant balloon monsters in Macy's Thanksgiving parade, affording a hurricane of harlequinaderie for the evening's close

---

K WORLD-TELEGRAM, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1937.

Symphony by Sibelius at Carnegie

Boston Orchestra Also Gives 'Eroica' by Beethoven

By PITTS SANBORN.

Quite definitely, Sibelius is the composer of the autumn. Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving its first Carnegie Hall concert of the season, joined the procession by offering the second, and most popular, of the Finnish master's seven symphonies. In a program of two numbers it followed Beethoven's "Eroica."

Though the splendor of the Sibelius symphony is scarcely contestable, this arrangement, except in sheer sonority, would ordinarily be anticlimactic. For the "Eroica" is still the greater. And the first movement of the "Eroica," that astonishing tone poem of a century and a quarter ago, Beethoven himself never surpassed in the six symphonies that he wrote afterwards.

Stands Unequalled.

Indeed, as a single symphonic movement it is hardly too much to say that the Allegro con brio of the "Eroica" in richness of inspiration and workmanship stands alone, unequaled.

On the other hand, last night's order proved right enough in the performance. Serge Koussevitzky gloried in the tonal palette of his superb orchestra, in its imposing opulence of sound, and that had more impressive scope in the modern work than in the classic. In fact, in Beethoven's music he tended to overdrive his men, demanding of them a fortissimo that is not properly in Beethoven's scoring.

* * *

Scherzo the Best Movement.

Nor was this the only drawback to the enjoyment of "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky's tempi and nuances were decidedly idiosyncratic, sometimes annoyingly so. The pace at which he took the Funeral March detracted from its impressiveness, and strange things happened in the concluding variations. Of the four movements the scherzo went best.

The Sibelius, however, was another story. There the conductor's gift for dramatizing stirred his hearers mightily. The contrasts and conflicts of the music were set forth with uncommon energy and eloquence, culminating in a peroration of commanding power. Mr. Koussevitzky's demands on the players were exorbitant, but the players met them.

An audience that crowded the hall was exceedingly demonstrative.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE,

Nov. 19 MUSIC 1937

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Gives Its First New York Concert of the Season

First New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

Program

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
IV. Finale: Allegro molto

Intermission

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 .... Sibelius
I. Allegretto
II. Tempo andante, ma rubato
III. Vivacissimo; Lento e sauve
IV. Finale: Allegro moderato

A HUGE audience, in festal mood, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Carnegie Hall at its first New York concert of the season.

The instrumentalists from the zone of the East Wind were never more admired and renowned in the metropolis than they are today. Their reputation is prodigious. Places at their concerts are almost unobtainable. The audiences that gather to hear them in Carnegie Hall are the cream of New York's concert-going public. Their enthusiasm is thunderous, electric, and unfailing. Fortunate indeed is the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this fourteenth year of the reign of Serge the First!

* * *

Its state of felicity is deserved. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra are models of dignity, expertness, and fine taste. Their programs are seldom or never dull, and certainly never maladroit. The orchestra is always on its mettle, and the occasions when it has not played admirably are difficult to recall.

The reasons for this condition of symphonic beatitude are many, and this is not the place nor the time for their recital. The facts alleged are sufficiently remarkable; and none should be happier about them than the music-lovers of our town, who enjoy the opportunity, on ten occasions in the course of each season, to observe and enjoy and wonder over a concert-giving enterprise which appears to function with unlapsing effectiveness.

* * *

Last evening's proceedings were of a well-remembered kind, but they were admirably skillful in conception and arrangement. They consisted in the traversal of two symphonic masterworks—the Third of Beethoven and the Second of Sibelius. Seldom has the tonal texture of the two great scores been played upon with so vivid a light—though some of those in the audience who have been brought up on Toscanini's Beethoven may have raised an eyebrow now and again at Boston's current conception of the "Eroica."

Serge Koussevitzky

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall

Mr. Koussevitzky was his familiar visual and interpretative self—perhaps a shade less ascetic in appearance than hitherto, but no less concentrated, taut, imperious, and controlling. Also, as of yore, he was fervently greeted and acclaimed by his audience.

* * *

He was at his best in the superb creation of Sibelius, one of the most original, exciting, and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind. If Sibelius had written nothing but this single symphony, with its mysterious intensities, its haunting imaginative power, he would stand among the masters.

The audience was justly enthusiastic at the close of the performance.

Boston Symphony Season

Jacques Fevrier Is Soloist at Brooklyn Opening Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Academy of Music. Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, will make his first New York appearance as soloist in Ravel's concerto for left hand alone. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, and Sibelius's second symphony are the other works on Serge Koussevitzky's program.

The other four concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony this season at the Academy under the

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 19 1937

Music

Boston Symphony in Season's Debut at Carnegie Hall

The return to New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was marked by unusual bursts of applause from an audience that not only filled every seat, but filled every standee position in the house. The program, brief but excellently chosen, included only two numbers: Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, from opus 55 of "Eroica"; and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 43.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra with a professional calmness and sense of leadership which offered New York music lovers a distinct contrast with the jerky style of John Barbirolli, and the Boston musicians, in their turn, played with a greater sense of response and enjoyment of their work than has been evident in the season's other symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall to date.

In the second movement of Beethoven's Symphony, the "Marcia Funebre: Adagio Assai," Koussevitzky's mastery of his players became really evident, and the resultant playing of the part gave the clear impression of a well-rehearsed orchestra. The "scherzo," which followed brought out the deep tones of the base viols, and the "finale" brought to a vigorous ending a symphony which caused the audience to call back the conductor for a number of curtain calls during the intermission.

Although to the trained musician a far more interesting and difficult work, the Sibelius symphony failed to receive from the audience quite the same spontaneous response that had been accorded the earlier work. Nevertheless, the conflict of the somber undertones with the blaring of the brasses that has been used so effectively in many of the Finnish composer's works had its cumulative effect upon the audience and left it with the impression that whereas the older music may possibly be compared to the calmer fields below a tall mountain, the modern composition is in a sense the windswept clearing above timberline—more rugged, more hardy, possibly nearer to the celestial ideal.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Orchestra Before Crowded House at Carnegie Hall

N.Y. Times

AUDIENCE IS ENTHUSIASTIC

Nov. 19/37

Beethoven's 'Eroica' and the Sibelius Second Are Only Works on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

An audience that packed Carnegie Hall shouted and cheered after the concluding performance of the Sibelius Second symphony by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who last night made their first New York appearance of the season.

Nor was there long to wait to experience the pleasure manifested at the end. A considerable measure of it was felt with the first tones that the magnificent orchestra sounded. The transparency of the tone, the texture of it, the justness of pitch, the sensitiveness and flexibility of style were newly realized. For sheer sound this concert would have been a refreshing and stimulating experience.

The program was a simple one, and very effective. It consisted of two symphonies, the first one being possibly the greatest ever written—Beethoven's "Eroica"; the second the wildly dramatic symphony of Sibelius.

The reading of Beethoven varied from the last performance of the "Eroica" given by Dr. Koussevitzky in this city. It was more rugged, more virile intentionally. It echoed Beethoven's virility and brusquerie. There were some passing variations of tempo, as with the second theme, with which details the listener might or might not agree. That is unimportant by the side of the power and imagination with which the music was treated.

No Details Are Lost

The opening movement of the "Eroica" is perhaps the richest single movement that Beethoven penned. No detail was lost. Dr Koussevitzky never rests on his previous conception of a score. He is always seeking, with the result that a passage is unduly italicized or a tempo shaded when the perfectly straight beat would accomplish the purpose. But if Koussevitzky's Beethoven, indeed all other composers, remains in a state of constant evolution rather than a static condition of excellence, it also constantly grows.

The interpretation of the Funeral March was nobly lyrical, dramatic without losing its solemn and profound character. Measures that are sometimes conventional were unexpectedly significant, as for example the figure for the violins which just precedes the last appearance of the march motive, which is interrupted by silences and sighs, as the orchestra concludes the elegy.

In the scherzo, on the other hand, Dr. Koussevitzky chose to be not only precise in his beat, but to take the middle part at a considerably faster tempo than is usual, so that if the horns had been other than those of the Boston Symphony it might have gone hard with their fanfares, and the notes had to be held pretty shortly. This severely strict tempo avoided sentimentality or loss of momentum, but it left the listener asking himself if the broader pace of tradition is not after all the right one for this passage. The finale, powerfully and nobly conceived, brought the realization that this movement, alone, would be itself a symphonic masterpiece. It is underrated by a good many because of the three gigantic movements which have come before. But it is a colossus, and capstone of the symphony.

Sibelius Stirs Audience

Sibelius's symphony stirred the audience mightily. The simplicity of it is extraordinary. The almost pastoral opening, the thrumming of the strings and echoes of dance motives, and rejoinder of the horn, communicate to the listener a singular sensation of spaces and silences. But this is not for long. The orchestra goes berserk; there are cries of battle. Passages of a savage and somber hue alternate wonderfully with those that might be born of the warmth and the scents of the brief northern Spring.

The beginning of the slow movement, and its progress, was played with much imagination and power. It commences as a skald might pluck his harp, and then the great dark tale winds on. Who forgets orchestral turmoil and stress that lead up to the great shout of the trumpets; the black echo of their tone by the deep horns and the ominous drum-roll; the superb modulation from a "flat" key to the poignant sweetness of the passage in F sharp major, or the lovely cantilena which is perhaps a little Tschaikovsky, yet not a Russian lamentation but a song of another race and a lament for a heroic past?

The orchestra sounded this music magnificently. The excitement of the last two movements that join together mounted, to the very end, which Mr. Koussevitzky made especially broad and mighty, with the plagal close that shouts defiance under the skies. Then came the public demonstration.

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opens its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Koussevitzky Brilliant As Series Opens

Hartford Courant

Bushnell Memorial Symphonic Season Triumphally Launched by Boston Orchestra

Nov. 17/37

BY T. H. PARKER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the first concert of the Bushnell 1937-38 series in the foundation auditorium Tuesday night.

The program:

Symphony in G Major. No. 88 .. Haydn
Lieutenant Kiji, Orchestral Suite ..... Prokofieff
Tod und Verklaerung .... Strauss
Til Eulenspiegel .... Strauss

Setting aside the customary ceremonial programing which tradition assures us befits the beginning of another symphonic year, Dr. Koussevitzky flung open once again at Bushnell Memorial last night the doors of great music played with greatness. Their portals were not hung with the pomposities of Sibelius or the portentiousness of Beethoven as habit would suggest. Instead they were garlanded with laughter and festooned with great and minor gaieties, and the only ritualistic fanfare was the mocking flourish, to which Lieutenant Kije was born and to which he was wafted away again. "C'est a rire." said Dr. Doussevitzky, and not even the cotton-batting clouds of "Tod and Verklaerung" cast a shadow on what was the merriest program with which a season ever opened here.

Thus major music got under way again, and it was good and right to see once more Bushnell's tawny big-top stretched at the marquee and to observe the aurora-boreal lighting effects of the hall, to be jostled along the aisles, to hear the particularly surging applause of a symphony audience, to see the crowded orchestral terrace under a strident cloudbank of tuning-up, and to inhale the scent of perfume mingled with that of mothballs and cough drops phenomenal to concert halls.

But apart from these pleasant inconsequentialities of atmosphere and the exhilirating surprise of so enormously lighthearted a program, what distinguished the opening and the evening was the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky and his resplendent orchestra in a thrilling performance. From the pure sparkling, smiling Haydn to the rowdy "Till," it was as always with the Boston, an event of superb interpretations and miraculous playing.

The Haydn was I think, new to Hartford. It could not have had a superior introduction than Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave it. As an assayer of classicism, Dr. Koussevitzky has gathered new insight and new purities each year. Haydn must be especially dear to his heart for last year he brought this composer to us, and this summer at Tanglewood and again last night, and more crystalline interpretations, more refinement of detailling, more sparkle of form and spirit now seem well nigh impossible. What seems a particularly conclusive evidence of Dr. Koussevitzky's homage to Haydn is the way in which he lets Haydn play his own compositions. To state Haydn with such simplicity, such almost reverential simplicity, such enriching literality, can only be the mark of completest sympathy and understanding between composer and interpreter.

Crammed as the evening was with magnificent playing in scores more complex than Haydn, the Symphony must be accounted the highest attainment orchestrally. The second movement was a marvel of limpidity on the part of the orchestra as it was of honesty in interpretation, and so rhythmic, so sturdy and yet so supple and fleeting were the third and fourth sections that they must remain vivid in memory for a long, long time.

As much as one hated to steal a moment from the music itself, it was worth it to watch Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting. It is difficult to imagine how he could have made less effort of it or exercised more economy of means for such maximum results. Measure after measure flew by with his beat almost imperceptible and no manual dynamic instructions visible. Then at the end of a period a sudden flurry, a whipping of the tempo, a flash and flourish to call up and push back the orchestral strengths, a stabbing signal to some entrance, and then on and on again the orchestra driving along under the magnetism of only a Jovian eye.

Prokofieff's music for the film "Lieutenant Kije" proved to be a simply captivating confection. It flashed and was utterly pungent with wit, and in its tootlings and pipings and tinkling completely ingenious in fabrication. More delightful music, with more beguiling bits of stylization and freshness of manner is hard to imagine. Underneath it all lay a finely founded unity of means and of intentions. All in all it is one of Prokofieff's smartest successes, though novelty it be. What a gay person this unsubstantial Kije must have been in Prokofieff's mind, for even his funeral music conjured up a creature smiling gaily in his beard as he lay in a hearse of pink icing and cellophane drawn along to his grave by horses "truckin' on down." There doubtless his soul floated out in champagne bubbles.

The orchestra performance of "Kije" was completely brilliant in a score which demanded virtuoso endeavor from even the double-bass players. When the audience flung its applause out and Dr. Koussevitzky motioned for solo part players to rise, it seemed as if half the orchestra was called up for credit for special feats.

With the same brilliant investigation and investiture, the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky piled up the musical immensities of the two so-familiar Strauss works. The "Tod und Verklaerung" (translated as "Death and Transportation" in a suburban library recently) however vulgar it may be musically, is a huge undertaking for any orchestra and so well was it done last night that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men almost made you feel there is something to it interiorally. The fantastic orchestrations of "Til" were set out in grand mockery, and the rowdy tale blown up as big as the giant balloon monsters in Macy's Thanksgiving parade, affording a hurricane of harlequinaderie for the evening's close.

K WORLD-TELEGRAM, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1937.

Symphony by Sibelius at Carnegie

Boston Orchestra Also Gives 'Eroica' by Beethoven

By PITTS SANBORN.

Quite definitely, Sibelius is the composer of the autumn. Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving its first Carnegie Hall concert of the season, joined the procession by offering the second, and most popular, of the Finnish master's seven symphonies. In a program of two numbers it followed Beethoven's "Eroica."

Though the splendor of the Sibelius symphony is scarcely contestable, this arrangement, except in sheer sonority, would ordinarily be anticlimactic. For the "Eroica" is still the greater. And the first movement of the "Eroica," that astonishing tone poem of a century and a quarter ago, Beethoven himself never surpassed in the six symphonies that he wrote afterwards.

* * *

Stands Unequalled.

Indeed, as a single symphonic movement it is hardly too much to say that the Allegro con brio of the "Eroica" in richness of inspiration and workmanship stands alone, unequalled.

On the other hand, last night's order proved right enough in the performance. Serge Koussevitzky gloried in the tonal palette of his superb orchestra, in its imposing opulence of sound, and that had more impressive scope in the modern work than in the classic. In fact, in Beethoven's music he tended to overdrive his men, demanding of them a fortissimo that is not properly in Beethoven's scoring.

* * *

Scherzo the Best Movement.

Nor was this the only drawback to the enjoyment of "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky's tempi and nuances were decidedly idiosyncratic, sometimes annoyingly so. The pace at which he took the Funeral March detracted from its impressiveness, and strange things happened in the concluding variations. Of the four movements the scherzo went best.

The Sibelius, however, was another story. There the conductor's gift for dramatizing stirred his hearers mightily. The contrasts and conflicts of the music were set forth with uncommon energy and eloquence, culminating in a peroration of commanding power. Mr. Koussevitzky's demands on the players were exorbitant, but the players met them.

An audience that crowded the hall was exceedingly demonstrative.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE,

Nov. 19 MUSIC 1937

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Gives Its First New York Concert of the Season

First New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

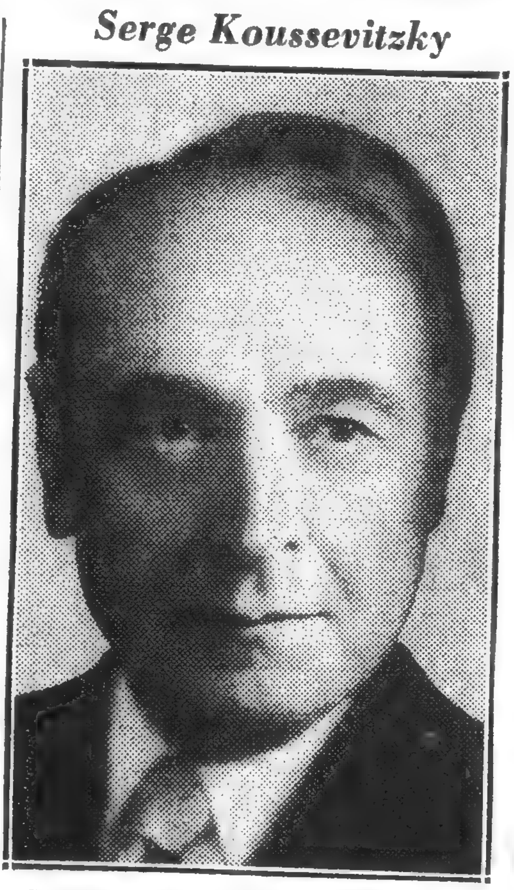
Program

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
IV. Finale: Allegro molto

Intermission

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 ..... Sibelius
I. Allegretto
II. Tempo andante, ma rubato
III. Vivacissimo; Lento e sauve
IV. Finale: Allegro moderato

Serge Koussevitzky



Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall

A HUGE audience, in festal mood, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Carnegie Hall at its first New York concert of the season.

The instrumentalists from the zone of the East Wind were never more admired and renowned in the metropolis than they are today. Their reputation is prodigious. Places at their concerts are almost unobtainable. The audiences that gather to hear them in Carnegie Hall are the cream of New York's concert-going public. Their enthusiasm is thunderous, electric, and unfailing. Fortunate indeed is the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this fourteenth year of the reign of Serge the First!

* * *

Its state of felicity is deserved. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra are models of dignity, expertness, and fine taste. Their programs are seldom or never dull, and certainly never maladroit. The orchestra is always on its mettle, and the occasions when it has not played admirably are difficult to recall.

The reasons for this condition of symphonic beatitude are many, and this is not the place nor the time for their recital. The facts alleged are sufficiently remarkable; and none should be happier about them than the music-lovers of our town, who enjoy the opportunity, on ten occasions in the course of each season, to observe and enjoy and wonder over a concert-giving enterprise which appears to function with unlapsing effectiveness.

* * *

Last evening's proceedings were of a well-remembered kind, but they were admirably skillful in conception and arrangement. They consisted in the traversal of two symphonic masterworks—the Third of Beethoven and the Second of Sibelius. Seldom has the tonal texture of the two great scores been played upon with so vivid a light—though some of those in the audience who have been brought up on Toscanini's Beethoven may have raised an eyebrow now and again at Boston's current conception of the "Eroica."

Mr. Koussevitzky was his familiar visual and interpretative self—perhaps a shade less ascetic in appearance than hitherto, but no less concentrated, taut, imperious, and controlling. Also, as of yore, he was fervently greeted and acclaimed by his audience.

* * *

He was at his best in the superb creation of Sibelius, one of the most original, exciting, and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind. If Sibelius had written nothing but this single symphony, with its mysterious intensities, its haunting imaginative power, he would stand among the masters.

The audience was justly enthusiastic at the close of the performance.

Boston Symphony Season

Jacques Fevrier Is Soloist at Brooklyn Opening Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Academy of Music. Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, will make his first New York appearance as soloist in Ravel's concerto for left hand alone. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, and Sibelius's second symphony are the other works on Serge Koussevitzky's program.

The other four concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony this season at the Academy under the

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Orchestra Before Crowded House at Carnegie Hall

N.Y. Times

AUDIENCE IS ENTHUSIASTIC

Nov. 19/37

Beethoven's 'Eroica' and the Sibelius Second Are Only Works on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

An audience that packed Carnegie Hall shouted and cheered after the concluding performance of the Sibelius Second symphony by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who last night made their first New York appearance of the season.

Nor was there long to wait to experience the pleasure manifested at the end. A considerable measure of it was felt with the first tones that the magnificent orchestra sounded. The transparency of the tone, the texture of it, the justness of pitch, the sensitiveness and flexibility of style were newly realized. For sheer sound this concert would have been a refreshing and stimulating experience.

The program was a simple one, and very effective. It consisted of two symphonies, the first one being possibly the greatest ever written—Beethoven's "Eroica"; the second the wildly dramatic symphony of Sibelius.

The reading of Beethoven varied from the last performance of the "Eroica" given by Dr. Koussevitzky in this city. It was more rugged, more virile intentionally. It echoed Beethoven's virility and brusquerie. There were some passing variations of tempo, as with the second theme, with which details the listener might or might not agree. That is unimportant by the side of the power and imagination with which the music was treated.

No Details Are Lost

The opening movement of the "Eroica" is perhaps the richest single movement that Beethoven penned. No detail was lost. Dr Koussevitzky never rests on his previous conception of a score. He is always seeking, with the result that a passage is unduly italicized or a tempo shaded when the perfectly straight beat would accomplish the purpose. But if Koussevitzky's Beethoven, indeed all other composers, remains in a state of constant evolution rather than a static condition of excellence, it also constantly grows.

The interpretation of the Funeral March was nobly lyrical, dramatic without losing its solemn and profound character. Measures that are sometimes conventional were unexpectedly significant, as for example the figure for the violins which just precedes the last appearance of the march motive, which is interrupted by silences and sighs, as the orchestra concludes the elegy.

In the scherzo, on the other hand, Dr. Koussevitzky chose to be not only precise in his beat, but to take the middle part at a considerably faster tempo than is usual, so that if the horns had been other than those of the Boston Symphony it might have gone hard with their fanfares, and the notes had to be held pretty shortly. This severely strict tempo avoided sentimentality or loss of momentum, but it left the listener asking himself if the broader pace of tradition is not after all the right one for this passage. The finale, powerfully and nobly conceived, brought the realization that this movement, alone, would be itself a symphonic masterpiece. It is underrated by a good many because of the three gigantic movements which have come before. But it is a colossus, and capstone of the symphony.

Sibelius Stirs Audience

Sibelius's symphony stirred the audience mightily. The simplicity of it is extraordinary. The almost pastoral opening, the thrumming of the strings and echoes of dance motives, and rejoinder of the horn, communicate to the listener a singular sensation of spaces and silences. But this is not for long. The orchestra goes berserk; there are cries of battle. Passages of a savage and somber hue alternate wonderfully with those that might be born of the warmth and the scents of the brief northern Spring.

The beginning of the slow movement, and its progress, was played with much imagination and power. It commences as a skald might pluck his harp, and then the great dark tale winds on. Who forgets orchestral turmoil and stress that lead up to the great shout of the trumpets; the black echo of their tone by the deep horns and the ominous drum-roll; the superb modulation from a "flat" key to the poignant sweetness of the passage in F sharp major, or the lovely cantilena which is perhaps a little Tschaikovsky, yet not a Russian lamentation but a song of another race and a lament for a heroic past?

The orchestra sounded this music magnificently. The excitement of the last two movements that join together mounted, to the very end, which Mr. Koussevitzky made especially broad and mighty, with the plagal close that shouts defiance under the skies. Then came the public demonstration.

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opens its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 19 1937

Music

Boston Symphony in Season's Debut at Carnegie Hall

The return to New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was marked by unusual bursts of applause from an audience that not only filled every seat, but filled every standee position in the house. The program, brief but excellently chosen, included only two numbers: Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, from opus 55 of "Eroica"; and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 43.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra with a professional calmness and sense of leadership which offered New York music lovers a distinct contrast with the jerky style of John Barbirolli, and the Boston musicians, in their turn, played with a greater sense of response and enjoyment of their work than has been evident in the season's other symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall to date.

In the second movement of Beethoven's Symphony, the "Marcia Funebre: Adagio Assai," Koussevitzky's mastery of his players became really evident, and the resultant playing of the part gave the clear impression of a well-rehearsed orchestra. The "scherzo," which followed brought out the deep tones of the base viols, and the "finale" brought to a vigorous ending a symphony which caused the audience to call back the conductor for a number of curtain calls during the intermission.

Although to the trained musician a far more interesting and difficult work, the Sibelius symphony failed to receive from the audience quite the same spontaneous response that had been accorded the earlier work. Nevertheless, the conflict of the somber undertones with the blaring of the brasses that has been used so effectively in many of the Finnish composer's works had its cumulative effect upon the audience and left it with the impression that whereas the older music may possibly be compared to the calmer fields below a tall mountain, the modern composition is in a sense the windswept clearing above timberline—more rugged, more hardy, possibly nearer to the celestial ideal.

50

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony Returns

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts First Concert of Its 52d Season in Manhattan.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

For the fifty-second time the Boston Symphony inaugurated a series of New York concerts last night, with Carnegie Hall filled for the festivity. Serge Koussevitzky, now in his fourteenth season as conductor of the famous ensemble, was extended the usual cordial welcome at his first appearance and was rousingly applauded at the conclusion of his program.

It was the same program as that which launched the orchestra's fifty-seventh year in Symphony Hall, Boston, early in October. Two symphonies were performed, one before, one after the intermission, without a curtain-raiser or a coda such as frequently is regarded as necessary for a two-symphony list. In this instance, any additional music would have been superfluous, even gratuitous.

The symphonies presented, Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Sibelius Second, proved altogether companionable. The Sibelius opus, too, might be styled "Eroica." Both scores are full of fight. Though the bardic and legendary spirit of the Finnish master's work separates it in character from the gigantic tribute which Beethoven conceived for an all-too-human hero, the poetic exaltation which informs both works, together with their largeness of line, bespeaks for them a certain kinship. Beethoven's clearly is the more personal in feeling. Sibelius's is the more national, and in the expressive nature of what it conveys the more remote in time, though composed a century later than the "Eroica."

A specialist in Sibelius, if any one is, Mr. Koussevitzky again stirred his hearers with the sweep and splendor of the second symphony's climactic finale. The brass playing was by all odds the finest Manhattan has heard this season. But it was matched by that of the woodwinds in the pastoral trio that plays such an enchanting part in the scherzo. The strings raced magically through the vivaccissimo, after some sumptuous playing in andante. This was the Boston Symphony in its best estate—the one orchestra of the season, so far, of which as much could be said at its first concert in New York. But not to be forgotten in this connection is the foreground of concerts already played in Boston.

In technical finish, the Beethoven performance was of a superior order. Highly particularized, the reading was one over which disagreements not only are possible, but inevitable. The horn trio of the scherzo was played quite as fast as Toscanini took it in his still debatable treatment of this movement. The chief theme of the allegro finale, that which figures also in the ballet, "Prometheus," and in one of the piano compositions, was given more slowly and in less militant fashion than is customary in its first statement. Details of tempi and emphasis aside, it was a joy to hear Beethoven's great striding basses sounding boldly through a tonal texture that was kept conspicuously clear. Neither symphony possessed a moment of opaqueness or muddied color. The performances were radiantly alight and propulsively alive.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony Season

Jacques Fevrier Is Soloist at Brooklyn Opening Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open ~~its fifty~~-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Academy of Music. Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, will make his first New York appearance as soloist in Ravel's concerto for left hand alone. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, and Sibelius's second symphony are the other works on Serge Koussevitzky's program.

The other four concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony this season at the Academy under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a special Brooklyn sponsors' committee, will be held on Friday night, January 7; Thursday night, February 10, and Friday nights, March 11 and April 1.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish Advocate - Nov. 19/37

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall last week, Dr. Koussevitzky chose an early Mozart Symphony, the Ravel Piano Concerto for left hand, and the tone poem, "A Hero's Life", by Richard Strauss.

Mozart started his career as composer at the somewhat early age of five with several small piano compositions which are still in use today. Thus we are not unduly surprised to learn that Mozart was only eighteen when he wrote the sparkling little symphony heard last week. The work is youthful in the best sense of the word, full of fresh ardor, filled with joy of life, abounding in good humor, yet graceful and charming withal. It was in this spirit of young life that Dr. Koussevitzky attacked this work: even the Minuet was taken at too rapid a tempo.

It is an ironic fact that Ravel's Concerto for the left hand is ever so much better than the one he composed for the conventional number of hands. It must be confessed that the sight of Jacques Fevrier struggling with the difficulties imposed by the composer, with his right hand rendered immobile as if obeying the rules of some absurd game, was not without its humorous implications. If we must have a left hand concerto we suggest the following: rewrite the left hand concerto for two hands and the two hand concerto for left hand at the same time omitting the left hand and, as a happy afterthought, leaving out the orchestral score. Then we should have one good piano concerto and can we ask for more?

Never have we heard the orchestra and conductor in better form than in the Strauss. Hard indeed is it to restrain superlatives in speaking of this performance. But then, with or without the program this music instinctively calls for the best one has to offer, and in the case of our Boston Symphony, this best is sheer musical magic. Nor must we forget Richard Burgin's superb playing of the violin solo part—his beautiful phrasing, his impeccable intonation. The highest praise we can offer Mr. Burgin is to say that he is worthy to be concert-master and assistant conductor of this orchestra in which latter capacity he is to function next week.

State Symphony Orchestra

Last Sunday evening at Sanders Theater, Alexander Thiede brought the Tschaikowsky series to a close

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, opens its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Symphony Resumes Concerts After

The Gentle Art of Listening to Music

To Borrow, Undigested, the Opinions of Others Is Fatal. We Must Do Our Own Interpreting

Trans. - Nov. 20/37

By REDFERN MASON

May the gods give us the simplicity of a child and then we shall enjoy music. For music, in a sense, partakes of the kingdom of Heaven, and to enter that kingdom calls for the wonder of childhood, not the learning of the pedant. Beauty is a thing to marvel at, not an abstruse entity to be analyzed with the gravity of a scholar. To plumb the mystery of music by the processes of ratiocination is as foolish as it [illegible] to weigh the blissful [illegible] the scales of a scientist. [illegible] be thankful, for, as [illegible] waif who has not an [illegible] never been to school [illegible] a Mozart sonata or a [illegible]chard Strauss than all [illegible]er would have enabled its one time owner ever to compass.

These thoughts came to me after hearing a concert given for children in Sanders Theater a few days ago. A program was given by the Symphonic Ensemble of Boston, and the director, Russell Ames Cook, told the hundreds of little ones what the music was all about. If the speaker had been a Hans Christian Andersen, he might have made that "Mother Goose" music of Ravel as wonderful as "The Ugly Duckling" or "The Tin Soldier." As it was he succeeded in transforming the clarinet into the heroine of the fairy tale, and the gurglings of the contra bassoon did really and truly suggest the mournful beast, who, as the reader well knows, was a young prince that had been bewitched.

But what their mentor told them was nothing to what must have been awakened in their gentle fancy when, to quote Walt Whitman, they were "reminded by the instruments."

For, in music as well as in matters spiritual, salvation comes from within. That is why I am always a little incredulous of lessons in the appreciation of music. When little Gounod sat by his mother during a performance of "Don Giovanni" he did not need to be told that those menacing scales were a foreboding of doom to the wicked rake. When he saw the development of the action he had confirmation of what his imagination had divined. When the people of Buda Pesth heard Berlioz's masterly version of the "Rakoczy" march, they needed no orator to draw the lesson of insurrection that was latent in that fiery melody. The opening notes of the Fifth Symphony hardly call for Beethoven's comment that "Thus Fate knocks at the door": we know their meaning by intuition, even though we may not be able to express in words what we feel.

For music is a sort of superior language; its subject matter is the divine commonplaces of love and death. It does not need words to tell a woman that she is loved: a glance, a tone, something in the very presence of the lover tells her the whole tale.

Not that explanations of a composer's intention are useless. But they come to us with far more force if, by virtue of our mental powers, we have guessed them in the first place for ourselves. Everyone who attends the concerts of the Boston Symphony should read John N. Burk's excellent notes on the works performed. But not before the performance or while the work is being played. Neither should we be forever questioning ourselves about the meaning of the music while it is sounding in our ears. We should sit quiet and let the tones sink into our consciousness. If the music is good snatches of it will come floating back into our consciousness afterward, and with them a mood, a mind state. That mood, that state of mind, is the significance of the composition to us in our then stage of mental development. Then is the time for us to read the commenter's notes. Then they will be valuable to us; then we shall be building on the fabric of our own mentality.

A piece of music, like a novel or a poem, affects us in different ways at different stages of our aesthetic development. Camille Saint Saens, in one of his delightful essays tells us the history of his appreciation of the Schumann Piano Quintet. When first he heard it he had a head full of Tacitus and Cicero; the spell of Latin classicism was upon him. So he loathed the work. Then came a reaction; Heine and Victor Hugo had taken possession of him; the spirit of romanticism was in his blood. Then the Schumann delighted him. The pendulum had swung from one extreme to the other. Saint Saens's final judgment took a middle position; he recognized Schumann's genius; but he could not be blind to his faults.

As we grow in knowledge, we come to recognize that a composition is at once a racial document, the picture of a civilization, and a tonal autobiography. Compare the Waltzes of Chopin with his Scherzi and his Polonaises. The waltzes were salon music written for the delight of French countesses; they are of a sophisticated and cloying sweetness. In the Polonaises he revives the past chivalry of Poland; they are "cannon balls swathed in flowers": the Scherzi go deep into the tragedy of our human existence.

It is well to remember too that Wagner was a philosopher and that Hitler would have put him in a concentration camp as a dangerous radical; that the symphonies of Beethoven are social as well as musical documents.

For what words are to the poet, notes are to the musician. Their compositions are their reactions to this working day world and, if their meaning could be put in words, it would often be judged libellous, even subversive. These men do not argue; their appeal is to the emotions. Yet, because a man cannot be deeply moved without putting his feelings into the work which most nearly concerns him, so the hieroglyphs of music are often of a significance which can rather be divined than verbally interpreted.

We must judge for ourselves, never content ourselves with the dicta of others, be they never so authoritative. As the child knows from the tone of the mother's voice what she is thinking, so we must read the meaning of music. It may seem to mean different things to different people; yet, if all these impressions were synthesized in a composite tonal portrait, they would be found to harmonize.

Boston Symphony Delights New York Audience. Thousands Turned Away

Trans. Nov 20/37

Always an event of the first magnitude in the New York musical season, the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five monthly pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall brought forth a house crowded to the last standing space. It is a modest estimate that between five hundred and a thousand people who made some direct attempt to obtain places were forced to reconcile themselves with the reflection that there are symphony concerts every day of the week in this gifted city.

Dr. Koussevitzky's consummate way with Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius does not call for special attention here. Suffice it to say that the combination of volcanic emotion and classic firmness, two qualities which culminate importantly in his interpretative mastery, are not taken for granted by New Yorkers, that the concentrated drama of Beethoven and the incandescent magnificence of Sibelius fell fresh on unaccustomed ears and enthusiasms.

Making way for this long established Thursday evening from Boston, the Philharmonic-Symphony Society pushed its regular subscription concert back to Wednesday. A New York audience is always a sartorial joy, a model of freshness and grooming. If the Thursday company surpassed Wednesday's in urbanity, let us plead first night enthusiasm as a reason, bowing warmly to New York's gracious reception of her guests.

Mr. Barbirolli continues to improve. It was impossible not to recognize in this young man struggling under his last year's burdens a conductor of the first group in the making. No one can honestly believe that he has reached full maturity or is likely to in the next one or two seasons, but already the sincerity, the creative artistry, and the growing imagination may be discerned. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture was presented with required intensity, and only the slightest suggestion of forced tone, the barest improbability of tempo. If Brahms' Second Piano Concerto lost its romantic, even Italinate, lyricism for brusque precision, the fault was rather with Artur Rubinstein's playing of the solo part. Thoroughly equal to the extraordinary demands of the concerto, the pianist was more mindful of its strength than its poetry. Mr. Barbirolli alone retained Brahms' warmth, the depth of his contemplation. Only the tone quality of his woodwind matched him as ill as did Mr. Rubinstein.

Daniel Gregory Mason's "A Lincoln Symphony" which received its first performance at this concert cannot be discussed in such brief space. If it is not derivative in the sense that it reminds one of one composer or another, it is in the sense that it reminds one of all straightforward composing. A sincere character-picture of the already legendary figure, it is marred principally by the composer's program, which might more fittingly grace a ballet scenario than a symphony concert bulletin. Graceful, soundly orchestrated music, the score rises to its only height in the final movement depicting America's grief at Lincoln's death. This page must certainly rank as a milestone in the development of our nationally descriptive music.

G. H. LOVETT SMITH

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony Returns

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts First Concert of Its 52d Season in Manhattan.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

For the fifty-second time the Boston Symphony inaugurated a series of New York concerts last night, with Carnegie Hall filled for the festivity. Serge Koussevitzky, now in his fourteenth season as conductor of the famous ensemble, was extended the usual cordial welcome at his first appearance and was rousingly applauded at the conclusion of his program.

It was the same program as that which launched the orchestra's fifty-seventh year in Symphony Hall, Boston, early in October. Two symphonies were performed, one before, one after the intermission, without a curtain-raiser or a coda such as frequently is regarded as necessary for a two-symphony list. In this instance, any additional music would have been superfluous, even gratuitous.

The symphonies presented, Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Sibelius Second, proved altogether companionable. The Sibelius opus, too, might be styled "Eroica." Both scores are full of fight. Though the bardic and legendary spirit of the Finnish master's work separates it in character from the gigantic tribute which Beethoven conceived for an all-too-human hero, the poetic exaltation which informs both works, together with their largeness of line, bespeaks for them a certain kinship. Beethoven's clearly is the more personal in feeling. Sibelius's is the more national, and in the expressive nature of what it conveys the more remote in time, though composed a century later than the "Eroica."

A specialist in Sibelius, if any one is, Mr. Koussevitzky again stirred his hearers with the sweep and splendor of the second symphony's climactic finale. The brass playing was by all odds the finest Manhattan has heard this season. But it was matched by that of the woodwinds in the pastoral trio that plays such an enchanting part in the scherzo. The strings raced magically through the vivaccissimo, after some sumptuous playing in andante. This was the Boston Symphony in its best estate—the one orchestra of the season, so far, of which as much could be said at its first concert in New York. But not to be forgotten in this connection is the foreground of concerts already played in Boston.

In technical finish, the Beethoven performance was of a superior order. Highly particularized, the reading was one over which disagreements not only are possible, but inevitable. The horn trio of the scherzo was played quite as fast as Toscanini took it in his still debatable treatment of this movement. The chief theme of the allegro finale, that which figures also in the ballet, "Prometheus," and in one of the piano compositions, was given more slowly and in less militant fashion than is customary in its first statement. Details of tempi and emphasis aside, it was a joy to hear Beethoven's great striding basses sounding boldly through a tonal texture that was kept conspicuously clear. Neither symphony possessed a moment of opaqueness or muddied color. The performances were radiantly alight and propulsively alive.

---

heartedness of women who boys and girls, homeless, hel
Luncheon reservations m
3669. She will be happy to dues in full from previously-membership committee with following directors: Mrs. Sa
Diamond, Mrs. Louis Isgur, M

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall last week, Dr. Koussevitzky chose an early Mozart Symphony, the Ravel Piano Concerto for left hand, and the tone poem, "A Hero's Life", by Richard Strauss.

Mozart started his career as composer at the somewhat early age of five with several small piano compositions which are still in use today. Thus we are not unduly surprised to learn that Mozart was only eighteen when he wrote the sparkling little symphony heard last week. The work is youthful in the best sense of the word, full of fresh ardor, filled with joy of life, abounding in good humor, yet graceful and charming withal. It was in this spirit of young life that Dr. Koussevitzky attacked this work: even the Minuet was taken at too rapid a tempo.

It is an ironic fact that Ravel's Concerto for the left hand is ever so much better than the one he composed for the conventional number of hands. It must be confessed that the sight of Jacques Fevrier struggling with the difficulties imposed by the composer, with his right hand rendered immobile as if obeying the rules of some absurd game, was not without its humorous implications. If we must have a left hand concerto we suggest the following: rewrite the left hand concerto for two hands and the two hand concerto for left hand at the same time omitting the left hand and, as a happy afterthought, leaving out the orchestral score. Then we should have one good piano concerto and can we ask for more?

Never have we heard the orchestra and conductor in better form than in the Strauss. Hard indeed is it to restrain superlatives in speaking of this performance. But then, with or without the program this music instinctively calls for the best one has to offer, and in the case of our Boston Symphony, this best is sheer musical magic. Nor must we forget Richard Burgin's superb playing of the violin solo part—his beautiful phrasing, his impeccable intonation. The highest praise we can offer Mr. Burgin is to say that he is worthy to be concert-master and assistant conductor of this orchestra in which latter capacity he is to function next week.

State Symphony Orchestra

Last Sunday evening at Sanders Theater, Alexander Thiede brought the Tschaikowsky series to a close

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony Season

Jacques Fevrier Is Soloist at Brooklyn Opening Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Academy of Music. Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, will make his first New York appearance as soloist in Ravel's concerto for left hand alone. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, and Sibelius's second symphony are the other works on Serge Koussevitzky's program.

The other four concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony this season at the Academy under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a special Brooklyn sponsors' committee, will be held on Friday night, January 7; Thursday night, February 10, and Friday nights, March 11 and April 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opens its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Symphony Resumes Concerts After

The Gentle Art of Listening to Music

To Borrow, Undigested, the Opinions of Others Is Fatal. We Must Do Our Own Interpreting

Trans. Nov. 20/37

By REDFERN MASON

May the gods give us the simplicity of a child and then we shall enjoy music. For music, in a sense, partakes of the kingdom of Heaven, and to enter that kingdom calls for the wonder of childhood, not the learning of the pedant. Beauty is a thing to marvel at, not an abstruse entity to be analyzed with the gravity of a scholar. To plumb the mystery of music by the processes of ratiocination is as foolish as it would be for a lover to weigh the blissful thralldom of affection in the scales of a scientist.

And for this we may be thankful, for, as matters stand, some poor waif who has not an ounce of culture and has never been to school may find more joy in a Mozart sonata or a symphonic poem of Richard Strauss than all the wealth of Rockefeller would have enabled its one time owner ever to compass.

These thoughts came to me after hearing a concert given for children in Sanders Theater a few days ago. A program was given by the Symphonic Ensemble of Boston, and the director, Russell Ames Cook, told the hundreds of little ones what the music was all about. If the speaker had been a Hans Christian Andersen, he might have made that "Mother Goose" music of Ravel as wonderful as "The Ugly Duckling" or "The Tin Soldier." As it was he succeeded in transforming the clarinet into the heroine of the fairy tale, and the gurglings of the contra bassoon did really and truly suggest the mournful beast, who, as the reader well knows, was a young prince that had been bewitched.

But what their mentor told them was nothing to what must have been awakened in their gentle fancy when, to quote Walt Whitman, they were "reminded by the instruments."

For, in music as well as in matters spiritual, salvation comes from within. That is why I am always a little incredulous of lessons in the appreciation of music. When little Gounod sat by his mother during a performance of "Don Giovanni" he did not need to be told that those menacing scales were a foreboding of doom to the wicked rake. When he saw the development of the action he had confirmation of what his imagination had divined. When the people of Buda Pesth heard Berlioz's masterly version of the "Rakoczy" march, they needed no orator to draw the lesson of insurrection that was latent in that fiery melody. The opening notes of the Fifth Symphony hardly call for Beethoven's comment that "Thus Fate knocks at the door": we know their meaning by intuition, even though we may not be able to express in words what we feel.

For music is a sort of superior language; its subject matter is the divine commonplaces of love and death. It does not need words to tell a woman that she is loved: a glance, a tone, something in the very presence of the lover tells her the whole tale.

Not that explanations of a composer's intention are useless. But they come to us with far more force if, by virtue of our mental powers, we have guessed them in the first place for ourselves. Everyone who attends the concerts of the Boston Symphony should read John N. Burk's excellent notes on the works performed. But not before the performance or while the work is being played. Neither should we be forever questioning ourselves about the meaning of the music while it is sounding in our ears. We should sit quiet and let the tones sink into our consciousness. If the music is good snatches of it will come floating back into our consciousness afterward, and with them a mood, a mind state. That mood, that state of mind, is the significance of the composition to us in our then stage of mental development. Then is the time for us to read the commenter's notes. Then they will be valuable to us; then we shall be building on the fabric of our own mentality.

A piece of music, like a novel or a poem, affects us in different ways at different stages of our aesthetic development. Camille Saint Saens, in one of his delightful essays tells us the history of his appreciation of the Schumann Piano Quintet. When first he heard it he had a head full of Tacitus and Cicero; the spell of Latin classicism was upon him. So he loathed the work. Then came a reaction; Heine and Victor Hugo had taken possession of him; the spirit of romanticism was in his blood. Then the Schumann delighted him. The pendulum had swung from one extreme to the other. Saint Saens's final judgment took a middle position; he recognized Schumann's genius; but he could not be blind to his faults.

As we grow in knowledge, we come to recognize that a composition is at once a racial document, the picture of a civilization, and a tonal autobiography. Compare the Waltzes of Chopin with his Scherzi and his Polonaises. The waltzes were salon music written for the delight of French countesses; they are of a sophisticated and cloying sweetness. In the Polonaises he revives the past chivalry of Poland; they are "cannon balls swathed in flowers": the Scherzi go deep into the tragedy of our human existence.

It is well to remember too that Wagner was a philosopher and that Hitler would have put him in a concentration camp as a dangerous radical; that the symphonies of Beethoven are social as well as musical documents.

For what words are to the poet, notes are to the musician. Their compositions are their reactions to this working day world and, if their meaning could be put in words, it would often be judged libellous, even subversive. These men do not argue; their appeal is to the emotions. Yet, because a man cannot be deeply moved without putting his feelings into the work which most nearly concerns him, so the hieroglyphs of music are often of a significance which can rather be divined than verbally interpreted.

We must judge for ourselves, never content ourselves with the dicta of others, be they never so authoritative. As the child knows from the tone of the mother's voice what she is thinking, so we must read the meaning of music. It may seem to mean different things to different people; yet, if all these impressions were synthesized in a composite tonal portrait, they would be found to harmonize.

Boston Symphony Delights New York Audience. Thousands Turned Away

Trans. Nov 20/37

Always an event of the first magnitude in the New York musical season, the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five monthly pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall brought forth a house crowded to the last standing space. It is a modest estimate that between five hundred and a thousand people who made some direct attempt to obtain places were forced to reconcile themselves with the reflection that there are symphony concerts every day of the week in this gifted city.

Dr. Koussevitzky's consummate way with Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius does not call for special attention here. Suffice it to say that the combination of volcanic emotion and classic firmness, two qualities which culminate importantly in his interpretative mastery, are not taken for granted by New Yorkers, that the concentrated drama of Beethoven and the incandescent magnificence of Sibelius fell fresh on unaccustomed ears and enthusiasms.

Making way for this long established Thursday evening from Boston, the Philharmonic-Symphony Society pushed its regular subscription concert back to Wednesday. A New York audience is always a sartorial joy, a model of freshness and grooming. If the Thursday company surpassed Wednesday's in urbanity, let us plead first night enthusiasm as a reason, bowing warmly to New York's gracious reception of her guests.

Mr. Barbirolli continues to improve. It was impossible not to recognize in this young man struggling under his last year's burdens a conductor of the first group in the making. No one can honestly believe that he has reached full maturity or is likely to in the next one or two seasons, but already the sincerity, the creative artistry, and the growing imagination may be discerned. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture was presented with required intensity, and only the slightest suggestion of forced tone, the barest improbability of tempo. If Brahms' Second Piano Concerto lost its romantic, even Italinate, lyricism for brusque precision, the fault was rather with Artur Rubinstein's playing of the solo part. Thoroughly equal to the extraordinary demands of the concerto, the pianist was more mindful of its strength than its poetry. Mr. Barbirolli alone retained Brahms' warmth, the depth of his contemplation. Only the tone quality of his woodwind matched him as ill as did Mr. Rubinstein.

Daniel Gregory Mason's "A Lincoln Symphony" which received its first performance at this concert cannot be discussed in such brief space. If it is not derivative in the sense that it reminds one of one composer or another, it is in the sense that it reminds one of all straightforward composing. A sincere character-picture of the already legendary figure, it is marred principally by the composer's program, which might more fittingly grace a ballet scenario than a symphony concert bulletin. Graceful, soundly orchestrated music, the score rises to its only height in the final movement depicting America's grief at Lincoln's death. This page must certainly rank as a milestone in the development of our nationally descriptive music.

G. H. LOVETT SMITH

Rachmaninoff Concert;

Serge Rachmaninoff, distinguished Russian pianist and composer, who will give a recital at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28.

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct this week's concerts at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and the Cambridge concert at Sanders Theater on Thursday evening.

Criticism and the Classics; William Walton's Advice

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

If anybody happened to read the interesting "entr'acte" in Mr. Burk's Boston Symphony program book of Nov. 12 and 13, we have not yet caught the echoes of any surprise at the views therein expressed by the talented English composer, William Walton. Walton is considered to be a white hope of modern music by many authorities in England. Here we have heard his "Portsmouth Point" overture and his oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast;" but we have yet to hear his probably more important symphony, his Viola Concerto and other works. At any rate his opinions on the art of music have a right to be respected and his advice the fair-play of sober reflection.

For the benefit of those who may have passed over Mr. Walton's contribution to the business of musical criticism in its most general sense, we shall re-quote the article's most significant passage: "I think Stravinsky would probably concede that a genuine composition had its own peculiar vitality, its musical personality; its own special aesthetic flavor, that makes a work characteristically Chopin, say, or Beethoven, or Elgar. It is only inability to savor any such aesthetic flavor in the work of Brahms that prevents me from enjoying any but a few small works by that composer. There is something wrong, and I am sure it is not the music. Indeed, unless we feel that the quality is really cheap or the construction bad, we are not justified in condemning a work because we do not like it or even dislike it. If a work is masterly in construction, only a consensus of adverse opinion can condemn it aesthetically. An individual in such a case can only like or dislike."

There are so many points of possible dispute and agreement in this short paragraph of Mr. Walton's, that we had better take up the most particular and most perplexing before proceeding to the general. On this point there are three statements: A. I only like a few works of Brahms. B. I take this position because I fail to detect a sufficient vitality or personality to make it genuine for my aesthetic purposes. C. Something is wrong, though the music itself is not at fault. Presumably we may dismiss the notion that Mr. Walton considers himself wrong or that he feels he has no right to his own opinion, for otherwise he would have not bothered with statements A and B. Presumably, too, the music is not wrong, because it can boast a masterly construction. It is, then, that vitalizing spirit, the apparent or real lack of which is the stumbling block for any exercise of personal taste.

Mr. Walton is not the only cultivated contemporary to suggest that Brahms is something less than the supreme master, which is the position—it must be admitted—that he generally occupies today. Mr. Ernest Newman devoted a long and serious article, by no means to be dismissed as merely perverse, in the course of which he arrived at somewhat the same conclusion. There is no reason, of course, why Brahms should not come in for the same kind of fierce discussion that has long raged around Wagner. You can find many people today who are out of sympathy with Wagner, though not for the reasons of horrid cacophony advanced by such an amateur as Ruskin.

We have purposely avoided giving a personal opinion of our own on this subject for other reasons implied in Mr. Walton's article. He says in effect that criticism must be personal. This is a fair enough view, until one becomes a professional reviewer and must attend all the important concerts and many of the unimportant events on the local scene. Particularly is it difficult in addition if tradition works against the use of the first person singular. An objective example is of us here. If a critic goes to a great number of piano recitals, he is bound to hear Chopin on almost all of them. Very likely he will grow weary of that composer, whose qualities he would appreciate if they were less often forced on his attention. Would he do right to cry out with Mr. Walton: "I do not like this composer any more. For me his poetry has turned to ashes; away with him and all his works. But mind you there is nothing wrong with his music as such, for it is well put together. It is only that I no longer detect a vitalizing force."

Well, it might wash. After a while, however, his readers might get a bit tired of such critical technique. They might ask who this man was that he went about discovering and rejecting "vitality" in music as though his pen were a divining rod. And later, perhaps, the bolder spirits might ambush him outside his office one dark night and compel him to eat his words. (This is precisely what was done to a film critic by Mr. James Cagney in one of his earlier pictures; and it was only after we had come out onto the busy street that we recovered from the shock and arrived at the comforting reflection that Mr. Cagney's brutality was still fiction.)

If we have ended by making light of Mr. Walton's advice, it is because he propounds, when all is said and done, one of the familiar impasses of criticism. The old autocratic criticism, which delivered its judgment from on high, is probably gone for good, because these opinions read so foolishly in the light of later events and reversals. It is doubtful, on the other hand, if the public vastly prefers the literary critic who hails a masterpiece a week and saves you the trouble of reading the book by filling up his column with the plot. Musical criticism is lucky in not having the latter pitfall and not having yet grown so lazy as to indulge in the former extravagance.

MUSICAL LEADER

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Reviewed by Gail Kubik

~~Trinity Court, 175 Dartmouth, Boston, Mass.~~ 44 [illegible] CAMBRIDGE

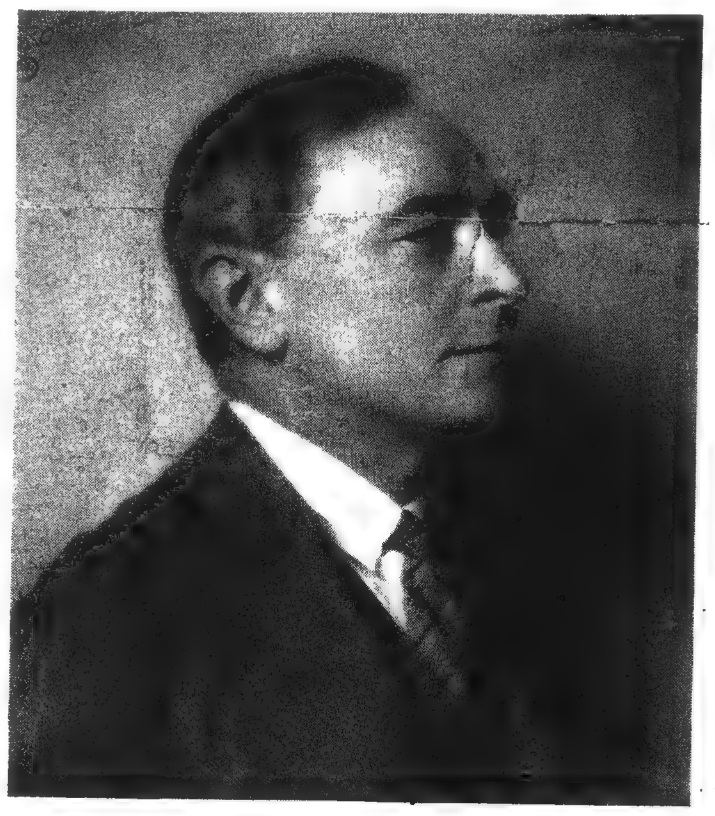
Koussevitzky Plays Contemporary Works

Boston concertgoers are not satisfied with merely hearing music. Especially numerous this season are lecture courses dealing with current programs and general music appreciation. Quite possibly Harvard University may have been an influence in this direction. The Harvard division of music has concentrated upon the historical and theoretical branches of music. Her faculty includes such men as Edward Burlingame Hill, Edward Ballantine, Archibald Davidson, G. Wallace Woodworth, and Hugo Leichtentritt whose approach to music is historical or musicological. Walter Piston, chairman of the department, Arthur Merritt and E. B. Hill have charge of the work in Theory. Whether or not we concede major credit to the University for the prevalent analytical approach to the concert season, the advanced taste of Boston music lovers is reflected in the uncommonly high standard of programs listed.

For instance: Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-reliefs" and Roussel's Symphony No. 3 were heard, together with Gieseking's playing of Beethoven's E-flat concerto. At the Boston Symphony concerts Oct. 29-30, the Roussel, certainly the more significant of the orchestral works, was repeated Nov. 4 in the second of the series at Harvard's Sander's Theatre in Cambridge. But that's only a small part of the Symphony's championship of the contemporary writer- witness its second program, which was made up of Prokofieff and Strauss. The Strauss of "Don Juan" or "Death and Transfiguration" may not be "contemporary," but the fact that Koussevitzky has, to date, played only one concert that did not contain at least one modern score is indicative of the distance Boston has traveled artistically.

State Symphony Presents Music by Bostonians

cere piece of music. Dr. Koussevitzky's performance Oct. 23 was completely in the spirit of the music. Excerpts from Wagner were also heard, with Mack Harrell, baritone, as soloist. Mr. Harrell did a good job in music from "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Walkure." His enunciation was splendid and his intonation exceptionally good.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Rachmaninoff Concert; B

Serge Rachmaninoff, distinguished Russian pianist and composer, who will give a recital at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28.

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct this week's concerts at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and the Cambridge concert at Sanders Theater on Thursday evening.

Criticism and the Classics; William Walton's Advice

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

If anybody happened to read the interesting "entr'acte" in Mr. Burk's Boston Symphony program book of Nov. 12 and 13, we have not yet caught the echoes of any surprise at the views therein expressed by the talented English composer, William Walton. Walton is considered to be a white hope of modern music by many authorities in England. Here we have heard his "Portsmouth Point" overture and his oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast;" but we have yet to hear his probably more important symphony, his Viola Concerto and other works. At any rate his opinions on the art of music have a right to be respected and his advice the fair-play of sober reflection.

For the benefit of those who may have passed over Mr. Walton's contribution to the business of musical criticism in its most general sense, we shall re-quote the article's most significant passage: "I think Stravinsky would probably concede that a genuine composition had its own peculiar vitality, its musical personality; its own special aesthetic flavor, that makes a work characteristically Chopin, say, or Beethoven, or Elgar. It is only inability to savor any such aesthetic flavor in the work of Brahms that prevents me from enjoying any but a few small works by that composer. There is something wrong, and I am sure it is not the music. Indeed, unless we feel that the quality is really cheap or the construction bad, we are not justified in condemning a work because we do not like it or even dislike it. If a work is masterly in construction, only a consensus of adverse opinion can condemn it aesthetically. An individual in such a case can only like or dislike."

There are so many points of possible dispute and agreement in this short paragraph of Mr. Walton's, that we had better take up the most particular and most perplexing before proceeding to the general. On this point there are three statements: A. I only like a few works of Brahms. B. I take this position because I fail to detect a sufficient vitality or personality to make it genuine for my aesthetic purposes. C. Something is wrong, though the music itself is not at fault. Presumably we may dismiss the notion that Mr. Walton considers himself wrong or that he feels he has no right to his own opinion, for otherwise he would have not bothered with statements A and B. Presumably, too, the music is not wrong, because it can boast a masterly construction. It is, then, that vitalizing spirit, the apparent or real lack of which is the stumbling block for any exercise of personal taste.

Mr. Walton is not the only cultivated contemporary to suggest that Brahms is something less than the supreme master, which is the position—it must be admitted—that he generally occupies today. Mr. Ernest Newman devoted a long and serious article, by no means to be dismissed as merely perverse, in the course of which he arrived at somewhat the same conclusion. There is no reason, of course, why Brahms should not come in for the same kind of fierce discussion that has long raged around Wagner. You can find many people today who are out of sympathy with Wagner, though not for the reasons of horrid cacophony advanced by such an amateur as Ruskin.

We have purposely avoided giving a personal opinion of our own on this subject for other reasons implied in Mr. Walton's article. He says in effect that criticism must be personal. This is a fair enough view, until one becomes a professional reviewer and must attend all the important concerts and many of the unimportant events on the local scene. Particularly is it difficult in addition if tradition works against the use of the first person singular. An objective example is of us here. If a critic goes to a great number of piano recitals, he is bound to hear Chopin on almost all of them. Very likely he will grow weary of that composer, whose qualities he would appreciate if they were less often forced on his attention. Would he do right to cry out with Mr. Walton: "I do not like this composer any more. For me his poetry has turned to ashes; away with him and all his works. But mind you there is nothing wrong with his music as such, for it is well put together. It is only that I no longer detect a vitalizing force."

Well, it might wash. After a while, however, his readers might get a bit tired of such critical technique. They might ask who this man was that he went about discovering and rejecting "vitality" in music as though his pen were a divining rod. And later, perhaps, the bolder spirits might ambush him outside his office one dark night and compel him to eat his words. (This is precisely what was done to a film critic by Mr. James Cagney in one of his earlier pictures; and it was only after we had come out onto the busy street that we recovered from the shock and arrived at the comforting reflection that Mr. Cagney's brutality was still fiction.)

If we have ended by making light of Mr. Walton's advice, it is because he propounds, when all is said and done, one of the familiar impasses of criticism. The old autocratic criticism, which delivered its judgment from on high, is probably gone for good, because these opinions read so foolishly in the light of later events and reversals. It is doubtful, on the other hand, if the public vastly prefers the literary critic who hails a masterpiece a week and saves you the trouble of reading the book by filling up his column with the plot. Musical criticism is lucky in not having the latter pitfall and not having yet grown so lazy as to indulge in the former extravagance.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Reviewed by Gail Kubik

~~Trinity Court, 175 Dartmouth, Boston, Mass.~~ 44 KIRKLAND ST
CAMBRIDG

Koussevitzky Plays Contemporary Works

Boston concertgoers are not satisfied with merely hearing music. Especially numerous this season are lecture courses dealing with current programs and general music appreciation. Quite possibly Harvard University may have been an influence in this direction. The Harvard division of music has concentrated upon the historical and theoretical branches of music. Her faculty includes such men as Edward Burlingame Hill, Edward Ballantine, Archibald Davidson, G. Wallace Woodworth, and Hugo Leichtentritt, whose approach to music is historical or musicological. Walter Piston, chairman of the department, Arthur Merritt and E. B. Hill have charge of the work in Theory. Whether or not we concede major credit to the University for the prevalent analytical approach to the concert season, the advanced taste of Boston music lovers is reflected in the uncommonly high standard of programs listed.

For instance: Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-reliefs" and Roussel's Symphony No. 3 were heard, together with Gieseking's playing of Beethoven's E-flat concerto. At the Boston Symphony concerts Oct. 29-30, the Roussel, certainly the more significant of the orchestral works, was repeated Nov. 4 in the second of the series at Harvard's Sander's Theatre in Cambridge. But that's only a small part of the Symphony's championship of the contemporary writer—witness its second program, which was made up of Prokofieff and Strauss. The Strauss of "Don Juan" or "Death and Transfiguration" may not be "contemporary," but the fact that Koussevitzky has, to date, played only one concert that did not contain at least one modern score is indicative of the distance Boston has traveled artistically.

State Symphony Presents Music by Bostonians

cere piece of music. Dr. Koussevitzky's performance Oct. 23 was completely in the spirit of the music. Excerpts from Wagner were also heard, with Mack Harrell, baritone, as soloist. Mr. Harrell did a good job in music from "Die

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Meistersinger" and "Die Walkure." His enunciation was splendid and his intonation exceptionally good.

PROKOFIEFF MUSIC AT CARNEGIE HALL

'Lieutenant Kije' Played for First Time in New York by Boston Orchestra

'HELDENLEBEN' ALSO GIVEN

Nov. 21/37

Jacques Fevrier, the Soloist, Is Heard in Ravel's Piano Concerto for Left Hand

N.Y. Times

By OLIN DOWNES

Two works were played for the first time in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon. They were the orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," op. 60, of Prokofieff, and Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand alone, in one movement. These pieces were played with the most exceptional finish and brilliancy, and the concert ended with a memorable reading of Strauss's "Heldenleben." The soloist in the performance of the Ravel concerto was Jacques Fevrier.

Prokfieff's music was composed for a film, which parodied the times of the Czar and his servile courtiers. It was produced in Leningrad in 1933. This should be good film music, eminently suitable, in its satiricol, tongue-in-the-cheek manner, to the subject. In concert it is rather thin stuff, though it gave players of the orchestra some special opportunities to show their skill.

In a certain way Ravel's concerto has relation to this music of Prokofieff, partly because of some of its harmonic texture, but more for the fact that it, too, is rather exterior, stylistic species of composition. The concerto ante-dated the Prokofieff score by a year, for it was first heard when it was played by Paul Wittgenstein, the left one-armed pianist, in Vienna in 1932. He had specifically ordered a composition for the left hand, with orchestra, from Ravel. The two quarreled over the piece when it was completed. This writer remembers a conversation with Ravel in Paris a few months after the first performance, when he was still excited, and, gesticulating, cried out, "Je ne suis pas l'esclave du pianist." Whether or not Wittgenstein relished the extremely difficult writing for the piano and the sometimes loud orchestration, it can be said that Mr. Fevrier played the music in a masterful fashion yesterday, and that the score demonstrated again Ravel's amazing capacity to make something out of almost nothing and do it like the consummate craftsman that he is.

The Boston program book tells us Henry Prunieres's opinion of the work. Prunieres found sentiment, romantic feeling, lyrical flow in the music. If those things are in it, "romantic" and "lyrical" are different things than we thought they were. It is a corruscating piece. Performed as it was yesterday, by Mr. Fevrier, who is the son of the composer of "Monna Vanna" and other works, it made an agreeable effect, and was cordially applauded. It is admirable for its polish, color, esprit, and, we find, quite empty of feeling or of any warm impression.

The reading of Heldenleben was one of astonishing beauty, clarity and poetical feeling. It would not be easy for one ignorant of the score to imagination, in the first place, that even a Strauss could make a remarkable structure of music from such a naïvely personal conception as that of a hero (Richard Strauss); his enemies (the critics); his courtship of his beloved (Mrs. Strauss); the terrible battle between the hero, who shouts ustily as the snarling critical crew fly before him, and is finally revealed in an attitude of prayer, following the confusion of his enemies; and the hero's "works of peace" (Strauss's compositions, freely quoted from in the score); and the hero's apotheosis, to a strain of the magnificent sunrise music from "Zarathustra."

But when the score is interpreted with understanding and imagination and when, in addition to these qualities, the beauty and distinction given it by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men are present, the listener sits absorbed and draws a deep breath and realizes that it does not matter what inspired music, when it is written by a great and inspired composer.

The love music soared and glowed; the amazing counterpoint of Strouss was clear in every port, no matter how complicated the passage. The battle was a conflict of musical forces and dramatic in other ways than those of voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky again treated details in his own way, and he is a musician who has earned the right to his conception of scores through long and objective study. The long applause was that of a deeply impressed audience.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 20 1937

Boston Symphony Season Opened

First of Music Series Attended by Society Last Night

Brooklyn's most important music series opened last evening at the Academy of Music when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the 52d season in the borough. Society attended en masse, obviously enthusiastic about the splendid program and enjoying the opportunity of meeting friends in the popular opera house. The absence of opera in Brooklyn this season makes the symphony of even more importance. The concerts are given under the ouspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sindersen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey was hostess in the box of the Brooklyn Committee and her guests were Judge and Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Dr. and Mrs. Griswold D. Nammack, Mr. and Mrs. James Loughran Hand, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Phillips and Col. Alfred C. B. McNevin.

Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, entertained as her box guests Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport and Hamilton Preston. Mrs. Good entertained at dinner at her residence, 800 St. Mark's Ave., before the concert.

Admiral and Mrs. Clark Woodward were box guests to Mrs. Myrick Rogers, Capt. R. A. Koch, Capt. and Mrs. Robert E. Hoyt, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Spence and Mr. and Mrs. Edward O. Bogert.

With Mrs. Benjamin Prince as her box guests were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fitch, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Hilhalenaowf, Mrs. William Steorns Cooney and Theodore Fitch.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne entertained in her box for Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett, Mrs. J. M. Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohne, Miss Lucille Fawcett, Judge Lewis L. Fawcett and J. C. Fawcett.

Dr. and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives were box hosts to Dr. and Mrs. Earl H. Mayne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Holmes Paine and Mr. and Mrs. John C. Faulkner.

In the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association box were Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Field Scott.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, opened his 12th season in Brooklyn with last night's concert and was warmly welcomed by the audience. Jacques Fevrier was the guest soloist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 20 1937

Brooklyn Society Attends Concert

With a large audience in attendance, the fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn opened last night at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the board of trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Box holders included Mrs. Thomas Murray Jr., Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. William H. Good, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives and Admiral Clark Woodward.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey was the hostess in the box of the Brooklyn committee at the concert. Her guests included Judge and Mrs. Franklin M. Taylor, Dr. and Mrs. Griswald D. Nammack, Mr. and Mrs. James Laughran Hand, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Phillips and Col. Alfred C. B. McNevin.

In the box with Mrs. Good, who is vice-chairman of the Brooklyn committee, were Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Hamilton Preston. Mrs. Good entertained at dinner at her home, 880 St. Marks avenue, preceding the concert.

Guests of Admiral and Mrs. Woodward were Mrs. Myrick Rogers, Capt. R. A. Koch, Capt. and Mrs. Robert E. Hoyt, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Spence and Mr. and Mrs. Edward O. Bogert.

In the box with Mrs. Prince were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fitch, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Milhalenaowf, Mrs. William Stearns Cooney and Theodore Fitch.

Box guests of Mrs. Osborne were Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett, Mrs. J. M. Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohne, Miss Lucille Fawcett, Justice Lewis L. Fawcett and J. C. Fawcett.

Dr. and Mrs. Ives had in their box Dr. and Mrs. Earle H. Mayne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Holmes Paine and Mr. and Mrs. John C. Faulkner.

In the box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association were Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Fields Scott.

The four remaining performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be on the following dates: Friday evening, January 7, Thursday evening, February 10, Friday evening, March 11 and Friday evening, April 1.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1937

l Musicians --- News of

Boston Symphony's New York Visit Is a Brilliant Triumph

Audiences Are Enthusiastic and Scribes Warm in Their Appreciation of Performance

That the visit of the Boston Symphony and the work it did under the direction of Serge Kossevitzky was a success may be gathered from the cordial newspaper records.

Says Lawrence Gilman in the Herald Tribune:

The instrumentalists from the zone of the East Wind were never more admired and renowned in the metropolis than they are today. Their reputation is prodigious. Places at their concerts are almost unobtainable. The audiences that gather to hear them in Carnegie Hall are the cream of New York's concert-going public. Their enthusiasm is thunderous, electric and unfailing. Fortunate indeed is the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this fourteenth year of the reign of Serge the First!

Its state of felicity is deserved. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra are models of dignity, expertness, and fine taste. Their programs are seldom or never dull, and certainly never maladroit. The orchestra is always on its mettle, and the occasions when it has not played admirably are difficult to recall.

The reasons for this condition of symphonic beatitude are many, and this is not the place nor the time for their recital. The facts alleged are sufficiently remarkable; and none should be happier about them than the music-lovers of our town, who enjoy the opportunity, on ten occasions in the course of each season, to observe and enjoy and wonder over a concert-giving enterprise which appear to function with unlapsing effectiveness.

Here is the testimony of Olin Downes in the Times:

The transparency of the tone, the texture of it, the justness of pitch, the sensitiveness and flexibility of style were newly realized. For sheer sound this concert would have been a refreshing and stimulating experience.

The program was a simple one, and very effective. It consisted of two symphonies, the first one being possibly the greatest ever written—Beethoven's "Eroica"; the second, the wildly dramatic symphony of Sibelius.

The reading of Beethoven varied from the last performance of the "Eroica" given by Dr. Koussevitzky in this city. It was more rugged, more virile intentionally. It echoed Beethoven's virility and brusquerie. There were some passing variations of tempo, as with the second theme, with which details the listener might or might not agree. That is unimportant by the side of the power and imagination with which the music was treated.

The orchestra sounded this music (the Sibelius) magnificently. The excitement of the last two movements that join together mounted, to the very end, which Mr. Koussevitzky made especially broad and mighty, with the plagal close that shouts defiance under the skies. Then came the public demonstration.

In the Sun Oscar Thompson wrote: :

In technical finish, the Beethoven performance was of a superior order. Highly particularized, the reading was one over which disagreements not only are possible, but inevitable. The chief theme of the allegro finale, that which figures also in the ballet, "Prometheus," and in one of the piano compositions, was given more slowly and in less militant fashion than is customary in its first statement. Details of tempi and emphasis aside, it was a joy to hear Beethoven's great striding basses sounding boldy through a tonal texture that was kept conspicuously clear. Neither symphony possessed a moment of opaqueness or muddied color. The performances were radiantly alight and propulsively alive.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American
NOV 21 1937

Fevrier Scores Triumph With Boston Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT.

A musical entente by Russian, French and German composers was noted at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The second of these was double-starred in Ravel's Concerto for left hand, featuring Jacques Fevrier as piano soloist.

The concert was ushered in with Prokofieff's Orchestral Suite, "Lieutenant Kije," originally composed as incidental music for a motion picture of the same title. It is intended to depict an amusing incident in the life of Czar Paul the First and revolves around court, military and romantic happiness, the score eloquently reflecting those various and varied phases.

Well constructed on typical Slavic themes, borrowing a little from Strumensky and culling a few cadences from Smelana, the suite was an intriguing number ranging from rugged to gentle pages and performed with imagination and sensitiveness under the lucid direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Fevrier is the talented son of the well-known French composer, Henri Fevrier, and his remarkable reading of the Ravel work was the sensation of the afternoon. The concerto was not unfamiliar locally, having been introduced here three years ago by Paul Wiltgenstein, the one-armed pianist. The composition's tremendous exactions in technique and finger problems found yesterday's interpreter most accomplished and capable. He won the acclaim of the audience and was generously applauded. Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" brought the program to a close.

YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD - STATESMAN
NOV 23 1937

FIRST WOMAN CONDUCTOR

For the first time in its 57 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS BRILLIANTLY AT CARNEGIE

N.Y. Post
Nov. 19/37

The Boston Symphony is with us again and musical New York signified its joy in the event by turning out last night in gala de gala, filling Carnegie Hall to the last bit of standing room and remaining after the concert's close to cheer Mr. Koussevitzky and his incomparable musicians.

Two staples of the symphonic repertory composed almost a century apart made up the program. They were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Sibelius's Second.

We have heard more heroic interpretations of the "Eroica" than Mr. Koussevitzky's, but he gave last night a closely knit performance with wonderful grasp of Beethoven's architecture and at the same time with the subtilest shading of dynamics and modeling of the melodic line. The dirge of the famous second movement was so restrained as to be almost objective. Yet it achieved a depth that might have been denied to a purely emotional approach, thus proving again that classicism has its place even in the interpretation of Beethoven's so-called romantic works.

In spite of the chronological abyss that separates the Beethoven from the Sibelius, it was interesting last night to see how much they had in common.

The latter work was particularly well designed to show the prowess of the famous Boston winds. Here again Koussevitzky was restrained, cunningly emphasizing the darker colors in the composer's palette until he came to the exultant peroration of the final movement. There at last he unleashed all the orchestral splendor at his disposal, and listeners knew that the Boston Symphony was with us again.

Their next concert is tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

E. D.

(63)

Musicians --- News of

Conductor and Orchestra in America's Windy City

New Violin Concerto by John Alden Carpenter Presented in First Performance

By Moses Smith

CHICAGO, Ill. (By Mail)—What is immediately apparent about the Chicago Symphony Orchestra is its institutional character, even though it is "only" in its forty-seventh season. This is made evident by many indications. There have been, for example, in all that period only two conductors—Theodore Thomas, now a legend in American orchestral music, who founded the orchestra in 1891 and conducted it until 1905, and Frederick Stock, who has been the conductor since then. The impression of an institution is conveyed by the management of the Orchestra and of Orchestral Hall, which it owns. It is strengthened by the kind of thinking that dominates the artistic, executive and financial direction.

Because of this institutional character the Chicago Orchestra is difficult to describe adequately in a single article. The task is made the easier, though, when it is a question of writing for Bostonians, because the Chicago Orchestra has thus so much in common with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both in the direction of the Orchestra and in the character and habits of the audiences there is evidently in Chicago the same healthy conservatism in which Bostonians are prone to take considerable pride. Chicagoans have come to take their symphonic music and Orchestra for granted, without (as so frequently happens) losing their capacity for enjoyment.

It is impossible to talk at any length with either Mr. Stock or Henry E. Voegeli, the manager, without discovering a refreshing lack of gadgets and doodads—psychological as well as material—which are all too frequent on the American scene. Their directness is healthy. If they have something to say, they say it precisely and sparingly, without flourish or inuendo or disguise. There is a similar economy in the operation of the institution. The financial statement published at the beginning of this season, for instance, shows that the total operating expenses for a season containing roughly 100 concerts amount to a little more than $300,000, even after a rental of Orchestral Hall (on which the Orchestral Association continues to make a profit) has been charged.

The hall itself is a lovely place, like home to the visiting Bostonian. There is nothing of the ornateness or superficial spaciousness of modern American auditoriums in this theater-like hall, which was built a few years after Symphony Hall in Boston. Yet its main floor, horseshoe of boxes and two balconies have more than 2500 seats, like Symphony Hall again. The chairs are comfortable without inducing slumber; and there is ample leg-room, a condition that is not always true in more recently constructed, if more lavish, auditoriums. In shape, style and decorations there is a warm simplicity about Orchestral Hall, which is wider than Symphony Hall, as it seems, and certainly not nearly so long.

The shape of the hall is naturally reflected in its acoustical properties, as the present writer had an opportunity to observe in a Young People's concert last Wednesday afternoon, a regular subscription concert on Thursday evening and part of the Thursday morning rehearsal. The difference in resonance is due, to a certain extent, to the different characters of the two orchestras, as determined by their respecive conductors. On the other hand, there seems to be a sharper differentiation among the instruments in Orchestral Hall than in Symphony Hall; and this may again be partly explained by the varying demands of the two conductors.

The Thursday night concert was the sixth of the season, which runs to twenty-eight weeks. The matinee concerts, repeating the Thursday night programs, occur, as almost everywhere else among leading American orchestras, on Fridays. There is another series of ten Tuesday afternoons; the Orchestra gives popular concerts on alternate Saturday evenings; six concerts are given for youngsters. Ten concerts are given in Milwaukee. And finally the Orchestra gives occasional concerts in suburbs and nearby cities. It is some years since it has undertaken extensive tours.

The program for this Thursday night concert was perhaps as representative of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's repertory as a single program is likely to be. For beginning there was Toch's "Pinocchio," subtitled "A Merry Overture," and merry, indeed, it was, the passages tumbling over one another helter-skelter in a most exhilarating fashion. It was followed by "A Romantic Suite," by Reger, the close of the first movement being marked by a dignified (and perhaps a little ironic?) little speech of Mr. Stock, to the effect that the music-making would pause while late-comers were seated. It is fine, moving music, not the less because it was written by someone on a level below the great masters. Mr. Stock has made it a point to give periodic representation to composers who, with a sneer, might be dubbed second-rate. He is to be commended for the procedure. The notion that there is room in a symphony concert only for masterpieces of the past or for works of dubious merit that happen to be new or unfamiliar—this notion can be as stifling to artistic culture and progress as indiscriminating devotion to mediocrity.

For a similar reason this visitor was not "shocked," as a purist might be, by a Concert Waltz (No. 2, in F major) of Glazounov that ended the program. Those whose artistic souls could not bear contact with a mere waltz after communion with more serious music might leave the concert-hall just before the waltz began. and some did. But most of the audience that took most of the seats in Orchestra Hall stayed to listen and applaud.

Surrounding the intermission were two works enlisting the services of the soloist, Zlatko Balokovic, a violinist out of Jugoslavia. The first work was John Alden Carpenter's new Violin Concerto, in first performance anywhere. The other was Bach's E major Concerto. Mr. Balokovic turned out to be a competent performer, possessed of the necessary abilities and graces of a virtuoso violinist, although why the Chicago audience went more or less wild over his playing the present writer was unable to comprehend. Perhaps it was local pride or something; Mr. Balokovic has, it appears, some Chicago "connections." It is also possible that the attestant was prejudiced more than he should have been by the violinist's excessive vibrato, which amounted frequently, in practice, to a whine.

This fact may also have operated against sympathetic reception of Mr. Carpenter's new work, which seemed unduly sentimental. With a more straightforward performance the music might have made a more uniformly favorable impression on the present writer. The Concerto is in a single movement consisting of the usual three or four symphonic divisions — according to how one classifies (at first impression) the numerous changes of tempo. In general this writer liked the fast sections, with their animated passage-work and jazzy syncopation, better than the slow ones, where Carpenter, obviously meaning to be profound and touching, did not quite succeed. Another hearing, though, might tell another tale.

The Chicagoan concert-goers have an admirable orchestra and a first-rate conductor. As has already become thrice-obvious on the writer's present journey, it is nonsense to consider one apart from the other. If the Chicago Orchestra has not the brilliance and color of the Boston Orchestra it is very likely because the Chicagoan conductor has a different personality and set of values from those of his Bostonian colleague. Stock is one of your musicians for whom the lines must be clear, the phrases carefully moulded, the rhythmic and formal outlines exact. He is obviously fussy, too, about intonation and balance among the instrumental choirs.

Thus it is clear that the Chicago Orchestra occupies a high place among American orchestras—much higher than this writer had believed before he heard it. And if it has not, say, the fire of the Boston Orchestra, it has a certain kind of warmth which for some music—like the Reger Suite—is perhaps better suited than are the brighter hues of the Boston Orchestra. On the side of technical precision and polish there is no fault to be found; and in this regard the Chicago Orchestra is the peer of the big three Eastern orchestras. In the same way, it has a conductor of superlative technic and musicianship, whom nothing seemingly escapes.

Mr. Burgin Takes the Baton for the Holiday Concerts

The Arts in Boston

According to custom. Richard Burgin is relieving Dr. Koussevitzky of his baton for this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following the first visit of the season to New York. And in pursuit of his own habit, Mr. Burgin has arranged an interesting program for his holiday audiences.

The first item is Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, in B flat major, as edited by Felix Mottl. Probably many were surprised yesterday to find under it the notation, "First performance at these concerts." Yet stop and think: is it not likely that there is a good reason why this work has not been played before by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that Mr. Burgin, besides being more inquisitive than his predecessors on the Boston podium, is also less discreet?

And indeed it seems evident. after listening to it, that other conductors must have avoided the piece because it is so definitely a chamber work, ill adapted to a large auditorium. Bach wrote it for two viole da braccia, two viole da gamba, one cello and a doublebass, with harpsichord continuo. Mottl gave the solo parts to two violas and three cellos, and reinforced them by conbining them in unison with the corresponding string choirs (reduced).

But the tone of these instruments, even as reinforced, is not heard to advantage in the open spaces of Symphony Hall; it cries out for a small room. Thus. while we could admire the characteristic Bachian quality of the score from the viewpoint of composition, we missed the fullness of tone that should have voiced the music. Within these unavoidable restrictions. the performance was admirable.

The name of Marcel Poot is strange to Bostonians and probably to most Americans. He is a Belgian, 36 years old. His Symphony, written in 1929, is being played this week by the Boston orchestra for the first time in America. Of his other works, apparently only an overture. played last year by the National Orchestral Association (a training group), had been heard in this country.

The symphony is in three movements, an Allegro vivo in the mood of a scherzo, a brief Andante and a final Rondo marked "Jazz-allegro," which employs a saxophone in addition to an already large assemblage of instruments. The symphony is not important, but it is amusing, and the Andante, which is rather charming, has the fillip of a scherzo-like interlude in the woodwind. It is possible that M. Poot wrote this music with his tongue in his cheek, especially the last movement, which at times seemed clearly satiric. Anyhow, the work was suited to the holiday mood.

For conclusion, the Symphony in B flat by Chausson, of which Mr. Burgin seems to have become custodian. He first revived it six years ago. Dr. Koussevitszky has never played it in Boston. Evidently it must be placed with the works of Vaughan Williams and a few other composers in the small category of compositions which do not appeal to this conductor of Catholic tastes.

We believe that Mr. Burgin is well advised to keep the symphony in the active list. Although the listener is tempted to count in it the references to Wagner and to Franck, in order to determine which predominates, nevertheless, the work is broadly conceived, its thematic language is salient and its message is well and fully, if not originally, stated. Chausson's fame is not helped by vaguely rhapsodical tributes like that of M. Jean-Aubry which is printed in the program book. For his music is not so anemic as such mistaken praise would lead us to expect. L. A. S.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

NOV 27 1937

race has been won.

* * *

AFTER the Moussorgsky music, "Todtentanz" (Dance of Death) by Liszt sounds showy, glittering and artificial. This brief concerto in the form of a theme from the Mass for the Dead, recorded for RCA-Victor by Jesus Maria Sanroma, and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler is played in a style transcending its colossal difficulty.

Pianists, in particular, will marvel at the manner in which Mr. Sanroma hurdles technical pitfalls with inimitable grace. His way of romping up and down the keyboard, rippling off scales at headlong speed and dazzling staccato passages, sounding massive chords arouses the enthusiasm to a torrid heat.

Jussi Bjoerling, Swedish tenor, in recordings of "La Donna E Mobile" from Verdi's "Rigoletto" and "Recondita Armonia" from Puccini's "Tosca" displays a voice of brilliance, power and expressiveness.

Faure's "Elegie", another RCA Victor record, is nobly and expressively sung by Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitzky, conducting.

COURIER

Realm Of Music

(By Gladys St. Clair Heistad)

The announcement of the 57th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra reaches me in a very attractive form, a leaflet affair featuring a stunning picture of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Koussevitzky will again assemble in the course of the season the great symphonic works of the past and the present—those which are familiar by the warrant of their greatness, and those which deserve more familiarity by the qualities they possess. The foremost concertos, too, will have their place. these affording opportunity to hear to the finest advantage the world's first pianists and violinists. These will appear with the Orchestra:

PEEKSKILL, N. Y.
EVENING STAR

NOV 26 1937

First Woman Conductor

For the first time in its 57 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

B. Trans. Nov. 27/37

EMMA BOYNET
French pianist, soloist at the Boston Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday

---

Edward Burlingame Hill's New Symphony to Be Heard Next Week

Trans. Nov. 27/37

Edward Burlingame Hill's new Third Symphony will be played for the first times at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Koussevitzky, returning to the conductor's stand, will also direct presentations of Haydn's Symphony in G major (No. 88), Respighi's transcription of the Bach Organ Passacaglia and the Mozart Piano Concerto in C major (K. 467). In the latter work Emma Boynet, French pianist heard with the orchestra two seasons ago, will be the soloist.

The program to be

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 21 1937

Finnish University Chorus Will Be Heard Here Twice

The University of Helsinki Chorus from Finland, composed of thirty-five young men, will arrive here on the Manhattan on Christmas Eve and give its first concert Thursday night, December 30, in Worcester, Mass. It will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction three times, in Boston, December 31 and January 1, and here in Carnegie Hall Thursday night, January 6. Under its own conductor, Martti Turunen, the chorus will also sing in Carnegie Hall on Monday night, January 10. The tour closes with a concert at Yale University on January 31, and the singers will return to Finland February 1 on the Berengaria.

MOBILE, ALA.
TIMES

NOV 25

First Woman Conductor

For the first time in its 57 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

PASTE OVER

Journey's End: Cleveland Orchestra and Conductor

B. Traus — Nov. 27/37

Impressions of Severance Hall and a Concert Given in Course of Subscription Season

Clevelanders have the advan- Clevelanders have the advantage of hearing and seeing their orchestra in the magnificent Severance Hall, an auditorium designed with an eye as well as ear to beauty. It was erected by virtue of the munificence of the townspeople, principally the late John L. Severance, and was completed in time for occupancy by the orchestra during its thirteenth season, 1930-31.

Severance Hall has the stunning luxuriousness and the handsomeness of both exterior and interior that characterize other halls employed for concerts and opera in the East and West. A quick approach to the building, set in appropriate surroundings (among them Western Reserve University, which donated the land), is sufficient evidence of the costliness of the structure. That quick approach, incidentally, is made possible by the carefully planned automobile entrance, that goes right through the building and makes possible rapid discharge of passenger patrons.

The hall was thus obviously planned with a cognizance of contemporary custom and habits. Within the hall, too, advantage has been taken of modern principles of structure and design, without (as happens so frequently) recourse to modern garishness. The main floor, boxes and upper balcony have a seating capacity of 1832; and it is unnecessary for a single patron to have his view of the proceedings on stage obstructed in any way.

The relatively small capacity for what looks, outside and in, like a large hall, is explained on a little examination. For the first, there are other quarters in the spacious building — smaller concert halls, ample quarters for the musicians, administrative offices, library and so forth. There are also unusually large and attractive foyers. For the second, there is ample leg room amid rows of seats. And the aisles are unusually wide. In the outer aisle, indeed, stretching horseshoe-like about the rear and sides of the main floor, there are auxiliary chairs, where not only an overflow may be seated instead of made to stand, but also late-comers may subside without disturbing others. The upholstery is exceptionally handsome and comfortable—almost too much for a concert room. But that reservation, the visitor from Boston soon realized, was probably due to inhibitions created by constant frequenting of the chaster halls of the East.

The Cleveland Orchestra, something of a baby among America's leaders, is now in its twentieth season. For fifteen years the conductor was Nikolai Sokoloff, distantly out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was succeeded by Artur Rodzinski, now in his fifth year. There is not yet a sufficiently large regular patronage entirely to support the orchestra—as there is not, apparently, in any American city. Even the small seating capacity of Severance Hall was not exhausted for the concert attended by this writer last Saturday, although the ticket-prices are somewhat lower than prevails on Thursday evenings, when the orchestra presents the other twenty weekly concerts, with occasional intervals. The Thursday concerts, however, are more nearly sold out.

In spite of an endowment that paid for the hall and more or less continues to guarantee its maintenance, therefore, it is obvious that the Orchestral Association must scan its budget carefully from year to year. Specifically this has meant keeping the orchestral personnel considerably below that of the typical large Eastern orchestra—in numbers and, to a certain extent, quality. Dr. Rodzinski has evidently demanded and obtained some leeway in this regard. His most recent efforts have resulted in both enlargement and improvement of the roll of instrumentalists. As always in such matters, he has run into trouble with the local Musicians' Union. And at the present writing the orchestra has under contract five string players whom it is not yet employing, and will not employ until the difficulty with the union is smoothed out.

With an orchestra of eighty, even after allowance has been made for musicians occasionally engaged for thickly-scored romantic and modern works, it would seem impossible to achieve the sonority of the Eastern orchestras. Necessarily the string section will want fullness and accompanying richness. But if this principle of orchestral architecture is really as rigidly operative as one has supposed, the present writer must have been suffering under an illusion during Saturday night's concert—an illusion induced by the obviously excellent accoustical properties of the hall, the ingenious balance maintained among the instrumental choirs by Dr. Rodzinski and perhaps by the additional effort of the players in the string sections.

In any event, the quality of orchestral playing quite overwhelmed this writer, who was certainly not prepared for anything so brilliant by the unequal—if more or less favorable—impression created by the concert of the same performers in Alumnae Hall, Wellesley, last season. The Cleveland Orchestra, on this present occasion, played the Haydn G major ("Military") Symphony with warmth and brilliance of tone and with virtuoso precision. It presented an admirable accompaniment in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, the solo part of which was played in more or less dutiful fashion by the soloist, Roman Totenberg.

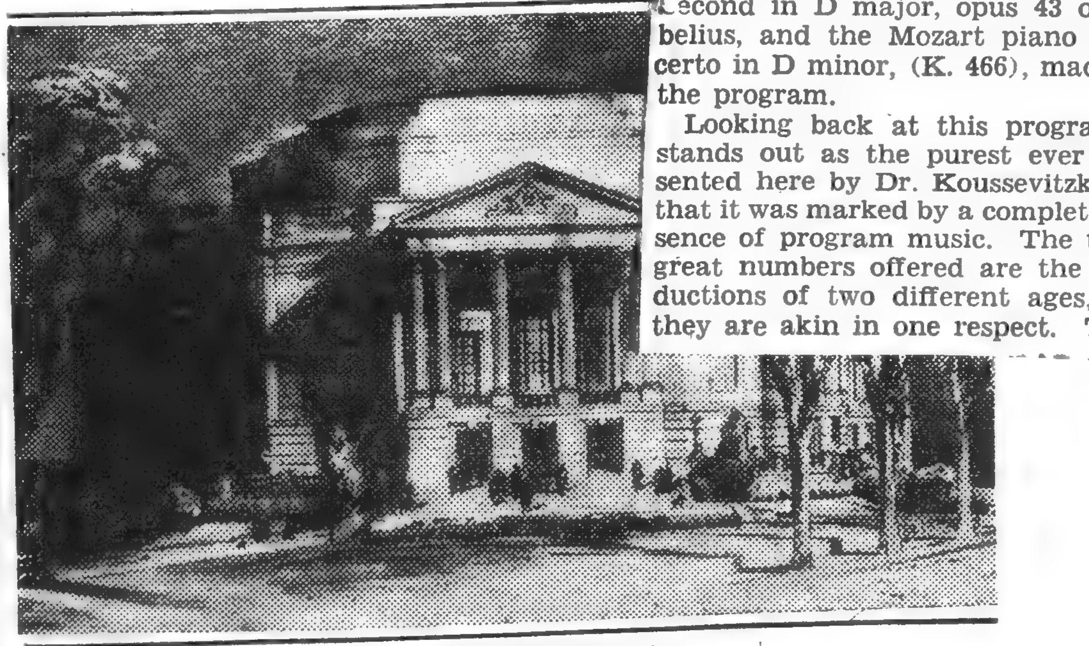
To "Le tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, the orchestra and conductor brought a technical equipment and style which the present writer, perhaps on account of provincialism, had previously credited only to the Boston Orchestra and its conductor in this country. In the final number, Turina's "Sinfonia Sevillana," conductor and orchestra let loose, to achieve a gorgeous orchestral panorama of beautifully matched (or balanced) colors and dynamics.

On this last stage of an extended itinerary the writer was more confirmed than ever in the notion that it is impossible entirely to separate an orchestra's qualities from those of its conductor. The music of Ravel came from this band and its conductor in a fashion considerably different from that of Koussevitzky and the Bostonians. Similarly Turina, according to Rodzinski and the Clevelanders was another matter than according to Goossens and the players of Cincinnati. Yet in each case Rodzinski and his assistants were convincing, even though the way of the others had seemed the only reasonable one at the moment. The explanation was obviously in the commanding musicianship, technical virtuosity, good sense and—so far as one could tell at a single concert—artistic sincerity of Dr. Rodzinski. Among the world's great conductors clearly he has a place M. S.

Memo

The Cleveland Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Rodzinski will play in Symphony Hall later in the season. Although both Orchestra and conductor have appeared in Wellesley in recent seasons, it is some years since the Orchestra, then under the direction of Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, has come to Symphony Hall, where, it may be expected, it will have an official as well as public welcome.

Beauty and Utility



SEVERANCE HALL
Home of the Cleveland Orchestra, model in its kind

---

(54)

Boston's Best Publicity Is the Symph

Its Quality Is a Cultural Advertisement Which Carries the Fame of N England All Round the World

B. Traus.

By REDFERN MASON

If Henry Lee Higginson, a successful business man as well as a lover of music, had not founded the Symphony, Boston might today lack its best advertisement. Emerson, Thoreau and Oliver Wendel Holmes made the city free of the world of humanism; the Widener Library at Harvard brings pilgrims from other lands to consult volumes which Europe could not afford to keep, but the Symphony has brought orchestral supremacy to the New World.

Just as Americans feel that they owe themselves a knowledge of the culture of the Old World, so today the tide of European tourism is setting westward and people come from every land to hear the Boston Symphony. A generation ago foreigners were loath to believe that any good culturally could come out of the United States. They admitted our ability in the realm of commerce; they admired our achievements in invention; but they were slow to confess that we had done anything admirable in the arts. We were "dollar princes" just as our women folk were "dollar princesses"; but it took a man of the stature of Henry Lee Higginson to demonstrate to their satisfaction that an American could be a Maecenas.

And, curious to relate, though today the Old World is paying belated tribute to what the Boston Symphony has accomplished, many of our men of affairs fail to recognize that this great orchestra is one of the best assets that New England possesses. They may vaguely be conscious that at every concert of the Symphony people are present from every State in New England, from New York and from Pennsylvania; but they seem strangely unaware of the fact that these strangers within the gate spend money here, that they carry the fame of Boston afar, that, in a way, they become missionaries of one of the best phases of the Boston spirit. If they knew how Boston is envied for her musical prestige; if they were alive to the value of the publicity which the Symphony has given the city all over the world, they would recognize their indebtedness in act, and, like good providers, make a subscription an annual investment.

More than that, they would themselves attend the concerts. For the business man whose mind is never off his books, his eyes always glued to the tape, is like a field which is never allowed to lie fallow. He becomes a mere slave of business routine, a piler up of capital which he can never enjoy to the full. The late George Eastman confessed to the writer that he had the good luck to find out before it was too late the error of too close application to business. "I found that the fellows about me, my clerks and associates, were getting something out of life which I, for all my wealth, was missing. They liked music, and they came to work fresh and invigorated because they sang or played an instrument and went to concerts." So he installed an organ in his home and got a man to play it for him and tell him what the music was all about. He soon grew interested, and later he brought together a string quartet. He attended the rehearsals; he gave recitals for his friends. Slowly but surely the conviction came over him that music was a socializing force; he found out that money invested by cities in bands, orchestra and choral societies lessened the expenditure in police and courts. Eventually he invested $13,000,000 in founding a school of music, and today that school brings students to Rochester, N. Y. from all parts of the United States.

Such is the experience of one of America's leading industrialists. Otto Kahn told a similar tale.

Reflect for a moment on the idealism, the infinite pains it has taken to make the Boston Symphony what it is. Not only had a great orchestra to be created, but a public had to be taught to enjoy the great things it did. When Gericke came in 1888, he found "some musicians, but hardly an orchestra." He it was who engaged Franz Kneisel as concert master and initiated the regime under which, to quote the words of Philip Hale, "the orchestra is a virtuoso." When Nikisch arrived he exclaimed, when he heard the men play: "All I have to do is to poetize." Richard Strauss, hearing his works played better than he could hear them in Europe, cried out in delight: "I wish I could have this orchestra in Europe to perform all the Beethoven symphonies."

Karl Muck, magician of the most sensitive beat of our generation, stopped in the middle of a Beethoven symphony and let the orchestra play without director. Rabaud imparted Gallic delicacy; but Mr. Higginson remarked that "only a Wiener Kind can play Schubert." Another Frenchman, Pierre Monteux, broke away somewhat from the classic tradition. He performed works by Bax and Holst, Respighi, Moussorgsky and Stravinski, the Spaniards Albeniz and De Falla, such Americans as Griffes, Loeffler and Burlingame Hill. He even had the courage to play the "Sacre du Printemps," and H. T. P. was able to describe him as "the savior of an illustrious orchestra." Today we have Serge Koussevitzky, of whom Ernest Newman said: "He aims at the superman." He it is who gave us the glorious performance of the Bach St. Matthew Passion. If he could have made the audience join the chorales, he would have raised Boston to the choral excellence of Bethlehem, Pa., where the whole populace sings.

In 1915 the Symphony visited San Francisco and gave daily concerts for a couple of weeks. The city had a symphony of its own, a poor one, and the director, Henry Hadley, was a better composer than leader. That series of concerts had a radical effect on public taste. Alfred Hertz was engaged as director and today the baton is wielded by Pierre Monteux. So notable has been the educational effect of the orchestra that today the people of San Francisco pay a tax which partly covers the inevitable deficit.

Could it be that Mayor-elect Tobin, who is young and presumably open to ideas which are, locally at least, new, though they are old in Europe, will induce the citizens of Boston to come to the aid of our Symphony through the rates? It would suffice if they paid the deficit. Of course, the government of the orchestra must be kept out of politics. Still, the Mayor might ex officio be one of the governors.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR - TRIBUNE

⁘ MUSIC ⁘

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting and Martha Baird, wife of Arthur M. Allen of this city, as guest soloist, presented its second concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theatre last night. Two symphonies, the "Unfinished" of Schubert, the Second in D major, opus 43 of Sibelius, and the Mozart piano Concerto in D minor, (K. 466), made up the program.

Looking back at this program it stands out as the purest ever presented here by Dr. Koussevitzky, in that it was marked by a complete absence of program music. The three great numbers offered are the productions of two different ages, but they are akin in one respect. They represent the utterances of masters who speak in the universal language and whose appreciation is in the hearing alone, not in the mental pictures other music is supposed to conjure up.

There is something in the Schubert B minor that pulls at the heart strings no matter how imperfectly it is presented. It is all melodious beauty with a yearning, possibly for the end of this mortal coil, that is strangely poignant. As it was played last night, with all its expression of perfect happiness, yet delirious, straining passion, it is a thing of unsurpassing effect. The orchestra was perfection with Schubert, or very close to it, so much so that most of the time the two movements were in progress, Dr. Koussevitzky merely stood back and let the orchestra play by itself. He, too, seemed to be just listening and thinking of the near-sighted little Viennese of homely countenance, whose strong beer breath was too much for the aristocratic Goethe, yet who created music that has never been excelled.

Schubert was never more original than in this symphony. It opens with the cellos and contrabasses announcing the theme, soon followed by the wood winds with a string accompaniment. The cellos again take up the haunting song. Then there is that yearning minor which seems doubly sorrowful after so much unrestrained joy, but the original theme returns. Had the orchestra played nothing else all night, no less enthusiastic an outburst would have resulted at the close. In the second movement, there was at least once when the violins were too strong for the pianissimoe horns and bassoons but this was while Dr. Koussevitzky was giving 108 men free hand.

Mrs. Allen began her solo with a little too much caution and uncertainty. Despite her outwardly calm mein she seemed to be nervous in her manner of playing. But she soon reached her test in the cadenza near the close of the opening movement, the Allegro, and once having passed this crisis with flying colors, improved as she progressed. So well was this done that, at the end of the Allegro, Dr. Koussevitzky turned on the podium and beamed a smile of appreciation on her.

Nothing in all Mozart's clavier music could be more graceful than the truely German melody of the Romanza, the theme of which is announced by the solo instrument, and nothing could exceed the rare sympathy with which the soloist responded. Her execution of the characteristic Mozart turns, done with a feathery pianissimo, was a treat in itself. Mrs. Allen once more showed her brilliance and musicianly splendor in the Rondo, the final movement, which called for travail through another difficult cadenza. She lost none of the humor of the many statements in this movement and was skillfully aided by the orchestra's bassoons and trumpets in the conclusion. Her one fault, if she had any, was that she reached no greater volume throughout her solo than a mezzoforte. An enthusiastic audience recalled her several times before accepting the intermission.

The long, moody Sibelius symphony made up the second half of the program, giving the suppressed horns their long overdue opportunity to shine. The first movement of this work opens with a deceptive cue in the lively theme of the woodwinds, but it is not long before the ominous bass brass becomes dominant. The second movement continues this metamorphosis with its opening dumming on the timpany and the contrabass pizzicato, but in the Lento of the third movement is the greatest lyric satisfaction of the whole work. Throughout, Dr. Koussevitzky gave free rein to his growling brass, permitting the realization of a terrific volume on the finale. It was, nevertheless, a stunning climax and an effective one to the first part of the program. T. A. M.

CONDUCTING SYMPHONY CONCERT

B. Herald - Nov. 28/37

(Performance Photo by Judkins-Wolff)

Richard Burgin, first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Globe MUSIC Nov. 27/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Perhaps the art of music is not destined, after all, to end in darkness, confusion and the domestic anguish of all keys dwelling simultaneously in the same measure. This heartening thought came to mind yesterday afternoon as Richard Burgin directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first performance in this city of a Symphony by Marcel Poot.

No doubt there are concert-goers who have looked sadly at the trend of composition in the 1920s, imagined the logical result, and have resigned themselves to looking backward at the Golden Age that ended with the war. Let them take courage! For if M. Poot's work indicates a change in tonal morals, there will yet be decorum in harmony, and counterpoint will be pure of heart.

Marcel Poot is a Flemish composer, born in 1901, and a newcomer to Boston Symphony programs. He was no more than 28 when he finished his Symphony, which is a confession of faith in melody, agreeable harmony and in an orchestral texture so clear that it suggests chamber music. Whether or not the work may be set down as immature, or whether it indicates that composers who grew up artistically in the post-war years are really turning away from cacophony is a question only the future can answer.

The Symphony's three movements pass quickly and robustly, with scarcely an echo of the past. To be sure, M. Poot evidently has learned from Stravinsky of the "Petrouchka" days—but who hasn't? The last movement, a formally loose rondo, is marked "Jazz Allegro," and it is another example of a European attempting a style of music for which no European has talent. Jazz, whatever its value—and it probably has done, symphonically—is America's one tonal accomplishment. Only on this side of the Atlantic can it be properly written and played, and then only by those to the manner bred.

While M Poot's ideas are striking rather than distinguished, his treatment of them in the first two movements is clever. More of his music will be welcome. Mr Burgin, making his annual exchange of the concertmaster's desk for the conductor's stand, secured a vital performance, even if the orchestra had evident difficulty with the "Jazz Allegro." He is to be congratulated for presenting the Symphony.

Mr Burgin departed from convention by starting his program with Felix Mottl's arrangement of the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto by J. S. Bach. Because it was written for six-stringed instruments with clavier accompaniment, this is the least played of the Brandenburg Concertos. Probably some have been tempted to play it with string orchestra, but mere doubling of parts would likely result in thick tone.

Yesterday there were 10 violas, four cellos, one double bass and harpsichord, of which two violas and three cellos took solo parts. Thus a fine balance of tone was preserved, through which the interweaving of the solos was clearly discernible.

The afternoon ended with the nobly eloquent Symphony of Ernest Chausson, last performed in Symphony Hall six years ago, when Mr Burgin was also the conductor. A pity this Symphony is so neglected! However Wagnerian the style, the thought is substantial and beautifully expressed. Here length is nicely adjusted to material; Teutonic and Gallic qualities are balanced in a marvelously sensitive score. What is more, Chausson's Symphony, reminiscent of Franck only in the last movement, is likely to wear better, under frequent repetition, than the D minor Symphony of Franck. The performance was deeply moving, if a little heavy.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will give first performance to the Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill. Emma Boynet, French pianist, will be soloist in Mozart's C major Concerto (K 467). Haydn's G major Symphony, No. 88, and Respighi's transcription of the J. S. Bach organ Passacaglia and Fugue will also be played.

C. W. D.

GEORGE BRENT OF FILMS GRANTED U. S. CITIZENSHIP

LOS ANGELES, Nov 20 (A P)—George Brent of the movies became an American citizen today. Brent, who gave his true name as George Nolan, said he was born 33 years ago in Ballinasloe, Ire.

63

Richard Burgin Conducts A Characteristic Program

B. Trans - Nov. 27/37

Discovered Bach, Novel Poot and the Chausson Symphony Occupy Symphonic Matinee

By Moses Smith

The reappearance of Richard Burgin on the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall two or three times during the course of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an accepted act. On each occasion, though, the subscribers to the concerts find a way of expressing their admiration and affection for one whom, through most of the season, they see at the head of the violins. The matinee audience of yesterday, when the orchestra under Mr. Burgin played the second of three concerts for the week (the first in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday, the last this evening in Symphony Hall), was cordially disposed and indicated its attitude at every opportunity. It seemed apparent that more and more Mr. Burgin is being accepted as an interpreter in his own right.

He had sufficient opportunity for exercising his musical and interpretative powers in a program which was artfully arranged, in view of the fact that two of the three numbers were new to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's repertory. One of the novelties, incredibly, was the last of Bach's six "Brandenburg" Concertos. This Sixth Concerto in B-flat was, according to Mr. Burk's illuminating program notes, originally designed as chamber music. Bach had in mind only a harpsichord "continuo" and some six stringed instruments, four of which were of the viol type now obsolete. Such a small group would obviously be out of the question at an orchestral concert. And Mr. Burgin employed, instead, the arrangement of Felix Mottl, with the result that the music was reproduced yesterday by perhaps a dozen-and-a-half players.

While he was about it, Mottl took the liberty of making a concerto grosso out of Bach's score by the simple process of assigning alternate passages to the large body of strings, while preserving the solo instrumental passages intact. Whether Bach thus intended his Sixth "Brandenburg" to resemble the others in concerto grosso form and to what extent Mottl's version constitutes an artistic sin we may for the time dismiss from consideration. The arrangement sounded quite logical yesterday. Perhaps Mr. Burgin might have brought out the contrasts intended by Mottl more persuasively if he had employed an even larger string contingent. But that question, too, will have to wait for an answer.

As it was, the music came forth so agreeably and convincingly that one was puzzled by its neglect hereabouts. (On the phonograph the Sixth Concerto has been available for some time in an excellent performance for Columbia under the direction of Adolf Busch.) There was no hint of monotony in spite of the fact that only the strings from viola down are employed. The Bachian mastery was once more apparent in the two fast movements with their almost continuous prelude-style that is never forced and never fails to show invention. The beautiful slow movement was like a heavenly discourse among the solo instruments, the kind of discourse that Bach conducted so well and that few, if any, composers in the entire history of music have been able successfully to emulate.

There was a new Symphony by a Belgian composer, Marcel Poot, whose surname is provocative to punning but whose music causes one to resist the temptation. The Symphony is dated 1929; and the style of the last movement, with the title, "Rondo, Jazz-Allegro," confirms that fact. There is a good deal of fuss, in a jazzy sort of way, stirred up by a reasonably large orchestra in this movement. But when it is over, one has heard one more futile attempt of a "serious" composer to beat George Gershwin at his own game.

But the first two movements are something else. In the first there is, from the very opening measure, a refreshing directness of statement, an exhilaratingly contemporary treatment of melody, harmony and counterpoint without ponderousness; and, incidentally, there is a new declaration of independence of scales as the basis of melody. The slow movement, too, is entertaining and engrossing, with a particularly happy touch created by the insertion of a quasi-minuet in the middle of the movement, otherwise given over to cool reflection.

The performance of the Bach Concerto had been just and sensitive. In the Symphony of Poot conductor and players seemed to realize every demand of the composer, including an excellent jazz style for the last movement. For the final number of the program, Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, the orchestra under Mr. Burgin rose to impassioned statement. Here was a magnificent orchestra, probably surpassing anything in Chausson's experience or perhaps even imagination, and beautifully attuned to his moods. Mr. Burgin's choice and changes of tempo were happy, and the orchestra was unerring in following his wishes. Conductor and players behaved at all times as if they believed in the music. And it is good music to believe in, because it is nobly representative of its time and place. The half-chorale, half-marching hymn of the last movement, sounding for all the world like another Revelation, was wonderfully intoned at its successive appearances by a brass section that has rarely sounded better.

For one who has been making a pilgrimage in the course of which he has heard excellent American orchestras it was good to be reminded of the quality of music-making that takes place through the symphonic season in Symphony Hall. No homecoming could have been more welcome.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

B. Her. Nov. 27/37

The seventh regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Bach........Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 in B flat major (edited by Felix Mottl).
Marcel Poot..............Symphony
Chausson............Symphony in B flat major Op. 20

It is not as remarkable as it looks on paper that Bach's Sixth Brandenburg concerto had never been played at a Boston Symphony concert before yesterday. Actually it is an example of chamber music that does not particularly benefit in an arrangement for more than six instruments. A glance at the score in the Bach Gesellschaft edition ought to convince any one that the predominant voices of the two violas should never be obscured. Now, that is exactly what Felix Mottl's edition, temperate as it is, has done.

Mottl has construed a different instrumental balance from that which would normally come to mind. Moreover his edition emphasizes the polyphonic jog-trot in the first and last movements, which is sometimes the curse of Bach's genius. This machine-like music was the kind that he could, and very probably did, compose in his sleep. Mr. Mottl allowed the slow movement to speak more directly for itself; but this, too, is not one of Bach's higher flights. In the performance yesterday it would have been better to have brought Mr. Artieres forward and equal in position with Mr. Lefranc. As it was the second voice did not emerge clearly enough.

From this pedestrian 18th century work to the flashy wit in 1929 of Marcel Poot was a startling transition. Conceivably we could have been amused by this symphony in 1929 and have remarked on the promise of a young composer. Today we emphatically cannot.

The last movement is trashy, and much of it would sound better to the clink of glasses and under the pall of smoke in one of the "El Gypolios" of Manhattan. The andante is a little precious in its simplicity and the deliberate crabbedness of the wood-wind canon. The first movement is dreadfully whimsical, though the most ingenious for its presentation of the material. Mr. Burgin labored almost choreographically over Mr. Poot's Symphony, which was heard for the first time in the United States (or at least at the Cambridge concert on Thursday); but it was not worth the effort.

Chausson's Symphony is a beautiful work in a manner to which we have become accustomed through excessive familiarity with the Franck Symphony. Conductors would have been wiser if they had brought out Chausson's music a little more, and also that of Vincent d'Indy in this same school, in order that the public taste might be broadened. Chausson may not have quite the imagination of Franck or the formal sturdiness of d'Indy, but his music is not merely romantically luscious.

At the end of a concert, such as yesterday's, it was welcome. The first movement has less aimlessness than that of Franck's Symphony; and the slow movement is music of rare loveliness. Mr. Burgin brought an intelligent insight and sincerity of purpose to the interpretation of this work. The orchestra responded splendidly, so that we heard a performance of fine sonority.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will lead the first performance of Mr. Hill's new Symphony; and Emma Boynet, French pianist, will play a Mozart Concerto. A Symphony of Haydn and a transcription by Respighi of one of Bach's organ works complete the program.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony Starts 52nd Season in New York

NEW YORK, Nov. 18 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has ploughed the snows, when necessary, for 51 consecutive Winters to give a series of concerts in New York, tonight began its 52nd season.

In more than half a century, the famous orchestra has missed a New York engagement only twice. Two concerts were postponed, none canceled.

The first postponement was caused by the blizzard of 1888—the orchestra had started, but was forced to turn back. The other was caused by the death of a conductor.

Tonight's concert demonstrated anew for the audience, many of whom have followed the New York concerts of the Boston players for decades, that Serge Koussevitzky's 110 players form, certainly, one of the great orchestras of the world; that tonally it is perhaps the finest.

Koussevitzky chose for the opening programs two symphonies. One was Beethoven's "Eroica"; the other Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major.

On each of the five trips the orchestra plays three concerts: Thursday night in New York; Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon in New York. The first matinee will present a young French pianist, Jacques Fevrier, in his New York debut.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

NOV 19 1937

With Boston Symphony Fevrier Soloist

NEW YORK, Nov. 18.—Jacques Fevrier, French pianist and son of the composer, Henri Fevrier, will be heard as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at Carnegie Hall. He will play Ravel's Pianoforte Concerto for the Left Hand. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 88, and in Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43.

CONDUCTING SYMPHONY CONCERT

B. Herald – Nov. 28/37

(Performance Photo by Judkins-Wolff)

Richard Burgin, first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Glob

MUSIC

Nov. 27/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Perhaps the art of music is not destined, after all, to end in darkness, confusion and the domestic anguish of all keys dwelling simultaneously in the same measure. This heartening thought came to mind yesterday afternoon as Richard Burgin directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first performance in this city of a Symphony by Marcel Poot.

No doubt there are concert-goers who have looked sadly at the trend of composition in the 1920s, imagined the logical result, and have resigned themselves to looking backward at the Golden Age that ended with the war. Let them take courage! For if M. Poot's work indicates a change in tonal morals, there will yet be decorum in harmony, and counterpoint will be pure of heart.

Marcel Poot is a Flemish composer, born in 1901, and a newcomer to Boston Symphony programs. He was no more than 28 when he finished his Symphony, which is a confession of faith in melody, agreeable harmony and in an orchestral texture so clear that it suggests chamber music. Whether or not the work may be set down as immature, or whether it indicates that composers who grew up artistically in the post-war years are really turning away from cacophony is a question only the future can answer.

The Symphony's three movements pass quickly and robustly, with scarcely an echo of the past. To be sure, M. Poot evidently has learned from Stravinsky of the "Petrouchka" days—but who hasn't? The last movement, a formally loose rondo, is marked "Jazz Allegro," and it is another example of a European attempting a style of music for which no European has talent. Jazz, whatever its value—and it probably has done, symphonically—is America's one tonal accomplishment. Only on this side of the Atlantic can it be properly written and played, and then only by those to the manner bred.

While M Poot's ideas are striking rather than distinguished, his treatment of them in the first two movements is clever. More of his music will be welcome. Mr Burgin, making his annual exchange of the concertmaster's desk for the conductor's stand, secured a vital performance, even if the orchestra had evident difficulty with the "Jazz Allegro." He is to be congratulated for presenting the Symphony.

Mr Burgin departed from convention by starting his program with Felix Mottl's arrangement of the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto by J. S. Bach. Because it was written for six-stringed instruments with clavier accompaniment, this is the least played of the Brandenburg Concertos. Probably some have been tempted to play it with string orchestra, but mere doubling of parts would likely result in thick tone.

Yesterday there were 10 violas, four cellos, one double bass and harpsichord, of which two violas and three cellos took solo parts. Thus a fine balance of tone was preserved, through which the interweaving of the solos was clearly discernible.

The afternoon ended with the nobly eloquent Symphony of Ernest Chausson, last performed in Symphony Hall six years ago, when Mr Burgin was also the conductor. A pity this Symphony is so neglected! However Wagnerian the style, the thought is substantial and beautifully expressed. Here length is nicely adjusted to material; Teutonic and Gallic qualities are balanced in a marvelously sensitive score. What is more, Chausson's Symphony, reminiscent of Franck only in the last movement, is likely to wear better, under frequent repetition, than the D minor Symphony of Franck. The performance was deeply moving, if a little heavy.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will give first performance to the Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill. Emma Boynet, French pianist, will be soloist in Mozart's C major Concerto (K 467). Haydn's G major Symphony, No. 88, and Respighi's transcription of the J. S. Bach organ Passacaglia and Fugue will also be played.

C. W. D.

GEORGE BRENT OF FILMS GRANTED U. S. CITIZENSHIP

LOS ANGELES, Nov 26 (A P)—George Brent of the movies became an American citizen today. Brent, who gave his true name as George Nolan, said he was born 33 years ago in Ballinasloe, Ire.

65

Richard Burgin Conducts A Characteristic Program

B. Trans. – Nov. 27/37

Discovered Bach, Novel Poot and the Chausson Symphony Occupy Symphonic Matinee

By Moses Smith

The reappearance of Richard Burgin on the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall two or three times during the course of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an accepted fact. On each occasion, though, the subscribers to the concerts find a way of expressing their admiration and affection for one whom, through most of the season, they see at the head of the violins. The matinee audience of yesterday, when the orchestra under Mr. Burgin played the second of three concerts for the week (the first in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday, the last this evening in Symphony Hall), was cordially disposed and indicated its attitude at every opportunity. It seemed apparent that more and more Mr. Burgin is being accepted as an interpreter in his own right.

He had sufficient opportunity for exercising his musical and interpretative powers in a program which was artfully arranged, in view of the fact that two of the three numbers were new to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's repertory. One of the novelties, incredibly, was the last of Bach's six "Brandenburg" Concertos. This Sixth Concerto in B-flat was, according to Mr. Burk's illuminating program notes, originally designed as chamber music. Bach had in mind only a harpsichord "continuo" and some six stringed instruments, four of which were of the viol type now obsolete. Such a small group would obviously be out of the question at an orchestral concert. And Mr. Burgin employed, instead, the arrangement of Felix Mottl, with the result that the music was reproduced yesterday by perhaps a dozen-and-a-half players.

While he was about it, Mottl took the liberty of making a concerto grosso out of Bach's score by the simple process of assigning alternate passages to the large body of strings, while preserving the solo instrumental passages intact. Whether Bach thus intended his Sixth "Brandenburg" to resemble the others in concerto grosso form and to what extent Mottl's version constitutes an artistic sin we may for the time dismiss from consideration. The arrangement sounded quite logical yesterday. Perhaps Mr. Burgin might have brought out the contrasts intended by Mottl more persuasively if he had employed an even larger string contingent. But that question, too, will have to wait for an answer.

As it was, the music came forth so agreeably and convincingly that one was puzzled by its neglect hereabouts. (On the phonograph the Sixth Concerto has been available for some time in an excellent performance for Columbia under the direction of Adolf Busch.) There was no hint of monotony in spite of the fact that only the strings from viola down are employed. The Bachian mastery was once more apparent in the two fast movements with their almost continuous prelude-style that is never forced and never fails to show invention. The beautiful slow movement was like a heavenly discourse among the solo instruments, the kind of discourse that Bach conducted so well and that few, if any, composers in the entire history of music have been able successfully to emulate.

There was a new Symphony by a Belgian composer, Marcel Poot, whose surname is provocative to punning but whose music causes one to resist the temptation. The Symphony is dated 1929; and the style of the last movement, with the title, "Rondo, Jazz-Allegro," confirms that fact. There is a good deal of fuss, in a jazzy sort of way, stirred up by a reasonably large orchestra in this movement. But when it is over, one has heard one more futile attempt of a "serious" composer to beat George Gershwin at his own game.

But the first two movements are something else. In the first there is, from the very opening measure, a refreshing directness of statement, an exhilaratingly contemporary treatment of melody, harmony and counterpoint without ponderousness; and, incidentally, there is a new declaration of independence of scales as the basis of melody. The slow movement, too, is entertaining and engrossing, with a particularly happy touch created by the insertion of a quasi-minuet in the middle of the movement, otherwise given over to cool reflection.

The performance of the Bach Concerto had been just and sensitive. In the Symphony of Poot conductor and players seemed to realize every demand of the composer, including an excellent jazz style for the last movement. For the final number of the program, Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, the orchestra under Mr. Burgin rose to impassioned statement. Here was a magnificent orchestra, probably surpassing anything in Chausson's experience or perhaps even imagination, and beautifully attuned to his moods. Mr. Burgin's choice and changes of tempo were happy, and the orchestra was unerring in following his wishes. Conductor and players behaved at all times as if they believed in the music. And it is good music to believe in, because it is nobly representative of its time and place. The half-chorale, half-marching hymn of the last movement, sounding for all the world like another Revelation, was wonderfully intoned at its successive appearances by a brass section that has rarely sounded better.

For one who has been making a pilgrimage in the course of which he has heard excellent American orchestras it was good to be reminded of the quality of music-making that takes place through the symphonic season in Symphony Hall. No homecoming could have been more welcome.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

B. Her. – Nov. 27/37

The seventh regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Bach	Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 in B flat major (edited by Felix Mottl).
Marcel Poot	Symphony
Chausson	Symphony in B flat major Op. 20

It is not as remarkable as it looks on paper that Bach's Sixth Brandenburg concerto had never been played at a Boston Symphony concert before yesterday. Actually it is an example of chamber music that does not particularly benefit in an arrangement for more than six instruments. A glance at the score in the Bach Gesellschaft edition ought to convince any one that the predominant voices of the two violas should never be obscured. Now, that is exactly what Felix Mottl's edition, temperate as it is, has done.

Mottl has construed a different instrumental balance from that which would normally come to mind. Moreover his edition emphasizes the polyphonic jog-trot in the first and last movements, which is sometimes the curse of Bach's genius. This machine-like music was the kind that he could, and very probably did, compose in his sleep. Mr. Mottl allowed the slow movement to speak more directly for itself; but this, too, is not one of Bach's higher flights. In the performance yesterday it would have been better to have brought Mr. Artieres forward and equal in position with Mr. Lefranc. As it was the second voice did not emerge clearly enough.

From this pedestrian 18th century work to the flashy wit in 1929 of Marcel Poot was a startling transition. Conceivably we could have been amused by this symphony in 1929 and have remarked on the promise of a young composer. Today we emphatically cannot.

The last movement is trashy, and much of it would sound better to the clink of glasses and under the pall of smoke in one of the "El Gypolios" of Manhattan. The andante is a little precious in its simplicity and the deliberate crabbedness of the wood-wind canon. The first movement is dreadfully whimsical, though the most ingenious for its presentation of the material. Mr. Burgin labored almost choreographically over Mr. Poot's Symphony, which was heard for the first time in the United States (or at least at the Cambridge concert on Thursday); but it was not worth the effort.

Chausson's Symphony is a beautiful work in a manner to which we have become accustomed through excessive familiarity with the Franck Symphony. Conductors would have been wiser if they had brought out Chausson's music a little more, and also that of Vincent d'Indy in this same school, in order that the public taste might be broadened. Chausson may not have quite the imagination of Franck or the formal sturdiness of d'Indy, but his music is not merely romantically luscious.

At the end of a concert, such as yesterday's, it was welcome. The first movement has less aimlessness than that of Franck's Symphony; and the slow movement is music of rare loveliness. Mr. Burgin brought an intelligent insight and sincerity of purpose to the interpretation of this work. The orchestra responded splendidly, so that we heard a performance of fine sonority.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will lead the first performance of Mr. Hill's new Symphony; and Emma Boynet, French pianist, will play a Mozart Concerto. A Symphony of Haydn and a transcription by Respighi of one of Bach's organ works complete the program.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 19 1937

Boston Symphony Starts 52nd Season in New York

NEW YORK, Nov. 18 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has ploughed the snows, when necessary, for 51 consecutive Winters to give a series of concerts in New York, tonight began its 52nd season.

In more than half a century, the famous orchestra has missed a New York engagement only twice. Two concerts were postponed, none canceled.

The first postponement was caused by the blizzard of 1888—the orchestra had started, but was forced to turn back. The other was caused by the death of a conductor.

Tonight's concert demonstrated anew for the audience, many of whom have followed the New York concerts of the Boston players for decades, that Serge Koussevitzky's 110 players form, certainly, one of the great orchestras of the world; that tonally it is perhaps the finest.

Koussevitzky chose for the opening programs two symphonies. One was Beethoven's "Eroica"; the other Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major.

On each of the five trips the orchestra plays three concerts: Thursday night in New York; Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon in New York. The first matinee will present a young French pianist, Jacques Fevrier, in his New York debut.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

NOV 19 1937

With Boston Symphony Fevrier Soloist

NEW YORK, Nov. 18.—Jacques Fevrier, French pianist and son of the composer, Henri Fevrier, will be heard as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at Carnegie Hall. He will play Ravel's Pianoforte Concerto for the Left Hand. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 88, and in Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43.

PRODIGY IN FIFTIETH TOUR

B. Post Nov. 28/37

News and Notes About Music Matters Here and Elsewhere

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE career of Josef Hofmann, now marking the 50th anniversary of his first American tour with recitals in the cities where he then appeared as a boy of 11, brings to mind the fact that most musical wonder children have been less fortunate than he. We were told in our school days that every horse is a quadruped, but that every quadruped is not a horse. In the same way it may be said that while most eminent performers were precocious, most prodigies do not turn out to be eminent performers.

With composers the case is different. The creative faculty does not often show early maturity, as it did in the case of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schubert or of the later Saint-Saens, Glazounov and Richard Strauss, who mastered the larger forms while still in short trousers; but the precocious composer has a far better chance of achieving ultimate fame than has the precocious performer. Even Erich Korngold has not done so badly, though he did not fulfil the prediction that he would be a second Mozart.

Returning to Mr. Hofmann, if we hear more of his precocity than of that of his colleagues who were also wunderkinder, it is because he was more remarkable than most (his teacher, Rubinstein, declared him a boy such as the world of music had never before produced) and because he was more sensationally exploited. In his tour of America in 1887 he gave 52 concerts in two and a half months, and when the lad broke under the strain, the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children interfered in his behalf. Mr. Hofmann returned to this country 11 years later, and, as he has subsequently observed, though he had become a much better pianist, the public was much less interested in his playing. The public, of course, does not care how well a prodigy plays, provided that the competence of the performance is sufficiently at variance with the age of the performer: Its attitude more resembles that of the visitor to the side show.

Mr. Hofmann's Boston recital, by the way, will take place at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 12.

* * * *

It is worthy of note that the Scandinavian countries, so progressive and advanced in most respects, have not produced their share of important composers. Taken as a whole, the Norwegians, Swedes and Danes have made their most significant contributions in the interesting but lesser domain of the art-song. Orchestral works by representatives of the three countries will, however, be heard at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this evening in the second of a series of concerts devoted to "national" music, by Alexander Thiede and the State Symphony Orchestra. The Danish Gade (1817-1890), will be heard through his overture, "Reminiscences of Ossian," which brought him a coveted prize, the attention of the King and, what was better, a royal stipend, which took him to Leipzig and the valuable association with Mendelssohn. Sweden will be represented tonight through the Sixth Symphony of Kurt Atterburg, presumably the one which won him the Columbia Phonograph Company's Schubert Memorial Prize, in 1928. The third composer is the

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 19 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Starts 52nd Season With Concert in New York City

New York, Nov. 18.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has ploughed the snows, when necessary, for 51 consecutive winters to give a series of concerts in New York, began its 52nd season tonight.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky chose for the opening programs two symphonies. One was Beethoven's "Eroica;" the other Sibelius's Second Symphony in D Major.

POOT'S NEW NOVELTY BY SYMPHONY

B. Globe

Saxophone Solo Given Prominence at Concert

1937

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"Spelling" Dr. Koussevitzky, as he does from time to time, Richard Burgin led the Symphony Orchestra yesterday through compositions by Bach, a new Belgian, Marcel Poot, and Chausson. Nor was Poot's lively symphony the only novelty; Bach's Sixth Brandenburg Concerto had been played by the orchestra for the first time at its concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the night before.

CHAUSSON TURNS VULGAR

To dispose first of the least rewarding portion of the concert, Chausson's Symphony is six years older than when we last heard it. also from Mr. Burgin, and sounds it. Chausson was hardly the man to write a symphony. He could be gentle, elegiac, idyllic, delicately imaginative. When he would be robust, and much of his Symphony is robustious, he was commonplace, even vulgar. And yet we are assured by Pierre de Breville, as quoted in Mr. Burk's notes, that Chausson "had no reason to fear or avoid vulgarity, for he did not know what it was."

The performance of this generally tiresome, sluggish and inflated symphony, with its patent borrowings from Franck and Wagner, suggested that conductor and orchestra had been chiefly occupied in the rehearsal period with the novel music of the afternoon.

Sixth Brandenburg

This sixth of the Brandenburg Concertos was written for two violas, two viole de gamba, a 'cello, bass and harpsichord. It was heard yesterday in the arrangement of Felix Mottl, for two solo violas and three solo 'cellos, with accompaniment of violas, 'cellos, bass and harpsichord. Some 20 players occupied the stage. The tonal effect is singularly somber, veiled. One was reminded of Gretry's comment after hearing Mehul's opera, "Uthal," from which the violins are absent: "Six francs for an E-string!" The expressive Adagio ma non tanto is the concerto's most appealing movement.

The Allegros, especially the first, though strong and sinewy, have that familiar, somewhat mechanical Bachian quality which Philip Hale used to call "counterpoint by the yard." The performance was one of high virtuosity.

Poot's Symphony

If your modern composer cannot be profound, he can at least be amusing. This symphony of Poot has an enlivening first movement, often suggestive of ballet music; and Andante of charm and sentiment, which proves that Poot has heard the voice of Ravel; and a Rondo, subtitled Jazz-Allegro, which contains agreeable episodes, such as the admirably written and also genuinely musical saxophone solo, but which for the most part is merely cheap. At least, Mr. Poot writes at all times with sureness of effect and with a clarity of thought, which all composers of his generation do not possess.

His Symphony was brilliantly played; but plainly the applause for the last movement did not come from the audience as a whole. There is still a place for everything, and some would still like to see, and hear, everything in its place.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Starts 52nd Season With Concert in New York City

New York, Nov. 18.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has ploughed the snows, when necessary, for 51 consecutive winters to give a series of concerts in New York, began its 52nd season tonight.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky chose for the opening programs two symphonies. One was Beethoven's "Eroica;" the other Sibelius's Second Symphony in D Major.

N. Y. Times, Nov. 29/37

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

COMPOSER REGAINS HIS PLACE IN SOVIET

Dmitri Shostakovich, Who Fell From Grace Two Years Ago, on Way to Rehabilitation

HIS NEW SYMPHONY HAILED

Audience Cheers as Leningrad Philharmonic Presents Work —Architect Also Restored

By HAROLD DENNY

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, Nov. 27.—Dmitri Shostakovich, young Soviet composer whose works are well known in America, is now apparently on the way to complete rehabilitation after his spectacular fall from favor in February, 1936. Until that fall he had been universally hailed in the Soviet as a genius and his works were widely performed.

Then at a stroke his ballet "Limpid Stream" was removed from the boards of the Bolshoi Theatre and his opera "Lady Macbeth" canceled on the eve of the opening in the theatre which had spent a fortune preparing it. These disasters, accompanied by denunciations in the Soviet press, which accused Mr. Shostakovich's music of being "un-Soviet, unwholesome, eccentric, tuneless and Leftist."

Some other Soviet musicians stood by Mr. Shostakovich at that time saying he still had a future and after he had overcome his failings he would produce great music.

Mr. Shostakovich took his medicine and has been busy writing ever since. This week his new work, Fifth symphony had its première, by the Leningrad Philharmonic and at the conclusion the audience rose and gave him an ovation. Mr. Shostakovich himself responded to the ovation on the platform. The Russian papers have said little about the affair, but today the Moscow Daily News—a Soviet publication though printed in English—ran an enthusiastic criticism by its Leningrad music critic, Andrew Budyakovsky.

"The composer while retaining the originality of his art in this new composition has to a great extent overcome the ostentatiousness, deliberate musical affectation and misuse of the grotesque which had left a pernicious print on many of his former compositions," he wrote. "Shostakovich's 'Fifth Symphony' is a work of great depth, with emotional wealth and content and is of great importance as a milestone in the composer's development.

"The fetters of musical formalism which held the composer captive so long and prevented him from creating works profound in conception have been torn off. He must follow up this new trend in his work. He must turn more boldly toward Soviet reality. He must understand it more profoundly and find in it a new stimulus for his work."

Mr. Shostakovich is not the only example of a worker in the arts fighting his way back after being denounced. Konstantin Melnikoff, who soon after Mr. Shostakovitch's downfall received a handsome dressing down for leftist formalism in architecture, now is in charge of a group of architects working on the reconstruction of Moscow.

Alexander Afinogenoff, a playwright who also came into disfavor about a year ago, is seen driving occasionally about Moscow in his car though none of his works is now being presented at least on Moscow stages.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

NOV 18 1937

Boston Symphony Program Thursday

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, Nov. 17.—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3 in E Flat, and Sibelius' Second Symphony in D, Op. 43, will comprise the program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

NOV 19 193

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which has ploughed the snows, when necessary, for 51 consecutive winters to give a series of concerts in New York, began in New York its 52nd season.

---

nglish in Form and

Symphony Warmly Greeted on Return

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra has a way of sounding better after a trip to New York. Perhaps it is not only the change that is beneficial, but the reportedly "festal mood" of its Carnegie audiences. Or perhaps it is just the nice things that critics Gilman and Downes are wont to say about it.

It did, at any rate, sound very well indeed in the Friday and Saturday concerts conducted by Richard Burgin in Symphony Hall. (This, it is understood, is not remarkable in fact, for the fact is that it usually does, but only in degree—which is necessarily variable.)

Mr. Burgin, in his periodic appearances as conductor, customarily presents new or rarely heard works.

In this instance it was a new symphony by the French, composer Marcel Poot, Felix Mottl's arrangement of the Bach Sixth Brandenburg Concerto in B flat major, hitherto unperformed at these concerts, and Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat major.

* * *

The latter symphony is evidently a favorite of Burgin's and it was he who conducted its last performance in 1931.

Chausson's music is played altogether too infrequently. A disciple of Cesar Franck, he was able to profit by his teaching to the extent of realizing his own personality rather than imitating his tutor's example.

Not that Chausson's originality is its striking quality. It's singular charm lies perhaps in the fact that there is really little "striking" about it. It is music that for the most part just sings and murmurs. Its romanticism is without frenzy, its poetry, always sensitive is never "precious," its orchestration is imaginative rather than "clever."

It has already been inferred that the Chausson Symphony was beautifully performed.

* * *

MR. BURGIN'S value to the orchestra is probably, in the order of their importance, first as musician, second as violinist and third as conductor. All of which, needless to say, places him in the first rank as concert master. In the role of conductor he inspires a confidence derived from the fact that one feels that he knows precisely what he is doing all the time.

His method of bringing about effects does not revolve so much on practiced conductatorial technique as on a happy blend of positive authority, and gentler persuasion expressed in movements of limited variety but obvious significance. His rhythmic energy is always compelling, his treatment of nuance effective.

The Poot Symphony opens with a rather deft Allegro vivo, not untouched with humor, proceeds to a wistful Andante reminiscent of Ravel, and ends with a decidedly surprising Jazz Allegro. That the latter is not good jazz is apparent, but just what it is we have not the slightest idea.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BROOKLYN TABLET

NOV 3 1937

Urges People to Boycott Music Hall, Orchestras

Dear Sir: On the front page of the August 21st issue of THE BROOKLYN TABLET appeared a letter sent out by the "Musicians' Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy". By means of this letter the Committee advertised a special benefit screening of the film called "The Spanish Earth." The purpose of this film was to glorify the Red army in Spain. The purpose of the showing was to secure money to send to the Red forces in Spain. Mr. Erno Rapee was one of many who signed this letter.

On the front page of the August 28th edition of THE BROOKLYN TABLET, you mentioned the fact that you had received a letter from Mr. Rapee asserting that he was asked to act as a sponsor for the benefit but that he thought it was to aid war sufferers and not a faction.

It was to be hoped that Mr. Rapee, who is now acquainted with the fact that the Musicians' Committee to aid Spanish Democracy is a Committee to advance the cause of Communism in Spain, would never again allow his name to be used in such a connection.

Such, however, is not the case. Mr. Rapee's name once again appears among the sponsors of a party held in Sherman Square Studios on Saturday, October 16th, under the auspices of the Musicians' Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy. Evidently Mr.. Rapee's explanation to THE TABLET did not proceed from any change of heart. His continued identification with the "Musicians' Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy" still places him on the side of the Spanish Reds who despise Democracy but who use the word to cover their Communistic designs.

Incidentally, amongst the signers of the original letter for aid to the Reds was Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Maurice Van Praag, Manager of the New York Philharmonic.

What are we Catholics going to do about it? Mr. Rapee apologizes and then denies his apology by subsequent endorsement of Red musical benefits in New York. Mr. Koussevitzky, when he comes to Brooklyn with his Boston Symphony Orchestra, depends upon Catholic support in the Brooklyn Academy of Music and elsewhere.

There is only one thing to do about it. Every reader of this letter should send a letter to the Managing Director of the Radio Center Music Hall acquainting him with the fact that Catholics and all other American citizens who are opposed to the Red Government of Spain will not attend any performance at the Radio Center as long as Mr. Erno Rapee is Director of the Music Hall Symphony Orchestra. A similar letter should be sent to the Brooklyn Academy of Music acquainting the management with the fact that no Catholic or other American citizen opposed to the Red Government of Spain will patronize any concert given by Mr. Koussevitzky. Another letter should be sent to the New York Philharmonic stating that no Catholic patronage will be given to the Orchestra this season because of Mr. Van Praag's sympathies for the Red Government and for Communism in Spain.

A little action of this kind will be an education to those musicians who, like Mr. Rapee and Mr. Koussevitzky, allow their names to be used to collect funds for the Red side and the Red Government against which the Nationalists and the Spanish people have risen. How much longer will Catholics in America continue to support those who pour contempt and ridicule on the letter of the Spanish Bishops who clearly reveal that the issue in Spain is between Communism, as represented by the Valencia Government, and civilization, as represented by the Nationalists?

R. Edward Lodge Curran,
President.
International Catholic Truth Society,
Brooklyn, Nov. 6.

Emma Boynet with Symphony

Emma Boynet, French pianist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week. She will play Mozart's Concerto in C major.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

NOV 14 1937

Recording Is An Intricate Process

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK — (AP). — The phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious. Much music has been done four times already—once in the old mechanical method; once when this method had been improved; once when electrical recording came in; again recently, because electric recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there is no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

Television may likewise do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long playing record may be produced. And so on.

* * *

RECORDING is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording studio was as fixed as a mountain — artists were brought to it from all corners of the world.

Studios still are maintained in strategic locations, of course —New York, Chicago and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But it can be taken places, and it is generally cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

It weighs several tons—nobody seems to have thought to weigh it exactly. Mostly it can go places by express, the more delicate parts are carried by the recording crew as personal baggage.

As a matter of fact, each man has his favorite recorder, which he values as much as Heifetz values his two best violins. These recorders are adjusted to infinitesimal precision; some recording experts prefer one adjustment, some another.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being 13 inches in diameter and one and a half inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" to do, the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for the Victor company, and Charles O'Connell, who does everything from conducting symphony orchestras to figuring record lengths on important jobs.

* * *

RECORDING men insist there is nothing in the musical world surer than the pitch of a given tone on a record; always it will reproduce truly if the machine is turning at the correct speed.

This matter of pitch also does its tricks. One day the Beethoven Eighth Symphony was being done at Boston. The first two movements were completed one day; next morning the third, or scherzo, was recorded.

Koussevitzky listened to the playback on the scherzo, and exclaimed: "It's a half tone sharp." It was, too.

This was corrected immediately and the result played once more for Koussevitzky. "Yes," said he, "the pitch is right, but that's not my tempo. It's a shade slow."

He was correct again, although probably not one musician in a thousand could have told it.

Much recording is done in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where the orchestra plays in the empty hall, using the regular stage set designed for it by Leopold Stokowski. No acoustical doctoring is necessary, though in Symphony hall, Boston, and Carnegie hall, New York, curtains and such like are sometimes hung.

* * *

MICROPHONE placement is often as tricky as anything else. There are two kinds of mikes—unidirectional, which means the mike absorbs the sound as it sweeps in a straight line from the performer; velocity, which focuses on particular sections of the whole.

Probably the trickiest problem with mikes was recording the enormous Wanamaker organ in Philadelphia. This is so large that 20 symphony orchestras could be seated in the space it requires. It is built into a store, on several floors, with a rotunda to complicate the course of the sound waves.

At first the records were filled with mysterious sounds like doors opening and shutting, squeaks, and so on. These were only the usual small noises around a big organ, but they insisted on recording themselves. Finally, by a long course of experiments, the microphones were placed so as to pick up tone and not noise. Fortunately, the result was like an organ playing in a great cathedral, instead of a retail store.

The technical principles of manufacturing records have been improved, yet remain basically the same as of old. What most people do not realize is, however, that their records are never stamped from the master record, once this is completed.

This is never used for anything but making stamps from which, in turn, records are pressed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 19 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS BRILLIANTLY AT CARNEGIE

The Boston Symphony is with us again and musical New York signified its joy in the event by turning out last night in gala de gala, filling Carnegie Hall to the last bit of standing room and remaining after the concert's close to cheer Mr. Koussevitzky and his incomparable musicians.

Two staples of the symphonic repertory composed almost a century apart made up the program. They were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Sibelius's Second.

We have heard more heroic interpretations of the "Eroica" than Mr. Koussevitzky's, but he gave last night a closely knit performance with wonderful grasp of Beethoven's architecture and at the same time with the subtilest shading of dynamics and modeling of the melodic line. The dirge of the famous second movement was so restrained as to be almost objective. Yet it achieved a depth that might have been denied to a purely emotional approach, thus proving again that classicism has its place even in the interpretation of Beethoven's so-called romantic works.

In spite of the chronological abyss that separates the Beethoven from the Sibelius, it was interesting last night to see how much they had in common.

The latter work was particularly well designed to show the prowess of the famous Boston winds. Here again Koussevitzky was restrained, cunningly emphasizing the darker colors in the composer's palette until he came to the exultant peroration of the final movement. There at last he unleashed all the orchestral splendor at his disposal, and listeners knew that the Boston Symphony was with us again.

Their next concert is tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

E. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 20 1937

Music Notes

Boston Symphony Opens Season at the Academy

Koussevitzky Conducts Program of Ravel, Haydn And Sibelius Works

There should have been a great demonstration of shouting and cheering at the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's initial concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. There was only enough applause to constitute an ovation.

The renowned band from Massachusetts with its master conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, never plays less than magnificently, and last night that magnificence was lent to one of the greatest pieces of modern music. The consequences were stupendous.

For the novelty side of the program there was Maurice Ravel's jazzy one-movement concerto for the left-hand which the Frenchman wrote for the one-armed pianist, Paul Wittgenstein, in 1931. Jacques Fevrier of Paris was the soloist last night and did his difficult part capably enough. Echoes of the famed Bolero which Ravel wrote earlier are in this ingenious work, combined with an imaginitive use of jazz effects and poignant lyricism.

The other number was Haydn's symphony in G Major, and exquisite composition of whose slow movement Brahms once said: "I want my Ninth Symphony to be like this."

In all of these, the Boston band played with an unvarying rightness of every beat and phrase, and with a glowing transparency of tone and texture that made just hearing the sound of the orchestra an exciting experience.

The immense Sibelius symphony is a Koussevitzky specialty. Under his inspired direction, the musicians played it with ritualistic fervor—this music, almost naked in its simplicity; alternately pastoral with echoes of dances, and peculiarly evocative of vast spaces in tis ruggedness and savagery.

The might and breadth of the finale was dramatically realized, its great masses of tone built up from the incendiary theme to a climax that overpowered the listener with its conflagration.

Four more Boston Symphony concerts will be presented at the Academy this season under the auspices of hte Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the next one on Jan. 7.

H. E.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD - TIMES

NOV 19 1937

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS IN NEW YORK

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, tonally ~~perhaps~~ the finest orchestra in the world, opened its 52nd season by giving a series of concerts here. Only two New York engagements have been missed by the orchestra in more than half a century, one caused by the blizzard of 1888 and the other by the death of a conductor.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has chosen two symphonies for the opening programs, one Beethoven's "Eroica" and the other Sibelius' "Second Symphony in D Major." The first matinee Saturday will present a young French pianist, Jacques Pevrier, in his New York debut.

ONLY CONCERT OF SEASON

Serge Rachmaninoff's only New York recital of the season will take place in Carnegie Hall, next Saturday afternoon, Nov. 27. He will play four of his own preludes besides works by Liszt, Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, and Wagner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

NOV 20 1937

Boston Symphony At Bklyn. Academy

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, appeared last evening in the Brooklyn Academy of Music in the first of five concerts to be given there this season.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program, besides holding over the second symphony of Sibelius from his first Carnegie Hall concert, included also the symphony in G major of Haydn (B. & H. No. 13, and the Ravel piano concerto for the left hand. The soloist in the last named was Jacques Fevrier, son of the eminent French composer, Henri Fevrier.

Ravel's splendid work, which was introduced here several years ago by the same orchestra with the one-armed pionist Paul Wittgenstein as soloist, came ver ynear being the high spot of the night. Mr. Fevrier, with his right hand tightly clasping his knee, went through the amazing protechnics of the music in masterful fashion. And when sensuous melody became the order o fthings for the piano there was sensuous playing to brng it out, notwithstanding the extremely difficult counter-effect of arpeggios.

R. C. B.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

[illegible]

Courtesy at the Concert

To the Editor of The Times:

Hartford has been called a city of music lovers, which seems very well borne out by the large audience at the Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday evening. However, if these people in attendance are true music lovers, it is difficult to explain their discourteous action to Dr. Koussevtsky and the orchestra, in leaving the concert hall before the last notes had died away. This action would seem to justify the remark that some people go to concerts to parade before the public.

Let us justify the fine reputation we have as true music lovers, true to the extent of showing our appreciation by being courteous. This it would seem is askng very little of all of us in return for the enjoyment we receive. The next test will be on Dec. 4. EDWARD C. SOMMER.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 18 1937

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY THRILLS AUDIENCE IN CONCERT HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned ~~to~~ thrill ~~a~~ capacity audience last evening as second event in the Woolsey Series of concerts. The familiar figure of Dr. Serge Kousevitzky assumed its usual place as master of ceremonies in a program distinguished by the inclusion of two works by contemporary musiicans of established fame. The third work was a Symphony by Josef Haydn, in G Major, from the Paris set.

All three of the composers included in last evening's music have enjoyed favor under their respective political regimes. Serge Prokofieff is now living in Russia as chief representative of the musical profession acknowledged by the Soviet Union, and Richard Strauss holds a high position in determining the musical policies of the eGrman Reich; each has come to his present political relation after the healing of considerable differences of opinion. Haydn's loose bond was, for the most part, constant, and always exceedingly pleasant Furthermore, these works by Prokofieff and Strauss were case histories, the one of "Lieutentnt Kije," manufactured out of thin air, and the other, a hero who may or may not be the composer himself.

150 Years Young

Dr. Koussevitsky has a way with Haydn. He makes hm seem so very important without inflating him. The imitation of a hurdy-gurdy in the trio, and the rustic dance must have been like a breath of fresh aid at the stuffy Concert Spirituel of Paris 150 years ago when Haydn delivered the order for a dozen symphonies with works such as these.

Prokofieff and Strauss each share a predilection for orchestral sound, and each is master of whatever technical resources are necessary to express either the thought or program at hand. Prokofieff chose a program as ledineated by a moving picture, and resigned half of the function of music to the shadow substance. Even so, it is events, not the ideas, of his hero's life which come through; the use of an elaborate orchestra to dress him sandsomely with saxaphone and celesta trimmings does not save "Lieutenant Kije" from being a stuffed shirt. As for Prokofieff's former rich harmonies contained in the Sythian Suite (played here last year), Haydn would blush to be so restricted in the year of grace 1934. It has been said that Prokofieff seems to "suffer from a permanent spiritual adolescence; one does not feel that . . . his undoubted talent will evven reach a convincing fruition." These are hard words perhaps, unduly severe for application to one of the composer's lesser productions.

A Full Life

Strauss knew full well the value of prodigious techniue to eke out a minimum of subject matter. A Hero's Life" sounds as only the Straussian orchestra can sound, with a glory and brilliance whih had no ounterpart in its ti me exept for Berlioz's day. Despite the pretentious nonsense of several parts, notably the battle scene (did you ever hear Wellington's Victory by Beethoven, or the Overture to Reinzi by Wagner?) and the unconscionabl time the piece takes in dying, the sore retains a high plac in the literature of the tone-poem. 'Opulent vulgarity" it may be in parts, but none may deny the thrill of its best pages.
Heldenleben" forth with a grandeur

The players and conductor set "Ein and a glory that was Bostonian at its best; no orchestra in the world today has the unity of mind and purpose, and the perfected ensemble gained under a single conductor which makes duplication possible. Instrumental playing can be no finer, and the composer—how much more the living composer!—may be profoundly grateful that such things are, and that both Strauss and Prokofieff can be played on the same program in America!

The audience heaped merited applause on the several soloists in both contemporary works, and upon all and sundry for a rarely stimulating evening.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 14 1937

Disc Business Growing, but What's Next?

NEW YORK, N. Y.-(AP)-The phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious. Much music has been done four times already: Once in the old mechanical method; once when this method had been improved; once when electrical recording came in; again recently, because electric recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there is no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

Television, likewise, may do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long-playing record may be produced. And so on.

More Equipment Now

Recording is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording studio was as fixed as a mountain—artists were brought to it from all corners of the world.

Studios still are maintained in strategic locations, of course—New York, Chicago and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But it can be taken places, and it is generally cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being 13 inches in diameter and 1½ inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" to do, the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for the Victor Co., and Charles O'Connell, who does everything from conducting symphony orchestras to figuring record lengths on important jobs.

The performance was being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with a Boston chorus ~~and of course~~ the Boston symphony. But there was only one performance, since it was all a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund, and it was necessary to record with the audience in the hall.

Thrown Out of Gear

Four recorders were set up, working in pairs. Mr. O'Connell did the delicate job of dividing the work into record-length sections, and found there would be 54 of these. He arranged for the records to end, as often as possible, on a tonic chord—or at least a chord not too tantalizing to the ear. It looked like a snap, on paper, once the job was done. The trouble was that of the 54 "sides," only two worked out exactly. Slight delays, changes of tempo, soloists a little slow in getting under way threw the whole thing out of gear.

The job was done in one sitting however, and if it had been made the usual way, five recording sessions would have been needed. When the work is released around the end of the year, the most experienced listeners will not know that on one record the factory found exactly one-half of one eighth note. This bit of sound was not only transferred to the next record, but in exact time.

The recorders do not use electric motors, these being subject to slight speed fluctuations. Gravity motors are used, and lugging the huge weights for these about the land is one reason why equipment is so heavy.

A True Tone, but—

Recording men insist there is nothing in the musical world surer than the pitch of a given tone on a record; always it will reproduce truly if the machine is turning at the correct speed.

This matter of pitch also does its tricks. One day the Beethoven Eighth symphony was being done at Boston. The first two movements were completed one day; next morning the third was recorded.

Koussevitzky listened to the playback on the third and explained: "It's a half tone sharp." It was, too.

This was corrected immediately, and the result played once more for Koussevitzky. "Yes," said he, "the pitch is right, but that's not my tempo. It's a shade slow."

He was correct again, although probably not one musician in a thousand could have told it.

Much recording is done in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where the orchestra plays in the empty hall, using the regular stage set designed for it by Leopold Stokowski. No acoustical doctoring is necessary, though in Symphony hall, Boston, and Carnegie hall, New York, curtains and such like are sometimes hung.

Carnegie hall sees little recording, although Messrs. Wallenstein and O'Connell recall ruefully one experience there with Toscanini. A lot of money had been spent to record some music with the spike-moustached little Italian. When he heard the playback he refused to approve a single thing.

DARIEN, CONN.
WEEKLY REVIEW

NOV 18 1937

First Symphony Concert Nov. 29

The Stamford Symphony Orchestra, comprised of 60 members from Stamford, Darien, Norwalk, New Canaan, Greenwich and Old Greenwich, will present its first concert of the winter series of three at the Stamford High School auditorium, Monay evening, November 29. Other concerts are scheduled for March 7 and May 2.

Hugo Kortschak, head of the violin school of the Yale Music School, is again conducting, this marking his third year with the orchestra. Mr. Kortschak is a graduate of the Prague Conservatory and has been a member of the Berlin Philharmonic, playing in the violin section and second concertmaster of the Chicago Symphony. As a conductor, he has led the Berkshire String Quartet and now devotes his summers to directing the Little Trio of the Music Box at Cummington, Mass. Also he has founded and developed the Manhattan String Quartet. He is associate director of the New Haven Orchestra.

The guest soloist for the concert November 29 will be Miss Orrea Purnel, a young English violinist who is making her debut in this country this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As the Symphony is the only organization of its kind in this section, it has the patronage of music lovers in communities adjacent to Stamford as well as a large following in Stamford.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC

Martha Baird Is Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra in Excellent Concert.—Debussy, Rachmaninoff Chamber Works Heard

By G. Y. Loveridge

Mighty deeds of music were accomplished by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the command of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Metropolitan Theatre last night. It was the second concert of the orchestra's Providence season. The program was a good one, and the theatre was well filled.

The soloist was Martha Baird, of this city. She played the Mozart piano concerto in D-minor, and was received with gratifying enthusiasm by an audience that numbered many of her close friends and hundreds of other persons delighted to hear a Providence artist as soloist with so distinguished an orchestra. Miss Baird, who in private life is Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, was recalled five times to acknowledge the applause.

The concerto is not a difficult one, as far as playing the notes goes, but it requires refinement, grace and delicacy in the execution of it, and these qualities Miss Baird brought to it in abundance. At no time did she try to make it seem heavily dramatic or otherwise cloud and conceal the lucid flow of it. Minor key or no minor key, Eric Blom or no Eric Blom, we are unable to see much storm and stress in this concerto; it is wistful in season, and it has that nostalgia for imagined places that is pat of the strength of Mozart, but mostly it ripples and purls and dances.

There is no lack of supple vigor in this music. It must be played evenly and surely, and that is the way Miss Baird played it, with humor, too, and with affection. At times her turns were not sufficiently fluent and the tone was occasionally hard, but the impression was distinctly that of an artistic success.

Miss Baird played the Beethoven cadenzas very ably. It is our feeling, very likely unreasonable, that cadenzas ought to be done away with, that they add nothing essential to the performance, but rather hinder it. However, it is somewhat late to change so venerable a custom, and if we must have cadenzas, let them by all means be written by Beethoven.

The romanza received particularly gracious treatment at Miss Baird's hands. We should have liked to hear it over, for it is the sort of thing that Mozart could do better than anybody else and that Miss Baird sets forth with charm and distinction.

And what orchestral support! A famous violinist once said to us, after soloing with the Bostonians, "They hand it to you on a golden platter." And so they do.

There were two symphonies on the program, the Unfinished of Schubert, and the second of Sibelius. If the Unfinished has ever been played better than it was last night, one would surely have to hear it to believe it. Immediately, in the suave whisper of the 'cellos and the hushed voices of a score of violins playing as one, the quality of this orchestra was apparent. As fragile as a dream was this music wrought by Dr. Koussevitzky from the tones of strings, woodwinds, horns. These are the kind of moments that people go to concerts for. They make one forget taxes, politics and peace treaties. They prove that the 20th century can offer something nobler tha the hamburger sandwich.

How odd a contrast was th Sibelius! The Boston Orchestra ha been a powerful advocate of Sibeliu for years and years, and gets the utmost from his music. We shall hav to join the outcasts who find nothin of sunny Italy in this symphony, bu prefer to feel northern winds, an hear the rude crashing of arctic seas Sibelius declines to offer a program for his symphonies, so it would be indecorous of anybody else to do so but doesn't one hear giants in thi mysterious work, and feel the long brooding darkness of the north? Artists often express a particular fondness for a small corner of some expansive painting, and so in this music one may find many favorite corners, such as the melody of oboes in the third movement, and that par of the finale where the bass players try to tear the strings off the instruments.

A Boston Symphony climax is like being tossed in blanket. One rises rhythmically higher and higher, and finally seems to hang suspended fo a moment in the very clouds. Wha brings one down in blanket-tossing is gravity; what bring one to earth after a concert is the traffic jam. Apparently both are immutable.

The Debussy string quartet, Opus 10, and the Rachmaninoff sonata for 'cello and piano, Opus 19, were performed in the School of Design Museum chamber music series yesterday afternoon.

It was one of the most interesting of the eight concerts thus far given. For the first time, it seemed to us, it was possible to discover a decided similarity in feeling, between paintings and music of the same period. In the main gallery there are impressionistic pictures that, even in coloring, were akin to the quartet.

It is a lovely bit of music, and it was exquisitely played. It has the languorous atmosphere and pale, poetic tints so characteristic of Debussy. The harmonies are as fugitive and tenuous as a rainbow, and as mystical. It is difficult to understand, in these presumably enlightened days, why Debussy's music was not at first appreciated.

The Musical Art Quartet played with delicacy and insight. They understood the work thoroughly, and they made the listeners understand it. This is music that one comprehends not so much by logic as by feeling; it deserves to be called great. Of the many fine performances by the quartet, this was one of the best. The players were Sascha Jacobsen, first violin; Paul Bernard, second violin; William Hymanson, viola, and Marie Romaet-Rosanoff, 'cello.

Mme. Rosanoff and Frank Sheridan, pianist, played the sonata. In this work: 'cello and piano are of about equal importance; it is not merely a 'cello solo with piano accompaniment, nor has the composer assigned the piano too great a share. The artists gave a remarkably smooth and unified performance. Mme. Rosanoff's Strad has an unusually noble tone; it speaks richly and with calm assurance, as though it were somehow aware of its position in the world. All its strings are good ones; in any register it has authority and depth. Simply to watch the bowing and the evenness and accuracy of the left hand was a pleasure; to hear the result made the occasion memorable.

The andante gave the best opportunity to enjoy the full beauty of tone of this instrument. It is real 'cello music, melodious, soaring, broadly lyrical. Mme. Rosanoff played it splendidly.

Mr. Sheridan presided at the piano with his accustomed skill, tempering the power of the instrument to the 'cello with exactitude, creating an elaborate tapestry of tone on which the 'cello wove its own contrasting pattern. His playing is always strong and certain, the tone full, the accent precise.

The artists were applauded with sustained fervour. They returned to the platform several times.

Tonight's program:

NOV. 10
MAURICE RAVEL (1875-
String Quartet in F
Allegro moderato—Tres doux
Assez vif—Tres rythme
tres lent
Vif et agite
ERNST VON DOHNANYI (1877-
Quintet in E flat minor, Opus 26 for piano and string quartet
Allegro non troppo
Intermezzo—Allegretto
Moderato

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 14 1937

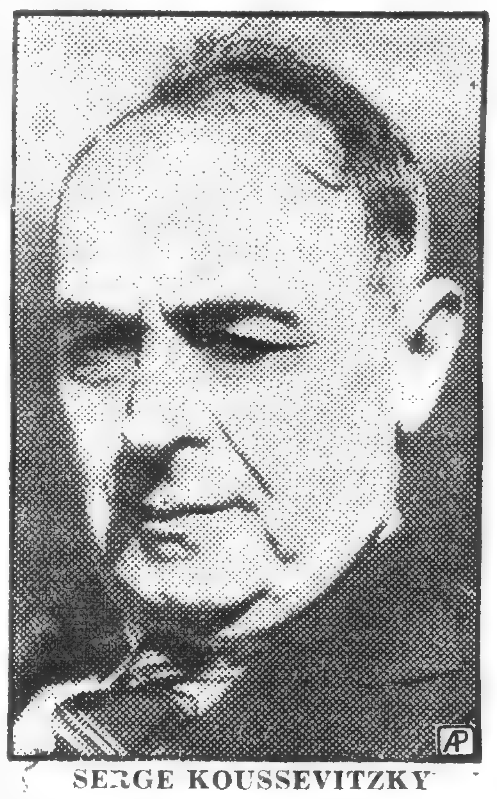
Boston Symphony To Play Wednesday

UNDER the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed Russian leader of the 110 piece musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town this coming Wednesday evening to play in Woolsey Hall, the event marking the second concert of the current season's Woolsey Hall Series. A brilliant program has been arranged by the distinguished Russian conductor, who this season is conducting the orchestra for his 14th consecutive year. The evening of great music will open with Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, and continue with Prokofieff's Orchestral Suite, "Lieutenant Kije." The third and concluding selection will be Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), a selection that should round out one of the finest orchestral programs ever presented in this city.

Although a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is naturally an important event in any music-minded community, the presence of the esteemed director never fails to divide the attention of the auditors, so much has been written and said of this great musician.

Dr. Koussezitzky was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except for small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The school was full—the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant, and made a place for him. There was only one posible scholarship open—for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astounded everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone, and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass, with its fist-wise bow. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tones and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso on the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilties, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instuments, the hundred-fold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, and gave cocneerts there in St. Petersburg.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on this infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric.

Koussevitsky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, taking to the musically-starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, Western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and foreful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. In his 14 seasons at the head of the great orchestra, he has touched new heights of his art, and brought the orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of seasons to test the cope of a conductor' interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

The complete program- of Wednesday evening's concert, which commences at 8:30, is as follows:

Haydn . . . Symphony in G. major, No. 88 (B. & H. No. 13)
I. Adagio; Allegro
II. Largo
III. Menuetto; Trio
IX. Finale; Allegro con Brio
Prokofieff . . . "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60
I. Birth of Kije
II. Romance
III. Kije's Wedding.
IV. Troika
V. Burial of Kije
INTERMISSION
Strauss . . . "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), Op. 40.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 18 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS CONCERT

Woolsey Hall Program Features Music Written for Soviet Film.

BY SUSAN BREUL

Music written for a Soviet film was featured last night on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra when Serge Koussevitsky conducted his first concert of the season at Woolsey Hall in New Haven.

Performed for the first time in America about a month ago, the incidental music to the comedy "Lieutenant Kije" was written in 1933 by Serge Prokofieff, a Russian ex-patriate who has lived successively in Japan, London, Paris and Chicago. The suite which Koussevitsky performed last night was arranged by the composer in 1934.

The score of "Lieutenant Kije" is ideal movie music, interesting in its own right and apparently descriptive of the action and characters in the film. Unlike the nondescript improvisations of so much Hollywood movie music it falls into no routine formulas but has its own original and vivid personality.

As a piece of contemporary writing it is typical of the "new music," in a straight-from the-shoulder idiom, debunked of the soul searching romanticism of the last century The composer's choice of subject is typical of contemporary musical attitudes for most musicians are eager to write for the films not only because of movie salaries, which, we understand, are good even in the U. S. S. R. but because movies today are the vital concern of thousands of ordinary people.

(Cont. above left)

With simple harmonics and rhythms Prokofieff's score gains piquancy from his use of instruments, a gay flute and piccolo duet accompanied by snare drum and pizzicato strings, a bass fiddle solo, a bassoon and flute duet. Incidental chromatics add to the score with a change of keys, on the way up a melody and return to scratch on the way down.

The remainder of last night's program was occupied by a Haydn G major symphony and the ponderous tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" by the 73-year-old Richard Strauss. Unlike the miraculous "Tod und Verklarung," "Ein Heldendeben" seems definitely dated, smacking of the horse-hair sofa and stuffy parlor of another age. Despite compelling themes and patches of expert development the piece as a whole begins to tarnish and wear out at the seams. Besides the pungent wit of the Haydn and Prokofieff its musical psychoanalysis sounds dry and labored.

Koussevitsky led the orchestra with his customary elegance and insight into the music. The orchestra responded in their best style.

RIVERSIDE, CAL.
ENTERPRISE

NOV 25 1937

First Woman Conductor

For the first time in its 57 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 17 1937

NEW SYMPHONIC SERIES OPENED BY BOSTONIANS

Prokofieff Novelty Brightens Program with Haydn and Strauss

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

A new Bushnell symphonic series began last night with some of the eclat that has come to be expected of it and music making of a kind that could be produced only by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When it was all over, the evening seemed to have been brief although the program was of conventional length. Dr. Koussevitzky was received as a friend is received, with cordiality, perhaps even warmth of a relative kind for he has been here many trips now, but although he was recalled a very proper number of times, it is doubtful that emanations of enthusiasm came to him very strongly from the auditorium. Richard Burgin, who should be known by this time, made his solitary entry twice unrecognized.

Dr. Koussevitzky has shrewdly written that the audience is an important agent in music making. With such an authority it may not be out of place to elaborate by saying that the spiritual resonance or lack of it in listeners can make or mar anybody's concert. Last night the orchestra did its part nobly, even to the point of unwrapping a bright new novelty which was received with as sophomoric impartiality as Strauss or Haydn. The fault may have been Prokofieff's, a point which will bear examining presently. Our culture has reached a high stage, so high that there is danger of visiting orchestras from naive and unenlightened Boston, Philadelphia and New York finding out how sophisticated we are and so become self-conscious and disheartened in our presence. They'll keep coming anyway but the music won't be so good.

Two Heroes

A pair of legendary characters came to life in this concert. Both of them cut the merriest sort of capers for their brief whiles, both died in such respective fashions that none could shed a tear, for the execution of Till Eulenspiegel never was any more real than the vaporous plane to which Lieutenant Kije was so comically restored when it was discovered that he never had an existence anyhow.

Between these two lugubrious scherzos in which death's name is taken in vain was a genuine mortuary ode whose habiliments were never more grand nor ghastly. Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" has upon occasion been found literal and grandiloquent. An ordinary reading can make it seem so. If the performance really reaches up to this music as it did last night, lays hold of it and lets nothing escape, it becomes an experience as indelible as it is undecipherable. It doesn't matter who wrote it or when, the listener owns it more than the author ever did.

Artful Program

This was an artfully contrived program. The Haydn Symphony in G (B. & H. No. 13), apparently a favorite with Koussevitzky, was so disarming in its zest and friendliness that one felt no qualms in having checked possible weapons of prejudice and preconception at the door. After the hearty minuet and the bubbling finale, the mood was set to meet "Lieutenant Kije" or anybody else.

This humoresque, in short, was Prokofieff. He was easily recognizable even with most of the whiskers of dissonance shaved off, leaving only as much of it as would do for a moustache—and a waxed one at that. There were the same brittle, bloodless tunes that Prokofieff long ago proved he could write, but tunes they are, and brittle and bloodless though they may be, they stay with you. The tune which obviously represents Kije, the imaginary officer who grew out of a misunderstanding between a stupid Czar and his obsequious courtiers, has quaintness and charm; every once in a while it turns on a curiously vacant, maybe satirical, modulation.

Easily Understood

The suite is somewhat repetitious within its five sections—Birth of Kije, Romance, Kije's Wedding, Troika and Burial of Kije—and it is ventured that here have been adaptations since its se as incidental music for a film. omehow you miss the film. Taken y itself the music is quite intelligible nd even after first hearing you feel ou know all about it—be that a fault r a virtue.

Some strange timbres are brought nto individual focus, there being olos for double bass, saxophone, lesta and an obbligato for sleigh-lls, somewhat after the fashion of a laboratory piece for a music appreciation class. There are many clev moments, nevertheless, not the leas of which is the dropping of individual notes from the Kije tune leaving gaps in the theme at the passing of Kije by etherealization.

The performance of Till Eulenspiegel was the most audacious imaginable. The effectiveness of the score is implicit but this virtuoso rendition was fairly stunning. Kije will come to mind at recollection's beck, but Till will be remembered.

(58)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC

Martha Baird Is Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra in Excellent Concert.—Debussy, Rachmaninoff Chamber Works Heard

By G. Y. Loveridge

Mighty deeds of music were accomplished by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the command of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Metropolitan Theatre last night. It was the second concert of the orchestra's Providence season. The program was a good one, and the theatre was well filled.

The soloist was Martha Baird, of this city. She played the Mozart piano concerto in D-minor, and was received with gratifying enthusiasm by an audience that numbered many of her close friends and hundreds of other persons delighted to hear a Providence artist as soloist with so distinguished an orchestra. Miss Baird, who in private life is Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, was recalled five times to acknowledge the applause.

The concerto is not a difficult one, as far as playing the notes goes, but it requires refinement, grace and delicacy in the execution of it, and these qualities Miss Baird brought to it in abundance. At no time did she try to make it seem heavily dramatic or otherwise cloud and conceal the lucid flow of it. Minor key or no minor key, Eric Blom or no Eric Blom, we are unable to see much storm and stress in this concerto; it is wistful in season, and it has that nostalgia for imagined places that is pat of the strength of Mozart, but mostly it ripples and purls and dances.

There is no lack of supple vigor in this music. It must be played evenly and surely, and that is the way Miss Baird played it, with humor, too, and with affection. At times her turns were not sufficiently fluent and the tone was occasionally hard, but the impression was distinctly that of an artistic success.

Miss Baird played the Beethoven cadenzas very ably. It is our feeling, very likely unreasonable, that cadenzas ought to be done away with, that they add nothing essential to the performance, but rather hinder it. However, it is somewhat late to change so venerable a custom, and if we must have cadenzas, let them by all means be written by Beethoven.

The romanza received particularly gracious treatment at Miss Baird's hands. We should have liked to hear it over, for it is the sort of thing that Mozart could do better than anybody else and that Miss Baird sets forth with charm and distinction.

And what orchestral support! A famous violinist once said to us, after soloing with the Bostonians, "They hand it to you on a golden platter." And so they do.

There were two symphonies on the program, the Unfinished of Schubert, and the second of Sibelius. If the Unfinished has ever been played better than it was last night, one would surely have to hear it to believe it. Immediately, in the suave whisper of the 'cellos and the hushed voices of a score of violins playing as one, the quality of this orchestra was apparent. As fragile as a dream was this music wrought by Dr. Koussevitzky from the tones of strings, woodwinds, horns. These are the kind of moments that people go to concerts for. They make one forget taxes, politics and peace treaties. They prove that the 20th century can offer something nobler than the hamburger sandwich.

How odd a contrast was the Sibelius! The Boston Orchestra has been a powerful advocate of Sibelius for years and years, and gets the utmost from his music. We shall have to join the outcasts who find nothing of sunny Italy in this symphony, but prefer to feel northern winds, and hear the rude crashing of arctic seas. Sibelius declines to offer a program for his symphonies, so it would be indecorous of anybody else to do so, but doesn't one hear giants in this mysterious work, and feel the long brooding darkness of the north? Artists often express a particular fondness for a small corner of some expansive painting, and so in this music one may find many favorite corners, such as the melody of oboes in the third movement, and that part of the finale where the bass players try to tear the strings off the instruments.

A Boston Symphony climax is like being tossed in blanket. One rises rhythmically higher and higher, and finally seems to hang suspended for a moment in the very clouds. What brings one down in blanket-tossing is gravity; what bring one to earth after a concert is the traffic jam. Apparently both are immutable.

The Debussy string quartet, Opus 10, and the Rachmaninoff sonata for 'cello and piano, Opus 19, were performed in the School of Design Museum chamber music series yesterday afternoon.

It was one of the most interesting of the eight concerts thus far given. For the first time, it seemed to us, it was possible to discover a decided similarity in feeling, between paintings and music of the same period. In the main gallery there are impressionistic pictures that, even in coloring, were akin to the quartet.

It is a lovely bit of music, and it was exquisitely played. It has the languorous atmosphere and pale, poetic tints so characteristic of Debussy. The harmonies are as fugitive and tenuous as a rainbow, and as mystical. It is difficult to understand, in these presumably enlightened days, why Debussy's music was not at first appreciated.

The Musical Art Quartet played with delicacy and insight. They understood the work thoroughly, and they made the listeners understand it. This is music that one comprehends not so much by logic as by feeling; it deserves to be called great. Of the many fine performances by the quartet, this was one of the best. The players were Sascha Jacobsen, first violin; Paul Bernard, second violin; William Hymanson, viola, and Marie Romaet-Rosanoff, 'cello.

Mme. Rosanoff and Frank Sheridan, pianist, played the sonata. In this work, 'cello and piano are of about equal importance; it is not merely a 'cello solo with piano accompaniment, nor has the composer assigned the piano too great a share. The artists gave a remarkably smooth and unified performance. Mme. Rosanoff's Strad has an unusually noble tone; it speaks richly and with calm assurance, as though it were somehow aware of its position in the world. All its strings are good ones; in any register it has authority and depth. Simply to watch the bowing and the evenness and accuracy of the left hand was a pleasure; to hear the result made the occasion memorable.

The andante gave the best opportunity to enjoy the full beauty of tone of this instrument. It is real 'cello music, melodious, soaring, broadly lyrical. Mme. Rosanoff played it splendidly.

Mr. Sheridan presided at the piano with his accustomed skill, tempering the power of the instrument to the 'cello with exactitude, creating an elaborate tapestry of tone on which the 'cello wove its own contrasting pattern. His playing is always strong and certain, the tone full, the accent precise.

The artists were applauded with sustained fervour. They returned to the platform several times.

Tonight's program:

NOV. 10
MAURICE RAVEL (1875-
String Quartet in F
Allegro moderato—Tres doux
Assez vif—Tres rythme
tres lent
Vif el agite
ERNST VON DOHNANYI (1877-
Quintet in E flat minor, Opus 26 for piano and string quartet
Allegro non troppo
Intermezzo—Allegretto
Moderato

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 14 1937

Boston Symphony To Play Wednesday

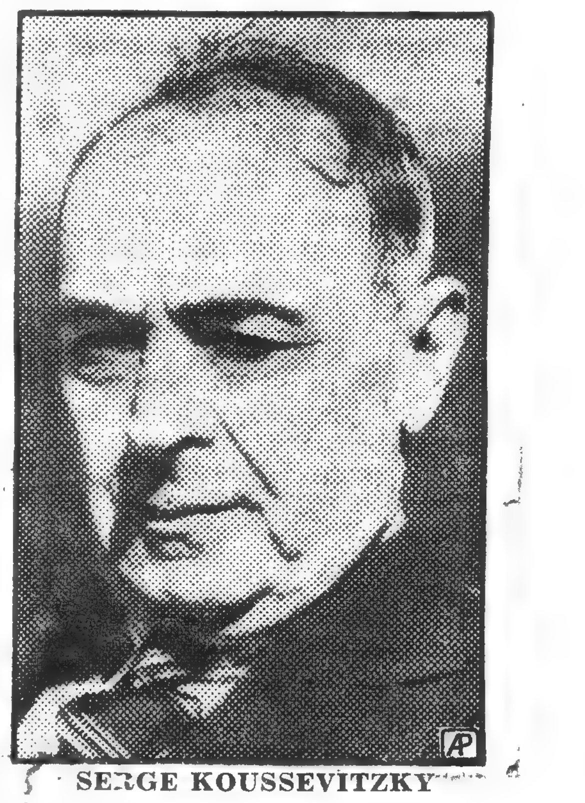
E

UNDER the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed Russian leader of the 110 piece musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town this coming Wednesday evening to play in Woolsey Hall, the event marking the second cencert of the current season's Woolsey Hall Series. A brilliant program has been arranged by the distinguished Russian conductor, who this season is conducting the orchestra for his 14th consecutive year. The evening of great music will open with Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, and continue with Prokofieff's Orchestral Suite, "Lieutenant Kije." The third and concluding selection will be Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), a selection that should round out one of the finest orchestral programs ever presented in this city.

Although a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is naturally an important event in any music-minded community, the presence of the esteemed director never fails to divide the attention of the auditors, so much has been written and said of this great musician.

Dr. Koussezitzky was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except for small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The school was full—the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant, and made a place for him. There was only one posible scholarship open—for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astounded everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone, and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass, with its fist-wise bow. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tones and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso on the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilties, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instuments, the hundred-fold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, and gave cocneerts there in St. Petersburg.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on this infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric.

Koussevitsky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, taking to the musically-starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, Western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and foreful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. In his 14 seasons at the head of the great orchestra, he has touched new heights of his art, and brought the orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of seasons to test the cope of a conductor' interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

The complete program of Wednesday evening's concert, which commences at 8:30, is as follows:

Haydn . . . Symphony in G. major, No. 88 (B. & H. No. 13)
I. Adagio; Allegro
II. Largo
III. Menuetto; Trio
IX. Finale; Allegro con Brio
Prokofieff . . . "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60
I. Birth of Kije
II. Romance
III. Kije's Wedding.
IV. Troika
V. Burial of Kije
INTERMISSION
Strauss . . . "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), Op. 40.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 18 1937

KOUSSEVITSKY LEADS CONCERT

Woolsey Hall Program Features Music Written for Soviet Film.

BY SUSAN BREUL

Music written for a Soviet film was featured last night on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra when Serge Koussevitsky conducted his first concert of the season at Woolsey Hall in New Haven.

Performed for the first time in America about a month ago, the incidental music to the comedy "Lieutenant Kije" was written in 1933 by Serge Prokofieff, a Russian ex-patriate who has lived successively in Japan, London, Paris and Chicago. The suite which Koussevitsky performed last night was arranged by the composer in 1934.

The score of "Lieutenant Kije" is ideal movie music, interesting in its own right and apparently descriptive of the action and characters in the film. Unlike the nondescript improvisations of so much Hollywood movie music it falls into no routine formulas but has its own original and vivid personality.

As a piece of contemporary writing it is typical of the "new music," in a straight-from the-shoulder idiom, debunked of the soul searching romanticism of the last century The composer's choice of subject is typical of contemporary musical attitudes for most musicians are eager to write for the films not only because of movie salaries, which, we understand, are good even in the U. S. S. R. but because movies today are the vital concern of thousands of ordinary people.

Cont. above left

With simple harmonics and rhythms Prokofieff's score gains piquancy from his use of instruments, a gay flute and piccolo duet accompanied by snare drum and pizzicato strings, a bass fiddle solo, a bassoon and flute duet. Incidental chromatics add to the score with a change of keys, on the way up a melody and return to scratch on the way down.

The remainder of last night's program was occupied by a Haydn G major symphony and the ponderous tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" by the 73-year-old Richard Strauss. Unlike the miraculous "Tod und Verklarung," "Ein Heldendeben" seems definitely dated, smacking of the horsehair sofa and stuffy parlor of another age. Despite compelling themes and patches of expert development the piece as a whole begins to tarnish and wear out at the seams. Besides the pungent wit of the Haydn and Prokofieff its musical psychoanalysis sounds dry and labored.

Koussevitsky led the orchestra with his customary elegance and insight into the music. The orchestra responded in their best style.

RIVERSIDE, CAL.
ENTERPRISE

NOV 25 1937

First Woman Conductor

For the first time in its 57 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 17 1937

NEW SYMPHONIC SERIES OPENED BY BOSTONIANS

Prokofieff Novelty Brightens Program with Haydn and Strauss

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

A new Bushnell symphonic series began last night with some of the eclat that has come to be expected of it and music making of a kind that could be produced only by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When it was all over, the evening seemed to have been brief although the program was of conventional length. Dr. Koussevitzky was received as a friend is received, with cordiality, perhaps even warmth of a relative kind for he has been here many trips now, but although he was recalled a very proper number of times, it is doubtful that emanations of enthusiasm came to him very strongly from the auditorium. Richard Burgin, who should be known by this time, made his solitary entry twice unrecognized.

Dr. Koussevitzky has shrewdly written that the audience is an important agent in music making. With such an authority it may not be out of place to elaborate by saying that the spiritual resonance or lack of it in listeners can make or mar anybody's concert. Last night the orchestra did its part nobly, even to the point of unwrapping a bright new novelty which was received with as sophomoric impartiality as Strauss or Haydn. The fault may have been Prokofieff's, a point which will bear examining presently. Our culture has reached a high stage, so high that there is danger of visiting orchestras from naive and unenlightened Boston, Philadelphia and New York finding out how sophisticated we are and so become self-conscious and disheartened in our presence. They'll keep coming anyway but the music won't be so good.

Two Heroes

A pair of legendary characters came to life in this concert. Both of them cut the merriest sort of capers for their brief whiles, both died in such respective fashions that none could shed a tear, for the execution of Till Eulenspiegel never was any more real than the vaporous plane to which Lieutenant Kije was so comically restored when it was discovered that he never had an existence anyhow.

Between these two lugubrious scherzos in which death's name is taken in vain was a genuine mortuary ode whose habiliments were never more grand nor ghastly. Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" has upon occasion been found literal and grandiloquent. An ordinary reading can make it seem so. If the performance really reaches up to this music as it did last night, lays hold of it and lets nothing escape, it becomes an experience as indelible as it is undecipherable. It doesn't matter who wrote it or when, the listener owns it more than the author ever did.

Artful Program

This was an artfully contrived program. The Haydn Symphony in G (B. & H. No. 13), apparently a favorite with Koussevitzky, was so disarming in its zest and friendliness that one felt no qualms in having checked possible weapons of prejudice and preconception at the door. After the hearty minuet and the bubbling finale, the mood was set to meet "Lieutenant Kije" or anybody else.

This humoresque, in short, was Prokofieff. He was easily recognizable even with most of the whiskers of dissonance shaved off, leaving only as much of it as would do for a moustache—and a waxed one at that. There were the same brittle, bloodless tunes that Prokofieff long ago proved he could write, but tunes they are, and brittle and bloodless though they may be, they stay with you. The tune which obviously represents Kije, the imaginary officer who grew out of a misunderstanding between a stupid Czar and his obsequious courtiers, has quaintness and charm; every once in a while it turns on a curiously vacant, maybe satirical, modulation.

Easily Understood

The suite is somewhat repetitious within its five sections—Birth of Kije, Romance, Kije's Wedding, Troika and Burial of Kije—and it is ventured that there have been adaptations since its use as incidental music for a film. Somehow you miss the film. Taken by itself the music is quite intelligible and even after first hearing you feel you know all about it—be that a fault or a virtue.

Some strange timbres are brought to individual focus, there being solos for double bass, saxophone, celesta and an obbligato for sleighbells, somewhat after the fashion of a laboratory piece for a music appreciation class. There are many clever moments, nevertheless, not the least of which is the dropping of individual notes from the Kije tune leaving gaps in the theme at the passing of Kije by etherealization.

The performance of Till Eulenspiegel was the most audacious imaginable. The effectiveness of the score is implicit but this virtuoso rendition was fairly stunning. Kije will come to mind at recollection's beck, but Till will be remembered.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

5

NOV 20 1937

Boston Orchestra Opens Season Here Before Large Audience; Many Attend with Guests

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, opened its fifty-second borough season last evening before a large and receptive audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Many subscribers entertained guests at the concert, which opened the annual series of five given here by the orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman and Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport, acting chairman.

Jacques Fevrier was heard as guest soloist in Ravel's Piano Concerto for the Left Hand. Other works played were Haydn's Symphony in G Major and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey represented the Brooklyn Committee as hosteess in the committee box. Her guests were County Judge and Mrs. Franklin M. Taylor, Dr. and Mrs. Griswald D. Nammack, Mr. and Mrs. James Laughran Hand, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Phillips and Colonel Alfred C. B. McNevin.

Mrs. William H. Good, entertained in her box following a dinner party at her home, No. 880 St. Marks avenue. Her guests included Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, former Federal Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport and Hamilton Preston.

With Admiral and Mrs. Clark Woodward in their box were: Mrs. Myrich Rogers, Captain R. E. Koch, Captain and Mrs. Robert E. Hoyt, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Spence and Mr. and Mrs. Edward O. Bogert. In another box with Mrs. Benjamin Prince were: Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fitch, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Milhalenaowf, Mrs. William Stearns Cooney and Theodore Fitch.

The box guests of Mrs. Dean C. Osborne were: Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett, Mrs. J. M. Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohne, Miss Luville Fawcett, Justice Lewis L. Fawcett and J. C. Fawcett. Dr. and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives entertained in their box for Dr. and Mrs. Earle H. Mayne, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Holmes Paine, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Faulkner. Another box was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. and their guests.

In the box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association were: Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Fields Scott.

Others seen in the audience were: Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Theodore Fitch, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, James H. Post, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott.

Also Mrs. H. D. Abbey, Miss Alice D. Abbott, Charles S. Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Miss Alsie W. Atwater, Mrs. Henry C. Bodgley, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Agnes M. Barry, Mrs. Alfred Barth, Adolph Beck, Mrs. H. Edward Behr, Dr. A. L. L. Bell, Herbert Benevy, Miss Charlote M. Berry, Dr. H. L. Berson, Miss Dorothy L Betts George M. illings, Miss E. Blackman, Miss Louise Blake, Dr. Roscoe C. E. Brown, Miss Mary T. Butterick, Miss Julia Byrne.

NEW YORK, N.
TIMES

NOV 21 1937

PROKOFIEFF MUSIC AT CARNEGIE HALL

'Lieutenant Kije' Played for First Time in New York by Boston Orchestra

'HELDENLEBEN' ALSO GIVEN

Jacques Fevrier, the Soloist, Is Heard in Ravel's Piano Concerto for Left Hand

By OLIN DOWNES

Two works were played for the first time in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon. They were the orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," op. 60, of Prokofieff, and Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand alone, in one movement. These pieces were played with the most exceptional finish and brilliancy, and the concert ended with a memorable reading of Strauss's "Heldenleben." The soloist in the performance of the Ravel concerto was Jacques Fevrier.

Prokofieff's music was composed for a film, which parodied the times of the Czar and his servile courtiers. It was produced in Leningrad in 1933. This should be good film music, eminently suitable, in its satirical, tongue-in-the-cheek manner, to the subject. In concert it is rather thin stuff, though it gave players of the orchestra some special opportunities to show their skill.

In a certain way Ravel's concerto has relation to this music of Prokofieff, partly because of some of its harmonic texture, but more for the fact that it, too, is rather an exterior, stylistic species of composition. The concerto antedated the Prokofieff score by a year, for it was first heard when it was played by Paul Wittgenstein, the left one-armed pianist, in Vienna in 1932. He had specifically ordered a composition for the left hand, with orchestra, from Ravel. The two quarreled over the piece when it was completed. This writer remembers a conversation with Ravel in Paris a few months after the first performances, when he was still excited, and, gesticulating, cried out, "Je ne suis pas l'esclave du pianist." Whether or not Wittgenstein relished the extremely difficult writing for the piano and the sometimes loud orchestration, it can be said that Mr. Fevrier played the music in a masterful fashion yesterday, and that the score demonstrated again Ravel's amazing capacity to make something out of almost nothing and do it like the consummate craftsman that he is.

The Boston program book tells us Henry Prunieres's opinion of the work. Prunieres found sentiment, romantic feeling, lyrical flow in the music. If those things are in it, "romantic" and "lyrical" are different things than we thought they were. It is a coruscating piece. Performed as it was yesterday, by Mr. Fevrier, who is the son of the composer of "Monna Vanna" and other works, it made an agreeable effect, and was cordially applauded. It is admirable for its polish, color, esprit, and, we find, quite empty of feeling or of any warm impression.

The reading of Heldenleben was one of astonishing beauty, clarity and poetical feeling. It would not be easy for one ignorant of the score to imagine, in the first place, that even a Strauss could make a remarkable structure of music from such a naïvely personal conception as that of a hero (Richard Strauss); his enemies (the critics); his courtship of his beloved (Mrs. Strauss); the terrible battle between the hero, who shouts lustily as the snarling critical crew fly before him, and is finally revealed in an attitude of prayer, following the confusion of his enemies; and the hero's "works of peace" (Strauss's compositions, freely quoted from in the score); and the hero's apotheosis, to a strain of the magnificent sunrise music from "Zarathustra."

But when the score is interpreted with understanding and imagination and when, in addition to these qualities, the beauty and distinction given it by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men are present, the listener sits absorbed and draws a deep breath and realizes that it does not matter what inspired music, when it is written by a great and inspired composer.

The love music soared and glowed; the amazing counterpoint of Strauss was clear in every part, no matter how complicated the passage. The battle was a conflict of musical forces and dramatic in other ways than those of voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky again treated details in his own way, and he is a musician who has earned the right to his conception of scores through long and objective study. The long applause was that of a deeply impressed audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 21 1937

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Activities of a Week End: The Boston Symphony, Miss Monath, and the N. B. C.

Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisting artist, Jacques Février; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Prokofieff............."Lieutenant Kije"
Orchestral Suite, Op. 60
(First performance in New York)
2. Ravel..............Pianoforte Concerto
(for the left hand)
(In one movement)

INTERMISSION

3. Strauss..............."Ein Heldenleben"
("A Hero's Life"), Tone Poem, Op. 40

MR. KOUSSEVITSKY and his virtuosi from Massachusetts, at the second concert of their current New York pair, began the program with a novelty by Serge Prokofieff in which the story of Lieutenant Kije was beguilingly set forth. If the reader may wonder who Lieutenant Kije may have been, and why he should have been memorialized in tones, let it be said that the Lieutenant was merely a tactful error. It happened in this way, according to the tale as told by that accomplished and learned historian, Mr. Nicolas Slonimsky:

Once upon a time the Czar Paul I misread the report of his military aide, so that the last syllable of the name of a certain Russian officer which ended with "ki" and the Russian intensive expletive "je" (untranslatable by any English word, but similar in position and meaning to the Latin "quidem"), formed a non-existent name, Kije. The obsequious courtiers, fearful of pointing out to the Czar the mistake he had made, decided to invent an officer by that name (as misread by the Czar). Hence, all kinds of comical adventures and quid-pro-quo's.

* * *

Thus did Lieutenant Kije come into being—on the wings of an anecdote. The Russian Hollywood discovered him, he was turned into a film, and Serge Prokofieff set him to incidental music. The result of this was made known by the studio Belgoskino in Leningrad four years ago. Thereafter Lieutenant Kije, by natural and inevitable stages, proceeded in the form of a concert suite, derived from the film, to Moscow, to Boston, and to Carnegie Hall, where he made his bow to us yesterday afternoon.

* * *

In this suite of Prokofieff's, as set before us by the Bostonians, we assisted at the Birth of Kije (announced by a cornet fanfare offstage, "as befitted one born in full regimentals in the brain of a Czar," remarked Mr. Burk in his entertaining program-note). We listened to his love song, transferred for concert purposes from a barytone voice to a saxophone; were present at his wedding, Allegro fastoso; and, finally, we witnessed his earthly end, as the voice of a muted cornet hymned the passage of his shade to that Slavic Valhalla where dwell the military figments of Czaristic brains.

Prokofieff's music is light-wristed, sly, deft, concise, and Mr. Koussevitzky's players discoursed it with delicate wit and charm.

* * *

Thereafter we heard again that celebrated "Concerto for the Left Hand" composed by Maurice Ravel for the one-armed Viennese pianist, Paul Wittgenstein, and played by him at a Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall three years ago. The pianist yesterday was an excellent French artist, Jacques Fevrier, son of that Henri Fevrier who composed the opera "Monna Vanna" in which the immortal Mary Garden used to sing.

The concerto itself is a tour de force, but not much more. The performance by young Monsieur Fevrier—whose right arm hung unoccupied by his side—was better than the music that he played. He made one forget that the performance was essentially a stunt: that the delivery of the melody above casades of arpeggios was the work of a single arm and hand. His playing was that of a musician of fine and discriminating taste, plus an astonishing technique. One forgot the easy mastery of a circus act in the achievement of an artist.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky closed his program with a brilliant performance of the only music of adult stature on the program, the noble and mighty "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss—a score which despite its nearly forty years still towers proudly among the music of our time. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the gigantic work excelled by reason of its continence, its tonal beauty, its flexibility and heroic litheness.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

NOV 22 1937

Week-End M
Includes Not

By PITTS SANBORN.

Principal musical and dance events of the week-end included the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall (Saturday afternoon); the broadcast of the NBC Symphony Orchestra (Saturday night), the concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall (yesterday afternoon); the piano recital of Nadia Reisenberg (yesterday afternoon); the concert of the New Friends of Music (later yesterday afternoon), and the piano recital of Frank Bishop (last evening) at the Town Hall; the debut of the American Negro Ballet at the Lafayette Theater (last night) and the piano recitals of Gerald Tracy (Saturday afternoon) and of Hortense Monath (Saturday evening) at the Town Hall.

* * *

Boston Symphony Plays.

Spohr entitled a symphony "The Consecration of Sound." Though it did not figure at the latest local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the entire concert might with propriety have borne that name. The paramount feature of the occasion was the performance led by Serge Koussevitzky of the "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Often as the work has been heard in our concert rooms, one may well doubt whether any previous performance had equaled this one in tonal splendor and perfection.

Take the body and richness of the 'cello tone as exemplified at the beginning, the security and brilliance of the brass throughout, the exquisite purity of the woodwind—such are merely some of the elements in playing that futilizes comparison. And Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score was impressive in its breadth, in its adjustment of detail to the general design and steadily vital and engrossing.

Earlier the program offered an orchestra suite taken from Serge Prokofieff's incidental music to the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije" and a repetition of Ravel's piano concerto for the left hand, which had been brought forward the evening before at the Brooklyn Academy of Music with the same soloist, Jacques Fevrier—a brilliant work, brilliantly set forth.

Suite New Here.

The Prokofieff suite, new to the local scene, was completed and published in 1934 (the film had been produced the previous year). Lieutenant Kije, an imaginary character, invented out of deference to the misreading of an officer's name by the Czar Paul, is the hero of this witty, satirical expertly orchestrated score, providing an Allegro called "The Birth of Kije" (sprung full-grown from the brain of Paul, even as Athena from the brain of Zeus), an Andante (Romance), an Allegro fastoso ("Kije's Wedding"), a Moderato ("Troika"), and an Andante assai ("Burial of Kije").

However, though pleasant to hear once, especially when so consummately performed, the suite is slight stuff for the symphonic repertory.

The second concert by the NBC Symphony Orchestra presented Pierre Monteux again as conductor in a program that comprised Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Handel's Concerto Grosso in D, the Andante and the Scherzo from the first symphony of Sibelius, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by C. T. Griffes, "Lohengrin" prelude, and

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle

NOV 21 1937

Symphony to Perform Suite for Strings

Serge Koussevitsky has accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony a Suite for Strings by Gardner Read, whose prize-winning symphony was given its first performance by the New York Philharmonic, Barbirolli conducting, on Nov. 4.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 21 1937

Symphony

Boston in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its fifty-second season of concerts in Brooklyn on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the program, which consisted of Haydn's Symphony in G major No. 88, Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major and Ravel's Piano Concerto for the left hand with Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, as soloist.

The playing of the Ravel Concerto marked M. Fevrier's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Area. The composer wrote this concerto originally for Paul Wittgenstein, noted Austrian pianist who lost his right arm in the World War. Composed and published in 1931, the piece was performed by Wittgenstein in various European cities and in Paris on Jan. 17, 1933, with Ravel conducting. Wittgenstein also performed the work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during his visit to this country in the season of 1934-35. The concerto was revived in October by M. Fevrier at the concerts of the Paris Conservatoire under the direction of Philippe Gaubert. Mr. Fevrier had made a close study of the score with Ravel and performed it in the presence of the composer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky will give five concerts during the present Brooklyn season. The dates of the remaining four are: Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday evening, Feb. 10; Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1. These concerts are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, together with the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 22 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY PRESENTS PROKOFIEFF COMPOSITION

The first performance in New York of Prokofieff's orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," Opus 60, was given in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program also included Ravel's concerto for the left hand alone, in one movement, and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

The Prokofieff music was given an extremely brilliant performance from every point of view, and when considered as accompaniment for a fantastic and satirical film, which is what it originally was, it is a brillant creation and undoubtedly fills its function perfectly. In the concert hall it is worth hearing once, but probably not twice.

The Ravel concerto was more substantial stuff, but still its chief recommendation was that it had been composed by one of the greatest living wizards of orchestration. Its next three best recommendations were the virtuoso conductor, virtuoso orchestra and virtuoso piano player, Jacques Fevrier. Somewhere along about fifth place came the music.

"Ein Heldenleben," despite its well known faults, remains a great and deeply moving work. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was highly individual but he swept the audience with him. If the music is naive and exhibitionistic, as some have claimed, the audience very evidently preferred it to the brilliant irony and wit of Prokofieff and Ravel. We did too. E. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 22 1937

Orchestras and Pianists

Philharmonic and Boston Orchestras Play in Carnegie—Second NBC Broadcast.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

For those with a mind to indulge such tastes, the week end offered an opportunity to hear no less than three symphony orchestras of eminent and varied distinctions. Appropriately, the two which are the most venerable of the nation's ensembles gave their concerts in Carnegie Hall—the Philharmonic-Symphony yesterday afternoon and the Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon—each with the assistance of a guest pianist. Fittingly, too, the youngest of the aspirants, the NBC Symphony Orchestra (now two concerts old), gave its performance for a comparative handful in a Radio City studio, with a nationwide audience in attendance via an extensive network.

John Barbirolli's choice of an all-Russian program for the Philharmonic concert might have reminded some of his listeners of his activities as an opera conductor in London, where he has often interpreted such works, but the especial accomplishment of this concert was not his or the orchestra's. It was the contribution of Artur Rubinstein, who was the soloist in the B flat minor piano concerto of Tschaikowsky. This was another matter than the Brahms concerto which he had played earlier in the week, and, apparently, one considerably more congenial to his abilities. Its virtuoso demands only acted as a stimulus to Mr. Rubinstein's exceptional command of the mechanics of piano playing, with which he combined abundant vitality and a fine flair for Tschaikowsky's lyricism. Though Mr. Rubinstein demonstrated the strength to maintain the voice of the solo instrument above the challenging orchestra, it was not at the expense of his piano tone, which remained firm, clear and sonorous. The last dazzling passage in double octaves was dispatched with excellent accuracy and power, providing the provocation for a warm response from the large audience, in which the orchestra joined with evident enthusiasm.

The extremities of Mr. Barbirolli's program were drawn from the repertory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the list beginning with the overture to "The Maid of Pskov" and concluding with three movements of the suite arranged by Glazounoff and Steinberg from "Le Coq d'Or." The latter was especially well played, supplying an aural jog to the memory of those who had recently seen Fokine's superb visualization of the work as a ballet (but with scarcely such a musical background). A deft performance by the Philharmonic strings of Arensky's "Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky" and Liadoff's symphonic picture "From the Apocalypse" completed the afternoon's music.

The Bostonians.

With the English-Italian Barbirolli engaged with an all-Russian program, the Slavic Serge Koussevitzky also offered an "all" program at the first matinee of the Boston Symphony's New York season on Saturday. His favor was bestowed on Prokofieff, Ravel and Richard Strauss, all of them contemporaries, if no longer among the most forward of the forward-looking composers. The promise of a new work by Prokofieff, a suite from his incidental music to the film "Lieutenant Kije," suggested that there might be an important addition to the season's scanty list of worth-while new music, but the disclosure was otherwise. Appropriate to the fanciful character of the scenario (the tale of a legendary Russian officer endowed with life by the Czar's misreading of an official report), Prokofieff's score is witty, rowdy and sentimental by turns. All of it is cunningly constructed, but scarcely of more weight than the celluloid on which it was recorded.

Mr. Koussevitzky's soloist was Jacques Fevrier, a young French pianist who has taken upon himself the task of acquainting the world with the true nature of Ravel's Concerto for the Left Hand. Authentic sources would have us believe that the composer was not satisfied with the interpretation of the pianist for whom the work was written. Certainly Mr. Fevrier's devoted and extremely facile exposition of the work revealed qualities in this score which had not been attributed to it at earlier hearings. Having created so favorable an impression merely by the use of his left hand (to avoid any suspicion of chicanery, the pianist kept his right hand plainly in view throughout the proceedings), Mr. Fevrier should acquaint us with his capacities as a two-handed pianist. Pendant to these matters was a performance of "Ein Heldenleben" that was exceptional both for the impetus and fervor of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, and the superlative performance by the orchestra. Such stunning unanimity and magnificent sonority would have ennobled a lesser conception, but Mr. Koussevitzky's feeling for the work was plainly of a superior order. It was also a pleasure to hear so capable and individualized a performance of the solo violin part as Richard Burgin's.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

NOV 24 1937

Boston Programs.

Back in Boston again after the opening of its season in New York, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be conducted by the concert master, Richard Burgin, in the programs on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. The novelty will be a Symphony by the Belgian composer, Marcel Poot, which will be played for the first time in this country. The composer was a pupil of Cesar Franck. The symphony is in three movements and if the final movement called "Jazz-Allegro" is any criterion, it is safe to say that Poot's famous teacher, who leaned toward religious mysticism, did not inspire it. Also on the program will be the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, featuring six stringed instruments, and the Symphony in B-flat major of Ernest Chausson.

In its concerts in New York last week the orchestra was enthusiastically received by the audience and by the critics. At the Thursday concert the program was the same as that for the opening of the season in Boston, the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. In the latter it was recognized that Dr. Koussevitzky is a Sibelius specialist. Again he stirred his audience with the sweep and splendor of the symphony's climactic finale. Said one critic: "The brass playing was by all odds the finest Manhattan has heard this season and the strings raced magically."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR

NOV 21 1937

Music

By JULIAN SEAMAN

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concluding the present pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, exhibited one innovation and a debut.

The first experiment was an orchestral suite by Serge Prokofieff, derived from some incidental music to a film, "Lieutenant Kije." Usually, this composer is fond of the pungent, mocking phrase; the astringent irony of a true satirist. This music is strangely puerile, thematically anaemic, and hardly worth the trouble of performance as abstract music.

Mr. Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, was the second venture, playing Ravel's concerto for the left hand, a prodigious task of virtuosity. Why M. Fevrier, who has two very capable hands, elected to do this will never be known. But he lid it superbly. For the rest, add a somewhat unbalanced expression of "Ein Heldenleben," and you have the program.

MT. VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

NOV 23 1937

FIRST WOMAN CONDUCTOR

For the first time in its 57 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 26 1937

Democratizing the Symphony

The soundest definition of what one means by a cultivated mind is probably the most familiar: "To know the best that has been said and thought in the world." For more years than one likes to think, that famous definition was not supposed to include the art of music; probably because most of the intellectuals of the world—the men of letters, scientists, philosophers—were unaware of the fact that music is a major art, and not a species of entertainment about on an intellectual level with tatting.

But that attitude has changed, not because the men of letters, scientists and philosophers themselves have changed (the name of Beethoven is absent from the greatest modern history of civilization), but because a change has been forced upon them by the average man. Within the last decade or so the average man has discovered, chiefly through the agency of phonograph recordings and radio broadcasts, that the art of music is not the province of a few incomprehensible specialists, but a vast and inexhaustible continent of the mind, still relatively unknown—a continent that awaits them, boundless in its riches for the spirit.

The discovery and adoption of this domain by the majority of responsive men and women is now simply a matter of extending the area of contact between music at its performing source and the potentially receptive ears and minds among innumerable listeners. The most effective implement for this is, of course, the radio, which for half a dozen years or more has made a splendid record in America by its distribution of the best symphonic music through the broadcasts of the Philharmonic, Philadelphia and other orchestras. To this memorable record a promising chapter has been added by the founding of the National Broadcasting Company's new symphony orchestra, established for the sole purpose of transmitting music of the highest type, without alloy or compromise. This organization, the first full-size and permanent symphony orchestra ever assembled and maintained by an American broadcasting company, is at present in charge of Pierre Monteux, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Artur Rodzinsky will follow him during the first three weeks of December. Then, beginning on Christmas night, the unapproachable Toscanini will direct the orchestra over a period of ten weeks.

No comparable enterprise has been attempted in America. Its possibilities are limitless; its effect on the democratization of musical culture in the United States may well be profound.

Thus, by a single bold and imaginative stroke, the ultimate popularizing of great symphonic music, conceived upon the highest levels of beauty and dignity and self-respect, becomes an attainable ideal.

MADISON, WIS.
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 29 1937

First Woman Conductor

For the first time in 57 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 27 1937

MUSICAL EVENTS

Pianists, Some with Orchestras and Some Without, But Mostly Pianists

THIS week's theme song could be a revival of Irving Berlin's "I Love a Piano," which was sung in a show called "Stop, Look, and Listen," to the accompaniment of about a dozen grands. (That revue was in the days when a grand was a piano, not a thousand dollars.) There haven't been a dozen pianos on any stage lately, but there have been dozens of pianists, and it seems that life will be just a series of keyboard exhibitions from now until sometime in 1938, at the least.

Of the three orchestras that entertained in Carnegie Hall last week, all had pianists as soloists at some of their concerts. The Boston Symphony, however, succeeded in beginning its season on Thursday evening without pianistic assistance, although that probably wasn't the reason for the enormous attendance. Mr. Koussevitzky brought his men to town that evening for nothing more startling than two symphonies—Beethoven's third and Sibelius's second. Still, these familiars sounded almost like novelties, thanks to the fresh, living performances that Mr. Koussevitzky offered. There were a few personal touches in Mr. Koussevitzky's doings with the music, but he projected the vitality of Beethoven's "Eroica" and the poetry of Sibelius's most popular symphony. Any listeners who came to Carnegie Hall with the idea that Sibelius composes like some sort of primeval sourpuss soon learned what Sibelius was all about when Mr. Koussevitzky took charge of the work.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)

N[illegible]

Symphony Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will appear in the Montclair High School auditorium Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, as the extra event in connection with the Unity Concert Course series. Tickets at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770, 9 to 11 A. M.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle

NOV 28 1937

AT MUSIC-LOVERS' REQUESTS:

On the left is Serge Koussevitski, conductor of the Boston Orchestra coming to the Eastman Theater Dec. 6; (60)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 22 1937

Orchestras and Pianists

Philharmonic and Boston Orchestras Play in Carnegie—Second NBC Broadcast.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

For those with a mind to indulge such tastes, the week end offered an opportunity to hear no less than three symphony orchestras of eminent and varied distinctions. Appropriately, the two which are the most venerable of the nation's ensembles gave their concerts in Carnegie Hall—the Philharmonic-Symphony yesterday afternoon and the Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon—each with the assistance of a guest pianist. Fittingly, too, the youngest of the aspirants, the NBC Symphony Orchestra (now two concerts old), gave its performance for a comparative handful in a Radio City studio, with a nationwide audience in attendance via an extensive network.

John Barbirolli's choice of an all-Russian program for the Philharmonic concert might have reminded some of his listeners of his activities as an opera conductor in London, where he has often interpreted such works, but the especial accomplishment of this concert was not his or the orchestra's. It was the contribution of Artur Rubinstein, who was the soloist in the B flat minor piano concerto of Tschaikowsky. This was another matter than the Brahms concerto which he had played earlier in the week, and, apparently, one considerably more congenial to his abilities. Its virtuoso demands only acted as a stimulus to Mr. Rubinstein's exceptional command of the mechanics of piano playing, with which he combined abundant vitality and a fine flair for Tschaikowsky's lyricism. Though Mr. Rubinstein demonstrated the strength to maintain the voice of the solo instrument above the challenging orchestra, it was not at the expense of his piano tone, which remained firm, clear and sonorous. The last dazzling passage in double octaves was dispatched with excellent accuracy and power, providing the provocation for a warm response from the large audience, in which the orchestra joined with evident enthusiasm.

The extremities of Mr. Barbirolli's program were drawn from the repertory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the list beginning with the overture to "The Maid of Pskov" and concluding with three movements of the suite arranged by Glazounoff and Steinberg from "Le Coq d'Or." The latter was especially well played, supplying an aural jog to the memory of those who had recently seen Fokine's superb visualization of the work as a ballet (but with scarcely such a musical background). A deft performance by the Philharmonic strings of Arensky's "Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky" and Liadoff's symphonic picture "From the Apocalypse" completed the afternoon's music.

The Bostonians.

With the English-Italian Barbirolli engaged with an all-Russian program, the Slavic Serge Koussevitzky also offered an "all" program at the first matinee of the Boston Symphony's New York season on Saturday. His favor was bestowed on Prokofieff, Ravel and Richard Strauss, all of them contemporaries, if no longer among the most forward of the forward-looking composers. The promise of a new work by Prokofieff, a suite from his incidental music to the film "Lieutenant Kije," suggested that there might be an important addition to the season's scanty list of worth-while new music, but the disclosure was otherwise. Appropriate to the fanciful character of the scenario (the tale of a legendary Russian officer endowed with life by the Czar's misreading of an official report), Prokofieff's score is witty, rowdy and sentimental by turns. All of it is cunningly constructed, but scarcely of more weight than the celluloid on which it was recorded.

Mr. Koussevitzky's soloist was Jacques Fevrier, a young French pianist who has taken upon himself the task of acquainting the world with the true nature of Ravel's Concerto for the Left Hand. Authentic sources would have us believe that the composer was not satisfied with the interpretation of the pianist for whom the work was written. Certainly Mr. Fevrier's devoted and extremely facile exposition of the work revealed qualities in this score which had not been attributed to it at earlier hearings. Having created so favorable an impression merely by the use of his left hand (to avoid any suspicion of chicanery, the pianist kept his right hand plainly in view throughout the proceedings), Mr. Fevrier should acquaint us with his capacities as a two-handed pianist. Pendant to these matters was a performance of "Ein Heldenleben" that was exceptional both for the impetus and fervor of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, and the superlative performance by the orchestra. Such stunning unanimity and magnificent sonority would have ennobled a lesser conception, but Mr. Koussevitzky's feeling for the work was plainly of a superior order. It was also a pleasure to hear so capable and individualized a performance of the solo violin part as Richard Burgin's.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 26 1937

Democratizing the Symphony

The soundest definition of what one means by a cultivated mind is probably the most familiar: "To know the best that has been said and thought in the world." For more years than one likes to think, that famous definition was not supposed to include the art of music; probably because most of the intellectuals of the world—the men of letters, scientists, philosophers—were unaware of the fact that music is a major art, and not a species of entertainment about on an intellectual level with tatting.

But that attitude has changed, not because the men of letters, scientists and philosophers themselves have changed (the name of Beethoven is absent from the greatest modern history of civilization), but because a change has been forced upon them by the average man. Within the last decade or so the average man has discovered, chiefly through the agency of phonograph recordings and radio broadcasts, that the art of music is not the province of a few incomprehensible specialists, but a vast and inexhaustible continent of the mind, still relatively unknown—a continent that awaits them, boundless in its riches for the spirit.

The discovery and adoption of this domain by the majority of responsive men and women is now simply a matter of extending the area of contact between music at its performing source and the potentially receptive ears and minds among innumerable listeners. The most effective implement for this is, of course, the radio, which for half a dozen years or more has made a splendid record in America by its distribution of the best symphonic music through the broadcasts of the Philharmonic, Philadelphia and other orchestras. To this memorable record a promising chapter has been added by the founding of the National Broadcasting Company's new symphony orchestra, established for the sole purpose of transmitting music of the highest type, without alloy or compromise. This organization, the first full-size and permanent symphony orchestra ever assembled and maintained by an American broadcasting company, is at present in charge of Pierre Monteux, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Artur Rodzinsky will follow him during the first three weeks of December. Then, beginning on Christmas night, the unapproachable Toscanini will direct the orchestra over a period of ten weeks.

No comparable enterprise has been attempted in America. Its possibilities are limitless; its effect on the democratization of musical culture in the United States may well be profound.

Thus, by a single bold and imaginative stroke, the ultimate popularizing of great symphonic music, conceived upon the highest levels of beauty and dignity and self-respect, becomes an attainable ideal.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

NOV 24 1937

Boston Programs.

Back in Boston again after the opening of its season in New York, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be conducted by the concert master, Richard Burgin, in the programs on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. The novelty will be a Symphony by the Belgian composer, Marcel Poot, which will be played for the first time in this country. The composer was a pupil of Cesar Franck. The symphony is in three movements and if the final movement called "Jazz-Allegro" is any criterion, it is safe to say that Poot's famous teacher, who leaned toward religious mysticism, did not inspire it. Also on the program will be the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, featuring six stringed instruments, and the Symphony in B-flat major of Ernest Chausson.

In its concerts in New York last week the orchestra was enthusiastically received by the audience and by the critics. At the Thursday concert the program was the same as that for the opening of the season in Boston, the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. In the latter it was recognized that Dr. Koussevitzky is a Sibelius specialist. Again he stirred his audience with the sweep and splendor of the symphony's climactic finale. Said one critic: "The brass playing was by all odds the finest Manhattan has heard this season and the strings raced magically."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR

NOV 21 1937

Music

By JULIAN SEAMAN

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concluding the present pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, exhibited one innovation and a debut.

The first experiment was an orchestral suite by Serge Prokofieff, derived from some incidental music to a film, "Lieutenant Kije." Usually, this composer is fond of the pungent, mocking phrase; the astringent irony of a true satirist. This music is strangely puerile, thematically anaemic, and hardly worth the trouble of performance as abstract music.

Mr. Jacques Fevrier, French pianist, was the second venture, playing Ravel's concerto for the left hand, a prodigious task of virtuosity. Why M. Fevrier, who has two very capable hands, elected to do this will never be known. But he did it superbly. For the rest, add a somewhat unbalanced expression of "Ein Heldenleben," and you have the program.

MT. VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

NOV 23 1937

FIRST WOMAN CONDUCTOR

For the first time in its 57 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

MADISON, WIS.
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 29 1937

First Woman Conductor

For the first time in 57 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

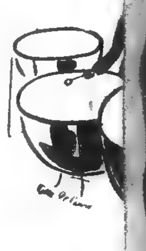
NOV 27 1937

(5)

[illegible] nov 27 /

MUSICAL EVENTS

Pianists, Some with Orchestras and Some Without, But Mostly Pianists



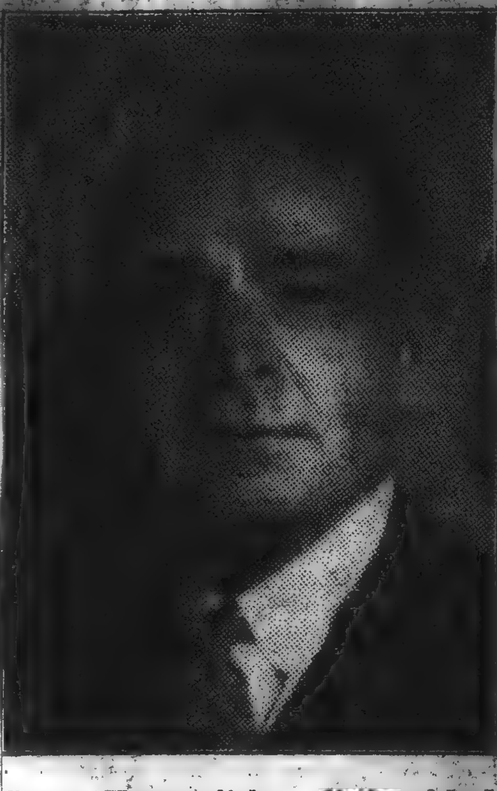
THIS week's theme song could be a revival of Irving Berlin's "I Love a Piano," which was sung in a show called "Stop, Look, and Listen," to the accompaniment of about a dozen grands. (That revue was in the days when a grand was a piano, not a thousand dollars.) There haven't been a dozen pianos on any stage lately, but there have been dozens of pianists, and it seems that life will be just a series of keyboard exhibitions from now until sometime in 1938, at the least.

Of the three orchestras that entertained in Carnegie Hall last week, all had pianists as soloists at some of their concerts. The Boston Symphony, however, succeeded in beginning its season on Thursday evening without pianistic assistance, although that probably wasn't the reason for the enormous attendance. Mr. Koussevitzky brought his men to town that evening for nothing more startling than two symphonies—Beethoven's third and Sibelius's second. Still, these familiars sounded almost like novelties, thanks to the fresh, living performances that Mr. Koussevitzky offered. There were a few personal touches in Mr. Koussevitzky's doings with the music, but he projected the vitality of Beethoven's "Eroica" and the poetry of Sibelius's most popular symphony. Any listeners who came to Carnegie Hall with the idea that Sibelius composes like some sort of primeval sourpuss soon learned what Sibelius was all about when Mr. Koussevitzky took charge of the work.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)

NOV 30 1937

Symphony Conductor

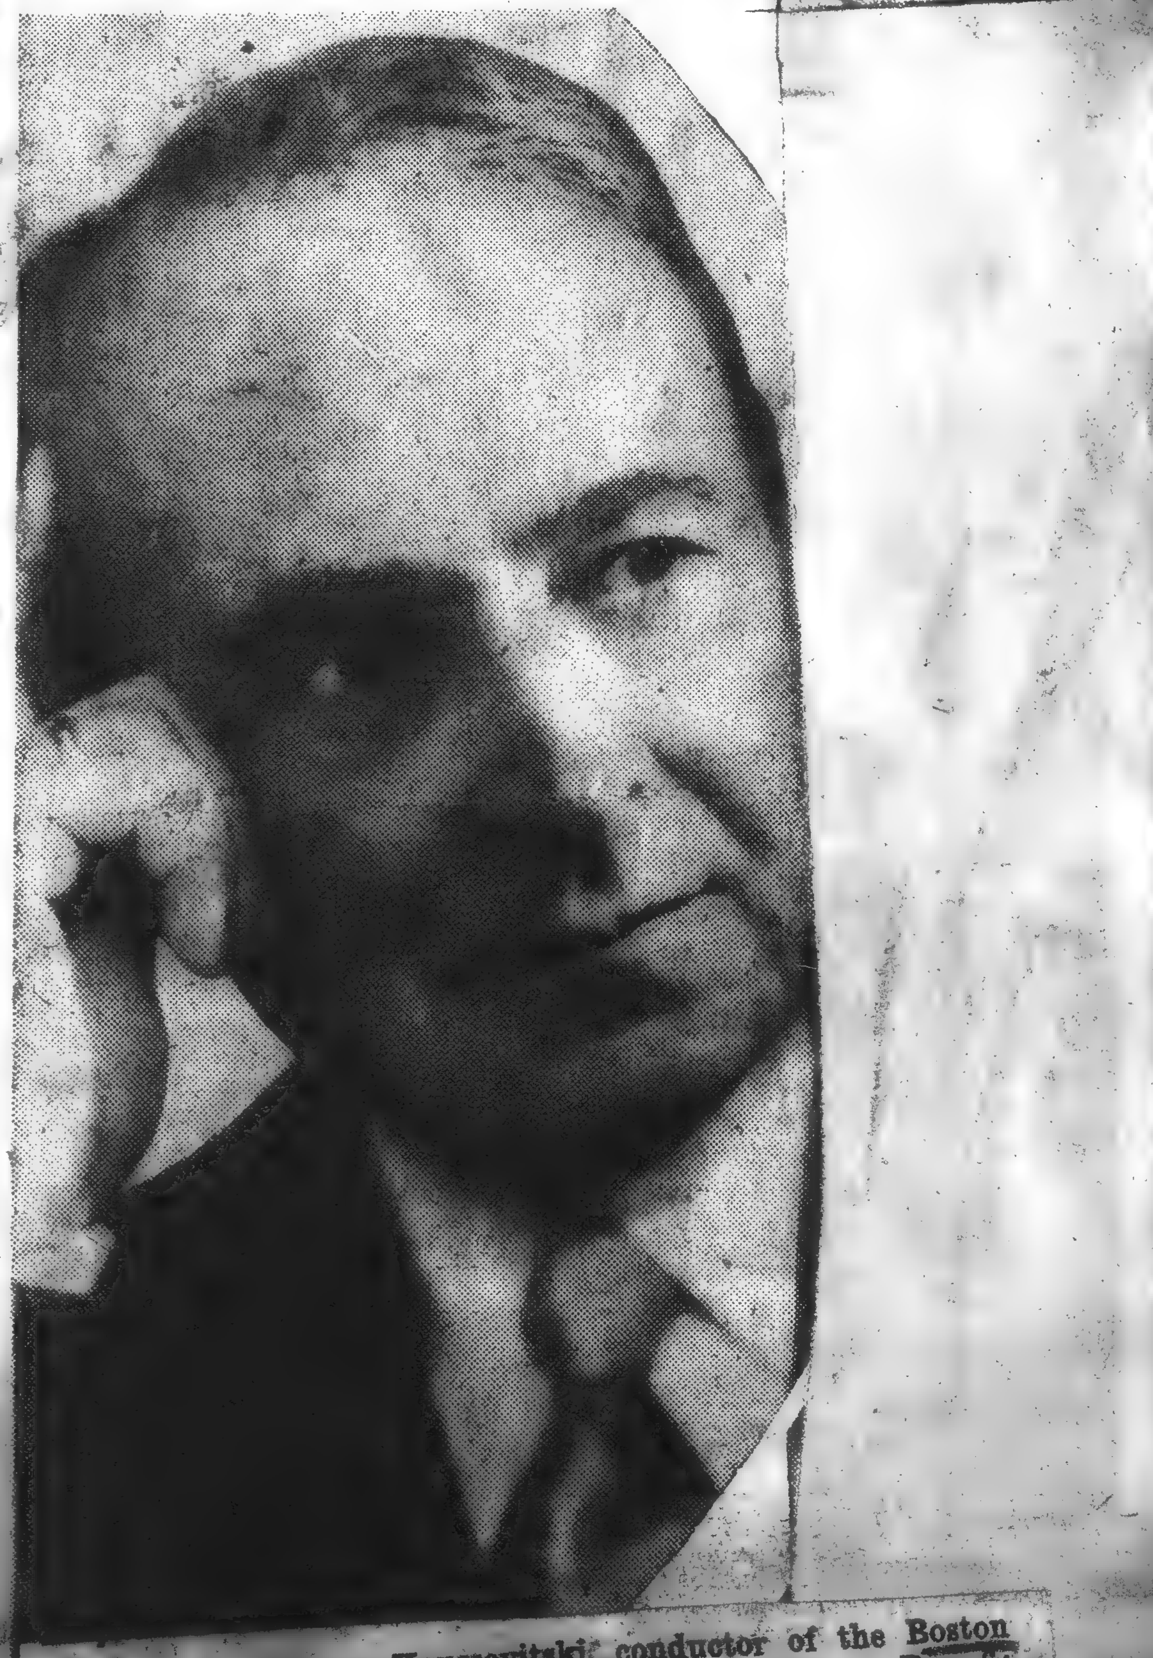


Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which [illegible] appear in the Montclair High School auditorium Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, as the extra event in connection with the Unity Concert Course series. Tickets at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770, 9 to 11 A. M.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle

NOV 28 1937

AT MUSIC-LOVERS' REQUESTS:



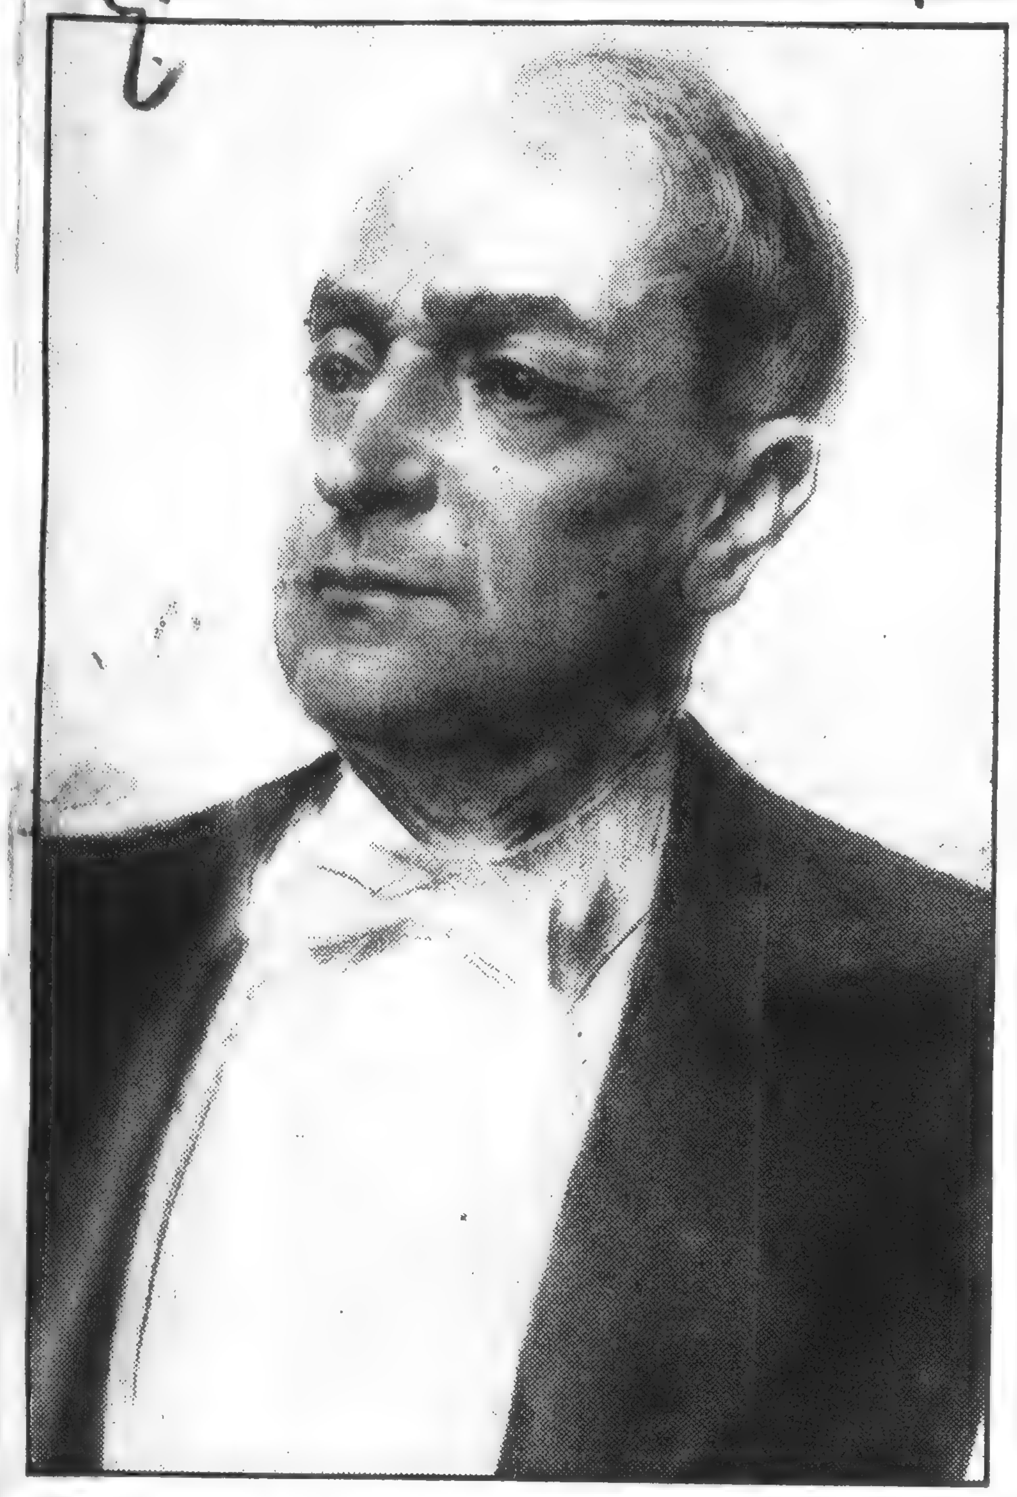
On the left is Serge Koussevitski, conductor of the Boston [illegible] coming to the Eastman Theater Dec. 6;

61

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

NOV 28 193

Portrait of Koussevitzky



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is of such commanding presence that he has served as subject for many artists. One of the most recent portraits is a drawing by Alexandre Iacovleff, reproduced here.

The Boston ensemble will return here Dec. 9 to present the annual concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art, each of whom will receive two seats without charge. Tickets will not be sold to any but members, who may purchase additional seats for guests.

10

Program Set For Concert

Second Chamber Music Event Thursday

THE second event in the Toledo Chamber Music concert series will be presented Thursday at 8:30 p. m. in the Robinson Junior high school auditorium.

The program will feature first performances in Toledo of works by two living composers, the eminent Hungarian, Zoltan Kodaly, and the famous violinist and composer, Fritz Kreisler.

The Amphion string quartet, Gerald McLaughlin, first violin; Howard Mickens, second violin; Paul Bishop, viola, and Ruth Earhart Beeson, 'cello, will be assisted by Elmer Gertz, pianist, in the playing of the three chamber music works: the "Serenade, Op. 12," for two violins and viola, by Kodaly; the "Piano Quartet in E flat," by Schumann, and the "String Quartet in A Minor," by Kreisler.

Zoltan Kodaly

Zoltan Kodaly received his musical education at the Budapest school of music, where, since 1907, he has been professor of composition. He and Bartok are the leading spirts of the new music in Hungary. From 1910 onward, his chamber music has been played in many countries. The "Serenade," for two violins and viola, composed in 1920, stands alone in the new chamber music because of the extremely rare combination of instruments.

Fritz Kreisler

Kreisler shows in his "Quartet in A Minor" that he has important thoughts of his own to express in compositions on a large scale. This quartet published in 1922, may be described as a personal confession after the model of Smetana's "Aus Meinem Leban."

Season tickets as well as single concert tickets are available at D. M. Caughlin & Co. music store, 322 Superior street.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle

The Phonograph Business Grows! (And Sits on a Powder Keg)

By John Selby

NEW YORK—(AP)—The phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious. Much music has been done four times already: once in the old mechanical method; once when this method had been improved; once when electrical recording came in; again recently, because electric recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there is no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

Television, may likewise do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long-playing record may be produced. And so on.

Recording is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording was as fixed as a mountain—artists were brought to it from all corners of the world.

Studios still are maintained in strategic locations, of course—New York, Chicago and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But it can be taken places, and it is generally cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

It weighs several tons—nobody seems to have thought to weigh it exactly. Mostly it can go by express, the more delicate parts are carried by the recording crew as personal baggage.

As a matter of fact, each man has his favorite recorder, which he values much as Heifetz values his two best violins. These recorders are adjusted to infinitesimal precision; some recording experts prefer one adjustment, some another.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being 13 inches in diameter and 1½ inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" to do, the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for the Victor Company, and Charles O'Connell, who does everything from conducting symphony orchestras to figuring record lengths on important jobs.

The performance was being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with a Boston chorus and of course the Boston Symphony. But there was only one performance, since it was all a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund, and it was necessary to record with the audience in the hall.

Four recorders were set up, working in pairs. Mr. O'Connell did the delicate job of dividing the work into record-length sections, and found there would be 54 of these. He arranged for the records to end, as often as possible, on a tonic chord—or at least a chord not too tantalizing to the ear. It looked like a snap, on paper, once the job was done. The trouble was that of the 54 "sides", only two worked out exactly. Slight delays, changes of tempo, soloists a little slow in getting under way threw the whole thing out of gear.

The job was done in one sitting however, and if it had been made the usual way, five recording sessions would have been needed. When the work is released around the end of the year, the most experienced listeners will not know that on one record the factory found exactly one half of one eighth note. This bit of sound was not only transferred to the next record, but in exact time.

The recorders do not use electric motors, these being subject to slight speed fluctuations. Gravity motors are used, and lugging the huge weights for these about the land is one reason why equipment is so heavy.

Recording men insist there is nothing in the musical world surer than the pitch of a given tone on a record; always it will reproduce truly if the machine is turning at the correct speed.

FRIENDS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HOLD SESSION

The Association of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held their fourth annual meeting in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Edward A. Taft, chairman, presided. The trustees of the orchestra were represented by their president, Bentley W. Warren.

After business affairs were disposed of, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, gave a short address. He also led a portion of the orchestra in Mozart's youthful Symphony in A major (K 201).

Tea was served in the foyer, where members of the association were privileged to see a collection of Winslow Homer paintings, loaned for the occasion by museums and private owners.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle

NOV 28 1937

Capacity House Assured to Greet Boston Symphony on Dec. 6

A CAPACITY house will greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Eastman Theater on Monday evening, Dec. 6.

The Civic Music Association reports that virtually all seats for the performance have been sold, with none but a few in the higher price brackets remaining. These are expected to be taken this week.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra. Included on the program will be Mozart's Symphony in A major, and the Symphony No. 4 in F minor, by Tschaikowsky. At least two othe major works will be played.

The concert will mark the thir sell-out performance by the orchestra here in three years.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 29,

FIFTY YEARS ON CONCERT STAGE

JOSEF HOFFMANN

Hoffmann Holds Musical Jubilee; President Leads Congratulations

[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Dispatch]

NEW YORK, Nov. 28—The first 50 years of Josef Hofmann's career as an artist in America were celebrated tonight at the Metropolitan Opera House, where as a boy of 11 he made his debut on Nov. 29, 1887.

As the guest of honor, he responded to the tumultuous tribute of the audience in the way most natural to him: he made music. He was not only the principal performer, but a benefactor as well. At his request the proceeds were turned over to the musicians emergency fund. Since top prices for orchestra seats were $15, the gross was about $22,000.

Among those in the theater were a score or more who were present half a century ago. There were others—throughout the country and abroad, who had enrolled in the Hofman Fifty-Year- Club, persons who had heard the prodigy in New York or in other cities on his first American tour. Those who could not attend tonight and others sent messages of congratulation.

From President Roosevelt came such a letter and it was learned that he also belonged in the 50-year club. As Dr. Walter Damrosch, who conducted for young Josef in an 1887 concert observed in his introductory remarks tonight:

"There was one little boy at the Hofmann concert, brought by his mother ,who asked her whether she thought he would be able to play like little Josef. The muses were not at the boy's cradle; he did not become a great pianist. But he did all right. He is President of the United States."

The President's letter deeply regretted his and Mrs. Roosevelt's inability to be present at the jubilee concert. It continued:

"My own regret is the keener because I first heard you play when you were a boy and I was a boy. Few, therefore, have followed your career for a longer period and none with a deeper sense of appreciation than I. And I like to think that my own appreciation of your work is typical of that which lovers of good music everywhere feel because of the joy and inspiration and pure enjoyment which have brought to their lives now for a full half century. Mrs. Roosevelt joins me in the hope that your approaching jubilee may be a memorable event in a career so crowded with distinction and that the music lovers of America may for years to come have the ennobling influence which your art has for so long infused into the musical life of the nation."

The program was a triumphal march for Hofman. It began with Brahm's orchestral work, the "Academic Festival" overture which celebrates in broad, resounding periods a joyous, meaningful occasion. It set the keynote of dignity and happiness.

Then Hofman came out, to begin his part of the program. The boy had grown older. But there was a youthful vigor in his gait and unaffected simplicity in his response to the thunderous reception of the audence. He sat down to play and his first offering was the D minor concerto by his unforgettable teacher, Arthur Rubenstein, one of the 19th century titans of the piano.

At the beginning of the second half, Hofman appeared alone and played a group by the greatest of all Polish composers, Chopin. It included the G minor Ballade, the Nocturne in E flat, waltz in A flat, and the Andante Spianato and Grande Polonaise.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

NOV 28 1937

Phonograph Business Continues To Prosper Despite Uncertainties Of Future Demand

Most Men Connected With Industry Admit Their Profession Is In Precarious Position

New And Improved Systems Of Recording, Television And Broadcast Work Form Threat

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK.

THE phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious. Much music has been done four times already: Once in the old mechanical method; once when electrical recording came in; again recently, because electric recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there is no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

Television May Likewise Do Tricks To Industry

Television, may likewise do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long-playing record may be produced. And so on.

Recording is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording studio was as fixed as a mountain—artists were brought to it from all corners of the world.

Studios still are maintained in strategic locations, of course—New York, Chicago and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But it can be taken places, and it is generally cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

It weighs several tons—nobody seems to have thought to weigh it exactly. Mostly it can go by express, the more delicate parts are carried by the recording crew as personal baggage.

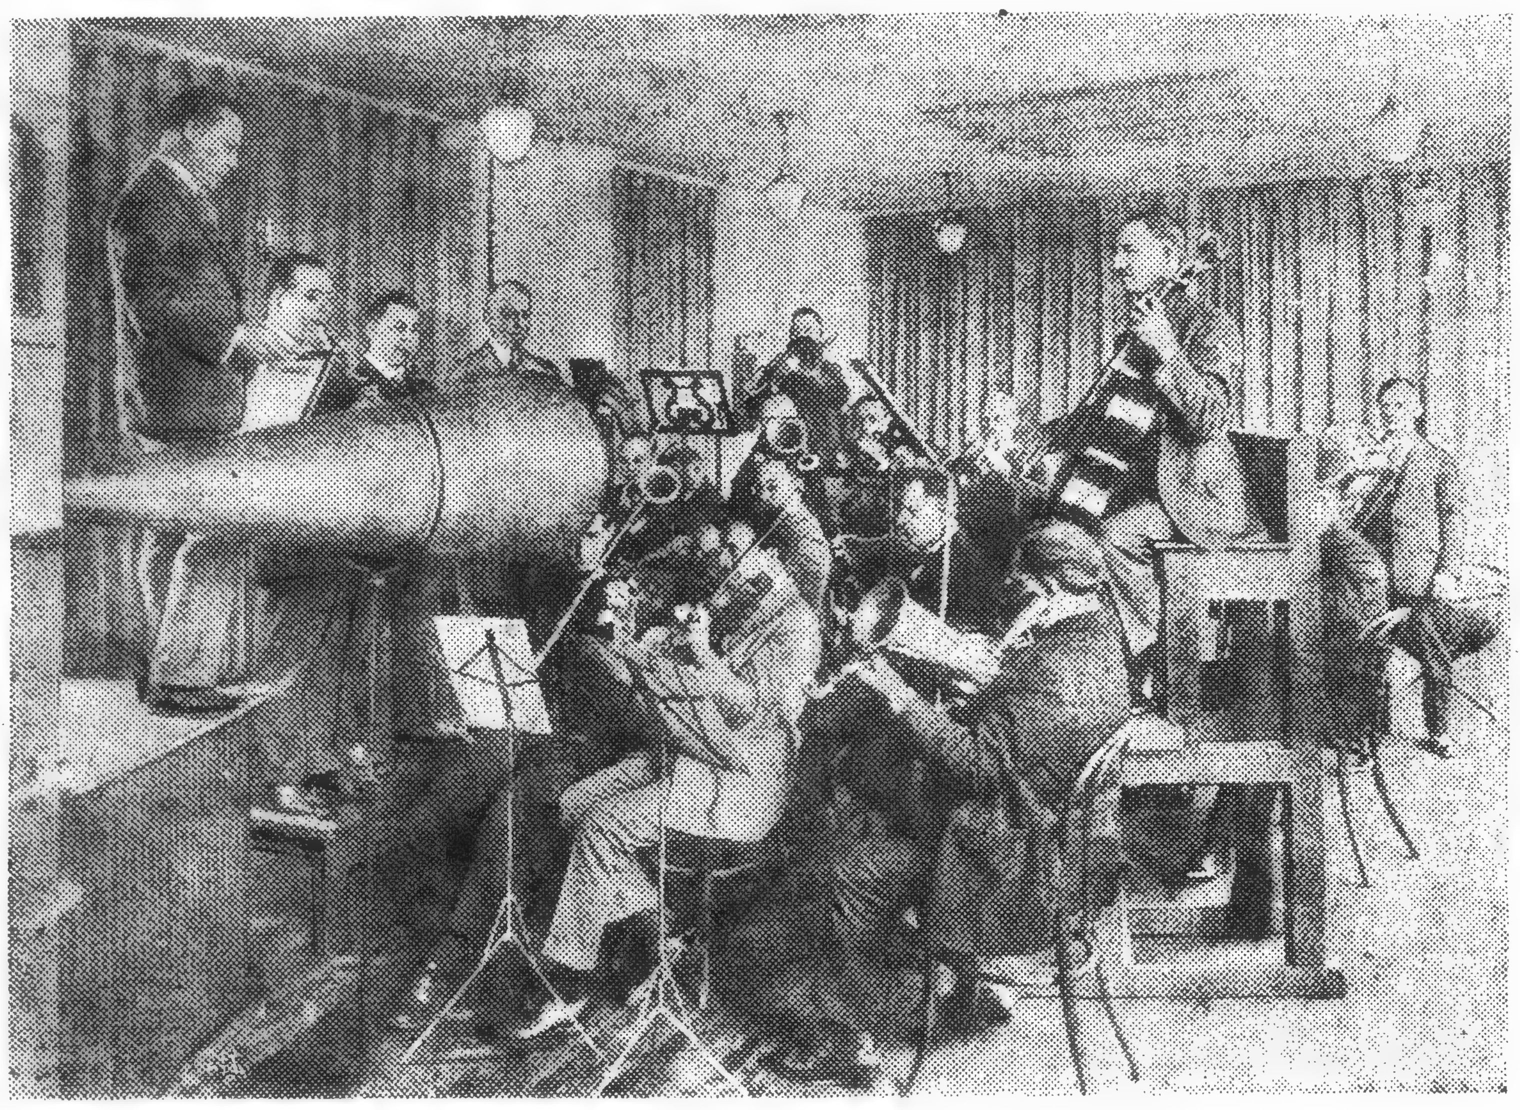
Each Man Possesses His Favorite Recorder

As a matter of fact, each man has his favorite recorder, which he values as much as Heifetz values his two best violins. These recorders are adjusted to infinitesimal precision; some recording experts prefer one adjustment, some another.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being thirteen inches in diameter and one and a half inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's St. Matthew Passion to do, the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for a disc company, and Charles O'Connell, who does everything from conducting symphony ochestras to figuring record lengths on important jobs.

The performance was being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with a Boston chorus and, of course, the Boston Symphony. But there was only one performance, since it was all a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund, and it was necessary to record with the audience in the hall.



MAKING AN EARLY PHONOGRAPH RECORDING

Four Machines Set Up To Operate In Pairs

Four recorders were set up, working in pairs. Mr. O'Connell did the delicate job of dividing the work into record-length sections, and found there would be fifty-four of these. He arranged for the records to end, as often as possible, on a tonic chord—or at least a chord not too tantalizing to the ear. It looked like a snap, on paper, once the job was done. The trouble was that of the fifty-four "sides," only two worked out exactly. Slight delays, changes of tempo, soloists a little slow in getting under way threw the whole thing out of gear.

The job was done in one sitting, however, and if it had been made the usual way, five recording sessions would have been needed. When the work is released around the end of the year, the most experienced listeners will not know that on one record the factory found exactly one-half of one-eighth note. This bit of sound was not only transferred to the next record, but in exact time.

The recorders do not use electric motors, these being subject to slight speed fluctuations. Gravity motors are used, and lugging the huge weights for these about the land is one reason why equipment is so heavy.

Pitch Of Given Tone Always Reproduces Same

Recording men insist there is nothing in the musical world surer than the pitch of a given tone on a record; always it will reproduce truly if the machine is turning at the correct speed.

This matter of pitch also does its tricks. One day the Beethoven Eighth Symphony was being done at Boston. The first two movements were completed one day; next morning the third, or Scherzo, was recorded.

Koussevitzky listened to the playback on the Scherzo and exclaimed:

"It's a half tone sharp." It was, too.

This was corrected imediately, and the result played once more for Koussevitzky. "Yes," said he, "the pitch is right, but that's not my tempo. It's a shade slow."

He was correct again, although probably not one musician in a thousand could have told it.

Much recording is done in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where the orchestra plays in the empty hall, using the regular stage sct designed for it by Leopold Stokowski. No acoustical doctoring is necessary, though the Symphony Hall, Boston, and Carnegie Hall, New York, curtains and such like are sometimes hung.

Carnegie Hall sees little recording, although Wallerstein and O'Connell recall ruefully one experience there with Toscanini. A lot of money had been spent to record some things with the spike-moustached little Italian. When he heard the playback he refused to approve a single thing.

Microphone placement is often as tricky as anything else. There are two kinds of mikes—unidirectional, which means the mike absorbs the sound as it sweeps in a straight line from the performer; velocity, which focuses on particular sections of the whole.

Catching Notes Of Organ Forms Major Problem

Probably the trickiest problem with mikes was recording the enormous Wanamaker organ in Philadelphia. This is so large that twenty symphony orchestras could be seated in the space it requires. It is built into a store, on several floors, with a rotunda to complicate the course of the sound waves.

At first the records were filled with mysterious sounds like doors opening and shutting, squeaks and so on. These were only the usual small noises around a big organ, but they insisted on recording themselves. Finally, by a long course of experiments, the microphones were placed so as to pick up tone and not noise—fortunately, the result was like an organ playing in a great cathedral, instead of a retail store.

The technical principles of manufacturing records have been improved, yet remain basically the same as of old. What most people do not realize is, however, that their records are never stamped from the master matrix, once this is completed.

This is never used for anything but making stamps from which, in turn, records are pressed.

MENUHIN PLAYS AT HOME OF DR KOUSSEVITZKY

Yehudi Menuhin, the young violinist, who played at Hotel Statler yesterday, visited Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the latter's Brookline home Tuesday night and played to him the long-lost Schumann Violin Concerto. Menuhin and the orchestra, conducted by Dr Koussevitzky, will give the first local hearing of the work at Symphony Hall next Feb 4 and 5.

This last major work by Robert Schumann, the 19th-century German composer, was finished only a short time before Schumann fell victim to insanity. It lay unknown for many years, and only last Summer was released for public performance, through a chain of unusual circumstances which have already been printed. The work was played in Germany last week.

The present season will bring three appearances of Menuhin in Boston, for in addition to those of yesterday and next February, he will, it is said, give a sonata recital with his sister Hepzhibah Jan 16.

MENUHIN'S NEW PLAN FOR 'LOST CONCERTO'

Will Drop Brahms Work for Schumann's at American Premiere Here Monday

BOSTON, Dec. 1 (AP).—A private playing last night by Yehudi Menuhin of Schumann's recently discovered "Lost Concerto" so impressed the Boston Symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, that he urged the young violinist today to drop the Brahms concerto from a future program here because it would be "distracting."

The conductor and a handful of music critic guests warmly acclaimed the Schumann selection, which has not yet been heard in concert in this country, although its world premiere was broadcast from Berlin on Friday.

As a result of Koussevitzky's reception, Menuhin has decided to advance the date of the American premiere and play the concerto, accompanied by piano alone, at his concert in New York next Monday evening.

"The Schumann Concerto is a revelation," said Koussevitzky. "The public must have a chance to concentrate on it alone, without any distracting additional concerto on the same program, particularly the Brahms. They are too much alike."

Menuhin agreed, and said he would request the conductors of the St. Louis, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras, with whom he had planned to play both on the same program, to drop the Brahms.

Trans. Dec. 1/37 62

Yehudi Menuhin Plays Nobly

By Redfern Mason

If people gave as much intensity to the solution of political and economic questions as Yehudi Menuhin gives to the realization of the beauty of Mozart and Bach, this would be a better world.

The twenty-one-year-old violinist was the soloist of yesterday's Morning Musicale at the Hotel Statler. He has grown in artistic stature. Today he is a man, looking with a man's eyes at this perplexing world and, though he may not pretend to understand life, "root and all and all in all," his playing is the expression of a nature capable of the concentration which men call genius.

He began with Mozart, the F. major Sonata K. V. 376. At first it seemed as if Minerva were a trifle reluctant. Indeed the goddess did not smile whole-heartedly upon the player until he reached the beautiful Andante. Then the fiddle sang with rare beauty. The accompanist, Ferguson Webster, was in the vein, as was the violinist, and the twain gave us pure Mozartean melody, which is one of the most beautiful things that the art of music has vouchsafed to humanity. A grave, uplifted beauty it is, a beauty that calls for a recollection almost religious. This recollection Yehudi has, always has had, but today it is of a more serious cast than it was in earlier days.

In the G minor Sonata of Bach, for violin alone, Yehudi played gloriously. The Adagio is a long recitative; the Siciliano an Arioso, the fugue is inspired instrumental dialectics. That recitative was given with a sort of luxuriating religiosity. It is aspiration, the cry of a heart steeped in divine song. This song Yehudi made part of himself. He voiced in it a personal experience. Like Anatole France he was "adventuring" among master pieces.

After the intermission came the Lalo Concerto, usually given disrespectfully in fragments. Yehudi treats the fine French romantic with more reverence. Here he liberated the romanticism which is part of the heritage of all normal youth. Of course it is French romanticism that Lalo creates; but your good artist is cosmopolitan. In those chanson like fragments which Lalo introduces here and there he probably departed from the spirit of the composer. Lalo's simplicity is not ingenuous; it has a touch of the hothouse plant about it or, to be more specific, a suggestion of Murgeresque sentimentality. Yehudi will have none of that. Something of the child still remains in him and it is when he makes the fiddle sing with childlike accents that he awakens something in the heart of the listener that perhaps no other violinist of today can evoke.

Two of the Brahms-Joachim Hungarian dances, the "Labyrinth" of Locatelli and the Paganini caprice on the "Moses" of Rossini completed the program.

It is a maturer Yehudi Menuhin who appears before us today. But he has still the priest-like aloofness that he had as a youngster. Like that great singer, Emmy Destinn, he does not believe in being on too easy going terms with Demos. There must be a touch of awe between them. Yehudi is right.

63

Menuhin Here Renders Work 'Lost' 81 Years

Trans. 12/2/37

Koussevitzky Drops Brahms as Result of Similarity to Schumann Concerto

By Moses Smith

Yehudi Menuhin played the now famous "lost" Violin Concerto of Schumann last night for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, as a result, when the famous young violinist makes his scheduled solo appearances with the Boston Orchestra on Feb. 4 and 5, he will play a single Concerto instead of the originally planned pair.

Yehudi, who came to Boston for his appearance at the Boston Morning Musicale this morning, has been the central figure in the international drama caused by the re-discvovery of the next-to-the-last work of Schumann, consigned to a century's oblivion by the will of Joachim, Schumann's friend. Menuhin was largely responsible for the breaking of the will, which prohibited performance of the Concerto until 1956.

His enthusiasm for a musical work which he considers the object of slanderous treatment resulted in the announcement of the projected first performance of the Concerto by himself and the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Vladimir Golschmann. But the Nazi authorities reconsidered the matter, insisted that such a prize ought not to go to two non-Aryans Thus, the first performance took place in Germany last Friday.

Four U. S. Performances

The first American performances are to be given by Menuhin with four American orchestras this season: St. Louis, Dec. 23 and 26; Philadelphia, Jan. 21 and 22; New York, Jan. 27 and 28, and Boston, Feb. 4 and 5. In each case the Brahms Concerto was also to have been presented by the young master. But last night's private hearing changed all that.

"The Schumann Concerto is a revelation," exclaimed Dr. Koussevitzky immediately after Menuhin had played it through with the piano accompaniment of Schumann. "There are no mysteries to me about Joachim's will, which refused to let the world have the Concerto before a century expired after the death of Schumann. He was too much of a friend of Brahms, to the point of a fault.

"Listening to the Schumann Concerto one constantly hears the Brahms Concerto ringing in one's ears. It is a colossal and inspired work, Schumann's noblest, and in playing it, the public must be given a chance to concentrate on it alone, on its beauty and greatness without any distracting additional concertos on the same program, particularly the Brahms.

"They are too much alike and the same, one as great as the other. The musical public on its own accord will immediately draw the right conclusion about the underlying debt of Brahms to Schumann, and it it almost indelicate to play the Brahms after the Schumann."

Sends Out Request

Menuhin needed no urging on the point, considering his own great admiration for the Schumann work. And through his managers he has promptly sent out a request to the other conductors involved that he be permitted to play only the Schumann Concerto at his several appearances.

The interest in the "new" work has been so great, furthermore, that Menuhin has agreed to give a preliminary public presentation of it for the benefit of a New York audience next Monday evening, when the accompaniment will be piano—"Schumann's own original version," Menuhin insists, as if to anticipate objections of the purists.

The violinist, who recently came out of a self-imposed retirement of almost two years, is now in the midst of a whirlwind of activity caused by almost solid bookings until August, 1940. Neither he nor his father knows what will come after that. In addition to today's recital at the Statler and the forthcoming appearances with the Symphony Orchestra, Menuhin will play here with his young pianist-sister, Hephzibah, in January. Boston will be one of the few American cities to hear them together this season—again a tribute to Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

DEC 2 - 1937

MENUHIN ACCLAIMED

'Lost Concerto' Wins New Laurels

BOSTON, Dec. 1.—(AP)—A private playing last night by Yehudi Menuhin of Schumann's recently discovered "Lost Concerto" so impressed Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky that he urged the young violinist today to drop the Brahms concerto from a future program here because it would be "distracting."

The conductor and a handful of music critic guests warmly acclaimed the Schumann selection, which has not yet been heard in concert in this country, although its world premiere was broadcast from Berlin last Friday.

As a result of Koussevitzky's reception, Menuhin decided today to advance the date of its American premiere and play the concerto, accompanied by piano alone, at his concert in New York next Monday evening.

Menuhin agreed, and said he would request the conductors of the St. Louis Philadelphia and New York philharmonic orchestras, with whom he had planned to play both on the same program, to drop the Brahms.

MONNESSEN, PA.
INDEPENDENT

DEC 2 - 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A rare musical treat that will attract concert-goers within a wide radius of Pittsburgh is offered in the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, December 11 and 12, under the management of May Beegle. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh presenting two outstanding programs. The Sunday afternoon concert, which begins at three o'clock is planned for the convenience of out-of-town music lovers, and judging from the patronage and enthusiasm accorded the Boston Symphony last season, it is safe to predict that Syria Mosque will be filled to capacity for both performances.

The major works on Saturday night include the Brahms Symphony No. 1; Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Orchestral Suite, and the Bach Concerto in D major for stringed instruments. On Sunday afternoon, December 12th, the Mozart Symphony in A major, and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 will both be given, as well as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Knovanstchina," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Morry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner.

Dr. Koussevitsky

Many local music lovers are planning to attend one or both of these concerts.

FRIENDS OF THE SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Gives Talk on Interpretation

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held their fourth annual meeting at Symphony Hall yesterday. Edward A. Taft, president of this association of loyal and generous citizens and music lovers, acted as chairman, and the speaker of the afternoon was Dr. Koussevitzky, who gave a scholarly and illuminating talk on the art and problems of interpretation. At the piano, Jesus Maria Sanroma illustrated certain points by playing music of Beethoven and Weber after the manner of Mendelssohn and Wagner. In conclusion, Dr. Kouesevitzky touched upon American orchestras in general. During his recent brief holiday, it seems, he has listened to those of New York and Philadelphia and one or two others as well.

Although it was especially requested by Mr. Taft that Dr. Koussevitzky's address of yesterday should not be quoted, as a whole or in part, there still can be no harm in repeating the wise observation that the great American orchestras are not the result of American wealth but of the need on the part of the American people for what these orchestras can give.

At the conclusion of Dr. Koussevitzky's remarks, the orchestra, or rather that portion of it which the slender score required, played the A Major Symphony of the 18-year-old Mozart which Dr. Koussevitzky added to the repertory last season and repeated a few weeks ago.

The exhibition of paintings in the first balcony gallery, which now supplements these meeings, consisted on this occasion of drawings and paintings by Winslow Homer, loaned by various galleries and private individuals. As they inspected this interesting and valuable collection, the Friends refreshed the inner man and woman with tea, cake and sandwiches.

WILKES BARRE, PA.
RECORD

DEC 1 - 1937

Concordia to Give 'Pop Concert' Series

"Pop Concerts", made famous by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be introduced in Wyoming Singing Society, the first on Monday evening, December 13, in Concordia Hall.

Attorney Charles H. Miner, Jr., was the inspiration for the striking change in Concordia's long-standing concert policies. "Pop Concerts," President William E. Newhart said:

"Consisting of a round medley of choral numbers, vaudeville acts, with a dash of minstrelsy thrown in, the informality of the program will be completed by the arrangements for community singing by the audience.

Josef Hofmann

Josef Hofmann began the 50th anniversary season of his concert career in America with a recital at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday, a remarkable occasion in our annals of concerts. There were a few in the great audience who had attended Josef Hofmann's first appearance in New York as a boy of 11. The great pianist was first heard in Boston in the same season, and there are those here who remember that notable debut and who will be present at the Golden Jubilee concert which he will give in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, December 12.

Heifetz at Symphony

Jascha Heifetz will appear as soloist at the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. These concerts will be given on December 17 and 18, the coming week being occupied by the annual western tour which includes appearances in Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh.

Prokofieff's Second Concerto for Violin is to have its first hearing in America at the coming pair of concerts. Heifetz will also appear with the Orchestra in the Concerto of Brahms.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW

DEC 2 - 1937

BRAHMS TO GIVE WAY TO SCHUMANN CONCERTO

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 1. (AP)—A private playing last night by Yehudi Menuhin of Schumann's recently discovered "Lost Concerto" so impressed Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky that he urged the young violinist today to drop the Brahms concerto from a future program here because it would be "distracting."

As a result of Koussevitzky's reception, Menuhin decided today to advance the date of its American premiere and play the concerto, accompanied by piano alone, at his concert in New York next Monday evening.

"The Schumann concerto is a revelation," said Koussevitzky. "The public must be given a chance to concentrate on it alone, without any distracting additional concerto on the same program, particularly the Brahms. They are too much alike."

Menuhin agreed, and said he would request the conductors of the St. Louis, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic orchestras to drop the Brahms.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 3 - 1937

Many Will Hear Buffalo Concert

This year even more Niagara Falls music lovers than went to Buffalo to attend the performance of the Boston Symphony last season plan to ~~go to the~~ concert next Tuesday night. With the famous Serge Koussevitsky conducting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fifty-seventh season, will present a program at Elmwood Music Hall in Buffalo Dec. 7, as the fourth concert on the Zorah B. Berry Tuesday evening series.

An adequate conception of the orchestra's quality and of the range of its concerts can be conveyed only by actually hearing this assembly of virtuosi led by a conductor of authority and inspiration.

"A huge audience, in a festive mood, greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening," wrote Lawrence Gilman in the New York Tribune, following the orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 19.

"The instrumentalists from the zone of the East Wind were never so admired in the metropolis as they are today. Their reputation is prodigious. Places at their concerts are almost unattainable. The enthusiasm of the audience is thunderous, electric and unfailing. Fortunate indeed is the Boston Symphony in this fourteenth year of the reign of Serge the First!"

When a New York music critic will use such extravagant terms in describing a concert, the orchestra must surely deserve the praise it receives wherever a concert is presented. The audiences which gather to hear the Boston Symphony are the cream of the concert-going public. People enjoy the quiet dignity and the fine taste of Koussevitsky and his men. Their programs are seldom, if ever, dull, for the orchestra is always on its mettle. The conductor is invariably acclaimed for his work by the audience.

Again to quote Mr. Gilman, whose opinion on music is considered as expert as that of any living critic: "He was at his best (referring to Koussevitsky) in the superb creation of Sibelius, one of the most original, exciting and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind. If Sibelius had written nothing but this single symphony, with its mysterious intensities and its imaginative power, he would stand among the greatest masters."

The Sibelius work, of which Mr. Gilman wrote, is the Second Symphony, which will also be included in the Buffalo concert.

The complete program for Tuesday evening is as follows:

Haydn ....Symphony in G major, No. 88
Prokofieff ......"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite
  Birth of Kije
  Romance
  Kije's Wedding
  Troika
  Burial of Kije
Sibelius ......Symphony No. 2 in D major

F. OF THE B. S. O.

The fourth annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held recently, was devoid of incident on the part of the public. No angry subscriber rose to denounce modern music. No intense radical came forward to complain about anything. Instead a large audience listened to the official news of figures and facts, to Dr. Koussevitzky in the unusual role of orator, to the Mozart symphony which the orchestra played, and remained to drink tea and admire the Winslow Homer water colors on the walls of the upstairs foyer. Whether such placid acceptance of a settled order is a good thing or not can safely be left to theorists.

What can be said immediately is that this organization, founded four years ago to remedy the rather lackadaisical methods of supporting the Boston Symphony that were employed since Major Higginson's activity ceased, has found favor with the public. Mr. Taft produced figures to prove that each year the membership of the Friends of the Symphony has increased by several hundreds. It should be remembered, too, that this increase has occurred in spite of the fact that the time of collection was changed from the end to the beginning of the season. If you can make the solicitation of money popular, you have certainly won half your battle.

More important, though less obviously so, has been the method by which the Friends of the Symphony has managed to function. In New York a drive for funds is conducted in a pitiless, blatant and undignified manner. You are made aware of the cause with all the tiresome efficiency that modern publicity methods can command.

Here, it is gratifying to record, Mr. Taft and his colleagues have made their activities appear informal and friendly. They did put aside the impersonal approach that was thought good enough before the establishment of the Society of Friends. Unquestionably, too, the motivating force has been practical common sense. But we have been saved the spectacle of high pressure salesmanship. And, marvelous to relate, this procedure works!

DISPATCH

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Attracts Local Music Lovers

A rare musical treat that will attract concert-goers within a wide radius of Pittsburgh is offered in the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, December 11 and 12, under the management of May Beegle. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh presenting two outstanding programs. The Sunday afternoon concert, which begins at three o'clock is planned for the convenience of out-of-town music lovers, and judging from the patronage and enthusiasm accorded the Boston Symphony last season, it is safe to predict that Syria Mosque will be filled to capacity for both performances.

Dr. Koussevitzky

The major works on Saturday night include the Brahms Symphony No. 1; Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Orchestral Suite, and the Bach Concerto in D major for stringed instruments. On Sunday afternoon, December 12th, the Mozart Symphony in A major, and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 will both be given, as well as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Morry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner.

Many local music lovers are planning to attend one or both of these concerts.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 4 -

MUSIC— Cold Water After Cocktails

By Carl E. Lindstrom

SIMPLE ANNOUNCEMENT from Boston that the American Sibelius Society has come into being is music news of first importance, less because a number of like-minded individuals have jointly dedicated themselves to the cause of a single composer, for such things have been done before, than that it nucleates a widespread, insistent and restless but unresolved feeling that one of the great composers of all time is a contemporary.

Formation of a society does not make a composer, as the shades of Bruckner and Mahler will testify, and Jean Sibelius does not need that help; but those ever so many persons who want to know more about his music do need it. One gets the impression, insofar as the Society's aims have been crystalized, that some such spirit is behind the present movement: The people need Sibelius more than Sibelius needs recognition.

The Society has incorporated and has timed its activities to begin on the composer's 72nd birthday, Dec. 8. The membership, about which a refreshingly modest anonymity is maintained, includes two lawyers, a maestro, a wholesale merchant, a pianist, a choral director and a journalist.

* * *

The aims nominally are to foster appreciation and study of Sibelius and his works, but a wide latitude is maintained as to methods.

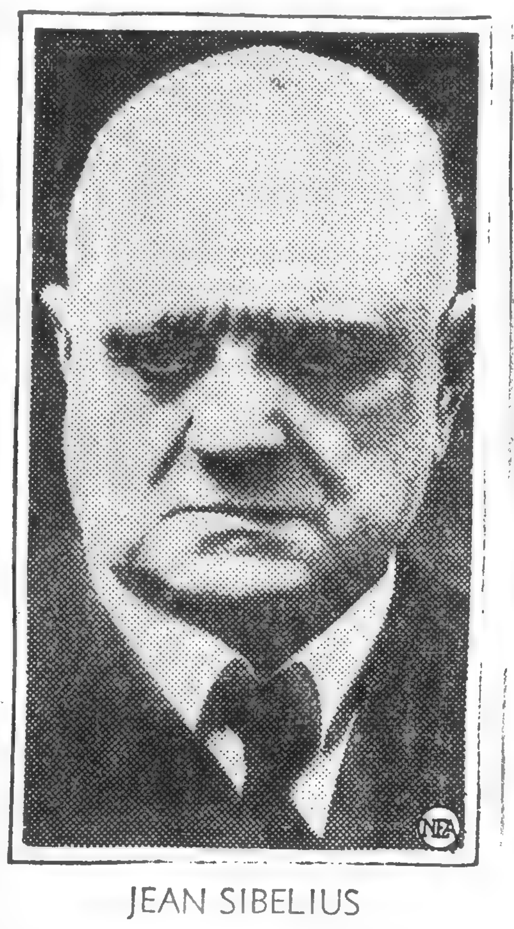
One important step has already been taken. The Society has sent the American soprano, Theodate Johnson, to Finland to make a special study of the songs of Sibelius, of which there are about 100 although comparatively few of them are well known. This study she pursued with Mme. Hagelstam, a noted Finnish singer. She familiarized herself with the language and availed herself of all the background necessary to artistic projection of the lyric Sibelius. An interview with Sibelius was more difficult to arrange, but a recording of Miss Johnson's voice had been sent to the composer and he was so pleased with its quality that he readily agreed to see her. He received Miss Johnson with cordiality and kindness and while it is well-known that Sibelius dislikes to talk about himself and his music, she was able to quote him in the following valuable comment: "Be sure to keep the legato line flowing. Don't sing dramatically; reserve that for certain spots only. Above all, sing with the heart."

To a degree for which it is difficult to find a parallel, there exists a great deal of Sibelius music which is downright inaccessible. Cecil Gray, when he wrote his monograph which incidentally is one of the most reasoned and courageous critical documents of the present century—found himself greatly handicapped for lack of Sibelius scores in England, which had been anything but hostile to the great Finn, and had to journey to Helsingfors and Jarvenpaa in order to canvass his field—then not with complete success. Some of the manuscripts have been sequestered by the composer himself; others are in escrow in Finnish libraries and museums; some of the greatest are hedged about with the technical difficulty of marshalling unusual instrumental and vocal forces necessary to their performance.

* * *

It is of particular interest in Connecticut to know that an important Sibelius work, "The Oceanides," was commissioned for the Norfolk Festival in 1914 when it was first performed under the composer's baton. He was then teaching at the New England Conservatory of Music and in the same year Yale made him an honorary Doctor of Music. Boston's interest in him is furthered by the fact that another of his significant tone poems, "Tapiola," was commissioned by the Boston Orchestra on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary in 1932.

Has "The Oceanides" had any Connecticut performances since that first in the ever-memorable summer of 1914? Possibly, but when shall the next time be? Dr. Koussevitzky, ardent champion of Sibelius that he is, did bring us Tapiola soon after its first performance. We have heard "The Swan of Tuonela" and Pohjola's Daughter and at least two of the symphonies but there are five others. A handful of the songs are well-known, but there are many, many others. Can we hope to hear the tone poem Luonnotar, and the "Return of Lemminkaeinen," "The Origin of Fire" and "Kullervo"; the quartet "Voces Intimae" and the incidental music to "The Tempest," "Pelleas and Melisande," "King Christian II" and "Svanehvit"?



JEAN SIBELIUS

One of the finest of the tone poems will be heard here Wednesday when Hans Kindler and the National Symphony Orchestra will present "En Saga." It was the first work to make the name of Sibelius known outside of Finland, and because of its sombre coloring unfortunately gave him the reputation of being a composer who was concerned mainly with the gloomy and forbidding aspects of life. Although this is hardly true, "En Saga" is assuredly characteristic Sibelius.

There are many facets to his complex nature, and to see only the one is to do him the kind of injustice which arises from his popular identification as the composer of Finlandia, Valse Triste and the Romance for piano. Whether he is the greatest symphonist since Beethoven, as Cecil Gray avers, it is certain that he has always maintained his direction unswervingly during a period when music has been above all else directionless. He has been no more afraid of dissonance than he has been of popular melody. It is doubtful that he ever harbored a theory of any kind: he had only to express a great mind and spirit, and he has always been craftsman enough to do it in a masterly way, regardless of what public fashion asked for or what other composers supplied it.

It will not prevent an understanding of "En Saga" or any other of the Finn's creations to bear in mind what Sibelius said to a German publisher when bringing him some new compositions: "Haer i utlandet fabricerar ni cocktails i olika kuloerer och nu kommer jag med rena kaellvattnet." Which from the Swedish may be read: "While you foreigners are busy making cocktails of various colors I bring you pure spring water."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

DEC 4 - 1937

PITTS.

FAMED BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BE HEARD HERE

Koussevitzky Directs Concerts Saturday And Sunday.

PROGRAMS VARIED

Bach Festival Choir To Begin Fourth Season On Tuesday Night.

Serge Koussevitzky, rated critically as one of the world's top-ranking conductors, will bring his Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pittsburgh next week for Saturday night and Sunday afternoon concerts at the Mosque.

Appearance of the Boston Symphony, second imported orchestra to perform here this season, and a program by the Bach Festival Choir of Pittsburgh will be the only major musical events of the week. The Pittsburgh Symphony ended the first half of its season yesterday and will not resume until December 30, when Eugene Gossens will be guest conductor.

Conductor Since 1924.

Dr. Koussevitzky, whose volcanic temperament is submerged beneath an impeccable musicianship, has been conducting the Boston Symphony since 1924. Five years ago he provoked critical controversy by leading the orchestra in the first public performance of George Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody in Blue."

Answering the question as to whether he was a classicist or modernist, Koussevitzky once said:

"I would like to make it clear that I am neither. The works of the great masters are indispensable, but music is not a static art. Music must be an expression of the period in which it appears. As to the value of the new works, conductors must use their own judgment."

Koussevitzky has achieved his greatest renown as the most outstanding interpreter of the contemporary composers, Sibelius and Stravinsky. He will play the Finnish composer's Symphony No. 2 here. The two programs follow:

SATURDAY EVENING.

C. P. E. Bach..Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments.
(Arranged for Orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
Prokofieff..'Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60.
Birth of Kije—Romance—Kije's Wedding—Troika—Burial of Kije
Brahms..Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

Mozart..Symphony in A major (K. No. 201)
Moussorgsky..Prelude to "Khovanstchina"
Straus..''Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner''—in Rondo Form, Op. 28.
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 2

A New Symphony From Professor Hi

A novelty on the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, presented yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was the Third Symphony, in G major, of Edward Burlingame Hill, distinguished resident composer, and professor of music at Harvard College. With his usual reticence and modesty, Mr. Hill merely told the editor of the program book that his new symphony had no descriptive background, and added a brief anal sis of the musical structure.

Fortunately the music is not so cold as the analysis. In fact this is the most effective and the most significant of all Mr. Hill's works. The two previous symphonies; the tone poems, "Lilacs" and the "House of Usher"; the Ode for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, the Sinfonietta—all these stirred admiration for the scholarship and the technical and structural gifts of the composer, without profoundly moving us. This new symphony adds to the former virtues of Mr. Hill as a composer a vigor and freedom of expression, a substance and an emotional depth that at a first hearing seem destined to place it in the first rank of American compositions.

The first movement is a gay and charming allegro, full of neat inventions and pleasing conceits. The Finale is a muscular proclamation, closely knit, building up to a powerful climax. Even more remarkable is the slow movement, elegiac in mood, at once eloquent and restrained in expression. There are echoes throughout of Mr. Hill's predecessors, but this time they include references not only to Gallic but to German and even Russian styles, and they have all been assimilated into an individual musical speech. The symphony did not fail to make its impression on the audience, which recalled its author to the platform again and again. Mr. Hill, justly enough, shared the tribute with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, who had been sympathetic as well as virtuosic interpreters.

The concert opened with a brilliant performance of Haydn's Symphony in E flat. The last movement was taken a little too fast. You couldn't say that the line was actually obscured—the orchestra seems to be able to play at any pace and still be clear—but you had to keep too close an eye on it. No doubt the capabilities of such a body of players offer a great temptation to a conductor, but he should not yield to it to the extent of distorting outline and proportion.

Emma Boynet, the soloist of the occasion, played Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in C major (K. 467) with a delicate grace that seemed a little too refined and gentle. There is more virility than this in Mozart.

The concert closed with Respighi's bombastic transcription of Bach's Organ Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor.

L. A. S.

6

PROF. HILL'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Rich Coloring and Warm Melodic Contours Mark Work

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Haydn and Mozart, whose names are so frequently linked, were rudely separated at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon when Dr. Koussevitzky placed the new Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill between the Symphony in E-flat major, No. 99, of the one and the C major Pianoforte Concerto (K. 467) of the other. For further chronological confusion, the concert ended with Bach's via Respighi (the great C minor organ Passacaglia and Fugue); yet the result was brilliantly successful.

EMMA BOYNET SOLOIST

The pianist in the Concerto, which had been played but twice before at these concerts, was Emma Boynet. On the face of it, the performance of one of these pianistically slender works hardly seems a full-sided job; while with a grand piano in a large hall there seems always a certain disproportion between the music itself and the conditions under which it is heard. But the answer to the first difficulty is that these concerts are by no means as easy as they sound; and surely the unceasing charm and euphony of yesterday's performance, as regards both Mlle. Boynet and the orchestra, plus the beauty of the music and the deft skill with which it was played were something one would not readily forego.

Mlle. Boynet, gratefully remembered from her previous appearance in Symphony Hall two years ago, when she played the C minor Concerto of Saint Saens, was recalled many times.

Mr. Hill's Work

Repeated summons to the platform were also the reward of Mr. Hill for having composed a symphony of such freshness and seeming spontaneity that the listening ear was caught with the first measure and held fast until the end. Whether or not Mr. Hill has here produced an enduring masterpiece is not to the point. Occasionally, though very rarely, the pervading geniality of his music lapses into mere facility. Nor would the reminiscence hunter depart empty-handed; at the very outset of the final movement one could almost fancy that the orchestral parts were those of the Prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin."

But such things can be discovered in any contemporary score, as in many an elder one, while the verve and buoyancy of Mr. Hill's symphony, its warm melodic contours, its rich and varied orchestral coloring are nowadays encountered all too rarely.

Choice of Tonality

It was good to find Mr. Hill turning his back upon cyclic form and inventing new themes for each of the three movements. Moreover, the choice of the tonality of E-flat minor for the slow movement of a symphony in G-major was a happy one. Here the music has a transient Russian flavor, but the music as a whole sounds what may well be considered the native note.

Like the Concerto of Mozart, Haydn's Symphony is one of those generally, but undeservedly, neglected. The performance of it yesterday was at the level of the rest of the concert, and that constitutes high praise. And if the purists and the pedants were shocked again at what Raspighi has done to Bach, the unregenerate once more rejoiced at hearing this music in a tonal dress appropriate to its intrinsic richness and splendor.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

4 - 193

SEAT SALE OPENS

Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert here Tuesday

Opening of the seat sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given Tuesday evening in Elmwood Music Hall was announced yesterday by Zorah B. Berry, local manager of the concert.

Under the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra of 108 musicians will present a program which includes two symphonies, the Haydn G-major, No. 88, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. An orchestral suite which will be presented is a light, satiric work written by Prokfieff for the Soviet film, Lieut. Kije.

The concert will begin at 8.30 and no late arrivals will be seated during the Haydn Symphony with which the program opens, the management has announced.

Transcript, Dec. 11/37

Boston's Friends of the Best

"Musick is the thing of the world that I love most," Samuel Pepys said. Many Bostonians share this thought when they go, at the week's end, to the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. Tones come to them then "that call up all ghosts of youth and joy and tenderness, evoke all phantom pains of perished passion, revive all dead sensations of majesty and might and glory, all expired exultations, all forgotten magnanimities." Remembered values the music brings to life, and also it inspires new powers.

This great work cannot be done without cost. In Europe many cities sustain a like enterprise at public expense. Here, the municipality makes no contribution. Instead, it takes a heavy annual tax toll from Symphony Hall. That cost forms a part of the deficit amounting, in all, to some $90,000 a year which must be raised by private subscription—a large sum, but less than the amount needed and given in other American cities for symphony orchestras which have taken the Boston band as their challenging standard of excellence.

To meet the financial need of the local institution there has come into existence the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "an association dedicated to the presentation of the best in orchestral music in the best possible manner." Its numbers are steadily growing. The enrollment is importantly larger now than it was a year ago. Of the needed funds, about two-thirds has already been given. This help is greatly welcomed by the chairman of the Society of Friends, Edward A. Taft, who in turn upholds the hands of the orchestra's trustees led by Bentley W. Warren. The other third still must come in, and will be readily given, we think, accordingly as contributors small and large remember the gift which the Symphony Orchestra makes to the enrichment of Boston's life and to the leadership of this city in an important undertaking of excellence recognized throughout the nation.

Globe Dec.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The new Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill was given first performance at the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Dr Serge Koussevitzky altered his program slightly, substituting for Haydn's G major Symphony, No. 88, the same composer's less familiar Symphony in E-flat, No. 99. Emma Boynet, the French pianist, played the solo part in Mozart's C major Concerto (K 4670), and the afternoon ended with the amazing "orchestral interpretation" that the late Ottorino Respighi made of J. S. Bach's mighty organ Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor.

Prof Hill's Third Symphony, set in the key of G major and created in 1936, is the most ingratiating music he has written in recent years. Perhaps it bears witness to a tendency among contemporary composers to abandon the rigors of the postwar era and to embrace once again the desirable qualities of emotional warmth and tonal beauty for its own sake. At any rate, the harmony is clear though piquant, the melody broad and gracious, and the whole work flows spontaneously. It is beautifully scored and presents a wealth of color.

According to the composer's note in the program book, the symphony ". . . has no descriptive background, and aims to present and develop musical ideas according to the traditional forms." No one ought to assume, however, that Prof Hill's music is simple. Far from it; his music reflects the complexity and sophistication of the modern mind. While his themes are ingenious rather than distinguished, and while sheer originality clings to but few pages, none but a technical master could produce so polished a score. If Wagner, Strauss and modern Frenchmen have supplied the basis for Prof Hill's orchestration, the general style is yet his own and shows how well he has assimilated what he has chosen to accept from predecessors.

It seemed that Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave brilliant performance to brilliant music. They will do well to repeat this symphony before the season is over. Prof Hill was present, and from the stage acknowledged the warm applause of the Friday audience.

Emma Boynet played Mozart's music just as it ought to be played: with clear and unfaltering finger dexterity and with rare perfection of style. Mozart requires intelligence, and he requires to be treated delicately but not coldly or in a mincing fashion. Mme Boynet's phrasing was well-proportioned. The tenderness that characterized the slow movement is something to be remembered. Thus it was regrettable that she chose the Busoni cadenzas, so far removed from Mozart's own style, and the first of which is about as appropriate to Mozart as a touch of swing in Siegfried's funeral march. Mme Boynet, like Prof Hill, was most cordially received.

This E-flat Symphony of Haydn, the 10th in the series he wrote for the London impressario, Salomon, is typical Haydn, just as fresh and delectable as its blood brother in G major. The treasury of Haydn symphonies is so vast that it is a shame an ordinary symphonic season affords little scope for exploration. Five years ago, Dr Koussevitzky devoted a whole program to Haydn, in observance of the 200th anniversary of his birth. We really ought to have a Haydn Festival some time.

While the purists fill each others ears with talk about the propriety of arranging Bach's music for modern orchestra, the rest of us may sit back and enjoy the sheer magnificence of tone in such a specimen of transcription as that of Respighi. No doubt when one so fond of mass effects as was Respighi sets organ and orchestra to going, clarity of detail is necessarily sacrificed. What of it? The essential outline of Bach's Passacaglia still remains, and the whole effect is simply stunning.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour. The Boston concerts of Dec 17 and 18 will bring Jascha Heifetz as soloist in the Brahms' Violin Concerto and Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto. Dr Koussevitzky will introduce the Concerto for Orchestra by the Soviet Michael Starokadomsky.

C. W. D.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

COURIER EXPRESS

1937

First Woman Conductor

For the first time in its 57 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have the honor.

Her. Dec. 4/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The eighth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Emma Boynet, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Haydn	Symphony in E flat No. 99
Hill	Symphony No. 3 in G major Op. 41
Mozart	Piano Concerto in C major (K. 467)
Bach	Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor for organ (transcribed for orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)

Mr. Hill's new symphony, played for the first time, created a very favorable impression on the majority of yesterday's audience, to judge by the applause which drew the composer several times to the front of the platform. It is a work more interesting for its workmanship than for its material. The last movement, which is the most brilliant, is rather surprisingly derivative of Wagner. One half of the mind admired the skill of the writing and the development of themes, while the other half wondered why the music did not suddenly turn into "Lohengrin" or the "Meistersinger."

No composer can altogether help these reminiscences, and they affect only part of the originality of his thought. Usually, too, the suggestion that there is a similarity between his and other music causes the composer surprise, for nine times out of ten the comparison never consciously occurred to himself. Thus it frequently happens that a writer is told that some story of his exactly resembles something, say, of Stevenson, whereupon the writer may truthfully answer that he has never read the work in question.

The point is worth laboring only because the quality that you admire in Mr. Hill's music is not the personality of the composer's ideas, but his skill and facility. The most individual movement and the one which is also the most beautiful is the slow movement. Here Mr. Hill has more of importance and of deep conviction to project. The entire symphony is undeniably effective. There is not an awkward or a meaningless page in the score. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra unquestionably gave it a sympathetic performance.

The new work was preceded on the program by one of the most enchanting of those masterpieces of symphonic literature, the later symphonies of Haydn. Haydn, in this E flat symphony as in others, is much more free in form and much less symmetrical than Mozart. His invention is amazingly lively, and as a matter of fact this symphony is a more interesting work than the more familiar "Surprise," an opinion which can easily extend to several others of the symphonies commissioned by Salomon. The symphony was beautifully played, except that the finale was taken a shade too fast.

It causes us a great deal of pleasure and some embarrassment to be able to reverse an impression of Mlle. Boynet's piano playing, which was formed at her appearance here two years ago in the Saint-Saens Fourth Concerto. Then she seemed to have the uncompromising tone and musical obduracy that sometimes is found in connection with the French piano schools. Now, however, she played with an exquisite tone. The grace of her phrasing and the neatness of her technique were a joy to hear in this lovely Mozart Concerto. Her performance was classical in feeling, as was the accompaniment provided by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The first Busoni cadenza was, on the contrary, anything but classical, though the second was much more in keeping.

Finally, for a grandiose conclusion, there was the great Organ Passacaglia of Bach. Respighi's transcription is very much too theatrical at the conclusion and in one or two details, but on the whole his is a remarkably effective arrangement. Happily it does not make the mistake of trying to imitate too literally the organ. Respighi was wise to keep it orchestral in spirit, and if we are going to hear a transcription of such a masterpiece it is better that way. The subject, of course, is not one to be settled by any such categoric statement as that. Nevertheless the point of view admits a plausible defense.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away. At the concerts of Dec. 17 and 18 Jascha Heifetz, violinist, will be soloist in Prokofieff's Second Concerto and the concerto of Brahms.

Notable Chapter Added to American Music

Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony Finds Itself at Home in the Company Of Compositions by Haydn, Mozart and John Sebastian Bach

By Redfern Mason

Yesterday was an important day in the history of the Boston Symphony, and the audience knew it. For, thanks to Serge Koussevitzky, we were privileged to hear one of the best chapters of music ever written by an American. If he had not believed in the work the keen sighted director would never have put Edward Burlingame Hill's Third Symphony on a program that opened with Haydn, ended with Bach and included the C major Piano Concerto of Mozart.

If Mr. Hill's work had not been an utterance of high musicianship, the gold of the great Viennese and the imperishable bronze of John Sebastian would have blinded our eyes to work of inferior merit.

We had listened to the dainty exquisiteness of the Haydn Symphony in E flat, No. 99, a work which the composer wrote for his sojourn in London, and inwardly blessed the Esterhazys for letting him give free rein to his fantasy for their aristocratic circle, even if they did treat him as a sort of superior lackey. Then we settled back, hoping for the best from the talent of New England.

The opening movement of Mr. Burlingame Hill's symphony was an emphatic summons to attention. The composer's confidences about the work published in the program give no inkling of his mental state when he wrote it. It is highly probable indeed that he would hesitate to say what his music really means. During the opening Allegro there is a sense of groping; he is like Dante in the Wood of Error; but he has glimpses of the Sun of Truth. In the second movement, the Moderato, you know that he has found the light. There is a sense of direction; the musician is moving towards a goal which his instinct perceives, though he may not have words in which to express it.

There is a choral use of the instrumental groups that momentarily suggests Bach, though the vernacular is Mr. Hill's own. The work grows in grace and the feeling comes over you that here America is standing artistically on her own feet. Not that there is any touch of local dialect. The composer's America is of larger significance. The spirit which operated in Emerson and Thoreau is here present; the narrow dogmatism of Cotton Mather is absent. The catholicity of Harvard at its best is to be felt.

In the Allegro energico, in which the work concludes, there is an abounding sense of obstacles overthrown; the battle ends in victory. The audience sensed this; they knew that the New Englander had accomplished something of which they might be proud. And they were right. Edward Burlingame Hill has written a score in which the American genius comes into its own.

Of the Haydn symphony it will suffice to say that Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it delightfully. He loves Haydn and knows that if "Papa" Haydn had something of the eternal child in him, that same childlikeness is one of the attributes of genius.

After the intermission we listened to the C major Concerto of Mozart, with Mdlle. Emma Boynet at the piano. The work is pure Mozartean music; there are "just enough notes," as the little Wolfgang once said to the Austrian emperor, when that worthy complained that his composition was too complicated. Every note is in its right place, and every phrase is a pearl. This pearl-like quality Miss Boynet brought out with a clarity to delight Mozarteans, who are the most exacting beings in the world. Her playing has the luminous quality of her race, and she has the Gallic horror of excess. A German would put metaphysics into the work; a Russian would seek for mysticism. But the French woman is content to find the light of the sun. Under her touch the music was radiant.

Koussevitzky found a tremendous climax for the concert in Respighi's orchestral transcription of the mighty Passacaglia in C minor of Johann Sebastian Bach, which is to music what Cologne cathedral is to architecture, a vast fane of tone that towers heavenwards.

Personally I would rather hear the composition on the organ, for which Bach wrote it. There is an impersonal majesty in the organ which the orchestra tends to dissipate, a touch, perhaps, of Italian theatricality. Yet to deny its orchestral grandeur would be tantamount to an admission of insensibility. There were moments of almost intolerable splendor. When tuba and trombones gave out that solemn theme, it was like the announcement of some august creed, solid as the foundations of the world. The suspensions of the first variation are a chain of sighs; the theme breaks up into phrases that are like stars. The work moves on from glory to glory, rising to the heights of a beatific vision. The end is a coda great as that of the D minor Toccata or the fugue in D in the first volume of the Well Tempered Clavichord. That throbbing of the drum at the close, the note C deep in the bass, was an unforgettable effect.

Yet I should like to hear Dr. Powers Biggs play the Passacaglia on the organ—a real Bach organ—in the Germanic Museum.

It was a great concert, by masters.

STOKOWSKI SHARES CHILDREN'S CUSTODY

Lawyer for Divorced Wife Reveals Such Agreement

LOS ANGELES, Dec 3 (A P)—Luke McNamee, attorney-of-record for Mrs Leopold Stokowski, said she and the noted orchestra conductor, will have alternate charge of the couple's two young daughters under yesterday's divorce decree, which he said included a property and custody agreement reached Oct 8.

In Philadelphia, Stokowski said he signed the agreement with the understanding—in which counsel concurred—that he and his wife have joint custody of the children.

"Yes, that's the way it is," McNamee said. "The agreement provides she will have the children part of the time and he part of the time."

He would not give details of the custody and provision for support of the children, however. All papers in the case at Las Vegas were sealed. First reports indicated Mrs Stokowski received sole custody of the daughters, Gloria Luba, 10, and Andrea Sadja, 6.

Stokowski deplored the cruelty charge on which his wife won her uncontested decree, saying "I could not be cruel to anyone, so I certainly could not be cruel to my children or their mother."

Cruelty is a blanket charge which appears in a majority of Nevada divorce complaints.

Composer Hill Given Ovation At Symphony

His New Work Given First Performance By Orchestra

By RUTH MARSTERS

Two symphonies, a Mozart concerto and the Respighi transcription of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue for Organ proved stimulating fare at yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The audience was of capacity size as is usual at these concerts and warm in its reception of Dr. Koussevitzky, returned after a week's absence.

Of the two symphonies, the one written by Haydn in 1793, the other by Edward Burlingame Hill in 1936, it may be said that neither suffered through proximity with the other.

* * *

The Haydn symphony was one of those commissioned by Solomon for Haydn's second London visit—the one in E flat No. 99. The Hill symphony was the third to be written by the distinguished Harvard professor, and was given its first performance in yesterday's concert.

Professor Hill was in the audience and came upon the platform at the conclusion of the performance given his work to share in applause which was both great and deserved.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

For Professor Hill's Third Symphony in G major, Op. 41 is marked by the fine workmanship and freshness which generally characterize his compositions.

It is without program. The three movements are Allegro grazioso ma con brio, Moderato ma non troppo lento and Allegro energico.

* * *

Following the intermission Emma Boynet, French pianist, came upon the stage in black velvet for the performance of Mozart's C major Concerto.

The fine delicacy of her playing, her agile fingers, won an appreciative audience at the outset.

Dr. Koussevitzky brought the program to a magnificent climax with Bach's massive work. The orchestra was in fine form throughout the concert. It was one to be remembered.

The same program will be repeated in this evening's concert in Symphony hall.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

TIMES

Boston Orchestra Returns for Concert Tuesday

By WILLIAM BREACH

Times Music Critic

An unusual offering of orchestral music is in store for the coming week. On Monday night Franco Autori will lead his forces in a well selected program which includes the great tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" by Strauss. John Priebe, Buffalo's tenor, will be the assisting artist and will sing some numbers that are new here.

On Tuesday evening we will hail the return of the incomparable Boston Orchestra under the baton of the renowned Serge Koussevitsky. Dr. Koussevitsky and his men have always been prime favorites here and undoubtedly there will be a crowded house to greet them. We are pleased to see that the program includes the 2nd Symphony by Sibelius. Dr. Koussevitsky has long been famous as a Sibelius interpreter and this presentation should be one long remembered in the musical experience of Buffalo.

* * *

66

Notable Chapter Added to American Music

Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony Finds Itself at Home in the Company Of Compositions by Haydn, Mozart and John Sebastian Bach

By Redfern Mason

Yesterday was an important day in the history of the Boston Symphony, and the audience knew it. For, thanks to Serge Koussevitzky, we were privileged to hear one of the best chapters of music ever written by an American. If he had not believed in the work the keen sighted director would never have put Edward Burlingame Hill's Third Symphony on a program that opened with Haydn, ended with Bach and included the C major Piano Concerto of Mozart.

If Mr. Hill's work had not been an utterance of high musicianship, the gold of the great Viennese and the imperishable bronze of John Sebastian would have blinded our eyes to work of inferior merit.

We had listened to the dainty exquisiteness of the Haydn Symphony in E flat, No. 99, a work which the composer wrote for his sojourn in London, and inwardly blessed the Esterhazys for letting him give free rein to his fantasy for their aristocratic circle, even if they did treat him as a sort of superior lackey. Then we settled back, hoping for the best from the talent of New England.

The opening movement of Mr. Burlingame Hill's symphony was an emphatic summons to attention. The composer's confidences about the work published in the program give no inkling of his mental state when he wrote it. It is highly probable indeed that he would hesitate to say what his music really means. During the opening Allegro there is a sense of groping; he is like Dante in the Wood of Error; but he has glimpses of the Sun of Truth. In the second movement, the Moderato, you know that he has found the light. There is a sense of direction; the musician is moving towards a goal which his instinct perceives, though he may not have words in which to express it.

There is a choral use of the instrumental groups that momentarily suggests Bach, though the vernacular is Mr. Hill's own. The work grows in grace and the feeling comes over you that here America is standing artistically on her own feet. Not that there is any touch of local dialect. The composer's America is of larger significance. The spirit which operated in Emerson and Thoreau is here present; the narrow dogmatism of Cotton Mather is absent. The catholicity of Harvard at its best is to be felt.

In the Allegro energico, in which the work concludes, there is an abounding sense of obstacles overthrown; the battle ends in victory. The audience sensed this; they knew that the New Englander had accomplished something of which they might be proud. And they were right. Edward Burlingame Hill has written a score in which the American genius comes into its own.

Of the Haydn symphony it will suffice to say that Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it delightfully. He loves Haydn and knows that if "Papa" Haydn had something of the eternal child in him, that same childlikeness is one of the attributes of genius.

After the intermission we listened to the C major Concerto of Mozart, with Mdlle. Emma Boynet at the piano. The work is pure Mozartean music; there are "just enough notes," as the little Wolfgang once said to the Austrian emperor, when that worthy complained that his composition was too complicated. Every note is in its right place, and every phrase is a pearl. This pearl-like quality Miss Boynet brought out with a clarity to delight Mozarteans, who are the most exacting beings in the world. Her playing has the luminous quality of her race, and she has the Gallic horror of excess. A German would put metaphysics into the work; a Russian would seek for mysticism. But the French woman is content to find the light of the sun. Under her touch the music was radiant.

Koussevitzky found a tremendous climax for the concert in Respighi's orchestral transcription of the mighty Passacaglia in C minor of Johann Sebastian Bach, which is to music what Cologne cathedral is to architecture, a vast fane of tone that towers heavenwards.

Personally I would rather hear the composition on the organ, for which Bach wrote it. There is an impersonal majesty in the organ which the orchestra tends to dissipate, a touch, perhaps, of Italian theatricality. Yet to deny its orchestral grandeur would be tantamount to an admission of insensibility. There were moments of almost intolerable splendor. When tuba and trombones gave out that solemn theme, it was like the announcement of some august creed, solid as the foundations of the world. The suspensions of the first variation are a chain of sighs; the theme breaks up into phrases that are like stars. The work moves on from glory to glory rising to the heights of a beatific vision. The end is a coda great as that of the D minor Toccata or the fugue in D in the first volume of the Well Tempered Clavichord. That throbbing of the drum at the close the note C deep in the bass, was an unforgettable effect.

Yet I should like to hear Dr. Powers Biggs play the Passacaglia on the organ—a real Bach organ—in the Germanic Museum.

It was a great concert, by masters.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

DEC 5 - 1937

Concert Will Be Presented At Ann Arbor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony orchestra will present a concert as one of the choral union series Wednesday night, in Hill auditorium, Ann Arbor. The program:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B & H No. 13) Adagio, Allegro; Largo; Menuetto, Trio; Finale, Allegro con spirito (Haydn).

"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60, Birth of Kije, Romance, Kije's Wedding, Troika, Burial of Kije, (Prokofieff).

Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43, Allegretto; Tempo andante, ma rubato; Vivascissimo, Lento e sauve; Finale, Allegro moderato (Sibelius).

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

Heavy Duties For Symphony

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

FOLLOWING a week's holiday in New York, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rejoined the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a program which, if extraordinarily long, was extraordinarily well worth the effort expended.

Friday's concert was the occasion of the first performance anywhere of Edward Burlingame Hill's Third Symphony in G major, Op. 41.

It is a more ambitious work than those which are the usual result of Prof. Hill's summers in Jaffrey, and is of course a decided departure from the vein of the earlier tone poems and symphonic suites.

Concerning the Third Symphony, which was completed in the summer of 1936, the distinguished Harvard professor and composer states, "It has no descriptive background, and aims merely to present and develop musical ideas according to the traditional forms."

That there is no lack of ideas in this symphony or any in the inventiveness with which they are worked out is obvious enough. To the freshness of impulse that always singularizes Prof. Hill's writings there seems to be here an added gusto. Certainly there is an added brilliance.

* * *

THE WORK is in three movements: Allegro grazioso ma con brio; Moderato ma non troppo lento; Allegro energico.

It was beautifully played and enthusiastically applauded. Composer and conductor took their bows together.

The nimble-fingered Emma Boynet next came upon the scene for the performance of the Mozart Concerto in C major.

Miss Boynet, as everybody knows, is French and of the pianistic school of Isidor Philipe. Aside from that, she is serenely feminine from the preliminary spreading of her black velvet skirt to her phrasing of Mozart.

Will Conduct at Ann Arbor—

before you have time to slip back into second gear. You could slam on the brakes, but even if you did miss the squirrel you might hit somebody's ash tub. You're going too fast if you can't stop quickly when you need to

A feminine art is one particularized first by its sensitiveness to detail—so Miss Boynet's playing is described. Minute attention to particulars will sometimes blur or distort the broader line, it is true. When the sweep and the detail are achieved at once, then it is no longer an art to be called feminine in the stricter sense, it is more likely just a Sigfrid Undset.

* * *

NO MATTER. Everybody enjoyed what Miss Boynet did.

The Haydn Symphony in E flat, No. 99, which opened the program, and the Bach Passacaglio and Fugue in C minor for organ in the Respighi transcription, which brought it to a close, were both given splendid performances under Dr. Koussevitzky's ardent leadership.

A Modest Plea for Improving N.B.C.'s Series

Suggestions and Comment About the Saturday Night Broadcasts

To the Transcript Music Editor:

The new orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company is now an established fact. For the last three Saturday evenings one might hear it from one's armchair, accompany it with a dry Palatinate, and think oneself at the Sunday "Pops." The programs succored the illusion. It is true that Arturo Toscanini had first choice, that the Orchestra's organizer, Artur Rodzinski, had the second and that Pierre Monteux must choose works that would not fall to his successors. But surely Mr. Toscanini has not planned to present the first and last movements of Sibelius' First Symphony, leaving the writhing middle divisions for Mr. Monteux's vivisection. Let us hope as well that the performance of the colorless second movement of Isadore Fried's "Jeu de Timbre" does not mean that Mr. Rodzinski has reserved the rest of it for us to hear at an early date.

But what an orchestra it is! Combined talents of the first order are bound to show their mettle even after only some seven weeks work together. As was expected, this group takes its place among the great organizations of the world. There is just one major difficulty that both sponsors and public seem to have forgotten in their enthusiasm: however excellent the re-creation of tone-color via the air, it has not yet nearly reached perfection. The tragedy of this great orchestra is that the public for which it was designed will never hear it at its best. For who has ever heard an orchestra sound down its resonant theatre and been satisfied with the scrapings of the ether?

Granted that the National Broadcasting Company has done well to place its concerts on Saturday evening, to design them for the greater audience that is not able to take its symphonic pleasures first hand. As such, this series marks a newer and worthier attitude of the purveyor's of wireless entertainment. Mr. Toscanini will find in it an ideal medium for playing proselyte to his classics, for teaching them to the outer circle of musical people who will be increasingly eager to hear them in actuality.

For these people however, there should be some informed commentary that would point out the significance of each work, and draw attention to its characterizing elements. This would require no more time than is necessary for orchestra's and conductor's breathing space. Prolonged and ear-splitting applause must cease. It is pointless to immitate the concert hall. The guest audience, which is being treated to a performance for the world and not for its sole delectation, must be limited to a moment's applause. This hand-clapping, in its turn, must be reduced in volume quite as the great orchestral climaxes are "controlled" at the operator's switchboard.

But what has happened to Mr. Monteux? He is still the excellent drill-master; he has still the perceiving ear necessary to develop an orchestra's advantages and dispose of its infecilities. The Concerto Grosso of Handel was played with understanding and beauty, but the conductor was naturally more at ease in the French works than in Sibelius. Meet him on his own ground then, and go with him to the miming of Pan and Syrinx in "Daphnis and Chloe," follow him through Chloe's polymodal dance to the tonal magnificence of the final pages of Ravel's masterpiece. Has he transmitted to us the elation and the surge of this music? Clamber over the enchanted wall into Katschei's magic garden. How lame is this sinister old rogue! Perhaps Mr. Monteux has seen Katschei's egg dashed once too often to Diaghilev's illusory stage. Assuredly we must have more out of so lustrous musical texture.

If Franck's Symphony sounded traditionally for the most part, there was suggestion enough of its inherent drama to imply the necessity of the final distillation that was not forthcoming. Franck in his organ loft saw the perfect vision. His was the ultimate emotion unsullied by the smaller practical passions of our everyday world. With mysticism as intense as William Blake's it must sound to us, and so it did not sound on Saturday evening. . . . What this orchestra can achieve we have yet to know. G. H. L. S.

(Ed. Note: The reader is reminded that the above represents the informed opinion of an individual correspondent.)

BUTLER, PA.
EAGLE

DEC 6 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN PITTSBURGH

A new score of Prokofieff, the orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kije," will be presented for the first time in Pittsburgh by Serge Koussevitzky when the famous Russian conductor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first of two concerts in the Syria Mosque, next Saturday evening, December 11, at 8:30, and Sunday afternoon, December 12, at 3. Prokofieff wrote the music for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije," in 1933. The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character—the movements describing "The Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika" and "Burial of Kije."

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1937

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ON U. OF M. COURSE

Will Play Wednesday Evening at Hill Auditorium Under Koussevitzky.

ANN ARBOR - Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral Union series at 8:30 Wednesday night, Dec. 8, in Hill auditorium. This will be the seventh annual trip which this group has made to Ann Arbor. During this period, Dr. Koussevitzky has played a variety of compositions both classic and modern; and on this occasion the following program has been arranged:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B & H No. 13), Haydn, Adagio; Allegro, Largo, Menuetto; Trio, Finale; Allegro con spirito. "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60, Prokoffeff; Birth of Kije, Romance. Kije's Wedding, Troika, Burial of Kije. Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, Sibelius; Allegretto, Tempo andante, ma rutato, Vivacissimo; Lento e suave; Finale: Allegro moderato.

66

Notable Chapter Added to American Music

Dec. 4/37

Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony Finds Itself at Home in the Company Of Compositions by Haydn, Mozart and John Sebastian Bach

By Redfern Mason

Yesterday was an important day in the history of the Boston Symphony, and the audience knew it. For, thanks to Serge Koussevitzky, we were privileged to hear one of the best chapters of music ever written by an American. If he had not believed in the work the keen sighted director would never have put Edward Burlingame Hill's Third Symphony on a program that opened with Haydn, ended with Bach and included the C major Piano Concerto of Mozart.

If Mr. Hill's work had not been an utterance of high musicianship, the gold of the great Viennese and the imperishable bronze of John Sebastian would have blinded our eyes to work of inferior merit.

We had listened to the dainty exquisiteness of the Haydn Symphony in E flat, No. 99, a work which the composer wrote for his sojourn in London, and inwardly blessed the Esterhazys for letting him give free rein to his fantasy for their aristocratic circle, even if they did treat him as a sort of superior lackey. Then we settled back, hoping for the best from the talent of New England.

The opening movement of Mr. Burlingame Hill's symphony was an emphatic summons to attention. The composer's confidences about the work published in the program give no inkling of his mental state when he wrote it. It is highly probable indeed that he would hesitate to say what his music really means. During the opening Allegro there is a sense of groping; he is like Dante in the Wood of Error; but he has glimpses of the Sun of Truth. In the second movement, the Moderato, you know that he has found the light. There is a sense of direction; the musician is moving towards a goal which his instinct perceives, though he may not have words in which to express it.

There is a choral use of the instrumental groups that momentarily suggests Bach, though the vernacular is Mr. Hill's own. The work grows in grace and the feeling comes over you that here America is standing artistically on her own feet. Not that there is any touch of local dialect. The composer's America is of larger significance. The spirit which operated in Emerson and Thoreau is here present; the narrow dogmatism of Cotton Mather is absent. The catholicity of Harvard at its best is to be felt.

In the Allegro energico, in which the work concludes, there is an abounding sense of obstacles overthrown; the battle ends in victory. The audience sensed this; they knew that the New Englander had accomplished something of which they might be proud. And they were right. Edward Burlingame Hill has written a score in which the American genius comes into its own.

Of the Haydn symphony it will suffice to say that Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it delightfully. He loves Haydn and knows that if "Papa" Haydn had something of the eternal child in him, that same childlikeness is one of the attributes of genius.

After the intermission we listened to the C major Concerto of Mozart, with Mdlle. Emma Boynet at the piano. The work is pure Mozartean music; there are "just enough notes," as the little Wolfgang once said to the Austrian emperor, when that worthy complained that his composition was too complicated. Every note is in its right place, and every phrase is a pearl. This pearl-like quality Miss Boynet brought out with a clarity to delight Mozarteans, who are the most exacting beings in the world. Her playing has the luminous quality of her race, and she has the Gallic horror of excess. A German would put metaphysics into the work; a Russian would seek for mysticism. But the French woman is content to find the light of the sun. Under her touch the music was radiant.

Koussevitzky found a tremendous climax for the concert in Respighi's orchestral transcription of the mighty Passacaglia in C minor of Johann Sebastian Bach, which is to music what Cologne cathedral is to architecture, a vast fane of tone that towers heavenwards.

Personally I would rather hear the composition on the organ, for which Bach wrote it. There is an impersonal majesty in the organ which the orchestra tends to dissipate, a touch, perhaps, of Italian theatricality. Yet to deny its orchestral grandeur would be tantamount to an admission of insensibility. There were moments of almost intolerable splendor. When tuba and trombones gave out that solemn theme, it was like the announcement of some august creed, solid as the foundations of the world. The suspensions of the first variation are a chain of sighs; the theme breaks up into phrases that are like stars. The work moves on from glory to glory rising to the heights of a beatific vision. The end is a coda great as that of the D minor Toccata or the fugue in D in the first volume of the Well Tempered Clavichord. That throbbing of the drum at the close the note C deep in the bass, was an unforgettable effect.

Yet I should like to hear Dr. Powers Biggs play the Passacaglia on the organ—a real Bach organ—in the Germanic Museum.

It was a great concert, by masters.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

DEC 5 - 1937

Concert Will Be Presented At Ann Arbor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony orchestra will present a concert as one of the choral union series Wednesday night, in Hill auditorium, Ann Arbor. The program:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B & H No. 13) Adagio, Allegro; Largo; Menuetto, Trio; Finale, Allegro con spirito (Haydn).

"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60, Birth of Kije, Romance, Kije's Wedding, Troika, Burial of Kije, (Prokofieff).

Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43, Allegretto; Tempo andante, ma rubato; Vivascissimo, Lento e sauve; Finale, Allegro moderato (Sibelius).

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

Heavy Duties For Symphony

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

FOLLOWING a week's holiday in New York, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rejoined the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a program which, if extraordinarily long, was extraordinarily well worth the effort expended.

Friday's concert was the occasion of the first performance anywhere of Edward Burlingame Hill's Third Symphony in G major, Op. 41.

It is a more ambitious work than those which are the usual result of Prof. Hill's summers in Jaffrey, and is of course a decided departure from the vein of the earlier tone poems and symphonic suites.

Concerning the Third Symphony, which was completed in the summer of 1936, the distinguished Harvard professor and composer states, "It has no descriptive background, and aims merely to present and develop musical ideas according to the traditional forms."

That there is no lack of ideas in this symphony or any in the inventiveness with which they are worked out is obvious enough. To the freshness of impulse that always singularizes Prof. Hill's writings there seems to be here an added gusto. Certainly there is an added brilliance.

* * *

THE WORK is in three movements: Allegro grazioso ma con brio; Moderato ma non troppo lento; Allegro energico.

It was beautifully played and enthusiastically applauded. Composer and conductor took their bows together.

The nimble-fingered Emma Boynet next came upon the scene for the performance of the Mozart Concerto in C major.

Miss Boynet, as everybody knows, is French and of the pianistic school of Isidor Philipe. Aside from that, she is serenely feminine from the preliminary spreading of her black velvet skirt to her phrasing of Mozart.

A feminine art its sensitiveness to ing is described. I will sometimes blu
it is true. When achieved at once, then it be called feminine in the stricter sense, it is more likely just a Sigfrid Undset.

* * *

NO MATTER. Everybody enjoyed what Miss Boynet did.

The Haydn Symphony in E flat, No. 99, which opened the program, and the Bach Passacaglio and Fugue in C minor for organ in the Respighi transcription, which brought it to a close, were both given splendid performances under Dr. Koussevitzky's ardent leadership.

Will Conduct at Ann Arbor—Serge Koussevitsky will bring the distinguished Boston Symphony orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral union series Wednesday night at 8:30 in Hill auditorium. This will be the seventh annual trip which this group has made to Ann Arbor. The program will consist of Hadyn's "Symphony in G Major," Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," orchestral suite, and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43."

A Modest Plea for Improving N.B.C.'s Series

Suggestions and Comment About the Saturday Night Broadcasts

To the Transcript Music Editor:

The new orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company is now an established fact. For the last three Saturday evenings one might hear it from one's armchair, accompany it with a dry Palatinate, and think oneself at the Sunday "Pops." The programs succored the illusion. It is true that Arturo Toscanini had first choice, that the Orchestra's organizer, Artur Rodzinski, had the second and that Pierre Monteux must choose works that would not fall to his successors. But surely Mr. Toscanini has not planned to present the first and last movements of Sibelius' First Symphony, leaving the writhing middle divisions for Mr. Monteux's vivisection. Let us hope as well that the performance of the colorless second movement of Isadore Fried's "Jeu de Timbre" does not mean that Mr. Rodzinski has reserved the rest of it for us to hear at an early date.

But what an orchestra it is! Combined talents of the first order are bound to show their mettle even after only some seven weeks work together. As was expected, this group takes its place among the great organizations of the world. There is just one major difficulty that both sponsors and public seem to have forgotten in their enthusiasm: however excellent the re-creation of tone-color via the air, it has not yet nearly reached perfection. The tragedy of this great orchestra is that the public for which it was designed will never hear it at its best. For who has ever heard an orchestra sound down its resonant theatre and been satisfied with the scrapings of the ether?

Granted that the National Broadcasting Company has done well to place its concerts on Saturday evening, to design them for the greater audience that is not able to take its symphonic pleasures first hand. As such, this series marks a newer and worthier attitude of the purveyor's of wireless entertainment. Mr. Toscanini will find in it an ideal medium for playing proselyte to his classics, for teaching them to the outer circle of musical people who will be increasingly eager to hear them in actuality.

For these people however, there should be some informed commentary that would point out the significance of each work, and draw attention to its characterizing elements. This would require no more time than is necessary for orchestra's and conductor's breathing space. Prolonged and ear-splitting applause must cease. It is pointless to immitate the concert hall. The guest audience, which is being treated to a performance for the world and not for its sole delectation, must be limited to a moment's applause. This hand-clapping, in its turn, must be reduced in volume quite as the great orchestral climaxes are "controlled" at the operator's switchboard.

But what has happened to Mr. Monteux? He is still the excellent drill-master; he has still the perceiving ear necessary to develop an orchestra's advantages and dispose of its infecilities. The Concerto Grosso of Handel was played with understanding and beauty, but the conductor was naturally more at ease in the French works than in Sibelius. Meet him on his own ground then, and go with him to the miming of Pan and Syrinx in "Daphnis and Chloe," follow him through Chloe's polymodal dance to the tonal magnificence of the final pages of Ravel's masterpiece. Has he transmitted to us the elation and the surge of this music? Clamber over the enchanted wall into Katschei's magic garden. How lame is this sinister old rogue! Perhaps Mr. Monteux has seen Katschei's egg dashed once too often to Diaghilev's illusory stage. Assuredly we must have more out of so lustrous musical texture.

If Franck's Symphony sounded traditionally for the most part, there was suggestion enough of its inherent drama to imply the necessity of the final distillation that was not forthcoming. Franck in his organ loft saw the perfect vision. His was the ultimate emotion unsullied by the smaller practical passions of our everyday world. With mysticism as intense as William Blake's it must sound to us, and so it did not sound on Saturday evening. . . . What this orchestra can achieve we have yet to know. G. H. L. S.

(Ed. Note: The reader is reminded that the above represents the informed opinion of an individual correspondent.)

BUTLER, PA.
EAGLE

DEC 6 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN PITTSBURGH

A new score of Prokofieff, the orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kije," will be presented for the first time in Pittsburgh by Serge Koussevitzky when the famous Russian conductor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first of two concerts in the Syria Mosque, next Saturday evening, December 11, at 8:30, and Sunday afternoon, December 12, at 3. Prokofieff wrote the music for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije," in 1933. The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character—the movements describing "The Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika" and "Burial of Kije."

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1937

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ON U. OF M. COURSE

Will Play Wednesday Evening at Hill Auditorium Under Koussevitzky.

ANN ARBOR - Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral Union series at 8:30 Wednesday night, Dec. 8, in Hill auditorium. This will be the seventh annual trip which this group has made to Ann Arbor. During this period, Dr. Koussevitzky has played a variety of compositions both classic and modern; and on this occasion the following program has been arranged:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B & H No. 13), Haydn, Adagio; Allegro, Largo, Menuetto; Trio, Finale; Allegro con spirito. "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60, Prokofieff; Birth of Kije, Romance. Kije's Wedding, Troika, Burial of Kije. Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, Sibelius; Allegretto, Tempo andante, ma rutato, Vivacissimo; Lento e suave; Finale: Allegro moderato.

67

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 5 - 1937

Glee Club to Open 27th Season Here

Berrick Schloss to Conduct Program of Old Songs and Less Familiar Choral Works Friday Night.

OLD favorites and some less familiar choral works will bring together the members of the University Glee Club for the inauguration of their 27th season at the first of a pair of concerts in Memorial Hall, Friday night. Berrick Schloss is conductor of the club and Earl P. Perkins will be the accompanist.

The soloist will be Harriette Price, contralto, and this will be her first concert appearance here since she came to Providence from Boston to make her home. The club's second program of the season is set for April 22, when Dorothy Minty, young American violinist, will assist.

Also scheduled for this week are concerts by Georg Fior, pianist, at the Music Mansion, Wednesday night; by the Mercado Tipica Mexican Orchestra, Thursday night in the Metropolitan Theatre, a benefit program under the auspices of the Lions Club of Providence, and by the Rhode Island Concert Orchestra, Edouard Caffier, conductor, in the Elmwood Congregational Church. The latter concert is sponsored by the church choir, Medora Ladeveze, director.

◆ ◆ ◆

Glee Club Selections

At its concert in Memorial Hall Friday evening the University Glee Club, Berrick Schloss, conductor, assisted by Harriette Price, contralto soloist, and Earl P. Perkins, accompanist, will present the following selections:

I. "Worship of God in Nature" .... Van Beethoven
II. "Drinking Song" .... Williams
"Awakening" .... Homier
"Let Us Be Merry" .... Dunhill
III. Aria, "Divinites du Styx," from the opera, "Alceste" .... Gluck
Harriette Price.
IV. "Invictus" .... Huhn
"O Lord Our God" .... Rachmaninoff
"Beloved Land" .... Andrews
V. "Joshua Fit de Battle of Jericho" .... Gaul
"Deep River" .... Burleigh
"Swing Along" .... Cook
VI. "Tomorrow" .... Henschel
"Harp of the Woodland" .... Martin
"A Christmas Carol," ...... Davidson
From Masefield poem, "Christmas Eve at Sea"
"The Fairy Mother's Lullaby" . Gebhard
"Song of the Open" ...... La Forge
Harriette Price.
VII. "Invocation of Orpheus" ..... Peri
"Where the Wild Thyme Blows" .... Barratt
"The Lost Chord" .... Sullivan

Mrs. Price studied with Frank La Forge in New York and with Sir George Henschel in London, singing their songs on programs over there. She also coached on German lieder with Egon Sigmund in Berlin. In this country she has appeared throughout New England and in the south in most of the standard oratorios including Handel's "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Saint-Saens's "Christmas Oratorio."

Her performance in "Elijah" was for the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, with John Charles Thomas in the title role. She has also given several recitals in Jordan Hall, Boston. Among orchestras she has sung with are the Chicago Symphony, under Fredrick Stock, and the Omaha Symphony, Joseph Littau conducting. This season's engagements number concerts at Boston, Concord, N. H., the University of New Hampshire, Exeter Academy and a tour of the south in the early spring now being booked.

◆ ◆ ◆

Fior Program Wednesday

At his recital in the Music Mansion, Wednesday evening, at 8:30 o'clock, Georg Fior, pianist, will play the following numbers:

I
Air and Variations .... Handel
Chorale .... Bach-Hess
"Le Coucou" .... Daquin
"Sister Monica" .... Couperin
Capriccio .... Scarlatti
Scherzo .... Beethoven

II
Barcarolle
Mazurka
Etudes: G-major, D-flat .... Chopin
Scherzo

III
Prelude, A-minor .... Debussey
Larghetto .... Saxton
"The Island Spell" .... Ireland
Caprice, from 'Bal masque' ...... Poulenc
"Music Box" .... Liadow
"Danse" .... DeFalla

Mr. Fior has aroused the enthusiasm of critics and audiences in London and cities on the Continent such as Paris, Berlin and Amsterdam. In this country he has appeared widely in solo programs and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra. During the past year and a half he has played more than 50 recitals.

Latin-American Music

Music characterization of Latin-American nationalities and countries will make up the program which Mercado's Tipica Mexican Orchestra, Angell J. Mercado, director, is to present in the Metropolitan Theatre Thursday night, at 8:15 o'clock, under the auspices of the Lions Club and for the benefit of its charitable work. Solists will assist the orchestra in the three groups into which the program is divided: Music of various Latin-American countries:

Spain, "Aires Andaluces" ...... G. Gomez
Peru, "Serenta Incaica" ...... Terig Tucci
Chile, "Hay, Hay, Hay" ...... O. P. Freire
Senor Jose Rubio, tenor. ......
Argentine, "Bella Nina," ...... J. Torres
Portugal, "Fado." ...... Escarpentier
Luis and Josefina Ojeda, dancers.
Columbia, "Ideal." .... Mercado-Garcia
Cuba, "Cuban Dream." ...... Carmen Delfin
Mexico, "La Cantinera" ...... arr. Mercado
Concert type music:
"Fragancias" .... B. Millas
"Pagina Romantica" .... Genaro Martinez
"Ventanita Colonial" .. Maria Teresa Lara
Senor Jose Rubio, tenor.
Concertino, opus 107 ...... G. Chaminade
Sarita, salterist.
"Malaguena" .... Ernesto Lecuona
Luis and Josefina Ojeda, dancers.
Preludio in C-minor ...... Carmen Delfin
Carmen Delfin, pianist.
"Las Hijas de Cadiz" ...... Leo Delibes
Senorita Lolita Valdez, soprano.
Capricho Espanol, opus 34 .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Canto Gitano.
Fandango Asturiano.
Typical Mexican music:
Number to be announced.
"Mexican Fantasy" ...... arr. Mercado
"Granada" .... Augustin Lara
Senor Jose Rubio, tenor.
"Las Gardonias" ...... Velino Preza
"Florecita" .... Maria Grevor
Senorita Lolita Valdez, soprano.
"Rancho Grande" .... arr. Mercado

◆ ◆ ◆

R. I. Orchestra Series

The concert to be given by the Rhode Island Concert Orchestra of the Federal Music Project, Edouard Caffier, conductor, in the Elmwood Congregational Church Friday night, is the first of a series of three public programs arranged for the orchestra this month. The second concert will come next Sunday night, in Plantations Auditorium, with Mme. Renata Flandina Ruisi, soprano, as soloist. The third will be played Dec. 29, in Trinity Union M. E. Church, Broad street and Elmwood avenue.

George Jordan, Providence violinist, will be the soloist at the concert Friday night. In this city Mr. Jordan has previously appeared as soloist at the Music Mansion, with the MacDowell Club and in joint recital with the late Oscar Lozzi, pianist, at Memorial Hall. He has also given recitals at the Copley Plaza Hotel, Boston; in Worcester, New London and other New England cities. Friday he is to play Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor for Violin and Orchestra as part of the following program:

Overture, "The Sicilian Vespers" .... Verdi
Symphony in G-major, No. 88 (old B. & H. No. 13) .... Haydn
"Voices of Spring Waltzes" ...... Strauss
Concerto in E-minor for Violin and Orchestra .... Mendelssohn
George Jordan, violinist
Prize Song, from "Die Meistersinger" Wagner-Wilhelmj
"Parade of the Little Lead Soldiers" .. Pierne
"Dance of the Comedians," from "The Bartered Bride" .... Smetana

At the concert in Plantations Auditorium next Sunday evening Mme. Ruisi will sing "O, Had I Jubel's Lyre," Handel; "Lovely Month of May," Hammond, and "Voi lo sapete, mama," from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." The orchestra will play the overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla,' Glinka; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat major, eight Russian Folk Songs, opus 8, Liadow; Nocturne, from incidental music to King Christian," Sibelius, and "Norwegian Rhapsody," Lalo.

◆ ◆ ◆

NEW KENSINGTON, PA.
DISPATCH

DEC 6 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Attracts Local Music Lovers

A rare musical treat that will attract concert-goers within a wide radius of Pittsburgh is offered in the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, December 11 and 12, under the management of May Beegle. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh presenting two outstanding programs. The Sunday afternoon concert, which begins at three o'clock is planned for the convenience of out-of-town music lovers, and judging from the patronage and enthusiasm accorded the Boston Symphony last season, it is safe to predict that Syria Mosque will be filled to capacity for both performances.

Dr. Koussevitzky

The major works on Saturday night include the Brahms Symphony No. 1; Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Orchestral Suite, and the Bach Concerto in D major for stringed instruments. On Sunday afternoon, December 12th, the Mozart Symphony in A major, and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 will both be given, as well as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Morry Pranks,' after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner.

Many local music lovers are planning to attend one or both of these concerts.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

DEC 10 1937

Martinets

LISTENERS who fortunately own radio-phonograph sets and who plan to hear Serge Koussevitzsky and the Boston Symphony play Sibelius' "Second Symphony" tomorrow night, might wisely secure Koussevitzsky's record album of this opus. It's full of beauty—and part of the second movement reminds one of Sibelius' greatest triumph, "Finlandia."

GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 6 - 1937

New Society To Honor Famous Finnish Composer

BOSTON, Dec. 6—Coincident with he 72nd birthday of the great Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius Dec. , comes the announcement of the ncorporation of the American Sibeius Society, a new non-profit organzation which has for its expressed urposes:

To foster appreciation and study f Sibelius and his works, to provide or a stimulation of interest in the omposer, the composers and their orks who have been influenced by m, and other composers whose orks may be deemed worthy of tensive study.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra as long been outstanding in its inrpretation and performance of the mposer's works under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The composer was honored by officials of the New England Conservatory when he visited America for the Norfolk Festival in 1914.

The Society has been formed by a representative group of music lovers of varied professions who wish to set in motion a movement, especially identified with Massachusetts, which will give tangible evidence of the artistic debt owed to Finland for the sponsorship of a musician whose music is unique in out time.

Prospective members of the Society should bear in mind that it is not necessary to be a musician, but simply to enjoy music, and that the purposes of the Society allow the widest possible scope of subjects to be discussed.

Inquiries should be addressed to Miss Mildred E. Bixby at 26 Central street, Boston, Mass.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 6 - 1937

Conductor

Serge Koussevirtzky, world famous musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall Tuesday evening.

Music

Boston Symphony Coming

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall, next Tuesday evening, under local booking of Zorah B. Berry.

The orchestra began the present season, its 57th, with a concert in Carnegie Hall, November 19th, playing the Sibelius Symphony No. 2, which will be played here.

"A huge audience, in festal mood, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening," wrote Mr. Lawrence Gilman in the New York Tribune, following the Carnegie Hall concert. "The instrumentalists from the zone of the East Wind were never more admired and renowned in the metropolis than they are today. Their reputation is prodigious.

"Mr. Koussevitsky was the familiar visual and interpretative self—perhaps a shade less escetic in appearance than hitherto, but no less concentrated, taut, imperious, and controlling. Also, as of yore, he was fervently acclaimed by his audience.

"He was at his best in the superb creation of Sibelius, one of the most original, exciting and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind."

The Haydn Symphony in G major, No. 88 to be given on the Buffalo program, is the famous symphony which the composer wrote for performance in Paris and was originally known by the Breitkopf and Hartel number of 13.

The new socre of Prokofieff, the orchestral suite Lieutenant Kije, will be presented for the first time here. Prokofieff wrote the music for the Soviet film, Lieutenant Kije, in 1933. The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character.

The program for Tuesday evening:

Haydn Symphony in G major, No 88
Prokofieff ....
Lieutenant Kije, Orqchestral Suite
Birth of Kije
Romance
Kije's Wedding
Troika
Burial of Kije
Sibelius.... Symphony No. 2 in D major

* * *

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 6 - 1937

Symphony To Play Here

Boston Orchestra to Give Concert

A new score by Prokofieff, the orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," will be presented for the first time here by Serge Koussevitzky when the famous Russian conductor and the Boston Symphony orchestra give a concert in the Museum of Art peristyle Thursday at 8:30 p. m.

Prokofieff wrote the music for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije" in 1933. The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character; the movements describing "The Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika" and "Burial of Kije." The lieutenant was an imaginary figure, springing from a misunderstood remark made by a military aid to the czar.

The obsequious courtier, fearful of pointing out to the czar the mistake he had made, invents an officer by that name.

The program will open with Haydn's "Symphony in G Major, No. 88." The famous symphony which the composer wrote for performance in Paris formerly was known by the earlier Breitkopf and Hartel edition number 13.

The closing number will be Brahms' "First Symphony in C Minor."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

[illegible] 6 - 1937

JOHN PRIEBE TO SING

Buffalo tenor to be soloist with Buffalo Orchestra

John Priebe, young Buffalo tenor, will be the soloist tonight at the concert of the Buffalo Orchestra in Elmwood Music Hall. Franco Autori will be conductor. Mr. Priebe has made an unusual choice of solos and will be heard in three Elizabethan songs arranged by the late Peter Warlock. Peter Warlock, which was the pseudonym of the brilliant young English writer, Philip Heseltine, found these songs in an early sixteenth century set of books in the British Museum, and arranged them for string orchestra.

Mr. Priebe also will sing the Mozart concert aria, Der Pieta, written in 1783 and used by the composer Anfossi for his opera Il Curioso Indiscreto. The orchestra will play the Mozart Haffner Symphony in D, the two Debussy nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals, and Strauss' Death and Transfiguration.

This concert is the third in the series of twelve to be given by the Buffalo Orchestra and the second to present a local soloist. Gordon Watkins, Buffalo pianist, will be soloist at the next concert on December 20th. In January, Gasper Cassado, celebrated Spanish cellist, last season a soloist with the New York Philharmonic, will play with the orchestra. Mr. Priebe will be a soloist in Boston in the spring performance of the Beethoven Missa Sollennis with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

D[illegible] 6 [illegible]

To Discuss Symphony Program

In her music appreciation class tomorrow Emma Endres will analyze and discuss the program of the coming Boston Symphony orchestra concert, which includes the Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 88," Prokofieff's orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," and the "First Symphony" of Brahms. The talk will be in the lecture hall of the Museum of Art at 10:30 a. m. and repeated at 8:30 p. m.

DONORA, PA.
HERALD-AMERICAN

DEC 7 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Attracts Local Music Lovers

A rare musical treat that will

Cont. like "Gazette" right ↗

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 1 - 1937

Winter Musical Events Inspire Plans For Parties Before and After

Nashes To Give Dinner Preceding Organ Recital at University Tuesday Evening

By HELEN FOOTE GRAHAM.

THE EARLY DAYS of December always are more or less quiet compared to those later in the month when there are parties galore for all ages and sets most of them formal affairs.

Currently, however, there are the usual informal gatherings, and with several musical events on the December calendar there will be parties before and after.

Mr. and Mrs. Philip C. Nash will entertain at dinner Tuesday evening in their home preceding the organ recital by Fernando Germani, the Italian virtuoso, in the Doermann Theater on the University campus. Mr. and Mrs. Preston E. James of Ann Arbor will be guests of honor at the dinner, the others including Mr. and Mrs. Jan S. Irvine, Mr. and Mrs. Hale T. Shenefield, Mrs. Roa Higgin and Dr. Robert Tucker.

The Nashes also will be hosts to a dinner group Thursday evening, Dec. 16, the night of the opening performance of "Yellow Jacket" by the University Dramatic Association in the University Theater.

The other important musical event this month is the annual membership concert for members of the Museum of Art. It will be Thursday evening, Dec. 9, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will ~~appear~~ for the third successive season.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 2 - 1937

Lost Concerto Wins Acclaim

BOSTON, Dec. 2.—(AP)—A private playing by Yehudi Menuhin of Schumann's recently discovered "Lost Concerto" so impressed Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky that he urged the young violinist today to drop the Brahms Concerto from a future program here because it would be "distracting."

The conductor and a handful of music critic guests warmly acclaimed the Schumann selection, which has not yet been heard in concert in this country, although its world premiere was broadcast from Berlin last Friday.

As a result of Koussevitzky's reception, Menuhin decided today to advance the date of its American premiere and play the concerto, accompanied by piano alone, at his concert in New York next Monday evening.

JEANETTE, PA.
NEWS DISPATCH

DEC 2 - 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 musicians will play at Syria Mosque, December 11 and 12 at Syria Mosque. The concerts are under the management of May Beegle.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will bring his orchestra to present the two outstanding programs, the first, Saturday night and the second, Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

The major works on Saturday night include the Brahms Symphony No. 1; Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Orchestral Suite, and the Bach Concerto in D major for stringed instruments. On Sunday afternoon the Mozart Symphony in A major, and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 will both be given, as well as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Morry Pranks" after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle

68

DEC 5 - 1937

MONDAY DEC. 13 1937

Symphony Due Tomorrow

TOMORROW evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return for a single concert in the Eastman Theater under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. The concert is listed in Series "A" of the events sponsored by the Civic Music Association.

Holders of Series "A" tickets are reminded that this concert is on Monday, rather than the customary Friday evening. Previous tour bookings made the Monday date necessary, it was said.

The orchestra will play Mozart's Symphony in A major; the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina;" "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss; and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, in F minor.

The Eastman Theater box office reports that a capacity house will be in attendance, with less than a 100 single seats remaining on sale tomorrow morning.

NEWS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Attracts Local Music Lovers

A rare musical treat that will attract concert-goers within a wide radius of Pittsburgh is offered in the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, December 11 and 12, under the management of May Beegle. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh presenting two outstanding programs. The Sunday afternoon concert, which begins at three o'clock is planned for the convenience of out-of-town music lovers, and judging from the patronage and enthusiasm accorded the Boston Symphony last season, it is safe to predict that Syria Mosque will be filled to capacity for both performances.

Dr. Koussevitzky

The major works on Saturday night include the Brahms Symphony No. 1; Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Orchestral Suite, and the Bach Concerto in D major for stringed instruments. On Sunday afternoon, December 12th, the Mozart Symphony in A major, and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 will both be given, as well as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Morry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner.

Many local music lovers are planning to attend one or both of these concerts.

GAZETTE

3/37

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Attracts Local Music Lovers

A rare musical treat that will attract concert-goers within a wide radius of Pittsburgh is offered in the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, December 11 and 12 under the management of May Beegle. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh presenting two outstanding programs. The Sunday afternoon concert, which begins at three o'clock is planned for the convenience of out-of-town music lovers, and judging from the patronage and enthusiasm accorded the Boston Symphony last season, it is safe to predict that Syria Mosque will be filled to capacity for both performances.

Dr. Koussevitzky

The major works on Saturday night include the Brahms Symphony No. 1; Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Orchestral Suite, and the Bach Concerto in D major for stringed instruments. On Sunday afternoon, December 12th, the Mozart Symphony in A major, and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 will both be given, as well as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Morry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner.

Many local music lovers are planning to attend one or both of these concerts.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

DEC 5 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SYRIA MOSQUE

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKL LEADS FAMED ORCHESTRA IN NEW PROKOFIEFF SCORE

Pittsburgh, Pa., Dec. 4—A new score of Prokofieff, the orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kije," will be presented for the first time here by Serge Koussevitzky when the famous Russian conductor and the Boston Symphony orchestra give the first of two concerts in the Syria Mosque, next Saturday evening, December 11, at 8:30, and Sunday afternoon, December 12, at 3. Prokofieff wrote the music for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije," in 1933. The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character—the movements describing "The Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika," and "Burial of Kije." The lieutenant was an imaginary figure, springing from a misunderstood remark by a military aid to the Czar. The obsequious courtier, fearful of pointing out to the Czar the mistake he had made, invents an officer by that name. The opening number for the Saturday evening concert will be a "Concerto for Strings," by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been arranged for larger orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Brahms in C Minor.

The Sunday afternoon program starting at 3 o'clock will open with Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 201. This symphony of Mozart is a product of his 18th year. It is scored for small orchestra. The second number will be the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina," a tone poem in miniature, which sets the mood for the opening scene, a public square in Moscow at dawn. Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will complete the first part of the program. The closing number will be the second Symphony of Sibelius in D major. When this symphony was performed at the opening of the orchestra's season in Carnegie Hall, New York, in November, Lawrence Gilman wrote in the New York Tribune: "Koussevitzky was at his best in the superb creation of Sibelius, one of the most original, exciting, and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind. If Sibelius had written nothing but this single symphony, with its mysterious intensities, its haunting imaginative power, he would stand among the masters."

Many people from Wheeling will attend these concerts, especially on Sunday afternoon.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 6 - 19

Boston Symphony Here Wednesday

Koussevitzky To Conduct; Program Announced

Another Ann Arbor concert tradition will be observed next Wednesday night in Hill auditorium when the Boston Symphony orchestra plays its seventh annual Choral Union concert and its 14th here in the long history of the series. The program for the event was announced today.

Serge Koussevitzky, who has directed the Boston orchestra for 14 of its 57 years, will conduct the musicians in their concert here.

Appearance of the Boston orchestra will provide the fifth and last Choral Union concert before the Christmas holidays. After the vacation period, local concert-goers will have an opportunity to hear several newcomers to Hill auditorium, including Ruth Slenczynski, the Helsinki Finnish chorus, Gina Cigna, the Roth String quartet and Georges Enesco.

The Boston Symphony program:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B & H No. 13) .... Haydn
Adagio: Allegro
Largo
Menuetto: Trio
Finale: Allegro con spirito
"Lieutenant Kije", Orchestral Suite, Op. 60 .... Prokofieff
Birth of Kije
Romance
Kije's Wedding
Troika
Burial of Kije
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 .... Sibelius
Allegretto
Tempo andante, ma rubato
Vivacissimo; Lento e suave

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

1937

* * *

Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister will be hostess at a supper Thursday evening in the Park Lane complimenting Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, following the concert in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle.

Out of town guests will be George E. Judd, Boston, manager of the orchestra; George Edman, editor of the Berkshire Evening Eagle, Lennox, Mass.

Miss Dorothy Sedgwick, Martins Ferry, O., who will be Mrs. Hollister's guest for several days this week and will attend the supper, will arrive tomorrow.

CHARLEROI, PA.
MAIL

DEC 4 - 1937

Boston Symphony Concerts At Mosque Next Week End

A rare musical treat that will attract concert-goers within a wide radius of Pittsburgh is offered in the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Saturday evenin and Sunday afternoon, December 11 and 12. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh presenting two outstanding programs.

The Sunday afternoon concert, which begins at 3 o'clock, is planned for the convenience of out-of-towr music lovers.

The major works on Saturday night include the Brahms Symphony No. 1 Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Orchestral Suite, and the Bach Concerto in D major for stringed instruments On Sunday afternoon, December 12 the Mozart Symphony in A major and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 wil both be given, as well as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Morry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner.

Many local music lovers are planning to attend one or both of these concerts.

Dec. 10 SENTINEL 1937

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Attracts Local Music Lovers

A rare musical treat that will attract concert-goers within a

69

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 5 - 1937

Boston Group Programs Prokofieff Novelty For Concert Under Serge Koussevitsky Friday

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, regarded as one of the greatest symphonic bodies in the world today, comes to Music Hall Friday evening as the fourth attraction in the current Artist Series. The orchestra is under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. This is his fifteenth season as head of this organization which he has molded into one of the most responsive instruments in the history of orchestral enterprises.

Its full complement of 110 musicians will appear in the concert here Friday evening in a program of variety and interest.

Dr. Koussevitsky has selected one of the most charming of Haydn's symphonies with which to open his program, the one in G major, which was written for a society in Paris and first performed there in 1787.

This will be followed by a very popular novelty, an orchestra suite by the Russian composer, Prokofieff called "Lieutenant Kije." It is in five parts. The music was originally written for a film by the same name. Later the composer made an orchestral suite of it. The music is descriptive of the adventures of a mythical lieutenant in the Czar's army who was a creature of an obsequious courtier's mind who did not wish to offend his master when the latter made a mistake of identity.

The suite was first played in Moscow in 1934. It was given its first American performance in Boston on October 15 last and made a fine impression.

The program will conclude with a grandoise performance of one of the greatest tone poems in modern musical literature, Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" (a Hero's Life). This magnificent work has not been heard here in a number of years. It requires an orchestra of exceptionally large proportions. When it was first performed in Frankfort in 1899 it aroused a tremendous amount of discussion and was regarded as the final word in music. It was played the following year for the first time in Cincinnati at the May Festival under Theodore Thomas. Since then it has been heard several times, but because of its large apparatus is less frequently performed than any of the other Strauss tone poems.

The program in detail follows:

Symphony in G Major.............Haydn
Agadio; Allegro.
Largo.
Menuetto; Trio.
Finale: Allegro con spirito.
Lieutenant Kije.............Prokofieff
Birth of Kije.
Romance.
Kije's Wedding.
Troika.
Burial of Kije.
INTERMISSION.
Tone Poem—Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40 Strauss

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 6 - 1937

Few Seats Now Remain For Boston Symphony

A little symphony which Mozart composed at the age of 18 will be the opening number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert in the Eastman Theater tonight. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's illustrious conductor, has revived this charming symphony of youth with conspicuous success. It is scored for a small string orchestra, with oboes and horns.

The second number will be the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera 'Khovanstchina," a tone poem in miniature, which sets the mood for the opening scenes, a public square in Moscow at dawn.

Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" will complete the first part of the programme. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, in the interpretation of which the Russian conductor holds a special fame.

The Eastman Theater box office reports a virtual sell-out for this concert, with none but a few seats in the higher price brackets remaining.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

Boston Maestro Pleads Cause Of Modern American Music

Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, entered one of his urgent pleas for greater recognition of modern American music in Rochester today.

"America is now rich in good composers," said the famous musician who will lead his celebrated orchestral group at the Eastman Theater tonight.

"The trouble is that the American public is not aware of this. American music is exerting a tremendous influence on modern European composers, whereas formerly Americans thought the only good music came from Europe.

"Rochester has in Dr. Howard Hanson of the Eastman School one of the greatest propagandists for American music.

"The great job facing him and other American musicians is to make the public understand the value of American music. It is interesting to note that some of the great classical music of the day is reflecting the influence of American jazz."

The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra was in Williamstown, Mass., today for an evening concert, opening a five-day tour with engagements in Troy, Saratoga Springs, Newburgh and White Plains.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

DEC 7 1937

MUSICIAN DEAD

BROOKLINE, Mass., Dec. 7, (AP)—Henry Horatio Stanislaus, 55, an English horn player for 20 years in the Boston symphony orchestra, died yesterday at his home. Burial will be at Scarboro, Me. Stanislaus' parents were court musicians to Queen Victoria. He left his widow and two daughters.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

A Boston Critic

Moses Smith in the Boston Evening Transcript.

THE St. Louis Symphony Orchestra is the second oldest orchestra with a continuous existence in the United States, being the senior of the Boston orchestra by a year and surpassed in age only by the New York Philharmonic Society.

In a little more than half a dozen years, attended by the usual local squabbles with the public and unions, Vladimir Golschmann has evidently succeeded, with the assistance of an able and sympathetic management, in rehabilitating the orchestra and subjecting it to ever higher artistic standards. The St. Louis orchestra is practically the equal of the great Eastern orchestras.

For some reason, the evening audiences are larger in St. Louis. But in age, predominance of the gentler sex and in cool responsiveness to the music-making, the audience was like that back home. It seems to admire the conductor and to be grateful to him for the things he is doing with (and to) the orchestra, but it will not get excited.

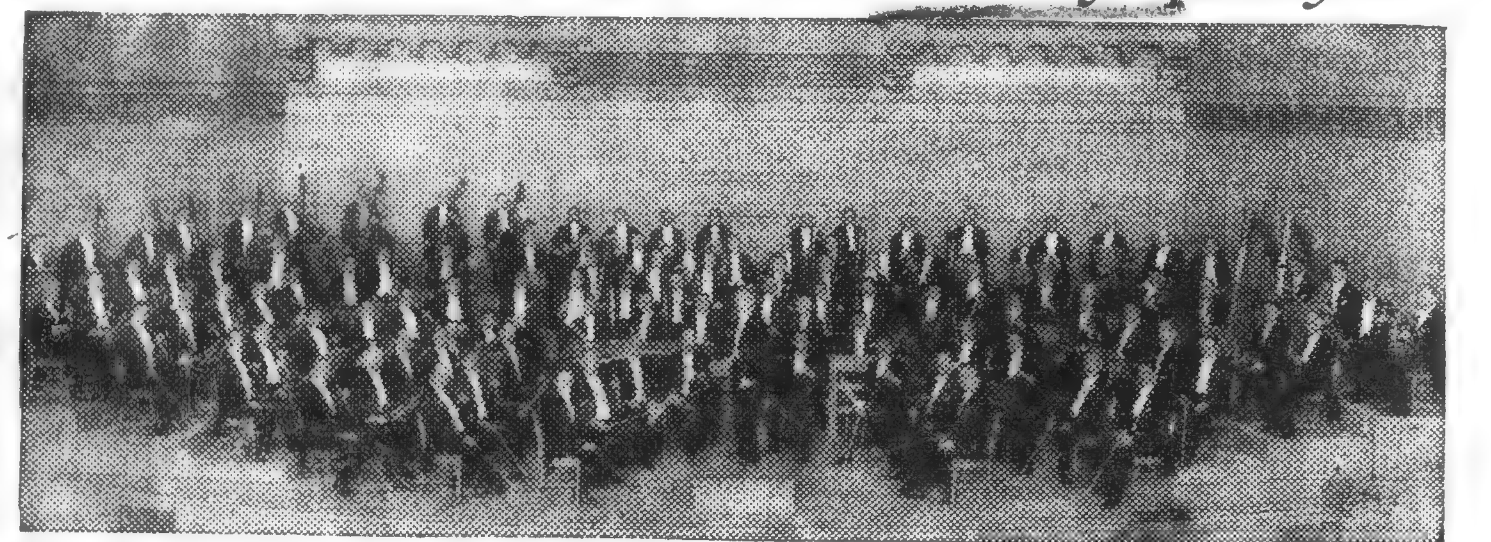
An orchestra is not made overnight, even with the best musicians. What was made clear, as the visitor listened to the St. Louis orchestra in a strange auditorium, was that the orchestra has now a fine esprit de corps and that it has a conductor of uncommon gifts under whose continued leadership it is bound to improve.

To the extent that the program and a single concert permitted one to judge one would say that Mr. Golschmann's competence is musical as well as technical, that he knows the scores and knows varying styles, and usually displays good taste. Above and beyond these things, he is a virtuoso conductor, with fire and bravura and imagination, usually kept under sane control.

MONROE, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1937

Ann Arbor to Hear Boston Symphony



Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hill Auditorium on Wednesday evening, December 8, when it makes its seventh annual concert in Ann Arbor.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

DEC 7 - 1937

abouts, and after that, summonses.

Symphony Orchestra Member Succumbs

BROOKLINE, Mass., Dec. 7.—(A. P.)—Henry Horatio Stanislaus, 55, an English horn player for 20 years in the Boston symphony orchestra, died yesterday at his home. Burial will be at Scarboro, Me. Stanislaus' parents were court musicians to Queen Victoria. He left his widow and two daughters.

Boston Symphony To Give Concert

Serge Koussevitzky will bring the distinguished Boston Symphony Orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral Union series Wednesday night, December 8, at 8:30 o'clock in Hill Auditorium. This will constitute the seventh annual trip which this outstanding group has made to Ann Arbor. The following varied program has been arranged:

Symphony in G Major, No. 88, B. and H. No. 13, (Haydn); "Lieutenant Kije", orchestra suite, Op. 60 (Prokofieff); Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43 (Sibelius).

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL

DE 7 - 19

MUSICIAN DIES

BROOKLINE, Mass., Dec. 7 (INS).—Prof. Henry Horatio Stanislaus, 55, associated with the Boston Symphony orchestra for more than 20 years, was dead today.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

PLANS CONCERT FOR MUSEUM

Boston Symphony Group To Introduce New Composition.

Long famous for his practice of introducing new compositions on his programs, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra will give Toledo its first opportunity to hear a work by Prokofieff when the ensemble plays in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle Thursday evening.

The score to be given its first performance here is the orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije, Op. 60." It is described as a satirical commentary, its various sections being labeled "Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika" and "Burial of Kije."

Also on the program to be given here are Hayden's "Symphony in G Major, No. 88" and Brahms' "Symphony No. 1, C Minor, Op. 68."

Thursday evening's event will be the annual concert complimentary to members of the museum. There is no public sale of tickets, but members are permitted to purchase additional seats for their guests. The concert is scheduled to begin at 8:30.

HENRY H. STANISLAUS

Prof Henry Horatio Stanislaus, 55, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 20 years, died yesterday at his home, 107 Colburne Crescent, Brookline.

Mr Stanislaus was born at Kidderminster, Worcester County, England. His grandparents were court musicians to Queen Victoria and his father was a bandmaster and orchestra leader. The Brookline descendant of these illustrious musicians had played first oboe and English horn in many parts of the world.

He leaves a wife and two daughters, the Misses Virginia and Daphne Stanislaus. Funeral services will be held at the Waterman Chapel, 495 Commonwealth av, Thursday at 9 a m, and burial will be in Scarboro, Me.

LINCOLN, NEB.
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 7 - 1937

QUIET ENTRANCE FOR TOSCANINI SYMPHONY

Only Polite Mention Among Press; Cost Will Run Over $250,000.

NEW YORK—(AP)—Considerably to the astonishment of many people about town, the famous new Toscanini symphony orchestra was almost stillborn, this week. Created at a cost of $250,000, and likely to cost a lot more before the bills are all in, this magnificent body of players was given a dress rehearsal last Tuesday, and instead of the critical hullabaloo that normally would follow, there was practically silence. Polite mention was the rule in the press, although there has been more than polite mention in the musical circles which presumably know.

There it is said that the new orchestra is as good as any on earth, and better than many. This is probably too strong praise—the orchestra as it sounded Tuesday under Arthur Rodzinski was probably not as brilliant as the Boston symphony, not as luscious of tone as the Philadelphia when Leopold Stokowski conducts. it sounded much like the Philharmonic-symphony of New York, though not a man was taken from the Philharmonic.

The orchestra's reception may be a hangover from the debate over the ethical position of Toscanni in returning to America, and over the doubtful practicality of giving the now famous Toscanini broadcasts on Saturday night, when half the symphony orchestras in the country are playing in their own halls.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 7 - 1937

Director Koussevitsky Wins Rounds of Applause From Capacity Audience

By RUTH B. CHAMBERLAIN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA! . . . .

These were magic words which brought social and musical Rochester hurrying to the Eastman Theater last evening for the outstanding musical event of the 1937 season. A great orchestra . . . this Boston Symphony . . . and a brilliant conductor, this Serge Koussevitzky who from the moment he stepped to the podium kept an audience spellbound with the majesty of his directing.

It was a night of nights.

A brilliant audience in top hat and ermine streamed through the foyers of the theater to fill every nook and corner while the more enthusiastic music lovers obeyed the "Standing Room Only" sign and heard the concert throughout from the rear of the theater. The applause which welcomed Mr. Koussevitzky was but a minor salute as compared to the salvos of handclaps which brought him back to the stage for countless encores at the conclusion of his program.

For those supporters of Rochester's musical season the concert last evening was the ultimate in orchestral art and their appearance in the mezzanine balcony and orchestra circle on this occasion was further proof of their interest in the artistic development of Rochester. We refer to such earnest music lovers as Mrs. George F. Johnston, who by the way has an amazing exhibit of the musical instruments which she collected while on a world tour, now on display in the Art Gallery promenade of the theater. These cases were of great interest to the many spectators who chose to promenade through this corridor during the intermission.

Mrs. William B. Macomber and her sister, Mrs. Samuel E. Durand, the two charming and musically-minded daughters of Mrs. Robert Ranlet, president of the Woman's Committee of the Civic Music Association, were among the most enthusiastic listeners. Mrs. Charles M. Everest, attired in a gown of palest blue chiffon and lace, arrived with an old friend and music lover, Mrs. Henry G. Danforth.

Speaking of gowns there was an elegant array of smart frocks to be seen in the premenades during the intermission. Mrs. George E. Norton, wearing a lovely dinner gown of heaven-blue satin brocade was seen in the Art gallery with her husband, the Rev. George E. Norton and her sister, Miss Marion Beach, and Miss Janes Gillis. Here also we met Mr. and Mrs. Beekman C. Little, Mrs. Charles P. Ford, stunning in a gown of silver brocade . . . Mr. and Mrs. Fred K. Thompson, Charles K. Hutchinson, Mrs. Ralph Voorhees, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest C. Whitbeck and Mrs. William R. Hardy and her daughter.

Outstanding in chic was Mrs. A. B. Sanderl whose gown of American beauty transparent velvet was designed in the princess mode. She was accompanied by her sister Mrs. Cecil B. Mackey of Toronto whose gown of black transparent velvet was worned with a triple strand of pearls.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wall, Mrs. James M. Gleason, Miss Helen Rogers, Herbert Stern, Mrs. Whitney Allen, Augustine J. Cunningham, Miss Louise Devine, Joseph Taylor, Judge George Carnahan and Mrs. J. Foster Warner were among the distinguished Rochesterians noted during the evening.

We remember also: The smart little Juliet cap of gold sequins worn by Miss Antoinette Townson; . . . the rich simplicity of Mrs. Henry M. Stern's black frock; . . . those exquisite green orchids worn by Mrs. Frank P. Smith who with Mr. Smith and Mr. and Mrs. Waldo Potter enjoyed a cigarette and chat with us during intermission; . . . we remember also: The regal carriage of Mrs. George O. Bailey and her beautifully coiffured hair; . . . the kindly smile of Mrs. Milton Chapman whose frock of dark red lace over matching taffeta was entirely becoming; . . . Nor can we forget the generosity of her companion Miss Helen C. Richards whose proffered cough-drop saved us from missing any part of this wonderful concert.

Mrs. William E. Werner lovely in a gown of black transparent velvet with gold lame sleeves and silver fox cape, was among the

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle

DEC 7 -

Boston Symphony Concert Draws Crowds of Music Lovers To Eastman Theater

WHEN Serge Koussevitsky stepped on the stage at the Eastman Theater to conduct the Boston Symphony last night, he was greeted with a long and hearty round of applause by a large audience in which society was well represented.

Appearance of the famous orchestra here is always a notable event on the music calendar, and never fails to attract hundreds to the theater.

Noted as they came in the mezzanine entrance were Mrs. Frederick T. Pierson, her son, Frederick and Mrs. Pierson, and Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell Pierson. Mrs. Alan Valentine came in with Mrs. Mary Steichen Martin, and also noted entering the theater were Mrs. William .T Noonan and her daughter, Mrs. Frank Beattie, Dr. and Mrs. Harold L. Alling, Mrs. John Hill Kitchen and Miss Louise Devine, Mrs. Charles P. Ford, wearing a white brocaded gown, and Dr. and Mrs. George E. Norton, the latter gowned in blue and silver brocade.

Mrs. Samuel E. Durand and Mrs. William B. Macomber were noted together, and also seen before the concert began were Mrs. George F. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Thaddeus S. Newell, Miss Marietta Dryer and Rufus Dryer 2nd, Mrs. J. Warren Cutler, Mrs. John Montignani, and Dr. and Mrs. Lewis Gilbert with Mrs. Eric B. Hoard.

Others seen before the concert were Dr. and Mrs. Charles B. F. Gibbs, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Challice, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph C. Willson, Mrs. Walter Farley with her sisters, Mrs. James Bristol and Mrs. Albert F. Sulzer, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Booth, the latter in a beautiful gown of cream satin over which was worn a long wrap of wine red velvet, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Maloy, Mrs. Maloy in a wrap of black velvet with becoming shirred collar, Mrs. Smith Sheldon, Mrs. George Wetmore and her daughter, Dorothy, the latter in a ruby red velvet wrap, Mrs. Raymond A. Lander and her daughter, June, and Mrs. Arthur G. Dutcher and her son, Darrow.

Mrs. Walter Forsyth in a handsome wrap of black velvet with lovely collar of fox, with her mother, Mrs. Innis P. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Ivan L. Nixon and their son, Richard, Mrs. Nixon stunning in a gown of black velvet with jeweled clip and smart wrap of black velvet with collar of chinchilla, Mr. and Mrs. Wendell J. Curtis.

Mrs. Taylor Bidwell and Mr. and Mrs. Walter Cassebeer, Mrs. Cassebeer attractively gowned in black crepe, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Stern, the latter in a most effective gown of black satin with panel of brilliant red and beautiful wrap of ermine, and Miss Louise Kelly.

A storm of applause followed the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" and the conductor was recalled several times before the members of the audience left their places to stroll in the corridor during intermission.

Noted in the corridor were Mrs. John Ward and daughter, Betty, who wore a lovely gown of blue with a matching ornament in her hair, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Hallett, the latter gowned in rust colored damask. Dr. David B. Jewett and his son, David, and Mr. and Mrs. Newton B. Castle, Mrs. Castle wearing a gown in an especially lovely shade of green.

Mrs. William P. Barrows, wearing black velvet with white lace collar and cuffs, was noted with Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Osborne, and also seen chatting with friends during the intermission were Dr. and Mrs. Willson Coates, the latter gowned in olive green velvet, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Smith, Mrs. Smith in a lovely gown of brown net, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Horwitz, Mrs. William F. Washburn in a gown of black velvet with lace trim, Miss Margaret Withington, Miss Marion Weed, in a lovely gown of black lace over white taffeta, and Mrs. Raymond Thompson with her daughter, Virginia.

Mr. and Mrs. Sandor Vas were noted, as were Mr. and Mrs. Harry Watts and Mr. and Mrs. John DeWitt, Miss Joan Carpenter, who wore a sweet gown of turquoise moire, Mrs. Leonard M. Weiner and her daughter, Dorothy, Dr. and Mrs. William A. McVay, Col. and Mrs. Harry Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Howard J. Ludington and Mr. and Mrs. Earl Sandmeyer.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hayes were noted chatting with Mr. and Mrs. Morton Baum, and others seen at the concert were Mrs. Charles D. Blackmon and her son, William, Mrs. Carl Paul and her son, Carl Jr., Mrs. Wade H. Reichard and her daughter. Mary Rose, who gown of black velvet with square cut neck line set off with brilliant clips was most becoming, and Miss Alice Howell, charming in black velvet, and her guest, Miss Ann Reinhold of Jacksonville, Fla., occompanied by Charles Crandall.

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson G. Corkhill were seen, as were Mrs. J. Foster Warner and her son, J. A. Warner, Mrs. Frank S. Thomas and her uncle, Samuel Averill, Miss Ellen Todd, Mr. and Mrs. Harrison L. Chapin, Mrs. Chapin in a graceful gown of rose satin, Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Frame with Mrs. Charles T. Crouch, Dr. and Mrs. Earl Elliott, Mrs. Robert Douglas wearing an exquisite gown of blue and silver lame, Dr. and Mrs. Karl Wilson, the latter attired in a gown of silver and blue lame, Mrs. Marjorie Pratt with her mother, Mrs. George Bailey. Miss Marion Myers and her brother, Jack.

Mrs. Mary Thomas in charming frock of lavender chiffon, Miss Florence McCurdy, smart in a gown of black crepe with puffed sleeves of silver brocade, Dr. and Mrs. Richard C. Jaenike, Miss Helen Rochester Rogers, Miss Helen Maloy, charmingly gowned in white crepe with wrap of black velvet, accompanied by her father, Charles J. Maloy, Dr. and Mrs. G. Kirby Collier, Mr. and Mrs. Leland Judd with Mr. and Mrs. Wadsworth Sykes, Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur B. Rayton, Mr. anl Mrs. Arthur M. Lowenthal, Charles Hutchison, Mr. and Mrs. Reed Shutt, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Jackson, Mrs. Davis Doron, Mrs. Bradley T. Frazier and Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Frederickson.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 8 - 1937

(70)

SYMPHONY OF SORROW

Musicians Mourn Oboist's Death

Musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave their usual brilliant performance at Elmwood Music Hall although, unknown to the large audience, they were mourning the loss of one of their most noted confreres.

After the concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director, revealed the orchestra had been notified as it left Rochester yesterday morning that Henry Stanislaus, internationally-known oboist, had died of pneumonia in a Boston hospital.

Mr. Stanislaus, a native of England, had lived in Boston for the last 25 years and annually made the symphony's tour. Just prior to the start of the current tour he was taken ill and removed from his home to the hospital. The orchestra will move on to Ann Arbor, Mich., this morning.

MUSIC REVIEW

By
ISABELLE WORKMAN EVANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its magnificent leader, Sergei Koussevitzky, returned to Buffalo for a performance last night in Elmwood Music Hall, which will long be remembered by those fortunate ones present. The superb artistry and the amazing technical perfection of this body of fine musicians is sufficient to please the most critical connoisseur or to inspire the most apathetic layman. The concert was a presentation of Zorah B. Berry.

The Symphony in G Major, No. 88 by Haydn was the delightful opening number of the program. This perfectly disciplined band of artists, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky since 1924, provided an interpretation with freedom of expression and opalescence of tone to delight the listener. An interesting program note informs one that this symphony was first performed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the year 1889, just 80 years after the death of the composer. The vivid coloring, the rhythmic line, the mellifluent phrasing, the perfect control of the leader and the inspired response of the men, were all qualities of the performance which elicited rapturous applause from the audience.

An interesting feature of the program was the playing of the orchestral suite, Lieutenant Kije, Op. 60 by Prokofieff. This cleverly orchestrated number was published in 1934 and was given its first performance in the United States by the Boston Orchestra in October of this year. The music, which depicts many incidents in the life of a ficticious Russian officer, Kije, possesses extremely effective and clever instrumentation. The unusual solo passages were adroitly played and the entire composition was given a lucid and enjoyable performance.

The massive tonal effects of the Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius, offered great contrast to the delicacy of the opening Haydn opus. Dr. Koussevitzky imparted great contrast in moods and provided restraint and reserve in building up his climaxes which evoked storms of applause from the enraptured listeners. Dr. Koussevitzky returned many times to the podium to acknowledge the acclaim, which left no doubt that the evening was a memorable one.

H. H. STANISLAUS DIES IN BROOKLINE

Was in Boston Symphony Orchestra 20 Years

Prof. Henry Horatio Stanislaus, 55, of 107 Colburne Crescent, Brookline, associated with the Boston Symphony orchestra for 20 years, died yesterday at his home.

A native of Kidderminster, Worcester county, England, Mr. Stanislaus had played first oboe and English horn in symphony orchestras in many parts of the world. His grandparents were court musicians to Queen Victoria and his father had been bandmaster in the second battalion Scottish border regiment and had conducted a civilian orchestra.

After instruction by his father Mr. Stanislaus won two scholarships, including a maintenance grant, in the Royal Academy of Music at South Kensington, from which institution he was graduated with the title, Associate, Royal Academy of Music.

He then played first oboe and English horn in the Queen's Hall orchestra, conducted by Henry Wood, later coming to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

He leaves his wife and two daughters, the Misses Virginia and Daphne Stanislaus. Funeral services will be at 9 A. M. Thursday in the Waterman Chapel, 495 Commonwealth avenue. Burial will be in Scarboro. Me.

Musician Dies

HENRY H. STANISLAUS

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

Dec. 7/37

MUSIC REVIEW

By
ISABELLE WORKMAN EVANS

The Buffalo Orchestra of the federal music project and of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra Society appeared again under its dynamic conductor, Franco Autori. last night in Elmwood Music Hall. This was the third recital of the current series; the enthusiasm of the public in applauding this organization which now is recognized as a permanent civic enterprise, is wholehearted. The soloist yesterday evening was the Buffalo tenor, John Priebe.

The gay and virile Symphony in D Major, Kochel, No. 385, by Mozart was the opening number. Mr. Autori gave this composition an interpretation notable for authoritative style, well proportioned nuance, and precise rhythm. The robust character imparted to the Allegro, the lovely tone quality of the Andante, the rhythmic charm of the Menuetto and the brillancy of the Finale were appreciated by the listeners.

Mr. Priebe has become widely known as a singer of oratorio. This tenor, who has been re-engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, chose numbers for last night's program well suited to the lyric quality of his voice. A group of Elizabethan Songs arranged with strong orchestra by the English composer, Peter Warlock, were Mr. Priebe's first offerings. He imparted appropriate feeling to the songs and presented them in an effective manner. The lovely quality of his voice which is never forced, was apparent in his offering of the aria Per Pieta, Non Ricercate, by Mozart. The applause was enthusiastic.

The beautifully impressionistic Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals, by Debussy, were played by the orchestra in an effective manner. The many moods of these exquisite tone paintings were portrayed ably. The final program number was the dramatic Death and Transfiguration, by Strauss. The orchestra followed the leadership of Mr. Autori in impressive tonal shadings. The interpretation of this emotional tone poem received salvos of applause from the enthusiastic audience. The next concert of the series will take place December 20th and will feature C. Gordon Watkins, pianist, as soloist.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

DEC 7 - 1937

Tomorrow marks the 72d birthday of the great Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. Coincident with the anniversary comes announcement from Boston of the incorporation of the American Sibelius society, a new non-profit organization which proposes to foster the appreciation and study of Sibelius and his works, to provide for stimulation of interest in the composer, the composers and their works who have been influenced by him, and other composers whose works may be deemed worthy of intensive study.

It is particularly fitting that this movement should begin in Massachusetts, for the Boston Symphony orchestra has long been outstanding in its interpretation and performance of Sibelius' works, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. When the composer visited America for the Norfolk festival in 1914, he was honored by officials of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
DEC 8 - 193

Many Visitors Here Will Attend Boston Symphony Orchestra

By IDA TAYLOR

THERE are many visitors in the city, most of whom will attend the concert to be given tomorrow evening, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art.

Mrs. Clark Browning has as a guest in her home on Parkwood avenue, Mrs. G. W. Burton of Ft. Worth, Tex., who arrived Sunday from her home for a several weeks' visit here.

Mrs. Ralph Holbrook of Jersey City, former Toledoan who has been a guest for a brief visit in the home of Mrs. Robert West, will accompany her hostess to Ann Arbor today to attend a concert being given in that city this evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mrs. Holbrook will remain over for the concert tomorrow evening and plans to return to her home in the east on Saturday.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

A SNAPP OF MUSIQUE

If you have forgotten that Bach had a sense of humor, you can remind yourself of that fact by listening to his "Peasant Cantata," which G. Bret has adapted and shortened somewhat, which Jeanne Guyla soprano, and Martial Singher, barytone, sing, and which Victor has recorded in set M-360. The music is sung in French, which sounds a little strange at first, but it is sung with gusto and with nice humor. M. Bret directs the orchestra with what you might call verve.

Two Bach arias, sung in German this time, and sung with understanding by Ria Ginster, soprano, are also available for those who dote on the classics. The arias are 'Hort doch der sanften Floten' and "Schafe konnen sicher weiden" (Victor 14385). You ought to do something about 'em.

You also ought to do something about Mme. Roesgen-Champion's recording of Haydn's Major Concerto for harpsichord and orchestra, if you dote on the classics. This harpsichordist is extraordinarily good, the orchestra conducted by Piero Coppola is competent, and the music is the kind that makes you sigh with contentment (Victor 12042).

The classic tradition is continued by Edwin Fischer's Chamber Orchestra, which plays Abaco's Concerto in B-flat major. Mr Fischer seems to be as good a director as he is a pianist (he doesn't do any playing here), and that's good enough for any one. And the music is charming (Victor 14418)

Albert Spalding, the violinist, who is coming to town this winter to be soloist with the Indianapolis Symphony, has recorded Beethoven's Romance in F Major, Op. 50 (Victor 14579). The playing is dextrous.

The romantic tradition is sustained by two records made by the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The first (Victor 14415) contains the Overture to Moussorgsky's "Khowantchina," which will please you no end. The second is Faure's "Elegie" (Victor 14577), with Jean Bedetti playing the cello solo. The playing is as suave as the music.

Iturbi turns in "Cordoba," by Albeniz, a characteristic bit of Spanish music, which isn't as good as it sounds (Victor 1844). And Jussi Bjoerling, tenor, whom you may have heard on the air, sings two familiar operatic airs, "LaDonna e Mobile," from "Rigoletto," and "Recondita armonia," from "Tosca" (Victor 4372). You doubtless have read comments to the effect that this young man sounds like Caruso. He does, although his voice isn't as fully matured as the Caruso voice captured on records. But it's an outstanding voice, full, rich and free.

W. W.

YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS
DEC 9 - 1937

Koussevitzky Has Power In Symphony Direction

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 9—The only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the powerful direction of Serge Koussevitzky to be made in Michigan this season took place Wednesday evening at Hill Auditorium, marking the 14th concert played here by that organization.

The program, following the mold for orchestra programs this season, contained two symphonies, the G Major of Haydn, which opened the concert, and the Sibelius Second which closed it.

Between the two heavier works was played a new orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije" by Prokofieff, in which the modern Russian satirized the military pomp and circumstance of Imperial Russia. The work had its first American presentation by the Boston Orchestra on October 15 of this year and was as enthusiastically received there as it was in Hill Auditorium Wednesday. It was composed in 1933 and its relationship with things strictly modern is further marked by the fact that it was written as incidental music to a cinema.

The thrilling power of the Sibelius opus was presented in all its potential splendor and emotional effect, and the applause with which it was received brought Maestro Koussevitzky back to the podium again and again while the orchestra stood to receive the tribute of the audience for the masterful reading.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 8 -

Boston Symphony Delights Packed House at Music Hall

By WILLIAM BREACH
Times Music Critic

An audience which filled Elmwood Music Hall welcomed with enthusiasm the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a concert last night under the management of Zorah B. Berry. Orchestra and conductor in the finest fettle presented a lustrous concert both as to performance and program content.

The program opened with the Haydn Symphony in G. major, No. 88, the playing of which was marked by a sureness of attack and a beauty of tone that was a constant delight. The delicious humor and poetry of this delightful score were vividly set forth. Under Dr. Koussevitsky's deft baton the Largo was charged with depth of feeling, the Minuet moved with rhythmic grace and liveliness and the Finale with breath-taking speed and brilliance.

Serge Prokofieff's suite, "Lieutenant Kije," closed the first half of the program. This suite is derived from the incidental music which the composer wrote for a satirical Soviet film of the same title. This cleverly contrived score is undoubtedly very effective when heard in connection with the film. For concert purposes it seems somewhat too episodic to be entirely satisfactory, although it is bright and witty music written with exceptional sureness. It has brittleness and a satirical flavor characteristic of Prokofieff. It offers exceptional opportunities for individual players to display their skill. Needless to say it was played brilliantly and the audience received it with favor.

We are indebted to Dr. Kousseviteky for the opportunity of hearing the second Symphony of Sibelius. To many concert goers Sibelius is known only by his tone poem, "Finlandia." It is only within the last 15 years, or so, that the world has really begun to realize that he is one of the great symphonic writers.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR
C 9 - 1937

Boston Symphony Friday Night at

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town on Friday evening, December 10, to give a concert in Music Hall, there will be 110 musicians on the stage, facing their eminent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. This concert will be the fourth attraction in the current Artist Series and the first visit to this city in three years of this world-famous orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky will play a program of unusual proportions. He begins with the G major Symphony of Haydn, frequently known as the "Surprise" symphony. This will be followed by the first performance here of a new work by the Russian composer, Prokoffief. It is an orchestral suite called "Lieutenant Kije". This lieutenant is a fictitious character invented to save the Czar, Paul I from embarrassment when he misinterprets one of his aide's reports. The music is humorous and sardonic. Originally written for a motion picture which was produced in Moscow, the orchestral suite had a great success in Paris last spring and was first played in America last October by the Boston orchestra.

The concluding number on the progra poem. Heldenleben (A Hero's Life) by Richard Wagner. This work requires the largest of orchestras and is now regarded as the greatest work Richard Strauss has written for orchestra. Because of its great requirements it is seldom played. The Boston orchestra has made it one of its specialties and Dr. Koussevitzky was induced to place it on the Cincinnati program.

Because the Boston orchestra seldom visits this part of the country and its Cincinnati appearance is the only one in southern Ohio, many music lovers from all around will be on hand for this performance. The seat sale, which is in progress at the Baldwin store, 142 West Fourth street, indicates that the capacity of Music Hall will be tested.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TONIGHT

Performance of Orchestra Is for Museum Members.

Led by the noted Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in the Museum of Art peristyle this evening at 8:30. The Boston organization, one of the oldest and most famous in the country, has made several appearances here, always winning high acclaim from the city's music lovers.

Selections announced for tonight's program include the first Toledo performance of a Prokofieff suite, "Lieutenant Kije," said to be one of that composer's most interesting scores.

Two symphonies have been announced, Haydn's "G Major, No. 88" and Brahms' "No. 1, C Minor, Op. 68."

This is the annual concert complimentary to members of the museum and for that reason there has been no public sale of seats. Members, however, can purchase additional seats for their guests.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

Boston Symphony to Play Sibelius Composition Here

The famous second symphony of the brilliant Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, will be included on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it presents two concerts in Pittsburgh Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

Today marks the seventy-second anniversary of the birth of Sibelius.

A new score by Prokofieff will be presented for the first time here by the orchestra.

Yesterday marked the seventy-second anniversary of the birth of Sibelius.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST
1937

Fourth of Artist Series Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, consisting of 110 musicians, comes to Music Hall Friday evening as the fourth attraction in the Artist Series. This will be the first visit of this notable orchestra to Cincinnati in three years.

It will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who has been leader of the orchestra for 15 years.

The program it offers includes the G Major Symphony of Haydn, the 88th symphony that prolific composer wrote.

Then will follow the first performance here of a new work by the Russian composer, Prokoffief, called "Sergeant Kije."

It is an orchestral suite arranged from the musical score which Prokoffief wrote for a motion picture, which was produced in Moscow in 1933. The music is in a sly, humorous vein as it has to do with a lieutenant who never existed except in the brain of the Czar Paul I. It was played for the first time in this country by the Boston orchestra in Boston Oct. 25 and scored a brilliant success.

The program concludes with the colossal tone poem "Ein Heldelleben" (Life of a Hero) by Richard Strauss.

The visit of the Boston orchestra is bringing to town music lovers from Louisville, Dayton, Lexington, Oxford, Manchester and Indianapolis.

The Boston orchestra plays one week in the middlewest and Cincinnati is one of the six cities selected. Seats are on sale at J. Thuman's box office in the Baldwin store.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 9 - 1937

Boston Symphony Thrills By Faultless Performance

By Kenneth N. Westerman

In its concert last night in Hill auditorium, the Boston Symphony orchestra brought again to an Ann Ann Arbor audience that faultless perfection in symphonic production which has grown to be an expected annual thrill. Orchestras may come and go, but when the Boston Symphony, under the masterly conducting of Serge Koussevitzky, literally throws itself into the interpretation of a great symphony, the memory of their past concerts becomes again a vivid pleasure, and one feels that thrill of super-excellence which causes him to enthusiastically proclaim that the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra transcends all others.

When some one replies "How about"—whatever favorite they think of first—one merely shakes his head and declares that it simply isn't possible to do more perfect work than that of Tuesday night in the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, when the gripping fragmentary beauties were built into rugged powerful themes and Sibelius takes his place as one of the greatest of symphonic composers because the interpretation of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony brings out all the intensity and vigor of his sturdy music.

The clean precision of melodic line in the Haydn Symphony in G major, the oddities of the Prokofieff Orchestral Suite, and the rugged beauties of the Sibelius Symphony made a program of unsurpassed excellence and variety.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with its background of 57 years of the finest traditions of leadership, organization and artistry, has an ideal in production that demands an excellence not to be surpassed, and Serge Koussevitzky's leadership, scholarly but not pedantic, emotional but not effusive, vital but not erratic, vigorous but not violent, brings that ideal to fruition.

71

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
DEC 8 - 19

Many Visitors Here Will Attend Boston Symphony Orchestra

By IDA TAYLOR

THERE are many visitors in the city, most of whom will attend the concert to be given tomorrow evening, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art.

Mrs. Clark Browning has as a guest in her home on Parkwood avenue, Mrs. G. W. Burton of Ft. Worth, Tex., who arrived Sunday from her home for a several weeks' visit here.

Mrs. Ralph Holbrook of Jersey City, former Toledoan who has been a guest for a brief visit in the home of Mrs. Robert West, will accompany her hostess to Ann Arbor today to attend a concert being given in that city this evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mrs. Holbrook will remain over for the concert tomorrow evening and plans to return to her home in the east on Saturday.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

A SNAPP OF MUSIQUE

If you have forgotten that Bach had a sense of humor, you can remind yourself of that fact by listening to his "Peasant Cantata," which G. Bret has adapted and shortened somewhat, which Jeanne Guyla soprano, and Martial Singher, barytone, sing, and which Victor has recorded in set M-360. The music is sung in French, which sounds a little strange at first, but it is sung with gusto and with nice humor. M. Bret directs the orchestra with what you might call verve.

Two Bach arias, sung in German this time, and sung with understanding by Ria Ginster, soprano, are also available for those who dote on the classics. The arias are 'Hort doch der sanften Floten' and "Schafe konnen sicher weiden" (Victor 14385). You ought to do something about 'em.

You also ought to do something about Mme. Roesgen-Champion's recording of Haydn's Major Concerto for harpsichord and orchestra, if you dote on the classics. This harpsichordist is extraordinarily good, the orchestra conducted by Piero Coppola is competent, and the music is the kind that makes you sigh with contentment (Victor 12042).

The classic tradition is continued by Edwin Fischer's Chamber Orchestra, which plays Abaco's Concerto in B-flat major. Mr Fischer seems to be as good a director as he is a pianist (he doesn't do any playing here), and that's good enough for any one. And the music is charming (Victor 14418)

Albert Spalding, the violinist, who is coming to town this winter to be soloist with the Indianapolis Symphony, has recorded Beethoven's Romance in F Major, Op. 50 (Victor 14579). The playing is dextrous.

The romantic tradition is sustained by two records made by the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. The first (Victor 14415) contains the Overture to Moussorgsky's "Khowantchina," which will please you no end. The second is Faure's "Elegie" (Victor 14577), with Jean Bedetti playing the cello solo. The playing is as suave as the music.

Iturbi turns in "Cordoba," by Albeniz, a characteristic bit of Spanish music, which isn't as good as it sounds (Victor 1844). And Jussi Bjoerling, tenor, whom you may have heard on the air, sings two familiar operatic airs, "LaDonna e Mobile," from "Rigoletto," and "Recondita armonia," from "Tosca" (Victor 4372). You doubtless have read comments to the effect that this young man sounds like Caruso. He does, although his voice isn't as fully matured as the Caruso voice captured on records. But it's an outstanding voice, full, rich and free.

W. W.

YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS
DEC 9 - 1937

Koussevitzky Has Power In Symphony Direction

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 9—The only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the powerful direction of Serge Koussevitzky to be made in Michigan this season took place Wednesday evening at Hill Auditorium, marking the 14th concert played here by that organization.

The program, following the mold for orchestra programs this season, contained two symphonies, the G Major of Haydn, which opened the concert, and the Sibelius Second which closed it.

Between the two heavier works was played a new orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije" by Prokofieff, in which the modern Russian satirized the military pomp and circumstance of Imperial Russia. The work had its first American presentation by the Boston Orchestra on October 15 of this year and was as enthusiastically received there as it was in Hill Auditorium Wednesday. It was composed in 1933 and its relationship with things strictly modern is further marked by the fact that it was written as incidental music to a cinema.

The thrilling power of the Sibelius opus was presented in all its potential splendor and emotional effect, and the applause with which it was received brought Maestro Koussevitzky back to the podium again and again while the orchestra stood to receive the tribute of the audience for the masterful reading.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 8 - 1937

Boston Symphony Delights Packed House at Music Hall

By WILLIAM BREACH
Times Music Critic

An audience which filled Elmwood Music Hall welcomed with enthusiasm the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, in a concert last night under the management of Zorah B. Berry. Orchestra and conductor in the finest fettle presented a lustrous concert both as to performance and program content.

The program opened with the Haydn Symphony in G. major, No. 88, the playing of which was marked by a sureness of attack and a beauty of tone that was a constant delight. The delicious humor and poetry of this delightful score were vividly set forth. Under Dr. Koussevitsky's deft baton the Largo was charged with depth of feeling, the Minuet moved with rhythmic grace and liveliness and the Finale with breath-taking speed and brilliance.

Serge Prokofieff's suite, "Lieutenant Kije," closed the first half of the program. This suite is derived from the incidental music which the composer wrote for a satirical Soviet film of the same title. This cleverly contrived score is undoubtedly very effective when heard in connection with the film. For concert purposes it seems somewhat too episodic to be entirely satisfactory, although it is bright and witty music written with exceptional sureness. It has brittleness and a satirical flavor characteristic of Prokofieff. It offers exceptional opportunities for individual players to display their skill. Needless to say it was played brilliantly and the audience received it with favor.

We are indebted to Dr. Kousevitsky for the opportunity of hearing the second Symphony of Sibelius. To many concert goers Sibelius is known only by his tone poem, "Finlandia." It is only within the last 15 years, or so, that the world has really begun to realize that he is one of the great symphonic writers.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR
DEC 9 - 1937

Boston Symphony Friday Night at Music Hall

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town on Friday evening, December 10, to give a concert in Music Hall, there will be 110 musicians on the stage, facing their eminent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. This concert will be the fourth attraction in the current Artist Series and the first visit to this city in three years of this world-famous orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky will play a program of unusual proportions. He begins with the G major Symphony of Haydn, frequently known as the "Surprise" symphony. This will be followed by the first performance here of a new work by the Russian composer, Prokoffief. It is an orchestral suite called "Lieutenant Kije". This lieutenant is a fictitious character invented to save the Czar Paul I from embarrassment when he misinterprets one of his aide's reports. The music is humorous and sardonic. Originally written for a motion picture which was produced in Moscow, the orchestral suite had a great success in Paris last spring and was first played in America last October by the Boston orchestra.

The concluding number on the program is the stupendous tome poem, "Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life) by Richard Wagner. This work requires the largest of orchestras and is now regarded as the greatest work Richard Strauss has written for orchestra. Because of its great requirements it is seldom played. The Boston orchestra has made it one of its specialties and Dr. Koussevitzky was induced to place it on the Cincinnati program.

Because the Boston orchestra seldom visits this part of the country and its Cincinnati appearance is the only one in southern Ohio, many music lovers from all around will be on hand for this performance. The seat sale, which is in progress at the Baldwin store, 142 West Fourth street, indicates that the capacity of Music Hall will be tested.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TONIGHT

Performance of Orchestra Is for Museum Members.

Led by the noted Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in the Museum of Art peristyle this evening at 8:30. The Boston organization, one of the oldest and most famous in the country, has made several appearances here, always winning high acclaim from the city's music lovers.

Selections announced for tonight's program include the first Toledo performance of a Prokofieff suite, "Lieutenant Kije," said to be one of that composer's most interesting scores.

Two symphonies have been announced, Haydn's "G Major, No. 88" and Brahms' "No. 1, C Minor, Op. 68."

This is the annual concert complimentary to members of the museum and for that reason there has been no public sale of seats. Members, however, can purchase additional seats for their guests.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH
9 1937

Boston Symphony to Play Sibelius Composition Here

The famous second symphony of the brilliant Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, will be included on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it presents two concerts in Pittsburgh Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

Today marks the seventy-second anniversary of the birth of Sibelius.

A new score by Prokofieff will be presented for the first time here by the orchestra.

Yesterday marked the seventy-second anniversary of the birth of Sibelius.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST
1937

Fourth of Artist Series Friday

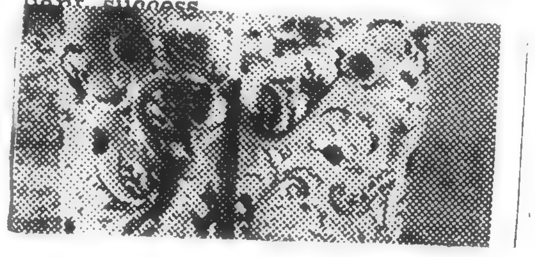
The Boston Symphony Orchestra, consisting of 110 musicians, comes to Music Hall Friday evening as the fourth attraction in the Artist Series. This will be the first visit of this notable orchestra to Cincinnati in three years.

It will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who has been leader of the orchestra for 15 years.

The program it offers includes the G Major Symphony of Haydn, the 88th symphony that prolific composer wrote.

Then will follow the first performance here of a new work by the Russian composer, Prokoffief, called "Sergeant Kije."

It is an orchestral suite arranged from the musical score which Prokoffief wrote for a motion picture. which was produced in Moscow in 1933. The music is in a sly, humorous vein as it has to do with a lieutenant who never existed except in the brain of the Czar Paul I. It was played for the first time in this country by the Boston orchestra in Boston Oct. 25 and scored a brilliant success.



ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 9 - 1937

Boston Symphony Thrills By Faultless Performance

By Kenneth N. Westerman

In its concert last night in Hill auditorium, the Boston Symphony orchestra brought again to an Ann Ann Arbor audience that faultless perfection in symphonic production which has grown to be an expected annual thrill. Orchestras may come and go, but when the Boston Symphony, under the masterly conducting of Serge Koussevitzky, literally throws itself into the interpretation of a great symphony, the memory of their past concerts becomes again a vivid pleasure, and one feels that thrill of super-excellence which causes him to enthusiastically proclaim that the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra transcends all others.

When some one replies "How about"—whatever favorite they think of first—one merely shakes his head and declares that it simply isn't possible to do more perfect work than that of Tuesday night in the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, when the gripping fragmentary beauties were built into rugged powerful themes and Sibelius takes his place as one of the greatest of symphonic composers because the interpretation of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony brings out all the intensity and vigor of his sturdy music.

The clean precision of melodic line in the Haydn Symphony in G major, the oddities of the Prokofieff Orchestral Suite, and the rugged beauties of the Sibelius Symphony made a program of unsurpassed excellence and variety.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with its background of 57 years of the finest traditions of leadership, organization and artistry, has an ideal in production that demands an excellence not to be surpassed, and Serge Koussevitzky's leadership, scholarly but not pedantic, emotional but not effusive, vital but not erratic, vigorous but not violent, brings that ideal to fruition.

LEWISTOWN, MONT.
DEMOCRAT-NEWS

DEC 9 - 1937

Rubinstein, Famous Pianist, Launches Another U. S. Tour

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor.

NEW YORK.—(AP)—One of those vital men of medium height strolled down the Queen Mary's hooded gang-plank the other day, bearing under his arm a sausage.

He was shortly installed in a Park Avenue hotel, and there on a table in his drawing room stood an elegant basket of fruit, in the exact middle of which lay a gayly colored can of spinach.

Yet the man was Arthur Rubinstein, no delicatessen expert but one of our great pianists, who has just reintroduced himself to the American public after a decade in other lands. He played the B flat Brahm's Concerto with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under John Barbirolli.

The sausage was imported thus unconventionally because Rubinstein likes that kind of sausage. But the spinach was a gift, and this is the why of that:

"I had a pupil, last summer," he explains, "from America. She played well, but she didn't dig down into the keys enough.

"I said to her, 'what you need is some of Pop-Eye's spinach.' And when I arrived she sent me some spinach. So."

Rubinstein has traveled more than a million miles giving concerts, although he is not yet 50 years old. This is a sample. Last season up to last spring, he was giving concerts in Europe. He had given almost without pause, 192 of them in every European country but Germany. Before April 17 he had made another brief tour of Italy, and had played the length of North Africa. After a Paris concert on April 17 he took ship with his wife and two children for South America.

There he played almost everywhere, flying the Andes four times. He returned to his Paris home (a former cobbler's shop atop Montmartre) for a day or so, and took a plane once more, this time for Australia.

He played in Australia until October; arrived early this month in Paris, and now is doing a transcontinental tour of the United States and Canada which will close late in February. He will go to the Orient—to play concerts of course—after that.

Rubinstein talks easily, well and fast. He likes good living, and says so. He has few illusions, and can even confess that what he plays recitals for, really, is the kick of it.

"That's why artists sometimes keep going too long, he says. "You see actresses marry money, for example, and see them steering back to the stage—not because they need money, but because they need applause. It's a drug."

Rubinstein likes other things, however. One is making records—although he owns neither phonograph nor radio. The latest record made is the Franck Sonata, with Jascha Heifetz. He thinks this one of the best he ever did.

"You see, Heifetz is a dignified, poised and reposeful player. And unkind people have said I am not respectful enough. He gave me something, and I gave him something."

At times disconcertedly frank, Rubinstein confesses, for example, that he is "99 per cent interested in women, and only 1 per cent in men."

One of the things out of his past which still makes him chuckle is his experience with Queen Victoria's piano. He played the piano for the present Duke of Windsor. Unfortunately he forgot the instrument was a museum piece; finally it literally came to pieces under his hands.

The Duke was affability itself. But each time he has seen Rubinstein since he has asked "when did you last break a piano?"

Rubinstein snared headline honors in New York concert halls this week with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, which began its 52nd consecutive series of concerts in New York.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

SOLD-OUT HOUSE FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays a concert at Music Hall on Friday evening, will be heard by a sold-out house. The orchestra carries 110 men, less to increase its numerical solidity than to cover every possible position in the band required by the music of the program.

Many who will listen to the music which Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged for the occasion will accept the glamour of the orchestral music as played, without analyzing reasons for its excellence. One reason, of course, is that this orchestra is subjected to comparatively few changes of personnel and practically no changes of policy.

One of the very evident policies is that of maintaining the concerts and their programs on the highest artistic line. The mere suggestion of considering what is so frequently and disastrously called "the public demand" receives but little, if any, consideration from an artistic ensemble. What the public demands is frequently not allied to the finest artistic ideals in music. Having maintained, since its formation, this high standard, defined and enforced by those informed on the subject, this particular orchestra has a unique reputation.

As to program-making, that is a matter of individual preference. However much one may regret the omission of a great symphony from the program formed for the Boston Orchestra concert, the Haydn symphony, which opens the concert, the new musical skit by the waggish Prokofieff and Strauss's "Heldenleben," will be superbly played and flawlessly. The three-number program also indicates adherence to the classic model, of overture, concerto and symphony, which is alas becoming obsolete. But not in Boston.

It would seem that in our eagerness to hear as much music at a concert as it is possible for an orchestra to play, during its allotted period of the program, we forget that with more than three numbers and these of different form, there are apt to be several inferior numbers, which efface the clear memory of their betters.

Through the kindness of a friend, one had the program of the newly-formed orchestra at Flint, Mich. Advanced amateurs, teachers and professional musicians, the program announces these 100 players to be. They are directed by Dr. William Wellington Norton. A by-line says that the public is invited to attend this series regularly, as all the programs are related to each other in presenting a definite idea for the year. Yet one discovers from the program at hand that, in order to include six numbers within a given time, the last movement of Tschaikowski's fifth symphony was omitted. A chorus of women's voices sang some Christmas music, there was the third movement of the "Grand Canon Suite," "On the Trail," by Ferde Grofe; "Wotan's Farewell," which had an ensemble of six harps for its explanation; introduction to the third act of an opera by Kistler—and a capacity house to hear the music. One is not certain that the enthusiasm with which this program was evidently compiled, nor the six harps for "Wotan's Farewell"—for orchestra without Wotan's voice—is sound program-making.

This orchestra has a Monday night rehearsal, which is free to the public. The idea is to cultivate a familiarity with orchestral music on the part of the audience. The popular concerts have no admission fee.

One bows to the orchestra of Flint, Mich., which collects one hundred players, including six harps, in a city not before celebrated for producing music. The residence therein of so many musicians competent and willing to play in an orchestra suggests that Flint had always the makings of an orchestra, and needs but to study program-making from a model in order to become another music center.

NINA PUGH SMITH.

Michigan News Dec. 8/37

MUSIC

By WILLIAM J. LICHTENWANGER

Seventy-Two

It is a happy coincidence that tonight's playing of the Sibelius Second Symphony by the Boston Orchestra should fall upon the 72nd anniversary of the birth of the great Finnish composer. The performance may be taken as the Boston's and Ann Arbor's joint contribution to the worldwide observances which will mark the birthdate of one who has come, through long years of insufficient but ever-growing recognition, to be hailed as the greatest of living composers.

When this Second Symphony was written, just after the turn of the century, Brahms was but a few years dead, Stravinksy was as yet unknown, Debussy was in his prime, and Richard Strauss, genius or charlatan, was dazzling the world with his orchestral thunderbolts. Now, 35 years later, Strauss is still the voice of the over-stuffed 'nineties,' and the younger Stravinsky, post-impressionist, is as definitely pre-war in his enduring works as Debussy himself. Only Jean Sibelius, he of the massive skull, is yet fresh and vigorous, and has yet finally to come into his own.

The Second Symphony, in the same key of D major which enthralled Haydn (as far as Breitkopf and Hartel are concerned), Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Brahms when these composers were embarking upon their second symphonic ventures, was composed during the years 1901-1902, while the composer was enjoying his first visit to Italy. This southern genesis has led some commentators to see the work as an "Italian Symphony," full of warm and sunny optimism in direct contrast to the austerity and melancholy of the composer's other symphonic sagas of the bleak and barren North. But while Italy may have had a heartening influence upon the composer which is indirectly reflected in the warm vigor of the Second Symphony, it is much easier to see in the work the patriotic passion and lofty ideals of an ardent young genius whose people were subejct to a Slavic master.

ORCHESTRAL SUITE, OP. 60
"LIEUTENANT KIJE"—Prokofieff.

Once upon a time, so a popular Russian story goes, the Czar, Nicholas I, misread the report of a military aide so that the last syllable of the name of a certain Russian officer which ended with "ki" and the Russian intensive expletive "je" (untranslatable by any English word but similar in meaning and position to the latin 'quidem") formed a nonexistent name 'Kije." The obsequious courtiers fearing to incurr the Czar's wrath by pointing out to him his mistake, decided to invent an officer by the name as misread by the Czar, and so "Lieutenant Kije" sprang, Minerva-like, full-grown from their nodding heads.

Having lived for quite a while in the rather shadowy sphere of anecdote, Lieutenant Kije was brought to the less-volatile world of the screen a few years back by the Belgoskino Film Co. of Leningrad. Serge Prokofieff furnishing music for the transmutation. From the screen the doughty Lieutenant, evidently a heroic Russian Eulenspiegel, comes to the concert stage in the guise of a suite in five parts, demoninated as: I. Birth of Kije; II. Kije's Lovemaking; III. Kije's Wedding; IV. Troika; V. Burial of Kije.

SYMPHONY IN G MAJOR,
B & H 13—Haydn.

I. Adagio: Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto; IV. Rondo Finale (Allegro con spiritoso).

This symphony is the seventh of the eleven which Haydn wrote during 1784-1789 for the famous Concerts Spirituel in Paris, among which were also the "Oxford," "Hen," "Bear," and "Queen of France." Taken as a whole, it might easily have been this symphony which Berlioz had in mind when he wrote of Haydn's music:

"It belongs to the kind of naively good and gay music that recalls the innocent joys of the fireside and the pot de feu. It comes and goes, never brusquely. At 9 o'clock it puts on a clean nightcap, says a prayer, and sleeps in the peace of the Lord."

The second movement, Largo, however, is of a little more serious mien which confounds those to whom "Papa Haydn" is never more than light and breezy, cheerful or frivolous. The simple nobility of its theme, subsequently elaborated upon in Beethovenish fashion, is almost Beethovenish in depth and is an unmistakable antecedent of those glorious Largos later to come.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 8 - 1937

MEMBER OF SYMPHONY DIES

Henry Stanislaus, Internationally-Known Oboist, Played at Festival

(Special to THE EAGLE)

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 8.—Henry Stanislaus, brilliant internationally known oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead.

Receiving news of his death while on their annual tour, the members of the orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, were like one family, all moved by the passing of a member who had been in its circle 25 years.

Unknown, however, was this sorrow to the overflow audience of 3500 that gave the orchestra an ovation at Elmwood Hall here last night.

Stanislaus died of pneumonia at a hospital in Boston.

At the Berkshire Festival last summer, Stanislaus was one of the musicians who pitched his tent on the shores of Lake Mahkeenac, at Tanglewood.

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DIRECTOR

Serge Koussevitsky

Serge Koussevitsky will bring his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Museum of Art peristyle tonight for a concert.

RUSSIAN SUITE CONCERT FEATURE

Prokofieff's orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije." will be included in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 p. m. today in the Museum of Art.

The score, to be played here for the first time, was written in 1933 for the satirical Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije." Other numbers on the program, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will be the Symphony of Haydn in G Major, No. 88, and the First Symphony of Brahms in C Minor.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

Many Visitors To Hear Concert

The fourth concert in the Artist Series Friday night in Music Hall, presenting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring a great number of out-of-town music lovers to Cincinnati to hear this celebrated orchestra. J. H. Thuman, impressario of the series, has received requests for reservation from dozens of persons not only in nearby cities but in surrounding states.

The orchestra's one-week tour is a heavy one for the musicians played Monday night in Rochester, N. Y., Tuesday night in Buffalo and Wednesday night in Ann Arbor. They will give a concert Thursday night in Toledo and then will come to Cincinnati for the Friday program. On Saturday night they are scheduled to play in Pittsburgh, whence they will return to Boston.

noted con- this section.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 1 . . 937

(72)

Symphony To Give Concerts At Syria Mosque

Koussevitzky to Conduct Group Tomorrow And Sunday Afternoon

A new score of Prokofieff, the orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kije," will be presented for the first time here by Serge Koussevitzky when the famous [redacted] conductor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first of two concerts in the Syria Mosque tomorrow evening and Sunday afternoon, at 3 o'clock.

Prokofieff wrote the music for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije," in 1933. The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character—the movements describing "The Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika," and "Burial of Kije."

The opening number for tomorrow's evening concert will be a Concerto for Strings, by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been arranged for larger orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

The Sunday afternoon program will open with Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 201. The second number will be the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina," a tone poem in miniature, which sets the mood for the opening scene, a public square in Moscow at dawn. Richard Strauss' "Till Fulenspeigel's Merry Pranks" will complete the first part of the program. The closing number will be the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major.

MONDAY, DEC. 13, 1937

THE PITTSBURGH PRESS

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

Announce the Incorporation of the American Sibelius Society.

Coincident with the 72nd birthday of the great Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius on Dec. 8, comes the announcement from Boston of the incorporation of the American Sibelius society, a new non-profit organization which has for its expressed purposes: To foster appreciation and study of Sibelius and his works, to provide for stimulation of interest in the composer, the composers and their works who have been influenced by him, and other composers whose works may be deemed worthy of intensive study.

It is particularly fitting that a movement for the appreciation of the composer should have its inception in Massachusetts, where the Boston Symphony orchestra has long been outstanding in its interpretation and performance of the composer's works under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, and in Boston, where the composer was honored by officials of the New England Conservatory when he visited America for the Norfolk Festival in 1914. The society has been formed by a representative group of music lovers of varied professions who wish to set in motion a movement, especially identified with Massachusetts, which will give tangible evidence of the artistic debt we owe to Finland for the sponsorship of a musician whose music is unique in our time.

By special arrangement with the society, the American soprano, Theodate Johnson, who has received her entire vocal training with Ruth Thayer Burnham of Boston, went this fall to Finland, where she made an intensive research for material about the composer, with special emphasis on the unfamiliar song repertoire which she coached with Mme. Hagelstam. While in Helsingfors she conveyed the good wishes of the society to the Helsingfors university chorus, which will make its first appearance this season in America, and also conferred with the composer at Jarvenpaa, in order to bring back to the society new and first hand details of the composer's works.

Prospective members of the society should bear in mind that it is not necessary to be a musician, but simply to enjoy music, and that the purposes of the society allow the widest possible scope of subjects to be discussed. Inquiries should be addressed to Miss Mildred E. Bixby at 26 Central street, Boston, Mass.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

DEC 10 1937

'Canned' Music Business Faces Rapid Change

Record Making Methods May Be Up Today, Down Tomorrow

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

NEW YORK. (AP)—The phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious. Much music has been done four times already: once in the old mechanical method; once when this method had been improved; once when electrical recording came in; again recently, because electrical recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there is no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

Television may likewise do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long playing record may be produced. And so on.

Recording is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording studio was as fixed as a mountain—artists were brought to it from all corners of the world.

Studios still are maintained in strategic locations, of course—New York, Chicago and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But it can be taken places, and it is generally cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

It weighs several tons — nobody seems to have thought to weigh it exactly. Mostly it can go by express, the more delicate parts are carried by the recording crew as personal baggage.

As a matter of fact, each man has his favorite recorder, which he values much as Heifetz values his two best violins. These recorders are adjusted to infinitisimal precision; some recording experts prefer one adjustment, some another.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being 13 inches in diameter and 1½ inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" to do, the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for the Victor company, and Charles O'Connell, who does everything from conducting symphony orchestras to figuring record lengths on important jobs.

The performance was being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with a Boston chorus and of course the Boston Symphony. But there was only one performance, since it was all a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund, and it was necessary to record with the audience in the hall.

Four recorders were set up, working in pairs. Mr. O'Connell did the delicate job of dividing the work into record-length sections, and found there would be 54 of these. He arranged for the records to end, as often as possible, on a tonic chord—or at least a chord not too tantalizing to the ear. It looked like a snap on paper, once the job was done. The trouble was that of the 54 "sides," only two worked out exactly. Slight delays, changes of tempo, soloists a little slow in getting under way threw the whole thing out of gear.

The job was done in one sitting, however, and if it had been made the usual way, five recording sessions would have been needed. When the work is released around the end of the year, the most experienced listeners will not know that on one record the factory found exactly one half of one eighth note. This bit of sound was not only transferred to the next record, but in exact time.

The recorders do not use electric motors, these being subject to slight speed fluctuations. Gravity motors are used, and lugging the huge weights for these about the land is one reason why equipment is so heavy.

Recording men insist there is nothing in the musical world surer than the pitch of a given tone on a record; always it will reproduce truly if the machine is turning at the correct speed.

This matter of pitch also does its tricks. One day the Beethoven Eighth Symphony was being done at Boston. The first two movements were completed one day; next morning the third, or scherzo, was recorded.

Koussevitzky listened to the playback on the scherzo and exclaimed: "It's a half tone sharp." It was, too.

This was corrected immediately, and the result played once more for Koussevitzky. "Yes," said he, "the pitch is right, but that's not my tempo. It's a shade slow."

He was correct again, although probably not one musician in a thousand could have told it.

Much recording is done in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where the orchestra plays in the empty hall, using the regular stage set designed for it by Leopold Stokowski. No acoustical doctoring is necessary, though in Symphony Hall, Boston, and Carnegie Hall, New York, curtains and such like are sometimes hung.

Carnegie Hall sees little recording, although Messrs. Wallerstein and O'Connell recall ruefully one experience there with Toscanini. A lot of money had been spent to record some things with the spike-mustached little Italian. When he heard the playback he refused to approve a single thing.

Microphone placement is often as tricky as anything else. There are two kinds of mikes—unidirectional, which means the mike absorbs the sound as it sweeps in a straight line from the performer; velocity, which focuses on particular sections of the whole.

Probably the trickiest problem with mikes was recording the enormous Wanamaker organ in Philadelphia. This is so large that 20 symphony orchestras could be seated in the space it requires. It is built into a store, on several floors, with a rotunda to complicate the course of the sound waves.

At first the records were filled with mysterious sounds like doors opening and shutting, squeaks, and so on. These were only the usual small noises around a big organ, but they insisted on recording themselves. Finally, by a long course of experiments, the microphones were placed so as to pick up tone and not noise—fortunately, the result was like an organ playing in a great cathedral, instead of a retail store.

The technical principles of manufacturing records have been improved, yet remain basically the same as of old. What most people do not realize is, however, that their records are never stamped from the master matrix once this is completed.

13

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 10 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Well Received Here

Museum of Art Members Enjoyably Entertained During Three-Number Program, Directed By Serge Koussevitzky.

BY RUTH ELGUTTER

There are orchestras in the country—in the world, in fact—whose conductors and men have such high standards of musicianship that their number may be counted on the fingers of one hand, with perhaps a thumb to spare. Of this distinguished company is the Boston Symphony orchestra as directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

If Toledoans needed more evidence of that fact than they have had heretofore, it was presented last night when the Boston virtuosi played their fourth annual concert for members of the Museum of Art in the peristyle before the most smartly dressed audience of the season.

In listening to the noted aggregation, it is difficult to say just where the musicianship of Mr. Koussevitzky leaves off and that of the men begins, so perfect is the coordination between them. It is a delight to watch the distinguished conductor—there is such ease in his direction. His expressive hands carry most of the melodies with occasionally a shake of the head at an exceptionally powerful passage or a lift of the eyebrow at a tender note.

Haydn Symphony First

That he is a master at program building also was apparent in last night's concert. Only three works were played, but all are of major significance and together they presented a rare balance of tonal delight.

First was the Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 88" (distinguished by publishers from the numerous other works in the same group by the descriptive phrase, B. and H. No. 13) from which was extracted its just share of exacting and classical beauty.

From the formality of the old master's work, Mr. Koussevitzky covered musical centuries by going to the work of Prokofief of Soviet Russia, a composer whom Mr. Koussevitzky considers the greatest modern writer of music and whose works he introduced in this country. The composition played was "Lieutenant Kije, Orchestral Suite, Opus 60," a novelty, to be sure, but a delightful work.

As played by the Boston group it was something to be remembered no matter how one may regard it. This reviewer liked it from the first muted cornet tone announcing the birth of Lieutenant Kije, accompanied with some fanfare of drums. to the lyrical tones of his burial music.

The work originally was written as the score for a Soviet film, telling a satirical tale of one Lieutenant Kije, character of the imagination, who came into being because a czar of Russia once misread his aide's handwriting and what was intended as a closing phrase he took as a name and O. K.'d the payroll. Then and there the fiction was fantastically created, a legend crediting Kije with birth, romance, wedding, holiday and death, as related in the musical work. The composer later transcribed the music for symphony orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky has done the rest magnificently.

Brahms Work Pleasing

As might be imagined from the story, the music is fantastic, satirical and, at times, if less expertly played, might even be discordant, but it also has within it an undercurrent of emotion, a simplicity and a tenderness which make it of musical importance.

Listeners might have differed in opinion about the Haydn work and certainly about the Prokofieff composition, but there could have been little difference in reaction to the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68," which closed the program. Musician and layman alike could enjoy the warmth of its melody as the Boston Symphony orchestra flooded the hall with its rich tones. Here was music which could be enjoyed by the mind and the heart alike.

Great as would have been the pleasure at hearing more music by the Massachusetts aggregation, had they played an encore, anything presented after the Brahms work would have been anti-climax by comparison.

So it was appropriate, with the thrillingly harmonious tones fresh in the memory to have a smiling Koussevitzky return to the stage again and again to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause with a pleased bow and each time include in his response the entire orchestra, which is as one with him.

Toledo looks forward to Mr. Koussevitzky's visit next season.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

DEC 10 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TOMORROW

Concert, Including Sibelius Work, Also Listed for Sunday.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Pittsburgh this week for a pair of concerts on tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon, December 11 and 12, a new score of Prokofieff will be presented for the first time here by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky. The work is entitled "Lieutenant Kije," which Prokofieff wrote for the Soviet film of the same name in 1933. In addition to the Prokofieff composition, Bach's Concerto in D major for stringed instrumetns and Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

The Sunday afternoon concert will open with the Mozart Symphony in A major, which was written when Mozart was 18. The second number is the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina," with Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major following.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 10 1937

Mrs. Hollister Hostess at Supper Party

THE CONCERT by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky last evening was attended by one of the most enthusiastic and brilliantly gowned audiences of the season.

Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister was hostess at a supper party following the concert given in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky in her home at the Park Lane.

Among her out-of-town guests were George E. Judd of Boston, the manager of the orchestra; Miss Dorothy Sedgewick, a houseguest of Mrs. Hollister's who came from her home in Martins Ferry, O., for the concert, and George Erdman, editor of the Berkshire Evening Eagle, Lenox, Mass.

Mrs. Hollister is a patron of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival association and is a member of the advisory board of that organization.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gives several concerts during the summer on the estate in Lenox, Mass., where Mrs. Hollister and her sister, Miss Olive Colton, spend their summers. Miss Colton is at present in Washington, D. C., as the guest of Miss Amy Maher.

Mrs. Hollister was gowned in an ocean green satin model embroidered with tiny lilacs, over which she wore a royal evening coat of brocaded tapestry in pastel shades, trimmed with a Russian sable collar and having a wide belt of black obi cloth embroidered in gold.

Miss Sedgewick wore a striking gown of American Beauty taffeta moire, made on princess lines, with a black velvet evening coat with kolinsky collar.

Pink roses centered the supper table at the Park Lane, where places were marked for Dr. Koussevitzky, Miss Sedgewick, Mr. Judd, Mr. Erdman, Mrs. Harold Reynolds, Mrs. Zorah Bowman, Miss Katherine Geddes and Miss Ruth Elgutter.

Miss Sedgewick will leave today for Cleveland before returning to her home. Mr. Erdman and Mr. Judd will go to Cincinnati to attend the concert which Dr. Koussevitzky will direct this evening.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony

Last week, at Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky presented the Haydn Symphony No. 99; the first performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's new Symphony No. 3 in G major; the Mozart Piano Concerto in C major, Emma Boynet, soloist; and Respighis orchestral transcription of the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor for Organ by Bach.

Mr. Hill's latest opus is a pleasant and pleasing addition to American music. In it one can discern the composer's evident mastery of technique and his decided knowledge of the modern orchestra. If Mr. Hill prefers to look back to the past instead of facing the present, not to mention the future, it is only what we expect from the genial Harvard professor whose roots and traditions naturally predispose him to a certain gentlemanly conservatism. The audience thoroughly approved the work, recalling the composer time and time again to the platform.

The great virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed to great advantage in the Haydn—perhaps to too great advantage to do musical justice to the last movement. Bach's transcribed organ piece was given a breath-taking performance by the conductor although Respighi's treatment is open to question: the substance there was but the soul was lacking. Bach's majestic dignity is not aided by too lavish orchestral decoration.

The soloist, Emma Boynet, scarcely did justice to Mozart. This C major concerto demands something more than a facile technique and a pleasant disposition. Underneath the delicate tracery, Mozart forged a foundation of iron and it is only in the spirit of understanding Mozart's basic steadfasness that we can approach this little-understood genius.

The orchestra and conductor were, as usual, in fine form.

State Symphony

The State Symphony paid its homage to German music at Sanders Theater last Sunday evening in the third of its series of national concerts. Alexander Thiede presented three great representatives of the German school: Bach, in a transcribed Choral Prelude; Wagner in the Magic Fire Music from Die Walkure; Beethoven in the Eroica Symphony.

The conductor approached the music in a reverent spirit giving it the most careful treatment possible. As a whole, the orchestra responded nobly although there were, it must be admitted, a few deficiencies here and there. But the sincerity of purpose, to be noticed in all Federal Music presentations of late, was, in a sense inspiring both to orchestra and audience.

We were glad to see Mr. Thiede admonish noisy late comers by halting the music. He has been long-suffering and patient long enough and the rebuke was certainly forthcoming. Evidently some people are under the impression that bad manners are excusable at popular-price presentations.

Milo-Moise Goldstein

That talented and sensitive musician, Milo-Moise Goldstein, was responsible for some fine 'cello playing last Tuesday evening, at the studios of the Professional Musicians Society, 274 Boylston street.

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 10 1937

Furs, Jewels Much in Evidence At Boston Symphony Concert

Ermine, Mink and Sable, Lovely Gowns Seen at Season's Big Musical Event

AS MEMBERS of one of the most resplendent audiences ever to assemble in the Peristyle of the Museum of Art hurried from their cars Thursday night to escape the cold blasts of winter, an air of excitement and expectation prevailed . . . they were about to hear another concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Annually in the museum series there is a concert for members and this was the first that Mrs. Edward Drummond Libbey, widow of the museum's benefactor, has missed. She is in California.

Glimpses of ermine, mink and sable were not uncommon as the music lovers hurried to their seats, and jewels flashed brilliantly under the soft lights in the Peristyle.

Mrs. Webb C. Hayes' mink jacket and tiny round muff gave an added richness to her black velvet gown as she chatted for a few minutes with her brother, Gerald V. C. Baker, and her sister-in-law, Mrs. A. L. Baker, in the Pronaos. Also lavishly furred in mink were Mrs. H. Godfrey Phillipps and Mrs. J. C. Blair.

Just as stunning in their simplicity were the furless evening wraps worn by Dorothy Rowland and Marjorie Retherford. Miss Rowland's cloth coat of dull black was fashioned on strictly tailored lines and Miss Retherford's, of black velvet, was softly draped.

Mrs. James Bentley's ermine cape lent a smart contrast to her sapphire blue gown of slipper satin, and the ermine ascot on Mrs. Joseph W. Robinson's velvet evening wrap was most striking.

NOT UNTIL the intermission was it possible to view fully the many lovely gowns worn by feminine listeners. Mrs. James West's black gown was most unusual, designed with a panel of black and gold striped lame which swept into a graceful train in back. The fitted bodice was of the same striped material.

Mrs. Frank Suydam wore a gown of wine colored crepe trimmed with bands of velvet in the same shade on the skirt, matching velvet hip-length jacket and sable scarf.

Mr. and Mrs. Reeve Kelsey Biggers (Suzanne White), who have just returned from their honeymoon in Honolulu, were there. Mrs. Biggers was attired in a black crepe dress fashioned with a straight floor-length skirt. The bodice and short sleeves were trimmed with clusters of gay-colored sequins.

A cluster of aqua marine and orchid velvet flowers trimmed the front of the square neckline of Doris Harther's black velvet gown.

AMONG OTHERS in the audience were Mrs. Leonard Phillipps (Ruth Cartwright), Mrs. Charles B. Belknap, Mr. and Mrs. William Booker, James Hodge, Romaine Bidwell, Miss Leslie Leland, Dr. and Mrs. R. Lincoln Long, Mrs. Robert West, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph K. Close, Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Broer, Mrs. E. H. Close, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hayes, Mr. and Mrs. Karl Hoke, Mrs. E. H. France and her daughters, Mrs. Oscar Foster, Juliet and Eliabeth France; Mrs. C. S. Bigelow and her daughter, Mrs. Isaac Kinsey Jr.; Mrs. H. L. Thompson and her son, Lawrence; Mr. and Mrs. William A. Gosline and their daughter, Mrs. C. Lockhart McKelvy; Mr. and Mrs. Dan Summers, Josephine and William Blair, Mr. and Mrs. Henry R. Bloch, Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Hanson, Dr. J. Lester Kobacker, Dr. and Mrs. A. L. Steinfeld.

Mr. and Mrs. Clark Husted, Mrs. Julius Lamson, Mrs. Harrie Chamberlin, Mrs. John D. Biggers, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Mauk, Mrs. Carlton K. Matson, Mr. and Mrs. Meredith Ashley, Mrs. Thomas P. Goodbody, Mrs. Lyman Goodbody, Carl Goodbody, Williamene Nelles, Jack Marshall, Mrs. Karl Hardee, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Bentley, Mr. and Mrs. Durban Longenecker, Mr. and Mrs. David Goodwillie, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Logan, Mrs. Mary Willing Megley, Maxine Barnes, William Mauk, Barnes Mauk, Mrs. Oliver N. Hiett, Judge and Mrs. Silas E. Hurin, Judge and Mrs. Julian P. Tyler, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Nash, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Bissell, Kate Harsch, Mrs. Spencer Vanderbilt, Mrs. Jessie Dowd Stafford and her daughter, Isabel.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 10 1937

Brilliant Audience Attends the Boston Symphony Concert

By IDA TAYLOR

THE most brilliant audience of the winter filled the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art last evening for the concert presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

This annual concert complimentary to the members of the museum always is the outstanding musical event of the season.

Several supper parties were given following the concert, among the most important of which was the one for which Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister was hostess, honoring Dr. Koussevitsky, in her home at the Park Lane.

Out-of-town guests at the supper included Mr. George E. Judd of Boston, the manager of the orchestra; Miss Dorothy Sedgewick of Martins Ferry, O., and Mr. George Edman, editor of the Berkshire Evening Eagle, Lennox, Mass.

Mrs. Hollister is a patron of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival association and is on the advisory board of that organization.

Each mid-summer season the Boston Symphony orchestra gives several concerts on its estate in Lenox, Mass., where Hawthorn's "Tanglewood Tales" were written. Mrs. Hollister and her sister, Miss Olive Colton, who is in Washington, D. C., spend every summer at Lenox.

Many Stunning Gowns Were Worn

IT WAS an evening of superlatives in dress as well as music with lavish fabrics, rich furs and rare jewels.

"Acres of ermine and mountains of mink" as one spectator phrased it, were much in evidence.

Mrs. Hollister was stunning in a beautiful gown of ocean green brocaded satin embroidered with tiny lilacs and having a corsage of dark autumn leaves.

A large pearl comb, with three pearl pendants, adorned her hair.

Combs and ornaments of gold and silver seem to be replacing flowers and feathers.

A royal evening coat of obei cloth, strictly tailored, with a Russian sable collar, completed Mrs. Hollister's luxurious ensemble.

Miss Sedgewick's striking gown was of American Beauty tafetta moire, made on princess lines, over which she wore a black velvet coat trimmed with kolinsky.

Mrs. William A. Gosline's black and white brocaded gown had the small pattern outlined with brilliants, and the bodice had bands of the diamonte trimming. A long white lace scarf added an artistic touch.

A bronze embroidered tafetta, fashioned with a square neckline and small puff sleeves, formed the smart model worn by Mrs. Charles T. Harther.

Mrs. C. Lockhart McKelvy was stunning in a frock of American Beauty uncut velvet, with a short jacket of matching sequins. She wore a short cape of baum martin.

A short jacket of Yale blue sequins was worn by Mrs. Earl Newcomer over her smart black velvet gown.

Miss Sally Libbey looked very handsome in a white brocaded satin frock, having a basque jacket with kolinsky collar and cuffs. Mrs. James Bentley wore a long white ermine wrap over her sapphire blue net gown. Miss Frances Barney's watermellon velvet wrap was a luscious color.

OTHERS in the fashionably dressed audience were Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Spitzer, Judge and Mrs. Julian Tyler, Mr. and Mrs. Richard D. Logan, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph W. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ward Canaday, Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Phillipps, Miss Wilhelmina Nelles, Jack Marshall, Mrs. Thomas P. Goodbody, Carl Goodbody, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Suydam, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Bentley, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. Whiting Shepard, Mrs. Lamson Rheinfrank, Mrs. Sidney Spitzer, Mrs. Herbert Baker, Mrs. George Close, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Albert Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Mauk, Mr. and Mrs. William Booker, Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair Walbridge, Mr. and Mrs. George Pope MacNichol, Miss Peggy Mennel and Redfield Beckwith.

The Ann Arbor News
Michigan
Dec 9/37

(24)

MONDAY, DEC. 13, 1937

Boston Symphony Thrills By Faultless Performance

By Kenneth N. Westerman

In its concert last night in Hill auditorium, the Boston Symphony orchestra brought again to an Ann Ann Arbor audience that faultless perfection in symphonic production which has grown to be an expected annual thrill. Orchestras may come and go, but when the Boston Symphony, under the masterly conducting of Serge Koussevitzky, literally throws itself into the interpretation of a great symphony, the memory of their past concerts becomes again a vivid pleasure, and one feels that thrill of super-excellence which causes him to enthusiastically proclaim that the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra transcends all others.

When some one replies "How about"—whatever favorite they think of first—one merely shakes his head and declares that it simply isn't possible to do more perfect work than that of Tuesday night in the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, when the gripping fragmentary beauties were built into rugged powerful themes and Sibelius takes his place as one of the greatest of symphonic composers because the interpretation of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony brings out all the intensity and vigor of his sturdy music.

The clean precision of melodic line in the Haydn Symphony in G major, the oddities of the Prokofieff Orchestral Suite, and the rugged beauties of the Sibelius Symphony made a program of unsurpassed excellence and variety.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with its background of 57 years of the finest traditions of leadership, organization and artistry, has an ideal in production that demands an excellence not to be surpassed, and Serge Koussevitzky's leadership, scholarly but not pedantic, emotional but not effusive, vital but not erratic, vigorous but not violent, brings that ideal to fruition.

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

[illegible] 37

Boston Symphony

Capacity Audience Hears Concert in Museum Peristyle

Serge Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to Toledo last night to fill the Museum of Art's peristyle with his own interpretation of the great first symphony of Johannes Brahms.

He delighted a capacity audience with his famous strings both in the warm Brahms first movement and in Josef Haydn's Symphony in G Major.

Following a pattern, familiar to Toledo audiences, the gray-haired maestro opened the program with the Haydn symphony, moved to a modern Russian orchestral suite antl closed with the stirring Brahms.

Between two opposite forms of the symphony, Mr. Koussevitzy gave the first Toledo performance of Serge Prokofieff's orchestral suite, Lieutenant Kije. The suite is derived from music he wrote in 1933 for a Soviet film.

With a military fanfare the Russian hero is brought to life, though the second movement, Romance, seemed something less than romantic. The Troika, fourth movement, is suggestive of an earlier Russia.

Perhaps Koussevitzky is the greatest master of Brahms. Certainly his interpretation last night left nothing desired by the listener, at least to judge by the applause.

Undoubtedly Mr. Koussevitzky's arrangement of the orchestra, splitting his strings, first violins on the left, second on the right, tends to emphasize the section. For the Brahms, the result is to bring out the recurrent themes which make the final movement so enjoyable.—C. M. R.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

DEC 11 1937

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE FORM

The Boston Orchestra, 110 men, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, played at Music Hall on Friday evening to an almost capacity house. The music, superbly played, was a program disappointment. But, as this was known in advance, it was possible to concentrate on the orchestra itself, on the manner of its director, and on the interpretation of the program he had chosen.

With an orchestra of festival proportions, a symphony of ampler proportions would have been delightedly received. Not every member of the band came on to play the Haydn Symphony in G major, nor is this pleasant composition designed for Music Hall and its vastness. Notwithstanding the artlessness of the music, it was possible to admire the manner of its production. Always the balance of the orchestra permitted one of the director's specialties to be heard. This is the adept turn of the phrase, causing it to reach a bowed apex, arched into a line of beauty, large or small, as the occasion demands. With Haydn the demand is of lesser degree, but the art is no less perfect instrumentally.

The Boston Orchestra, is admired for certain traits, certain manners, and styles. It is an orchestra so well proportioned that seemingly not one member of it is superfluous. It includes not one man too many, nor one for its complete quota of sonority. And yet, there are but ten cellos, and violas, twelve firsts, it was not possible to count the rest of the orchestra. One things which leads to instrumental excellence, is the instruments used by the ensemble. They are of first quality. Another detail which may add to a unity of accord, is that the first violins, while bowing in unison, although with slightly different method, holds their instruments in exactly the same position. The band has a superb concertmaster, and a first bass player to whom Dr. Kousssevitsky accorded special honors.

It is recalled that the original essays of the celebrated director of the Boston Orchestra were upon the bass fiddle.

The Prokofieff suite is designed for a scenario. Devoid of scene and pictorial representation, in concert form the music is overlong and despite its evident cleverness, a trifle boring. Dr. Koussevitsky played both the Prokofieff music and Strauss's "Heldenleben," in episodic style, detaching each incident for its fellows. In the suite there is declaration from a hushed woodwind of the hero's personality, so one assumes, preceding all but one section. In that, the announcement is given to a deeper voice. The music tells the underlying tragedy of a former Russian officer, born in full uniform in the brain of his czar, a sort of gentlemanly Russian Minerva.

It was a question in the minds of musicians how Dr. Koussevitsky would play Strauss's own musical picture of himself, in his "Life of a Hero." For "Heldenleben" is a musical biography of Richard Strauss, written by himself, and he ought to know about himself. In "Heldenleben" there are presented, as in the Domestic Symphony and elsewhere in the Strauss compositions, those impedimenta which prevent genius from full and early flight to the empyrean of musical art. The inconsequent chatter of a too-devoted wife, the dour opposition of certain recalcitrant critics, who fail immediately to acclaim genius under whatever form it may present itself.

It is said that Dr. Koussevitsky has his own ideas about Strauss music. Also it was thought that he might play "Heldenleben" as pure music and not as a biography. On the contrary, except for the fifth section, the interpretation was as vivid, as personal as if Koussevitsky, too, suffered from the same afflictions as Strauss. There was even a too great intensity in the direction, which was fairly dragged from the superb orchestra, to indicate the sufferings of the artist from a plethora of instrusive and unimportant details, chattering consorts and malign critics. It was so personal as to arouse unprecedented interest in a composition not considered the most sympathetic of Strauss's many. These details curtail the grandeur of the Strauss orchestral phrase, but they were incomparably expressed by an unrivaled orchestra and a director convinced of the righteousness of his cause.

NINA PUGH SMITH.

75

Exhibitions of the Week in the Boston Art Galleries

B. Trans — Dec. 11/37

Winslow Homer at Symphony Hall, Group Shows and Varied Talents Fill the Schedule

A notable achievement is being consummated at Symphony Hall. The trustees, with the assistance of, and through affiliations with museums, and friends of the Symphony, are showing exhibitions of the Fine Arts in the previously barren lobby behind the first balcony. Such a feature is truly appreciated in broadening the scope and increasing the range of values given by the organization. The present show consists of about thirty Winslow Homer water colors, some of which, coming from the estate of Mrs. Charles Savage Homer have never before been exhibited.

There is a fine selection, picked from all phases of Homer's work, including his early lithographs, an early oil, "Nooning," and his water colors from Devonshire, the West Indies trip, and New England. One of the best water colors which has not been shown before is "Palm Trees—Bahamas." At first glance, the ·e is taken up wholly by a massive waving palm, but slow· a fine depth of contrasting background offsets this, and shows a grand sense of painting.

CONTEMPORARY GROUP AT GRACE HORNE'S

The group showing at Grace Horne's, which takes up two galleries, is a good representation of what is being done around Boston at the present time. About twenty artists are shown, and the general impression is one of a more facile and understanding approach to the field of modern painting, and, withal, a more definite and studied desire for drawing.

In addition to these, Allan Rohan Crite has added a refreshing and new approach to the understanding of Negro spirituals. In a series of pen and ink sketches he recreates a similar atmosphere of peace, sacredness and reflection, tracing the course of three of these well-known hymns. Pervaded by a fine sense of rhythm, interesting design and power, these interpretations are boldly drawn and with, perhaps, more attention to detail would stand out highly in this individual field.

Susan Moore Sisson has a room full of decorative flower studies in water color. Though tightly drawn and executed, they have a very decorative pattern and design. Careful study of the anatomy of her plants make these drawings unusual, though one feels that stronger values throughout might give them more power.

DIVERSIFIED SHOW AT VOSE GALLERIES

The Vose Galleries are showing a diversified group of still-life paintings, water colors of Spain, pastel portraits and statuary.

Elizabeth Piutti-Barth, giving up, for the time, portrait work, presents some colorful and carefully handled Chinese statuary in which its translucency and textures stand out in simple compositions against rich backgrounds.

The group of Patricia Tate's pastel portraits show improvement in drawing and application of tonal values over her past work, and are an interesting report of progress. The subjects include all ages, and are all pastels, save a charcoal portrait of Dodge MacKnight.

The water colors of Spain by Edith Hoyt give a rather subdued impression of what always used to be a sunny, warm country. This feeling may be brought about by the lack of definiteness in her edges and an occasional muddiness of wash.

Some scenes from the West are more colorful, more crisply drawn and show more water color technique, with their larger, more powerful washes, and more facile modelling.

NORMAN ROCKWELL IN THREE MEDIA

Last Monday, Bell and Fletcher, Ltd., opened a showing of Norman Rockwell's illustrations, a diversified group, depicting his technique in three media.

His is the interesting and rare case of an illustrator who, with a love of personalities, interest in true historical representation, combined with an artistic sensitiveness and technique, raises the standards of that much maligned class.

The series of eight illustrations for "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer" show from the preliminary sketches, through charcoal studies, to the final oil the careful delineation that goes into these canvases.

A series of five drawings depicting the life of Louisa May Alcott, with fine crisp draughtsmanship were done in Concord, where Rockwell studied original sources and atmosphere for his sketches.

The show is interesting because of the opportunity to study the approach and outlook a well-known illustrator must take in his field, which, while transitory, is important in depicting the trend of the time.

ROBERT GORDON FISHER

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 11 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Lauded For Prokofieff And Strauss Renditions

BY JOHN P. RHODES.

The Program

Symphony in G-major, No. 88 (B. & H. No. 13) .... Haydn
I. Adagio; Allegro
II. Largo.
III. Menuetta: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito
"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60 .... Prokofieff
I. Birth of Kije
II. Romance
III. Kije's Wedding
III. Troika
V. Burial of Kije
"Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life), Op. 40 .... Straus
I The Hero; II The Hero's Adversaries; III The Hero's Consort; IV The Hero's Conflicts; V The Hero's Mission of Peace; VI The Hero's Withdrawal and End.

Occasionally one has the rare and yet incisive experience of having a preconceived attitude changed against his will. Last night this reviewer had that experience, listening to the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The program which at first only partly seemed designed to exhibit the talents of the 110 players in the orchestra, principally because of the inclusion of a Haydn symphony, proved to be quite the contrary. An additional presupposition that a composition by Prokofieff could be nothing if not more or less dissonant, and consequently inconsistent, side by side with another by Richard Strauss, also proved to be incorrect.

The Austrian composer's symphony, played with what the Teutons might call "schmalz," amplified in tone volume far beyond the orchestral limitations of Haydn's day, carried all the force of latter-day spmphonies. The second largo movement had a breadth of feeling that was almost Beethovenesque, and yet moved with the simple dignity and restraint characteristic of Haydn himself. Other parts of the work seemed almost new in their brilliance.

As far as the Prokofieff work was concerned, the Soviet composer seems to have changed tactics somewhere along the line between his Opus 41 and Opus 60. Whereas "The Age of Steel" ballet, coming out of the U. S. S. R. several years ago, was harsh and at times cacophonous, even in its more witty moods, the "Lieutenant Kije" suite played last night seemed surprisingly dulcet and rhythmic.

As a French reviewer, Robert Bernard said, on hearing some of Prokofieff's more recent works in Paris this summer, "one could hardly get from these pieces a true impression of what is done and what is supposed to be done in the U. S. S. R." The country which fosters the art of men like Shostakovitch and Miaskovsky, seems suddenly, in this Prokofieff number, to have turned its back on all that communistic law represents—revolutionary mass activity and violence.

The sententiousness of the lieutenant in full regimentals, his melancholic wooing of an unnamed Dulcinea, and his subsequent jingling troika-ride and final requiem demand as much if not more discretion on the part of individual players in an orchestra as any of Prokofieff's other works. The demands were met by the Boston orchestra with unerring precision and subtle tone shading.

In its proper place as a grand finale, the Strauss "Heldenleben" demonstrated the Koussevitzky organization at its best, or rather at that acme of perfect associated with its performances in the public mind. Those who attempt the performance of works of the German musician find him a severe taskmaster. When his commands are obeyed as they were last night, the result is immensely gratifying.

"Ein Heldenleben" is perhaps the most grandiose of Strauss compositions. It contains an astonishing amount of sheer music, considering that it may have been an attempt on the composer's part toward self-glorification. A provoking amount of quarreling among the woodwind instruments, a deal of growling in the bases, the recurrent crash of percussion, combined with the grandeur of the main "hero" theme make the work a sublime achievement.

The understanding cooperation of the Boston musicians, individually and en masse, impelled by the driving urge of their conductor, worked toward and achieved the end which Strauss strove to reach in writing the work. Whether the success of the orchestra results from the dynamic power of Koussevitz or from the splendid cooperation of the players is begging the issue. Dependent one upon the other, and being fortunate in having both, the Boston orchestra is rightly ranked with one, or at most two, rivals in the United States.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR
Dec. 11/37

LOST RHAPSODY—

Whiteman Discovers Gershwin Masterpiece

Chicago—(U.P.)—Years ago the late George Gershwin, best known among composers of the so-called American folk music, wrote a rhapsody and filed it away to be forgotten.

Gershwin

Apparently he believed it worthless. Eventually it was lost.

Today, found by orchestra leader Paul Whiteman among old arrangements, it was revealed as a "Second Rhapsody in Blue."

Whiteman, one of the composer's closest friends, and his orchestra, made the first rhapsody famous.

He was rummaging through Gershwin arrangements used 10 and 12 years ago in an attempt to settle a dispute over comparison of present day swing and jazz when he discovered the Second Rhapsody.

"I forgot the controversy and hurried to have my pianist play it," said Whiteman. "Some of the other boys listened in. I believe it equals the first rhapsody."

* * *

Whiteman said the score originally was written as accompaniment to a motion picture and was re-named "Rhapsody in Blue." It was played once by the Boston Symphony.

"It will be presented under its original title of "Rhapsody in Blue," he said. "You might call it a 'tone poem' with a strong love theme running through it."

Gershwin died in Hollywood July 11 of a brain tumor. The "Rhapsody in Blue" and "American in Paris," were his best known works.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

DEC 11 1937

MUSIC FOR TODAY

Lillian Tyler Plogstedt

Last night, as the fourth attraction of the Artist Series the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, gave a concert in Music Hall. It was an ideally arranged program that was presented; just long enough to whet one's appetite, and of a perfect sequence. A Haydn symphony, a new work by Prokofieff, one of the most interesting of the modern composers, and the magnificent Strauss tone poem, "Ein Heldden-leben," presented sharp contrasts, and works that must inevitably have pleased everyone from the classicist to the most ardent protagonist of modern scores.

Koussevitsky is one of the most dynamic of conductors, and his every desire is mirrored in the playing of his superb orchestra. He molds them to the most magnificent climaxes, the most exquisite phrasing, the most complete exposition of the meaning of every portion of a work.

Nothing lovelier than the playing of the Haydn Symphony, the one in G Major, No. 88, can be imagined; what exquisite tenderness and beauty in the slow movement, and what buoyancy in the finale.

Prokofieff has the gift of writing music filled with sly humor and a certain rough gaiety. The work offered last evening was an orchestral suite entitled "Lieutenant Kije," the name of an officer who did not not exist, but was invented to spare the feelings of Czar Paul, who had misread the report of an aide, so that the last syllable of the name of a Russian officer which ended in "Ki," and the Russian expletive "Je," formed the name Kije.

Five episodes in the life of this figmentary personage, his birth, romance, wedding, his troika, or three-horse sleigh, and his funeral make up this charming work. It was magnificiently played, with all the grotesquery, and comic descriptions of the career of "Kije" graphically revealed. We neglected to say that the music was written for a Soviet film bearing the same title.

But the greatest glory of the program was in the playing of the wonderful Strauss work: "The Life of a Hero," painted on the orchestral canvas by that past master of art of orchestration, Richard Strauss, and interpreted by so splendid an orchestra held the audience spellbound and kept it standing at the close for a great ovation to the musicians and their gifted leader. Especial mention (if one can single out a single choir for this honor) should be made of the string section, which plays with such perfect ensemble and such velvety tone, and to their splendid concert-meister, who so beautifully interpreted the love motive in the third section of the work.

DECATUR, ILL.
HERALD

DEC 13 1937

ANGRY MAESTRO TELLS AUDIENCE TO STAY IN BED

By Associated Press

PITTSBURGH—Angered by latecomers Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, halted a concert before a capacity audience of 3,600 at Syria mosque yesterday.

He strode from the music hall and refused to return for five minutes.

As he left, the famous maestro blazed out at an attendant:

"I will not go back there, never! The fools—better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Placated by anxious friends backstage, Koussevitzky returned after a five-minute interval, picked up his baton and without a moment's hesitation resumed at the beginning.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE
DEC 11 1937

Varied Musical Programs Will Be Presented Here

Boston Symphony To Play Tonight And Tomorrow.

VIOLINIST IN DEBUT

Local Youth to Be Heard In Recital Tuesday; Ballet Is Coming.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra will give concerts tonight and tomorrow night at the Mosque, ushering in a week of activity marked by appearances of the Vienna Choir Boys, the Ballet Caravan and Violinist Ossy Renardy.

Koussevitzky, whose rumored retirement from conductorship of the Boston Symphony may make this his last appearance here in that capacity, will be doubly welcomed by the city's concert-goers—for his reputation as one of the world's ranking conductors and for the inclusion in his programs of two symphonies in interpreting which he peculiarly excels.

They are the orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," of Prokofieff whose satirical treatment of a symphonic theme gives him a place in Russian music similar to that occupied by the poet, Pushkin, in literature, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major.

Walter Winchell Column
like same on opposite page

CHICAGO, ILL Dec.
HERALD - EXAMINER 12/37

CLARKSBURG, W. VA. Dec.
EXPONENT 12/37

WILKES BARRE, PA. Dec.
INDEPENDENT 12/37

Daytona Beach Fla.
Sun. Record Dec.
12/37

(26)

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

DEC 1

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with the distinguished Serge Koussevitzky conducting, brought a thunderous applause at the conclusion of the program, Friday evening, from an audience that filled to capacity the spacious Music Hall for the fourth attraction of the artist series.

Music lovers arrived early to hear this highly anticipated concert, and promenaded in the foyer greeting friends before taking their places in the vast auditorium.

Dr. and Mrs. William Tunstall Semple, who returned last week from a visit to El Paso, Tex., occupied one of the boxes on the left of the auditorium with Mrs. Joseph Spencer Graydon and Mr. John Dee Wareham.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Goossens were present in a box with Mr. and Mrs. J. Herman Thuman and Mr. and Mrs. Emil Heermann.

Mr. and Mrs. Colin Gardner motored here from Middletown and heard the concert with Mr. and Mrs. Phillip Wyman in their box on the left of the auditorium. Mrs. Wyman answered inquiries for her daughter, Miss Nancy Smith, who is spending the winter abroad with a travel group and is at present enjoying a sojourn in Rome. Miss Smith is a popular member of the younger set, and will be much missed from the junior festivi— this yuletide season, her friends anticipating her return next June.

Mr. George H. Warrington arrived with his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Bailey, the latter wearing a dubonnet satin gown with a gray fur wrap. Mrs. Warrington, who is enjoying a brief visit in New York, was much missed from this family group.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Julius Fleischmann, the latter wearing a handsome black decollete with a diamond and turquoise necklet, were accompanied by Mrs. Fleischmann's mother, Mrs. William H. Kruse.

Mr. and Mrs. Learner B. Harrison were among the many from Indian Hill attending the concert. Mrs. Harrison wore a fascinating black dinner gown topped by a silver sequin high necked bodice.

Mrs. Russell Wilson, wearing a charming gown of violet blue, and Mrs. Mark Mitchell in a black satin decollete, heard the concert together.

Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, the latter wearing a pale green lame bodice with a black skirt, mingled with their friends during the twenty minute intermission.

Mr. and Mrs. Leroy Ballinger, who have moved to the Hotel Gibson from their country place on the Ohio River until after the Christmas holiday season when they will probably depart for their usual stay in Florida, were among the early arrivals. They are anticipating the return December 18 of their elder daughter, Miss Natalia, who is a freshman at Connecticut College, and who will be warmly welcomed at the Christmas festivities.

Dr. and Mrs. Gale S. Lowrie and Mrs. Guido Gores were a congenial trio from Clifton, in the throng of music lovers.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Merkel occupied Col. and Mrs. C. O. Sherrill's well placed seats. Col. Sherrill is confined to his home on East Hill avenue, with an attack of the grippe from which he is now convalescing.

Miss Elizabeth Matthews and her mother, Mrs. Mortimer Matthews, were among the many who motored in from Glendale for the Boston Symphony. Others from this nearby village included Mr. and Mrs. Harold Van Buren, Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Whiting Brown and their daughter, Miss Emily; Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Charles Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. William Anderson, Mr. and Mrs. Marston Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Allen and their son, Mr. Van Ness Allen.

Mrs. Logan Thomson with her daughter, Miss Jane, and Miss Alice Rammelsberg arrived from College Hill, the Misses Gertrude and Bertha Cist being among others from this hilltop suburb.

Mr. and Mrs. William G. Kittredge III and the latter's mother, Mrs. Tylor Field, made up a family group for the concert. They are now occupying Father Spence Burton's residence on Reading road, since the Kittredges gave up the John W. Tarbill, Jr.'s Glendale home, and Mrs. Field has recently sold her Grandin road home to Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Knowles.

Among others who chatted with friends in the foyer included Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Strietmann, the Misses Martha, Marjorie and Gwendolyn Rawson, the Misses Eleanor and Louise Wilby, Mrs. James Morrison, Mr. and Mrs. Harry S. Robinson, Miss Beatrice Shillito, Mrs. William Webb Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Richard W. Barrett and Mr. and Mrs. Donald Robinson.

Dr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. and Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith, music critic of the Times-Star; Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Bullock, Mr. William G. Stiegler, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Orr, Dr. and Mrs. Derrick Vail, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Goodyear, Miss Blanche Greenland, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Black, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mrs. David Austin, Mrs. Fenton Lawson, Miss Norma Geier, Mr. Walter Geier, Miss Woodra Walters, Mr. Richard Kohl, Mr. and Mrs. Orian Kaufman, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Parsons, the Rev. and Mrs. Robert S. Lambert, Mr. John Mott Boswell and his daughter, Miss Helen; Mrs. H. Frederick Schaefer and her daughters, the Misses Mary and Louise; Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Caldwell, Mrs. Stanley Merrill, Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. Harrison, Jr., Mrs. Tyler Plogstedt, Miss Elizabeth Gamble, Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Beinkamp, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Weil, Mrs. J. Walter Freiberg, Mrs. Max Schmidt, Dr. and Mrs. Otto Geier, Miss Emily Poole, Mr. and Mrs. Phillip Geier, Mr. and Mrs. Bayard Kilgour, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Howard Cox, Mrs. Rudolph Balke, Mr. Charles McLaughlin, Mrs. Burtis B. Breese and her daughter, Mrs. Jane Breese Millard.

Mrs. R. K. Brodie and his daughter, Miss Ruth; Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Scott Alter, Dr. and Mrs. Martin Fischer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Upson, Mrs. Laura Simpson Lamb, Dr. Karol Liszniewski, Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell W. Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Asa Atkins, Mr. Edmund Kittredge, Mr. Joseph Field, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Strauss, with the former's mother, Mrs. Albert Strauss; Miss Mary Louise Kohl, Mr. Franklin Loveland, Miss Katherine Wulsin, Miss Barbara Allen Smith, Mr. Gordon McKim, Jr.; Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Hawley, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Coleman Benedict, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Tietig, Mr. Rudolph Tietig, Jr.; Miss Agnes Tietig, Mr. John McCormick, Mrs. Donald Dearness, Dr. William Craddock, Mr. and Mrs. Howard B. Luther, Mr. and Mrs. William Hardy, Mr. and Mrs. Ben E. Tate, Dr. and Mrs. Claude Lotspeich, Mr. and Mrs. William Shroder, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Carothers, Miss Amy Sherlock, Mrs. Frank Kunkel and her daughter, Mrs. Robert Cline; Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm MacAvoy, Dr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Dudley Palmer, Mr. Lino Mattioli, Mrs. Dorothy Rawson, Mrs. T. J. Davis, Mrs. Katherine Blakmore.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

DEC 11 1937

Tonight Pittsburgh will welcome the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Koussevitzky, to Syria Mosque and again tomorrow afternoon.

. . . Following tonight's concert the Frederic Schaefers are having a reception in their Devon Road home honoring Dr. Koussevitzky. Mr. Schaefer is vice president of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, under whose auspices the orchestra comes to Pittsburgh.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
Walter Winchell
DEC 14 1937

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 11 1937

LAST NIGHT Mr. J. Herman Thuman realized another triumph of impresarioship in his Artists' Series which packed Music Hall from turret to foundation stone, and gave those devotees who helped make up this vast audience the time of their lives.

Of course the great Koussevitzky and his 110 orchestral marvels, who gave the subscribers to the Artist Series and unalloyed musical thrill, in themselves almost filled this towering auditorium, those who secured the comparatively few other seats considering themselves as the beloved of Chance!

In the intermission the spacious foyer, reminded fashionable life of important May Festivals where promenading in the intermission was a penance rather than a pleasure—so huge was the throng attempting to move about even in that capacious entresol.

To witness Koussevitzky's control of his orchestra until it appeared to the initiate as one instrument in varied genres, was in itself worth the price of admission so unique is this distinguished Russian's manner of conducting. No wonder these musicians, with arresting veneration, regard this brilliant authority's magic control of his men, and his unique directoral effects which bind these artists together as one man of many musical minds.

Koussevitsky's uniquely original mannerisms and his expenditure of energy were in themselves amazing, although the results were so marvelous as to make the enthusiastic audience forget them—so much a part of Koussevitzky are these high-geared movements of hands and arms, of facial distortions, and the managing of his magic baton. Incidentally, he has beautiful hands, which he uses with the finesse of a woman.

This occasion was a very real one, and brought out fashionable life from the youngster still in school; through the debutante groups of recent years; the young marrieds (who came out in force—particularly from Indian Hill and its contiguous territory); and including the elder generation of Cincinnati and this vicinity.

The intelligentzia of Glendale was there, so, too, was that of suburbs and city. In short, last night's audience made up one of those occasions of which it may well be said that "Society was present in toto!"

To list these names would be, practically, to include the entire social register, as well as those who dedicate their own talents to the art of music, and who form a very important and intriguing little community in themselves.

They, too, were there in full panoply.

The boxes were very gay and decorative.

With Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens were the Emile Heermanns and Mr. and Mrs. Thurmans.

With Mrs. Gardner of Middletown, who looked especially charming in her red-gold dinner gown, were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, the latter being a decorative adjunct to that loge and equally charming in the wide corridors during the intermission. Her gown was of black velvet—very becoming and simple in effect, but notably flattering to her charming coloring and naturalness.

Near by, also on the south side, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Semple, with Mrs. Joseph Spencer Graydon and Mr. J. D. Wareham, made up a group that was surrounded during the brief intermission. The one disappointment of this occasion was the absence of Mr. Graydon, who, as is often the case, was called out of town on legal matters.

On the north side of Music Hall there were comfortably ensconced Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, who had with them, among others, their son and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Bailey (Elsie Warrington).

Another gay group occpying a loge in that vicinity were Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Thuman and their pretty young daughter, who assembled as her comrades of the occasion, her brother, Mr. "Bill" Thuman; Mr. and Mrs. Robert Ames, Betty Lee Spencer, and Mr. Robert Egan.

And so it went. A thrilling evening, both from the standpoint of a most felicitous assembling of "the right people," and from that of a program presented by one of the most accredited and commended symphony orchestras in America.

OWING to an error in writing the cards of invitation for Mr. and Mrs. Roger Kemper Rogan's dinner, the date was correct but the day specified was incorrect.

This much-anticipated affair which Mr. and Mrs. Rogan are giving for their son, Mr. John B. Rogan, takes place on Thursday, December 30, and promises to be one of the most charming of all such affairs of the Christmas holidays.

It will be confined to the debutantes of the year and the men who trot about with them.

LANCASTER, PA.
SUNDAY NEWS

DEC 12 1937

Gershwin's 2nd Rhapsody Found After His Death

Chicago, Dec. 11.—(UP)—Years ago the late George Gershwin, best known among composers of the so-called American "classical jazz," wrote a rhapsody, filed it away and it was forgotten. He apparently believed it was worthless.

It was found by orchestra leader Paul Whiteman among old arrangements, and was reported to be a "second rhapsody in blue." Whiteman was one of the composer's closest friends. His orchestra, which usually introduced Gershwin's works, made the first rhapsody famous.

"Apparently George didn't think much of this one," Whiteman said. "But I believe it equals the first."

He said he was rummaging through arrangements, used 10 and 12 years ago in an attempt to settle a dispute over comparison of present day swing and jazz.

"I started with one pile of long-forgotten music and began thumbing it through. I came to a sheet bearing the title, "Second Rhapsody" written in George's familiar scrawl. I tore open the cover and recognized his typical manner of writing notes. I forgot the controversy and hurried to have my pianist play it Some of the other boys listened in.

"They were exceptionally impressed. The orchestral arrangement required little work."

Whiteman said the score originally was written as accompaniment to a motion picture and was re-named "Rhapsody in Rivets" for the purpose.

"It will be presented under its original title of 'The Second Rhapsody in Blue,'" he said.

The rhapsody was played once by the Boston Symphony, he said.

"I expect there will be criticism because the work is called a rhapsody since it does not conform to the style set by Liszt rhapsodies. But it must be remembered that 'rhapsody' means 'free form.'"

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

DEC 12 1937

THE Observatory Lodge will be a center of activity this Sunday night as Dr. Henry K. Ransom will entertain a number of friends at supper, and Dr. and Mrs. Cameron Haight will also have a Sunday night supper party for members of the surgical staff.

* * *

The Boston Symphony concert is always inspiration for parties, and Wednesday evening Allan Taylor, of Adrian, entertained at dinner at the Michigan League preceding the concert. A group of notables gathered after the concert at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Sink, of Olivia Ave. To celebrate the birthday of Dr. Reed Nesbit, Mrs. Nesbit invited a number of friends to their home on Devonshire Road.

* * *

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

DEC 11 1937

Smart Set Hears Boston Orchestra

Festive Throng Fills Music Hall for Fourth Program of Artist Series; Box Parties Are Reminiscent of May Festival Performances

BY MAY DEARNESS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Friday night in Music Hall for the fourth program of this year's Artist Series brought out society in grand number and gala attire. The huge hall was filled nearly to capacity with only a few seats vacant in the first few rows downstairs and on the extreme sides in the gallery.

The box parties were almost as festive as at a May Festival performance. Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Spencer Graydon shared one of these loges with Dr. and Mrs. William T. Semple and John Dee Wareham. In the adjoining box with Mr. and Mrs. J. Herman Thuman were Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens and Mr. and Mrs. Emil Heermann.

Mr. and Mrs. Colin Gardner motored from Middletown to hear the concert with Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman in their box party. Mrs. Calvin Verity and her son, William, headed another group of friends in a loge on the other side of the hall. George H. Warrington occupied another box on that side with his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Bailey.

Mr. and Mrs. Julius Fleischmann and his mother, Mrs. Lily Ackerland Fleischmann, were joined by Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin nad Mrs. T. J. Davis and her daughter, Mrs. Sidney Hosmer, in the crowded lobby during intermission. Mrs. Katherine Blackmore and Mrs. Jonathan Allen were in another group.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, who are leaving in about a week for a Christmas holiday in Florida, enjoyed a brief visit with Mr. and Mrs. Ellsworth F. Ireland and Dr. William H. Craddock during the intermission. With Mr. and Mrs. David C. Horton were Miss Katharine Wulsin and several friends.

Dr. and Mrs. Gale Lowrie had seats far down on the left of the auditorium. Sitting near them were Dr. and Mrs. Albert Freiberg, Mrs. John Crawford Pogue and her son, Robert; Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Harrison, Richard S. Whitacre, Mr. and Mrs. William M. Knox, Henry Zoellner, James Heekin, Mrs. George Hoadley and Mrs. Fenton Lawson.

Among some of the many others in the enthusiastic throng were Dr. and Mrs. Howard McIntyre, Dr. and Mrs. C. M. Lotspeich, Mr. and Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Pritz, Mrs. Philip Werthner and her aunt, Miss Marie Martin; Miss Beatrice Shillito, Dr. and Mrs. Otto Geier, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer with Dr. and Mrs. Alfred Springer, Dr. and Mrs. Daniel Laurence, Mr. and Mrs. John Strauss, Mrs. Frank Krug, Miss Mildred Eaker.

Mr. and Mrs. Ben Tate, Mr. and Mrs. Roger Kemper Rogan, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischbach, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Hoffman, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Wurlitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Wallis Hinkle, Dr. and M Beverley W. Bond, Mr. and M William H. Harrison, Mrs. Ne Wright, Walter Heermann, Dr. a Mrs. Martin Dumler, Mr. and M Donald Robinson.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
Walter Winchell
DEC 12 1937

SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN
Walter Winchell
DEC 1937

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH
Walter Winchell
DEC 1937

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
Walter Winchell

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
DEC 1 193

Walter
WINCHEL
Copyright, 1937.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle
Walter Winchell
DEC 12 1937

. . . Insiders say that Serge Koussevitzky will resign as conductor of the Boston Symphony when the season ends . . . There probably isn't anything to all that talk about Lily Pons and Kostelanetz being secretly sealed—she is being adored publicly by another . . . They are baiting E. Cantor to go into the Capitol to revive vaudeville there

“Firm Hands to Grasp

HANDS OF JASCHA HEIFETZ
Who will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 17 and 18

77

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1937

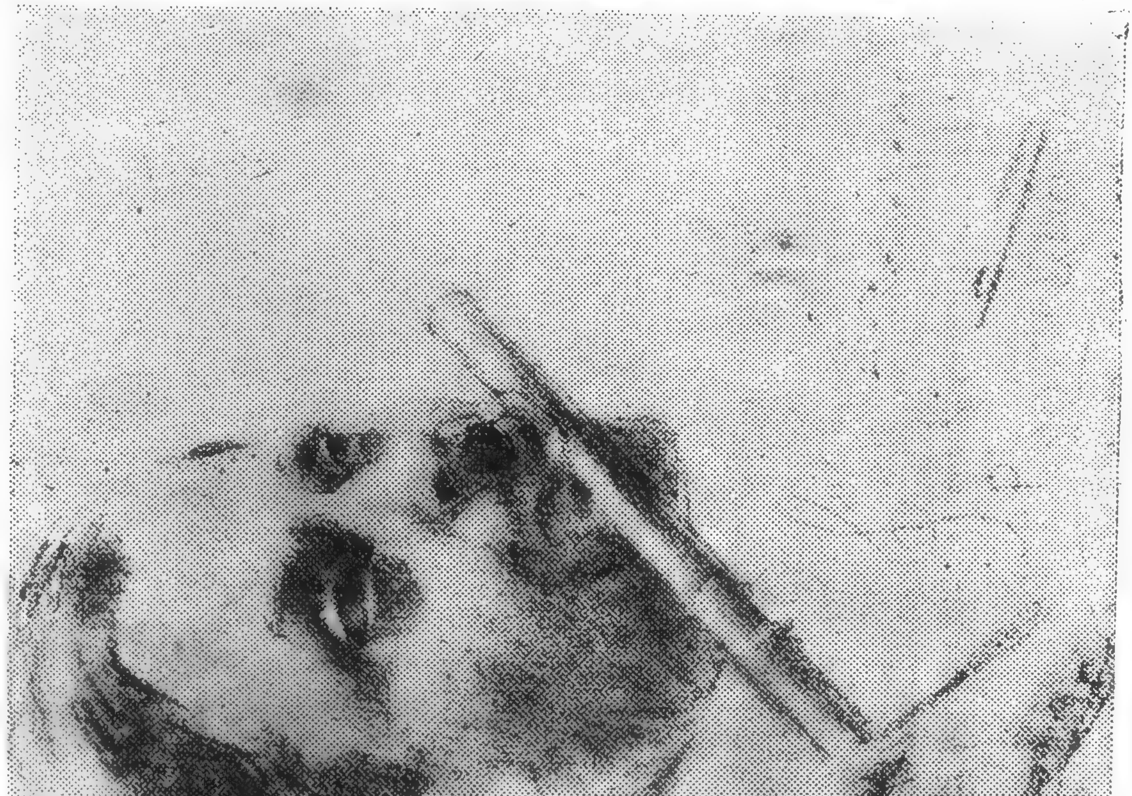
A Master From the First

Petersen

Josef Hofmann, Pianist
Left—As Young Prodigy. Right—As Pedagogue and Interpreter

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1937

Heifetz with Symphony; Flute Play



George Laurent, flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and musical director of the Flute Players Club which will give its 88th concert at the Hotel Vendome on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 19.

Edward Kane, tenor soloist with the Handel and Haydn Society at their annual presentation of Handel's Christmas oratorio, "The Messiah," which will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday and Monday evenings, Dec. 19 and 20.

Jascha Heifetz, distinguished violinist, who will be the soloist at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week, playing Brahms' Concerto and, for the first time in America, Prokofieff's Second Concerto.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 12 1937

JASCHA HEIFETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its ninth pair of concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and the fourth concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on the previous Thursday evening, December 16.

Jascha Heifetz will appear as soloist with the orchestra for the Friday and Saturday concerts. The violinist, together with Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra, will then give the first presentation in America of the Second Violin Concerto of Serge Prokofieff. The concerto was first performed in Madrid in 1935, the year of its composition. Mr. Heifetz will also appear in the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major.

The programme for the concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, will consist of the Symphony of Mozart in A major, K. No. 201; the Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill, which recently had its first performance at the Boston concerts; and the "Scotch" Symphony of Felix Mendelssohn.

Hofmann

(Continued from Page 11)

from memory, this was seldom done 50 years ago. Von Bulow, after years of laborious study, considered performing without music an intellectual accomplishment of which to be proud. Yet the small boy, Josef Hofmann, had memorized his program.

Invariably, the reviewers of the time placed particular stress on the boy's naturalness. He was "a healthy, happy, natural boy . . . in no wise externally different from any other child of ten . . ." In other words, he was a prodigy but not a precocity.

Josef Hofmann was born in Cracow, Poland, on Jan. 20, 1876. His father was a professor of piano at Warsaw Conservatory and conductor of the Warsaw Opera. His mother was a distinguished singer. At the age of three, he started piano lessons guided by his father, mother and aunt. His first public performance was at Ciechocinek, near Warsaw, in 1879, when he played his own valse, mazurka and nocturne. At nine, he was touring Europe; and also at that time he paid a visit to the United States.

But it was not until Nov. 29, 1887 that he gave his first concert in this country. It was at the Metropolitan Opera House. Less than a month later, he gave in Boston the concert which made possible the present golden jubilee appearance.

In 1894, Mr. Hofmann made his first public concert appearance after the seven years' seclusion and study. It was in Hamburg; and the pianist, then 18, played Rubinstein's D minor concerto, with the composer conducting. After this the master refused to give Hofmann any more lessons. "I have told you all I know about legitimate piano-playing and music-making," he told his pupil.

In the ensuing years, Mr. Hofmann has toured Europe and America many times. He has published books as well as musical compositions. In 1926, in addtion to his many other activities, he took on the post of general director and dean of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 12 1937

Orchestra music lovers will no doubt be out en masse this afternoon for the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque scheduled for 3 o'clock. For sheer beauty of performance this great orchestra and its distinguished leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, occupy a niche all their own in the modern musical world, a further proof that Pittsburgh can ill afford to dispense with with Cleopatra to bring it about; he was planning his last campaign to conquer Persia as a prelude to naming himself Emperor, when he was assassinated

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

DEC 12 1937

Don't Blame Social Ills on Art Sergei Koussevitzky Says Here

Copyright by Sun-Telegraph. All Rights Reserved.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY—Famed conductor of the Boston Symphony which is playing here. He says music, with all art, has no relation to contemporary practical life, was disappointed in having missed the "Yellow Cloth" and the whole International.

Music Has No Part In World Unrest, He Declares

Art, divorced completely from contemporary practical life, is the idea of Sergei Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing today in its second Pittsburgh concert. He said:

"Art has nothing whatsoever to do with social troubles. Real art is abstract with no relation to material things. It is the expression of an emotion—a completely abstract thing."

Sibelius, he said, created in a most peaceful period, yet the composer is one of the greatest of modern times. Sibelius, Ravel, and the Russians, Stravinsky and Prokofieff, are the Tschaikowskys, the Wagners and the Brahms of today.

TIME DOESN'T MATTER

He pointed out:

"Music is not a matter of the length of time it takes to play, but rather of its thoroughness of expression. I consider the value of the nine-minute 'Afternoon of a Faun,' by Sibelius, as great as the five-hour Wagner 'Sigfried' music."

The lithe little man, as energetic in conversation as upon the orchestra platform, was "very, very, sorry" to arrive in Pittsburgh almost a week after the closing of the Carnegie International. He said:

"I had so looked forward to seeing it. It is possible, you know, that a painter is influenced by music. Music is abstract, and abstract painting comes closest to expressing an emotion. Braque, who did 'Yellow Cloth,' is very great in his still life."

'MUSIC GREATEST ART'

Music, Koussevitzky insists, in tracing the evolution of art, is the greatest art. He said:

"There is no question of it. It is the last art to develop, and is the most abstract. All art developed toward the beginning of music. Sculpture developed at the peak of architecture, painting at the highest point of sculpture, and music, finally, at the highest peak of painting."

Koussevitzky recalled his student days in Russia when, he said, conditions for young composers were very bad. Rachmaninoff's famous prelude in C-Sharp Minor was sold for $15.

HE AIDED MUSICIANS

The Boston conductor, himself, was at that time composing, and he resolved that when he once possessed money, he would make things easier for musicians.

Later Koussevitzky founded the Edition Russe, and in it Stravinsky and Prokofieff first appeared. Prokofieff was but fifteen. Last year, at 45, he played his third Piano Concerto for the second time with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

And last evening, in the Syria Mosque concert, Koussevitzky directed the Boston orchestra in Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" orchestrali suit.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 12 1937

Smartly Gowned Audience Attends Symphony Concert

THE most brilliant audience of the winter filled the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art for the concert presented Thursday evening, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

This annual concert, complimentary to the members of the museum always is the outstanding musical of the season.

Several supper parties were given following the concert, among the most important of which was the one for which Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister was hostess, in her home in the Park Lane, complimenting Dr. Koussevitsky.

Other out-of-town guests at the supper included Mr. George E. Judd of Boston, the manager of the orchestra; Miss Dorothy Sedgwick of Martin's Ferry, O., and Mr. George Edman, editor of the Berkshire Evening Eagle, Lenox, Mass.

Mrs. Hollister is a patron of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival association, and is on the advisory board of that organization.

Each mid-summer season the Boston Symphony orchestra gives several concerts on its estate in Lenox, where Hawthorne's Tanglewood Tales were written. Mrs. Hollister and her sister, Miss Olive Colton spend their summers at Lenox.

It was an evening of superlatives in dress as well as muisc with lavish fabrics, rich furs and rare jewels.

Acres of ermine and mountains of mink as one spectator phrased it, were much in evidence.

Mrs. Hollister was stunning in a beautiful gown of ocean green satin brocaded, embroidered with tiny lilacs and having a corsage of dark autumn leaves.

A large pearl comb, with three pearl pendants, adorned her hair. Combs and ornaments of gold and silver seem to replace flowers and feathers, somewhat.

A royal evening coat of obei cloth, strictly tailored with a Russian sable colar, completed Mrs. Hollister's luxurious ensemble.

Miss Sedgewick's striking gown was of American Beauty taffeta moire made on princess lines, over which she wore a black velvet coat, trimmed with kolinsky.

Mrs. William A. Gosline's black and white brocaded gown had the small pattern outlined with brilliants, and the bodice had bands of the diamonte trimming. A long white lace scarf added an artistic touch.

A bronze embroidered taffeta, fashioned with a square neckline and small puff sleeves, formed the smart model worn by Mrs. Charles T. Harther.

MANY attractive affairs were given last evening, the most popular evening of the week in Toledo, for entertaining.

Mrs. George M. Tood entertained a small group of friends at a buffet dinner in her Scottwood avenue home.

This was the first of two dinners which Mrs. Todd has arranged for different groups.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

[illegible] 1937

Stragglers Chase Koussevitsky Off Concert Podium

Pittsburgh, Dec. 13 (UP)—Several concert stragglers today considered virtues of the anonymity of promptness after their tardiness brought an attack of temperament upon Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that interrupted the concert.

Koussevitsky glared at one red-faced group, but did not stop the music. At a second swish of silks, however, the conductor threw aside his baton and stomped off the stage.

"I will not go back there, never!" Koussevitsky shouted to an attendant. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

But he did go back, and started Mozart's Symphony in A Minor all over again—while the audience inspected the stragglers, and the stragglers inspected their shoes.

Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph- Monday,
Dec. 13, 1937

78

City of Symphony Music Lovers

PITTSBURGHERS LIKE symphony music . . . not only do they go to hear their own Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra but visiting orchestras as well.

Saturday night and yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony attracted music-lovers by the hundreds to Syria Mosque.

More and more of the younger set as well as their elders are concert-goers.

Chatting in the foyer during intermission at Saturday's concert were debutantes Mary Hammond, Jean Keister, Harriet Ann Willets, Mary Ward and Ann Berger in ice-green slipper satin.

Post-deb Muriel McKaig chose a period frock for the concert . . . of black satin with an off-the-shoulder neckline and a full gathered skirt.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW

DEC [illegible]

ORCHESTRA CZAR GETS DANDER UP

Koussevitsky Flares at Late Comers During Symphony Concert.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., Dec. 12. (AP)—Angered by late comers, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, halted a concert before a capacity audience of 3600 at Syria Mosque today.

He strode from the music hall and refused to return for five minutes. As he left, the famous maestro blazed out at an attendant:

"I will not go back there, never! The fools—better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

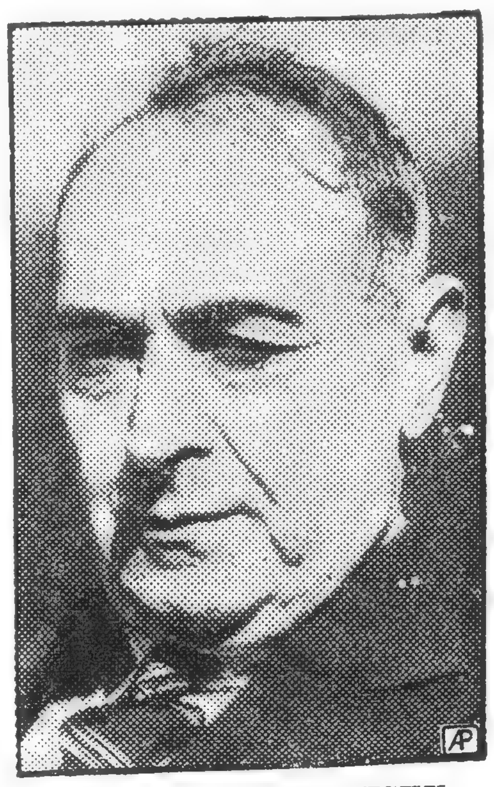
Earlier in the concert, while the orchestra was well into the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A major, he had laid down his baton, whirled toward the audience and shouted instructions that no one was to enter after the music had begun. The same request was printed on programs.

A few moments later, two tardy spectators brushed by ushers and walked down an aisle.

The conductor slammed his baton on the music stand, and strode from the stage.

Placated by anxious friends backstage, Koussevitsky returned after a five-minute interval, picked up his baton and the concert resumed without further interruption.

Angered by Late-Comers, Symphony Orchestra Conductor Halts Concert



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

PITTSBURG, Dec. 12.—(AP)—Angered by latecomers, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, halted a concert before a capacity audience of 3,600 at Syria mosque today.

He strode from the music hall and refused to return for five minutes.

As he left, the famous maestro blazed out at an attendant:

"I will not go back there, never! The fools—better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Earlier in the concert, while the orchestra was well into the first movement of Mozart's Symphony

(Continued on Page 2, Col. 3)

Cont. 9

Koussevitzky, noted con-

this section.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

DEC [illegible] 1937

MAESTRO QUITS CONCERT STAGE IN PITTSBURGH

Latecomers Anger Famed Symphony Conductor —Program Delayed

Pittsburgh — (AP) — Angered by late-comers, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, halted a concert before a capacity audience of 3,600 at Syria Mosque yesterday.

He strode from the music hall and refused to return for five minutes.

As he left, the famous maestro blazed out at an attendant:

"I will not go back there, never! The fools—better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Earlier in the concert, while the orchestra was well into the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A Major, he had laid down his baton, and whirled toward the audience.

He shouted clipped instructions that no one was to enter after the music had begun. The same request was printed on programs.

The conductor slammed his baton on the music stand and strode from the stage.

Placated by anxious friends backstage, Koussevitzky returned after a five minute interval, picked up his baton and without a moment's hesitation resumed at the beginning.

The concert proceeded without further interruption, but it was a chastened, amazed audience that spread the story throughout Pittsburgh.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 13 1937

LEADER HALTS CONCERT

Koussevitzky Walks off Stage When Annoyed by Late Comers.

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13 (AP).—Angered by latecomers, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, halted a concert before a capacity audience of 1600 at Syrie mosque Sunday. He strode from the music hall and refused to return for five minutes.

As he left, the famous maestro blazed out at an attendant:

"I will not go back there, never! The fools—better they should stay at home. They should have some respect for the art."

Earlier in the concert, while the orchestra was well into the first movement of Mozart's symphony in A major, he had laid down his baton, and whirled toward the audience. He shouted clipped instructions that no one was to enter after the music had begun. The same request was printed on programs.

MONDAY, DEC. 13, 1937
THE PITTSBURGH PRESS

79

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
DEC 12 1937

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

To Finland Again to Hear "Windswept Music"

Subscribers to the Evening Concerts of the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra Will Hear Sibelius's Second Symphony Thursday and Friday Nights in Music Hall.

THE symphonies of Sibelius, the Finn, are confessionals, like those of Tchaikovsky. Not that the two men are at all alike, except perhaps in an occasional passage of orchestral speech, but both are direct and vivid in their musical utterances. When Sibelius, whose Second Symphony we are to hear in the fifth pair of subscription concerts next Thursday and Friday evenings in Music hall of the Municipal Auditorium listened to the quartet in F, opus 59, of Beethoven, he saw pictures both strange and beautiful. He saw enchanting gardens with birds of paradise, lakes of red water, and he heard Beethoven sighing nearly all the time.

In the first movement of his Second Symphony Sibelius is likewise somber and sighing, but probably without being conscious of it. The movement was designed as a pastoral one and Paul Rosenfeld thought he heard "home sounds" in it with cattle in the scene and the burden of a lowly tragedy.

Philip Hale, annotating it for the Boston Symphony, thought Rosenfeld must have gained his impressions from a "tea table performance."

"The music," Hale says, "is extremely northern, bleak and windswept. Arresting and impressive music; and lo, suddenly Sibelius drops into Tchaikovskian mood, and even speaks the self-torturing Russian's speech. Yet Sibelius is generally in the foreground, and his speech is generally his own. It is when he would touch the heart of the public that Tchaikovsky pushes him aside."

Philip Hale's psychological insight was uncanny and that this is a case in point, will be disclosed in the performance of the work. "There is much of interest in the symphony besides the peculiar aesthetic and racial quality," he says. There are qualities of orchestration that hold the attention and excite admiration, as the long pizzicato for the double basses."

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
DEC 13 1937

Conductor Quits Stage in Anger; Later Goes Back

Pittsburgh, Dec. 13—AP—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, strode heatedly from the stage of the Syria Mosque yesterday after halting a program because late arriving customers thre whis musicians off stride.

The artist first had whirled toward the audience of 3,500 when he heard noise while directing the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A Major.

Hardly, had he resumed when two tardy persons pushed past ushers and down the aisle.

Koussevitzky slammed his baton on the music stand and left, his face flushed.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted at an attendant. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

His jangled nerves quieted, the conductor returned in three minutes and completed the concert without incident. In fact he said himself he thought the orchestra achieved "magnificent heights" in its rendition of Sibelius' Symphony in D Major.

MONDAY, DEC. 13, 1937 — THE PITTSBURGH PRESS

Koussevitsky Magic Provides Rare Treat

Boston Symphony Thrills Capacity Audiences in Two Concerts at Mosque—Late-Comers Anger Maestro Who Halts Program Twice

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Listening to supreme orchestral performance was the experience of capacity audiences attending the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Syria Mosque yesterday afternoon and last Saturday evening.

Playing two different programs the Hub's incomparable orchestra and its peerless conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, provided rich musical fare the projection of which was intrinsically artistic, technically flawless and potently appealing.

Mr. Lewando

The huge outpouring of concertgoers for both occasions gave evidence not only of the high esteem in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston musicians are held, but indicated that Pittsburgh's large army of music lovers are discriminating supporters of the highest phases of art expression, of which — in the symphonic fields—the leader and players from Boston are the outstanding example.

Grand Program Builder

A program builder par excellence, Dr. oussevitsky yesterday offered Mozart's 29th Symphony, in A Major; Moussorgsky's prelude to his opera, Khovanstchina; Richard Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and Sibelius' 2nd Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky is unique in his manner of bringing to utterance the vitality, zestful spirit and expressive appeal innate in Mozart's orchestral works. Even in this early symphony—Mozart was 18 when it was composed—written for strings two oboes and two horns, which many leaders are prone to disregard as meriting attention, Dr. Koussevitzky took it and revealed its loveliness to the full. The four short movements are gems of genius.

When the quiet serene Andante had begun, Dr. Koussevitzky suddenly stopped the orchestra. He resumed in a few moments, but after several bars had been played the conductor again laid down his baton and hurriedly left the stage. He reappeared in a few minutes, began the Andante for the third time and proceeded uninterruptedly to the number's conclusion.

Later he explained to this reviewer that he found it impossible to attend to his artistic duties while people were permitted to enter the auditorium unhindered.

The concert continued with the Moussorgsky item, a piece depicting "dawn on the Moskwa River," given with exquisite tonal coloring.

Brahms Real Treat

The Saturday concert brought to performance C. P. E. Bach's D Major concerto for strings in the Seinberg ararngements, Brahms' 1st Symphony and the first local presentation of Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," the latter an orchestral suite composed in 1933 as incidental music for the Soviet film of similar title. The story deals with a fictitious character of ancient Russia.

The music, for all of its interest and inventiveness, is, after all, an integral part of the picture for which it was written, and probably would be the more enjoyed in connection with a cinema performance. However, it is highly ingenious, modern, and utilizes remarkable instrumental combinations. For instance, the baritone solo part which occurs only in the picture, is given to a tenor saxophone, and later to a solo bass and other deep sounding instruments. These proceed interwoven in various combinations with the remainder of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky's ministrations as interpreter and the orchestra's fine collaboration were productive of a highly interesting performance.

However, the real treat of the evening was focused in the playing of the mighty Brahms 1st Symphony, of which Dr. Koussevitky is a foremost interpreter. He led his brilliant forces in a galvanic performance of the mighty work.

At both concerts salvos of applause were evoked, demonstrations bringing out the conductor time after time to acknowledge the tribute which he shared with his men.

Koussevitsky Scolds Concert Latecomers

Pittsburgh Tele. 12/13/37

Two patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brushed past doormen and ushers during the orchestra's opening concert in Syria Mosque yesterday afternoon.

So, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, threw down his baton and strode from the stage. The orchestra stopped in the middle of the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A Major. Koussevitsky shouted:

"I will never go back there, never. The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Placated, he returned to the rostrum three minutes later, and began Mozart's opus a second time.

CONCERT INTERRUPTED

Just a few minutes before, latecomers had interrupted his opening Pittsburgh concert.

The first time, he merely laid down his baton, turned angrily to face the audience, but resumed immediately.

But when he led the orchestra into Sibelius' Symphony in D Major, the previous interruptions were swept away in Koussevitsky's version.

The slight, grey-haired Russian conductor himself said his musicians reached "magnificent heights" in presenting the Finnish composer's work.

MASTER'S PLAINT

Later, Koussevitsky wrote this to his friend, Sibelius:

"I write to tell you what I think of audiences that do not behave. We have played nine concerts in 10 days. It is a great strain. This afternoon in Pittsburgh some people walk in when I am conducting Mozart and it is too much. I leave the stage.

"What is it, my friend, that makes them act so? They buy good seats and then they come late. They should not do this. They must learn respect for the art, respect for the music and respect for the musicians."

Then he told Sibelius of playing his symphony. He wrote:

"When I was in Helsingfors, I said you have never heard your music. Would you only come to America, I will show you what your music really is. You do not know, you cannot know, because you have never heard it the way my boys played it this afternoon.

PLEADED TO SIBELIUS

"Many times I have asked you to come to this country. You say the ocean is too much for you. You are old now, you say. I am no longer young, either, but never before have I been so strong, and only now am I beginning a little to understand music.

"I shall conduct many years yet, and one day you will sit in my audience and listen to my orchestra play your music. Then you will know what I mean that you have never heard it."

POTTSVILLE, PA.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 13 1937

STOPS CONCERT AS LATE COMERS ENTER THEATRE

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13. (AP)—Angered by latecomers, Serge Kousse-

---

Monday, Dec. 13, 1937
PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH

By J. FRED LISSFELT

After Director Koussevitsky thoroughly disciplined the audience yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque, we settled down to hear one of the most amazing performances that the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play.

The climax was doubtless at the end of the Strauss tone poem, "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a work abounding in the frankest humor of medieval Germany with all its grotesqueries and mockery. It is the most vivid of all program music, no detail of which escapes the understanding of Koussevitsky. Having at his disposal the virtuosi of the instrumental world, he unleashed them into the most spontaneous playing of his visit.

The Moussorgsky Prelude to "Khovanstchina" developed its brief story under the steadiest control of tone color imaginable, while the second symphony of Sibelius soared to matchless power in the long developing theme. It was like going on a long journey with Koussevitsky; at every turn he showed a new aspect of the Finnish landscape, often bleak, and only now and then relieved by a touch of brilliant costume or the blinding northern sun.

In contrast, the Mozart Symphony No. 29 in A Major afforded the string section of the orchestra another of its lucky occasions to demonstrate its finesse.

WAYCROSS, GA:
JOURNAL-HERALD
DEC 12 1937

Find Another "Rhapsody In Blue" Written By Gershwin

CHICAGO, Dec. 11. (U.P.)—Years ago the late George Gershwin, best known among composers of so-called classical jazz, wrote a rhapsody and filed it away to be forgotten. He apparently believed it worthless.

Eventually it was lost. Today, found by orchestra leader Paul Whiteman among old arrangements, it was revealed as a "second rhapsody in blue."

Whiteman, one of Gershwin's closest friends, and whose orchestra made the first rhapsody famous, said he was rummaging thru arrangements used ten and twelve years ago in an attempt to settle a dispute over comparison of present day swing and jazz.

"I started with one pile of long-forgotten music and began thumbing it through. I came to a sheet bearing the title, 'second rhapsody' written in George's familiar scrawl I tore open the cover and recognized his typical manner of writing notes. I forgot the controversy and hurried to have my pianist play it.

"Some of the other boys listened and were exceptionally impressed. The orchestral arrangement required little work."

Whiteman said that although Gershwin "apparently didn't think much of the rhapsody, I believe it equals the first.

The rhapsody was played once by the Boston symphony, he said.

"I expect there will be criticism because the work is called a rhapsody since it does not conform to the style set by Liza rhapsodies. But it must be remembered that 'rhapsody' means 'free' form."

"That is the best description I can give of the 'second rhapsody' except that you might call it a 'tone poem' with a strong love theme running through it.

"It doesn't seize the imagination like the first but it does something to you after hearing it two to three times."

Gershwin died in Hollywood July 11 of a brain tumor. The "rhapsody in blue" and "American in Paris," were his best known works.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
GAZETTE
13 1937

Late Comers Irk Conductor

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, strode heatedly from the stage of the Syria mosque yesterday after halting a program because late arriving customers threw his musicians off stride.

The artist first had whirled toward the audience of 3,500 when he heard noises while directing the first movement of Mozart's symphony in A major.

Hardly had he resumed when two tardy persons pushed past ushers and down the aisle.

Koussevitzky slammed his baton on the music stand and left, his face flushed.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted at an attendant. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

His jangled nerves quieted, the conductor returned in three minutes and completed the concert without incident. In fact he said himself he thought the orchestra achieved "magnificent heights" in its rendition of Sibelius' symphony in D major.

INDIANAPOLIS, IN
NEWS
13 19

at Latecomers

PITTSBURGH, December 13 (A.P.) — Angered by latecomers Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Loston Symphony Orchestra, ha a concert before a capacity audience of 3,600 at Syria Mosque yesterday

He strode from the music hall and refused to return for five minutes.

As he left the famous maestro blazed out at an attendant:

"I will not go back there, never! The fools—better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Earlier in the concert, while the orchestra was well into the first movement of Bozart's Symphony in A Major, he laid down his baton, and whirled toward the audience

He shouted clipped instructions that no one was to enter after the music had begun. The same request was printed on programs.

A few moments later, two tardy spectators brushed by ushers, walked down an aisle.

The conductor slammed his baton on the music stand, and strode from the stage.

Placated by anxious friends backstage, Koussevitzky returned after a five-minute interval and resumed at the beginning.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE
DEC 13 1937

Koussevitzky in Outburst Of Temper at Pittsburgh.

Pittsburgh, Dec. 12 (AP).—Angered by

ETC.

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER
DEC 13 1937

QUITS IN HUFF

PITTSBURGH, PENN. (AP) — Angered by latecomers, Serge

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
DE 13 1937

Angered by Late-comers, Koussevitzky Walks Out

Pittsburgh, Dec. 12 (AP).—Angered

ETC.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
DEC 13 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY PIQUED

Late Arrivals at Concert Irk the Conductor.

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony

ETC.

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE, MONDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1937.

City Has Rich Orchestral Experience In Playing of Superb Boston Symphony

By Dr. Frederick Dorian

Pittsburgh had another thrill in orchestral experiences in the eagerly anticipated appearance of Sergei Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony.

Great accomplishments have been made in orchestral development in this country in the last few months, everyone is tense with curiosity to hear what Toscanini will do with the new NBC orchestra at Christmas, but in the meantime the Saturday night and Sunday afternoon performances by the Boston Symphony at Syria Mosque again proved the superiority of that organization.

From our own experience in Pittsburgh we realized that the success of even a good orchestra depends to a great extent upon the caliber of its leader. Boston is undoubtedly fortunate. The contact of the conductor with his musicians is a perfect one. Dr. Koussevitzky's command of his group, and in turn their response, is somewhat esoteric. The mutual interaction between the master and the organization, as witnessed in the two week-end concerts, is exactly what every orchestra strives for but seldom attains.

Both programs were well chosen, each bringing something new to Pittsburgh. We heard an orchestral suite which Prokofieff wrote for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije" and we heard in the afternoon concert Moussorgsky's Khovantachina Prelude.

Few initial performances of modern works are as kindly received as was Saturday's reading of "Lieutenant Kije." However, this clever composition by no means speaks the last word in the language of modern Russian music. There is a charming romance in the score (the second movement) which blends its melody with an unusual grouping of instruments such as tenor-saxophone or double bass, and so, at the end of the movement, Koussevitzky has occasion to share honors with the fine player of his favorite string instrument.

The conductor's performance of other contemporary works—Strauss and Sibelius — were done with striking virtuosity. We have for some time been acquainted with the Boston Symphony's reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" or the "Second Symphony" by Sibelius, before we had the opportunity to enjoy the overwhelming effect of an actual performance. In Brahm's "First Symphony" the conductor gives a more subjective interpretation—take as an example the finale of the work, the second appearance of the chorale theme, which was played with a great ritardando for which there is no prescription in the score.

Performances of a kind we heard this week-end do not need any extolling, they speak for themselves. But another type of criticism is needed; unfortunately a certain part of the audience, which during the Sunday performance of Mozart's A Major Symphony again and again disturbed Mr. Koussevitsky, so that once he was forced to leave the stage.

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE: Dec. 13/37

"Better They Should Stay at Home"

—Post-Gazette Photo.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Symphony Interrupted, Conductor Quits Stand

(Continued From Page One.)

collar, Koussevitzky was a slight, tired little man. The music of Sibelius always leaves him exhausted. It is his great love, and he is its greatest interpreter.

Royal Welcome to Boston.

"When your Pittsburgh orchestra comes to Boston, we shall give it the royal welcome," he told Edward Specter, Pittsburgh Symphony manager. "But to be great you must have a permanent conductor. You must get a young man, a vigorous man, a man who will give you his soul. Then you will have great music and you will come to visit me and play for us in Boston."

The conductor was asked to phrase a letter to his friend Sibelius telling him of the afternoon's experiences, and this is his message:

"My Dear Friend:

"I write to tell you what I think of audiences that do not behave. We have played nine concerts in 10 days. It is a great strain. This afternoon in Pittsburgh some people walk in when I am conducting Mozart, and it is too much. I leave the stage.

"What is it, my friend, that makes them act so? They buy good seats and then they come late. They should not do this. They must learn respect for the art, respect for the music and respect for the musicians.

"Later we played your second symphony. When I was in Helsingfors I told you you have never heard your music. Would you only come to America, I will show you what your music really is. You do not know, you can not know, because you have never heard it the way my boys played it this afternoon.

"The more I play your music, my friend, the more I adore it, the greater it becomes in my mind. You are beginning to be recognized after many years. It was so with Brahms, with Tschaikovsky, with Beethoven. It is so with you. The greatest happiness I could know would be to receive another composition from your hand.

Begs Him to Visit America.

"Many times I have asked you to come to this country. You say the ocean is too much for you. You are old now, you say. I am no longer young either, but never before have I been so strong, and only now am I beginning a little to understand music. I shall conduct many years yet, and one day you will sit in my audience and listen to my orchestra play your music. Then you will know what I mean that you have never heard it.

"Affectionately,

SERGE."

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Morning Star - Telegram
DEC 13 1937

Serge, Angered by Latecomers' Surge, Turns Red--Very

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12 (AP).—Angered by latecomers, Serge Kous- ETC.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
D... 1937

Late Listeners Enrage Serge Koussevitzky

Pittsburgh, Pa.-(AP)-Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, strode heatedly from the stage of the Syria mosque Sunday after halting a program because late-arriving customers threw ' is musicians off stride.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted at an attendant. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

His jangled nerves quieted, the conductor returned after three minutes and completed the concert.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Koussevitzky Quits Podium, Angered By Latecomers

Had Warned Pittsburgh Audience; Returns After Five Minutes

Pittsburgh. Dec. 12.—(AP.)—An- ETC.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST - STANDARD
DEC 13 1937

Koussevitsky Chastens Latecomers

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12. (AP)—Angered by latecomers, Serge Kousse- ETC

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
DEC 13 1937

Halts Concert To Score Tardy

Pittsburgh, Dec. 13 (A. P.).—Angered by latecomers, Serge ETC.

HAZELTON, PA.
Standard Sentinel
DEC 13 1937

FAMOUS MAESTRO HALTED CONCERT

Angered By Latecomers, Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Strode from Hall.

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12. (AP)— ETC

SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD
DEC 14 1937

THE RUDE ONES

Angered by late comers, conduc-

MONDAY, DEC. 13, 1937 —THE PITTSBURGH PRESS

Symphony Concert Halted By Late-Arriving 'Fools'

Two late-comers sneaked in a side door at Syria Mosque yesterday in the midst of the Boston Symphony's playing of Mozart's Symphony in A Major.

Serge Koussevitsky, ranked as one of the nation's top-notch maestros, slammed down his baton and strode angrily off the stage.

"The fools, better they should stay at home, in bed," he ejaculated. "I will not go back there, never!"

He finally was calmed, however, and induced to return to the podium. An outburst of applause greeted his return. He turned, shrugged his shoulders and re-started the symphony, completed the concert.

With few exceptions today, orchestra lovers agreed that the incident "should be a lesson to Pittsburgh." The exceptions, among them some traditional late-comers, called the incident: "temperament."

The consensus was expressed by one symphony enthusiast, who said: "We certainly have been put in our place. I'd like to wring the necks of that couple."

Only nobody knew who they were. They really halted the program twice. In direct violation of the strict policy at all symphony concerts in Pittsburgh, the couple searched out an unguarded door at the left of the stage and sneaked in.

Mr. Koussevitsky, turned to direct the violins, was thrown off stride by the sudden flash of light from the opened doorway. He halted his baton in mid-beat. The couple stopped dead in their tracks. Mr. Koussevitsky resumed. The couple darted for seats. The conductor walked out.

Miss May Beegle, who brought the famed orchestra here, explained that doors are always closed during the playing of a symphony selection. She said agreement is reached in advance with visiting orchestras on when to seat late arrivals.

Despite this, however, Pittsburgh's reputation in courtesy to artists never has rated high. Symphony concerts are the only ones where the no-late-seating rule is strictly enforced. And at least once before, a conductor felt obliged to shame his hearers.

That conductor was Pittsburgh's own Emil Paur. He once halted a concert in the midst of a number, squatted down on the podium and just sat—until the audience quieted. Then they cheered him, too, as they did Mr. Koussevitsky yesterday.

Leopold Stokowski also once stopped a concert while playing here, at the Nixon. A crew of workmen were noisily conversing beneath the stage. Mr. Stokowski also has scolded his Philadelphia audiences for the same lack of courtesy which caused yesterday's incident here.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
DEC 13 1937

LATE COMERS ANGER ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12 — (AP) — Angered by latecomers, Serge Kous- ETC.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
DEC 13 1937

Angry Conductor Walks Out During Symphony Concert

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12.—(AP)— Angered by late-comers, Serge ETC.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR - TIMES
DEC 13 1937

Concert Conductor Walks Out, Angered At Tardy Arrivals

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13.—(U. P.) —Several concert stragglers today ETC.

GREENVILLE, PA.
RECORD ARGUS
DEC 13 1937

Noted Conductor Halts Concert to Quiet Audience

Pittsburgh, Dec. 13—(AP)—Serge ETC.

WARREN, PA.
TIMES-MIRROR
DEC 13 1937

PITTSBURGH'S MORONS ANGER KOUSSEVITZKY

Pittsburgh, Dec. 13—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, noted con- ETC.

JEANETTE, PA.
NEWS DISPATCH
DEC 13 1937

QUIET, PLEASE:

Critics praising Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra speak of the conductor as ascetic, taut, imperious and controlling and the mutual interaction between the master and organization as esoteric.

Yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque just as Mozart's Symphony in A Major, No. 29, got under way, there was a slight commotion in one corner of the huge audience. The great Serge stopped the music. A few minutes later more programs crackled or perhaps someone tried to slip into a rear seat unobserved. Anyway the conductor angrily left the podium and the stage. When he returned the thousands there scarcely breathed for fear of offending.

The Mozart piece required felicitous touches to bring out its richest charm and the conductor's actions apparently weren't mere display of what is sometimes ridiculed as "artistic temperament." At any rate a Russian prelude called Khovanstchina, the more or less well known Till Eulenspiegel which Strauss made possible and the presentation of a symphony by the Finnish Sibelius which followed on the program ought to have convinced anyone that symphony orchestra concerts are places where one goes to hear and not to be heard.

That Finnish composer's work as presented by the Boston musicians was an example of what Pittsburgh's symphony orchestra some day may become.

The program started with an angry conductor, veins standing out in his forehead, perspiration on his cheeks and then a lilting bit of Mozart. It ended with a mental picture of Finland and its winds and rocks and cold waters. May Beegle did a distinct service by bringing the treat to this section.

(861)

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 13 1937

Koussevitzky Halts Pittsburgh Program Because of Late Comers

Late comers surging toward their seats yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque, Pittsburgh, Pa., while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A Major, so disturbed Serge Koussevitzky, famous conductor, that he halted the concert for five minutes. The Mosque was filed to its capacity of 3600.

Earlier, the maestro had halted the orchestra and whirled toward the audience with clipped instructions that no one was to enter after the music had begun. A similar request was printed on the programs.

Koussevitzky Aroused

A few moments later, two tardy spectators brushed past ushers and walked down the aisle. Dr. Koussevitzky slammed his baton on the music stand and strode from the stage. To an attendant, he said: "They should have some respect for the arts."

After a five-minute interval, the conductor returned and resumed the program at the beginning. The evening before, the orchestra had played to equally as large an audience in Pittsburgh.

The Pittsburgh concerts were the last of seven scheduled for the annual Middle West tour which also touched at Buffalo, Rochester, Ann Arbor, Toledo and Cincinnati.

Large Audiences

Everywhere, the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were received with enthusiasm. The seven concerts drew a total attendance of 25,000. At every concert were music lovers who made the pilgrimage last summer to Massachusetts to attend the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. In Toledo, Mrs Cornelia Colton Hollister [illegible] supper for Dr. Koussevitzky. She is a summer resident of Lenox and member of the Festival's advisory committee. Among those greeting Dr. Koussevitzky in Buffalo was Cameron Baird, graduate of Williams College and a moving spirit in the musical life of that city.

The orchestra returned to Boston today. George E. Judd, manager, and Charles W. Spaulding, assistant manager of the orchestra, and George W. Edman, clerk of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, were on the tour.

NEW CASTLE, PA.
NEWS

DEC 13 1937

Koussevitzky Leaves Stage

Unusual Incident Marks Sunday Afternoon Concert In Pittsburgh

RETURNS TO STAGE AFTER INTERVAL

(International News Service)

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13—"The fools, better they should stay at home."

Musical circles here today reverberated with the remark, delivered by the noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, who peremptorily left the stage in the middle of a symphony concert here when interrupted by late-comers.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted, after he had stalked off the stage, leaving the orchestra and a throng of 3500 music lovers petrified. "The fools, better they should stay at home, in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Returns And Starts Over

Three minutes later, however, the conductor returned to the stage and started in the beginning again. The utmost quiet prevailed among the audience.

It was the famous orchestra's ninth concert in 10 days. The interruption came during the playing of the first number on the program. A few minutes earlier Koussevitzky had stopped the orchestra and then started over again when late arrivals interrupted him. When, a few minutes after that, two more late comers pushed their way past ushers and stroke down the main aisle, Koussevitzky strode from the stage leaving the auditorium in an uproar. The concert proceeded after that without incident.

Following its conclusion Koussevitzky laid at rest rumors that he was ill or intended to retire. Thoughts of retirement have not entered his mind, he said. He is not in poor health, he said, nor have doctors ordered him to take a rest.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

DEC 13 1937

Maestro Halts Music in Fury at Latecomers

PITTSBURGH, December 13 (AP.) — Angered by latecomers,

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

DEC 13 1937

Symphony Head Cools Off After Public Flare-Up

Koussevitzky Strides Off Stage in Pittsburgh.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who conducted his Boston Sympho-

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

13 1937

BATON DROPPED.

Koussevitsky In Rage

Over Latecomers, Walks Out On Pittsburgh Audience Of 3,600, But Later Resumes Program.

Pittsburgh, December 12—(AP)—Angered by latecomers, Serge Kous-

---

POTTESVILLE, PA.
Schuilkill Reporter

DEC 13 1937

ANGRY MAESTRO WALKSOFFSTAGE

Late Comers Irk Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra; 'Fools,' He Says

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13. (AP)—An-

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA

DEC 13 1937

LATE ARRIVALS PEEVE LEADER

Serge Koussevitzky Leaves Stage in Pittsburgh, But Returns.

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13.—(I. N. S.)—"The fools, better they should stay at home."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 13 1937

MAESTRO WALKS OUT!

Irked by Tardy Patrons, He Quits

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12 (C.T.P.S.).—Serge Kousevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, strode from Syria Mosque stage in the midst of a concert today. The orchestra was playing the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A major when the conductor whirled on the audience as two tardy persons brushed by ushers. The conductor slammed the baton on the music stand and strode from the rostrum.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted at attendants. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

His jangled nerves quieted, Kousevitsky returned three minutes later and resumed the concert.

AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN

DEC 13 1937

Symphony Conductor, Angered by Late-comers, Quits Concert Stage

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13.—(INS)—"The fools, better they should stay at home."

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

Angry Maestro Halts Concert And Berates Latecomers As "Fools"

Pittsburgh, Dec. 12 (AP)—Angered by

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

DEC 13 1937

CONDUCTOR STOPS SYMPHONY IN HUFF AT LATECOMERS

Serge Koussevitzky Walks From Stage at Pittsburgh, Finally Is Persuaded to Return.

By the Associated Press.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., Dec. 13.—Angered by latecomers, Serge Kous-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

DEC 13 1937

Koussevitzky Walks Out on Pittsburgh

By the Associated Press.

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 13. — Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the

---

WICHITA, KAN.
EAGLE

DEC 13 1937

ORCHESTRA CHIEF ROARS OFF STAGE

Koussevitzky, Ired Over Latecomers, Is Talked into Resuming Baton

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12.—(AP)—Angered by latecomers, Serge

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

DEC 13 1937

Koussevitzky Walks Out on Late Comers

Drops Baton in Pittsburgh, Cutting Mozart Short

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 12.—Angered by late-comers, Serge Koussevitzky,

---

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 13 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY WALKS OUT WHEN TARDY PATRONS WALK IN

PITTSBURGH (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

Stragglers Chase Koussevitsky Off Concert Podium

Pittsburgh, Dec. 13 (UP)—Several concert stragglers today considered virtues of the anonymity of promptness after their tardiness brought an attack of temperament upon Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that interrupted the concert.

Koussevitsky glared at one red-faced group, but did not stop the music. At a second swish of silks, however, the conductor threw aside his baton and stomped off the stage.

"I will not go back there, never!" Koussevitsky shouted to an attendant. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

But he did go back, and started Mozart's Symphony in A Minor all over again—while the audience inspected the stragglers, and the stragglers inspected their shoes.

Local Scrappings

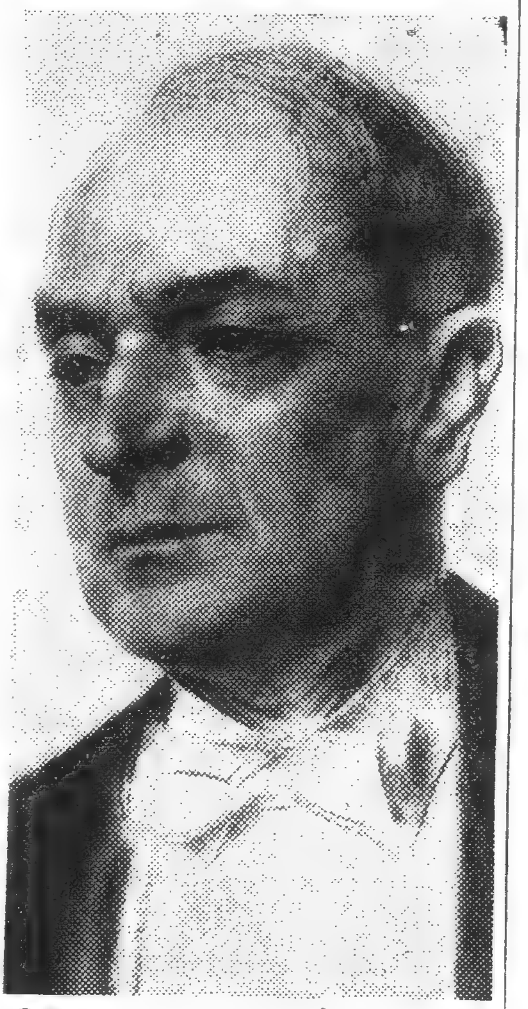
A couple of the usherettes at the Syria Mosque were taken over the coals following the Kousevitsky fireworks Sunday afternoon. . . . Marshall Goldberg's

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 15 1937

Here Tomorrow



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who will lead the Boston Symphony at Bushnell tomorrow evening, as sketched by Alexandre Jacovleff.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 14 1937

Scheme for Late Arrivals

Serge Koussevitzky, the ordinarily gracious and patient conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flew far off the handle Sunday afternoon in Pittsburgh. The situation, in brief, was that he had demanded, early in the concert, that no one was to be allowed to enter while the orchestra was playing. Yet a couple of tardy arrivals pushed past the ushers shortly afterwards and proceeded down the aisle, no doubt with much muttering and dropping of accoutrements. The conductor slammed down his baton, walked out, and stayed out for five minutes. The "fools" have no respect for art, he said, and should have remained at home.

Inasmuch as the Pittsburgh football team isn't engaged in Rose Bowl preparations, it would have been wise to recruit ushers from that stalwart squad for the concert. For Dr. Koussevitzky should, in justice, have jumped on the ushers for relaxing their vigilance, as well as upon the interlopers.

The tough old question of late comers to concerts and theaters is unanswered, despite Dr. Koussevitzky's outburst. Some people always have to be late at such things, and having paid the ante, they dislike missing any part of the program. What all theaters and concert halls need, obviously, is a Tardy Room, or Detention Pen, with heavy plate glass permitting late arrivals to see what's going on and amplifiers to let them hear, but so arranged that they will never disturb the on-time audience or the performers. There should be no chairs to make lateness a luxury.

The plan sounds promising, the only possible hitch being that in many places the Detention Pen would, of necessity, have to be as large as the main auditorium itself.

DECATUR, ILL.
HERALD

DEC 14 1937

They Pay!

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is the spoiled darling of Beantown's cultured set. Koussevitzky is temperamental because he is an artist, some say a genius. That temperament is indulged for the same reason.

Angered by late arrivals at a concert the other evening Conductor Koussevitzky stepped down from the podium and strode from the music hall. Backstage he bitterly denounced the late arrivals and called them ugly names. Friends of the ruffled genius rushed backstage and succeeded in soothing his outraged feelings. Koussevitzky returned to the podium, lifted his baton and the concert continued without further incident.

It is unfortunate but true that in this country the best in music does not pay its own way. It exists through the bounty of wealthy members of fashionable society. Those who pay the freight often are those who like to come in late so that they will be seen. Their tardiness may annoy Conductor Koussevitzky, but their contributions pay his salary. All of which may have been repeated to the ruffled artist by his anxious friends backstage.

Post — Dec 14/37

Gossip of the Town

TRUTH ABOUT TEMPERAMENT: Boston's Serge Koussevitzky, symphony orchestra maestro, stomped off a Pittsburgh podium in irritation because some of the citizenry galloped into the hall late and noisily. Was this a publicity stunt or an act? Says one of Boston's prominent musicians:

"Dull people cannot understand the other fellow's sensitiveness. Yet they themselves about to make a drive on the golf links will fly into rage because someone interrupted with even a whispered remark. No so? Consider how a contract bridge player reacts to intrusion."

And one of the town's minor conductors observed: "I don't blame him. How would you feel if you were keyed to the sharpest imaginable artistic pitch with 118 musicians, all of them scholars and the world's best, alert to your every gesture. Your concentration is tense, nervous, febrile and in a moment you are to be lost in the melodic and intellectual complications of Sibelius. Then some cluck who happened to be late in getting into the bath tub, strides in like the four horsemen in a civil war raid. It's devastating."

So it appears that symphony conductors who get angry with the customers have a pretty good case. And P. S.: Beethoven once got up at the piano when people talked at a house party while he played: "I will not play for swine," he said. And he didn't. Mozart, who had an acutely sensitive ear, actually fainted one time because someone hit a brazenly wrong note.

82

Koussevitzky Sad He Missed 'Yellow Cloth,' Lauds Painter

Dec. 13/37

Copyright by Sun-Telegraph. All Rights Reserved.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY—Famed conductor of the Boston Symphony which is playing here. He says music, with all art, has no relation to contemporary practical life, was disappointed in having missed the "Yellow Cloth" and the whole International.

Music Greatest Art, Noted Conductor Says Here

Art, divorced completely from contemporary practical life, is the idea of Sergei Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing today in its second Pittsburgh concert. He said:

"Art has nothing whatsoever to do with social troubles. Real art is abstract with no relation to material things. It is the expression of an emotion—a completely abstract thing."

Sibelius, he said, created in a most peaceful period, yet the composer is one of the greatest of modern times. Sibelius, Ravel, and the Russians, Stravinsky and Prokofieff, are the Tschaikowskys, the Wagners and the Brahms of today.

TIME DOESN'T MATTER

He pointed out:

"Music is not a matter of the length of time it takes to play, but rather of its thoroughness of expression. I consider the value of the nine-minute 'Afternoon of a Faun,' by Debussy, as great as the five-hour Wagner 'Sigfried' music."

The lithe little man, as energetic in conversation as upon the orchestra platform, was "very, very, sorry" to arrive in Pittsburgh almost a week after the closing of the Carnegie International. He said:

"I had so looked forward to seeing it. It is possible, you know, that a painter is influenced by music. Music is abstract, and abstract painting comes closest to expressing an emotion. Braque, who did 'Yellow Cloth,' is very great in his still life."

'MUSIC GREATEST ART'

Music, Koussevitzky insists, in tracing the evolution of art, is the greatest art. He said:

"There is no question of it. It is the last art to develop, and is the most abstract. All art developed toward the beginning of music. Sculpture developed at the peak of architecture, painting at the highest point of sculpture, and music, finally, at the highest peak of painting."

Koussevitzky recalled his student days in Russia when, he said, conditions for young composers were very bad. Rachmaninoff's famous prelude in C-Sharp Minor was sold for $15.

HE AIDED MUSICIANS

The Boston conductor, himself, was at that time composing, and he resolved that when he once possessed money, he would make things easier for musicians.

Later Koussevitzky founded the Edition Russe, and in it Stravinsky and Prokofieff first appeared. Prokofieff was but fifteen. Last year, at 45, he played his third Piano Concerto for the second time with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

And last evening, in the Syria Mosque concert, Koussevitzky directed the Boston orchestra in Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" orchestral suite.

Boston Symphony Plays New Soviet Music Here

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Last night we found the Boston Symphony players and Director Koussevitzky again before the grandest and most truly enthusiastic audience of which Pittsburgh can boast. Once more these players set standards that we should well keep before us in perfecting our local orchestra.

Interest in last night's program centered in a new work of Prokofieff, which, I dare say, has removed for Pittsburgh the odium of "modern music." It is, indeed, music of the moment, made for a Soviet film story, "Lieutenant Kije," a fictitious character like Anatole France's "Putois," born of a dilemma in a man's brain.

The music carries us through the imaginary birth, the romance, wedding revelry, a sleigh ride, and the hero's death in the most amazing and melodic tunes and counterpoints. If made for the film, the music can stand alone as absolute music too. It is witty and intellectual at the same time, and Koussevitzky left nothing untouched to display its best features, including a solo in the double bass, stunningly played, a feat we have not known since the days of Emil Paur.

Carl Philip Emanuel's Concerto in D Minor for strings shows that choir of the Boston orchestra at best, not discounting the marvellous solo of the second movement.

The last half of the program was devoted to Brahams First Symphony, a work of rare richness and depth in Koussevitzky's reading. To analyze its many beauties would be presumption at this late day; we may merely say that the performance last night almost erases from our memory the many former local triumphs of this orchestra.

Concert Interrupted, Koussevitzky Quits

Late-Comers Spoil Boston Symphony's Start; Conductor Resumes After Cooling Off.

One pulsing vein bulging from his right temple, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, strode from Syria Mosque stage yesterday afternoon when late comers in the audience threw the orchestra off stride.

Playing its ninth concert in 10 days, the orchestra was well into the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A Major when the conductor laid down his baton and whirled toward the audience. He had left strict instructions that no one was to enter after the music began. The order was clearly printed on the program.

Koussevitzky turned back to the orchestra, picked up his baton and resumed the concert. Two tardy persons brushed by ushers and walked down a main aisle. The conductor slammed the baton on the music stand and strode from the rostrum.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted at an attendant. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

His jangled nerves quieted, Koussevitzky returned three minutes later, picked up his stick and, without a moment's hesitation, started in from the beginning again. The orchestra was electrified, the audience still.

The concert proceeded without incident, and, in the last number, Sibelius' Symphony in D Major, the orchestra achieved what Koussevitzky himself admitted afterward were magnificent heights. The Finnish composer's work, as played yesterday, told of the winds and the rocks and the cold waters of his native land.

Koussevitzky is not in poor health. Physicians have not warned him to take a rest. He will not retire. He will continue to conduct. Thoughts of retirement are not in his mind. These were his sharp answers to published rumors that he is in ill health and will retire at the end of the current season.

Bundled in a great coat in his dressing room, his hands shaking violently and perspiration plastering his thin, grey hair to his forehead and trickling down under his

(Continued on Page Five. Col. 3.)

6

Respect For Artistry Demands Audience Get To Its Seats On Time

Pittsburgh Press

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Impresses Rights of Musicians To Silence As They Perform

Dec. 14/37

By MAXINE GARRISON

Serge Koussevitzky has the right idea. When two people pushed their way past the ushers and trailed down a main aisle in Syria Mosque Sunday afternoon, seeking their seats after the Boston Symphony Orchestra had begun its first number, the great conductor walked off the stage.

The program clearly stated that no one was to be admitted to the auditorium while a number was being played. It is highly doubtful if those two people disregarded the notice because they simply couldn't bear to miss another note of Mozart. They were surely not concerned with allowing other people to enjoy the music.

Koussevitzky is reported to have shouted as he left the stage, "I will not go back there, never! The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art." He did go back, however, though reluctantly.

Koussevitzky is not ordinarily one of your hair-tearing, hand-waving "tempermental" conductors. He conducts the orchestra more quietly, with less of the erratic motions usually accepted as ecstatic emotions, then any leader I have ever watched. He puts great workmanship and deep feeling into the music without asking his audience to watch how excited he gets, how he is carried away by his own feelings plus the music, as is the wont of more leaders than have the musicianship to back up their acrobatics.

* * *

No small aggravation would be likely to upset the control Koussevitzky shows. In his action he expressed a long pent-up anger, among the spectators as well as the artist, against audience manners, or rather lack of manners, of today.

At the theater, people wade in after the play has begun with much flashing of ushers' lights, much loudly whispered "Pardon me's," much rustling of clothes and settling down into seats. Frequently such late-comers also continue the conversation they had not quite finished before entering the theater.

Between acts those same offenders will follow the urge to have a quick drink, and almost invariably be late in returning to their seats. Again the rustle and bustle, the search for fallen programs, and, for the people in their immediate vicinity, the loss of several minutes' action on the stage.

At both concerts and plays, a good percentage of the spectators seem to fear missing the last bus home or the first drink after the show. Knowing that the climax of the drama or symphony has been reached, they drown out the final scenes and bars by sliding noisily into their coats and maneuvering themselves into position for making one mad dash for the exit the minute the curtain or baton falls.

* * *

Why these people come in the first place, no one knows, although it has been suggested that they want to be seen in the best places. If so, someone should tactfully suggest that there are other "best places" where they can not only be seen, but can be openly talked about without having some of their glory dimmed by the attractions of the stage.

The artists have their troubles with professional courtesy, too, but they make it a point to settle theirs. Last winter in New York Helen Hayes played "Victoria Regina" in the theater next to the one which housed the Lunts in "Idiot's Delight." No more than one performance was needed to show that Victoria's whispered last scene would have a very loud accompaniment of machine gun rattle from the final bombardment scene in the play next door. For the first few nights it seemed that Victoria might die of apoplexy right on the stage, and her audience was much perturbed by the anachronistic rat-a-tat which accompanied her final whispers. It looked for a while as if the two companies might fight it out on that line if it took all winter, but eventually Miss Hayes moved her curtain up 15 minutes, allowing Victoria and the audience peace and quiet for that final scene.

There may have been hard feelings, but the matter was settled. If there were only some time engineer who could as easily settle the problem of late-comers who think they bought the theater along with their seats!

Let Them Wait

Record Dec 14/37

Some late comers who strode down an aisle while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing at Pittsburgh were properly rebuked. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, halted the music and left the stage for a brief time in protest against the interruption.

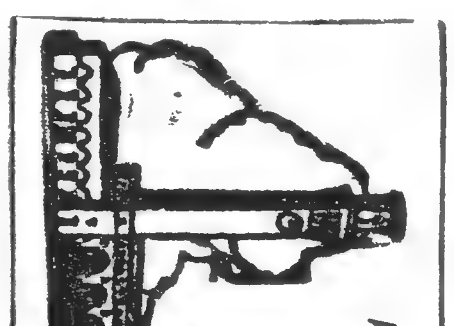
Dr. Koussevitzky confined himself to this protest, however. He did not scold the interrupters, as first reported. By halting the music for a moment he registered his due objection to the needless annoyance.

Music Is First

In Boston no late comer is allowed to enter Symphony Hall auditorium while the orchestra is playing or when any concert artist is singing or playing. The rule is stricly enforced, as it should be. If any patrons are late, let them wait until the number being rendered is finished.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

DEC 15 1937



Tall Tower Topics

BY THE MAN IN THE TOWER

When Koussevitzky, famous conductor, walked out on his audience the other night during one of his Philadelphia concerts because of annoyance from late-comers, many called it temperament. Others called it anger. Temperament or anger, we think he did the right thing. American people have notoriously bad manners at times, and at no time are their bad taste and bad manners more noticeable than at such affairs or when attending the theater. In metropolitan cities, particularly New York, audiences come swishing in all during the first act or first number at concerts and theatrical performances alike. Naturally this is most annoying to those who plan to get places at the allotted time. A person that comes in late to a symphony concert is just as rude as the invited guest who arrives at a dinner party a half hour late much to the annoyance and distress of the hostess whose puree Mongole is just done to the proper smoothness, one half hour just about spoiling it as is the first movement of a Tschaikowsky or Schubert Symphony by the late comers who are Emily Posts unto themselves.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

DEC 15 1937

SIBELIUS, THE "UNCROWNED KING OF FINLAND," LOOKS AHEAD AT 72

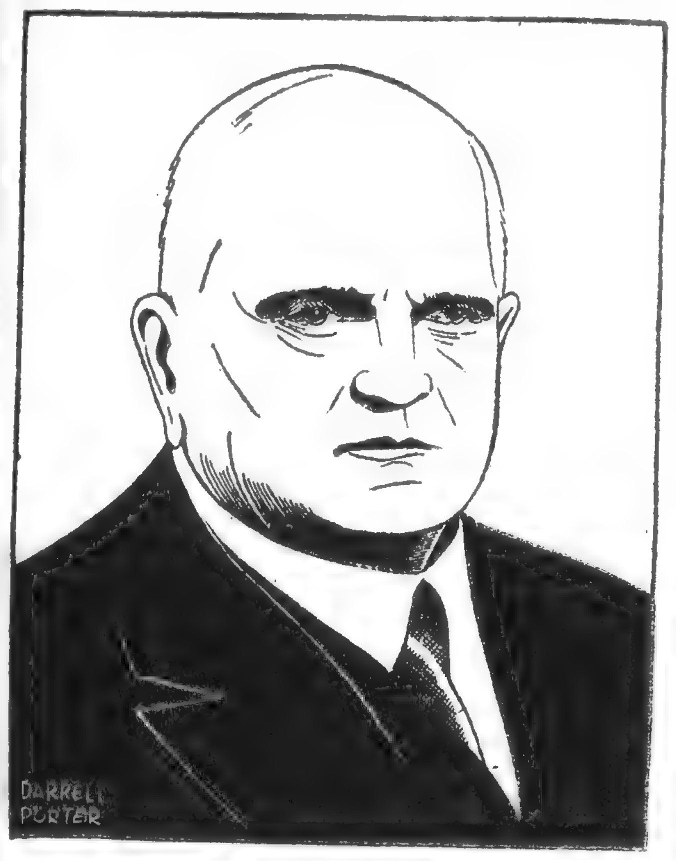
Eighth Symphony Is Being Completed by the Great Composer, Who Recently Observed Birthday Anniversary—Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra Will Play One of His Earlier Works in Two Concerts This Week.

LITTLE Finland has grown large in American esteem in recent years by two kinds of notes—banknotes, which it has paid punctually and proudly on its war debt to the United States, and the golden notes of music that have come from the hand of the composer, Jean Christian Sibelius, "Uncrowned King of Finland."

Sibelius observed his seventy-second birthday anniversary December 8, an anniversary noticed throughout the world. This week Kansas City again pays attention to the famous Finn. Audiences at the Thursday and Friday night concerts in Music hall will hear Sibelius's Second symphony in D major played by the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra, with Karl Krueger, conducting.

Clad H. Thompson, in his "Notes on the Program" for this week, comments on Sibelius and his music:

"When the music of this great Finnish master first began to win its way into the esteem of the world audience, certain elements of it sounding strangely upon the ears of classically trained listeners accustomed to the harmonic logic of the Teutonic schools and the smooth melodic lines of the Romance composers, led to the utterance of a good deal of nonsense concerning the composer and the nation he represented. The rugged directness of his style, and his proud independence of nearly all other schools of composition, stimulated the facile imaginations of critics, teachers and even conductors to describe Sibelius as 'the horny-handed son of a frozen barren soil, where an uncouth and primitive race ekes out a living on whale blubber and pemmican, and in bartering furs, fish and hides to a more developed society for the bare necessities of life.' Thus Cecil Gray, British biographer of Sibelius, quotes the popular notion which up to very recent times prevailed concerning the country, which he then proceeds to show is perhaps the most highly cultured in Europe today.



JEAN CHRISTIAN SIBELIUS, FINLAND'S MASTER OF MUSIC.

THE WORK OF FINLAND.

"Finland has no illiteracy. Its proportionate achievements in art, science, sociology and politics, in relation to the population, is unsurpassed by any other nation, and America has tangible evidence twice a year that it is alone among other nations in the matter of national financial management and regard for its obligations. Perhaps the most convincing evidence of the Finnish devotion to culture and art, however, is that government's almost unique treatment of certain artists, of whom Sibelius is the outstanding example. In the late '90s, after Sibelius had completed his musical training and his compositions began to attract more than local attention, the government conferred an annual allowance upon him which has left him free from all financial care, and has permitted him to devote his whole energy to creative work. No other symphonic composer has enjoyed such a privilege. Other musicians have held government positions, true enough, but their duties were either to teach, as was Tchaikovsky's duty, or to perform in public, as was Mozart's. But no other government ever relieved a musician of the common cares of life in order that he might compose to the glory of his nation and to the advancement of his art.

"The Finnish government has every reason to rejoice over its bargain, for never has official consideration been more handsomely repaid. Sibelius has not only discharged his debt in achievement, but also in devotion. Finnish tradition, Finnish literature, and Finnish nature have been his sole sources of inspiration. His symphonies, like those of Beethoven, are those of a lover of nature worshiping the nature he knows best; his program music, such as 'En Saga,' 'The Swan of Tuonela,' and 'Finlandia,' are directly sprung from his love of national epics like 'Kalevala.' And yet he has succeeded in responding to those inspirations without displaying any such self-conscious nationalism as one finds, for example, in the music of the Norwegian Grieg, or the Russian Rimsky-Korsakov. Though he speaks with a national characteristic, his language is universal. It is not what J. G. Huneker used to call 'map music.'

"The Second symphony in D major is a product of the composer's early maturity, written in 1901-02, and produced in Helsingfors the year of its completion. It is in the conventional four movements. . . ."

ANOTHER SYMPHONY SOON.

Sibelius was reported to have spent his birthday working at his villa, "Ainola," in the forests about thirty miles north of the capital of Finland. His Eighth symphony, in progress the last twelve years, is nearing completion. The list of his works totals some 150 compositions.

At one time America almost took Sibelius away from his native Finland. That was in 1921. The School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., sought Sibelius as a professor. He was on the point of accepting. At the last moment he declined. Shortly afterward Finland, alive at last to the man's genius, settled upon him a life pension of 100,000 Finnish marks a year.

Seldom has the world been as quick to recognize great genius during a composer's lifetime as has been the case with Sibelius. He has become a classic and at least one authority calls him Beethoven's peer.

Because of the happy circumstance of being able to compose without the necessity of worrying where his next meal is to come from, Sibelius has been a constant contributor to the world's modern musical literature. Two years ago, in a nation-wide poll designed to determine America's choice of all living composers, Sibelius outdistanced the field, with Maurice Ravel of France second.

A quarter of a century ago—and even then his genius was being accepted here—he visited America, and at Norfolk, Conn., he conducted nine of his own compositions, including his now famous tone poem, "Finlandia." It was on that visit that he was given an honorary degree at Yale university.

INTERPRETERS IN AMERICA.

Sibelius has been fortunate in America in that outstanding conductors, including Stokowski and Koussevitzky, have performed his symphonies and lesser works on many occasions. An American, Werner Janssen, was complimented by Sibelius as having conducted the Sibelius symphonies more to the liking of the composer than any other maestro.

The Sibelius prodigiousness is illustrated by his authorship of eight symphonies—only one less than Beethoven, and four more than Brahms.

"The Bohemian garret-and-starvation conception of a great artist does not apply to Sibelius," said Time Magazine in a discussion of the composer in its issue for last week. "Since 1897 he has enjoyed a modest pension from the Finnish state, which has provided him with leisure to compose. At his house at Jarvenpaa he lives the secluded life of a highly respectable country gentleman. His five daughters have long since gone forth to marry and raise families of their own. He and his wife live alone, looked after by two maids. He relishes good food and drink, smokes continually the best and largest Havana cigars, is partial between meals to well-aged whisky served in beautiful cutglass tumblers. Visitors to 'Ainola' are impressed by his measured hospitality and particularly by the genuine good nature which belies his fearsome face.

"About his own music Sibelius is cagey. Some have called him Sphinx-like, and he has found the description a great convenience. Nowadays, when English-speaking visitors get too inquisitive about how he composes or when his next symphony will be finished, he replies with regretful, laconic shrug: 'I, Sphinx.' There are grounds to suspect that he has quantities of early unpublished compositions stored about the house, that he has already outlined the movements of a Ninth symphony in addition to those of his forthcoming Eighth. A visitor's inquisitiveness invariably brings the same Finnish shrug, the favorite, inevitable reply.

SENSITIVE TO PRAISE.

"Not entirely confident of his position as a great musician, he is very appreciative of appreciation, collects, reads and rereads every small item that is written about him in the most provincial newspapers," Time continues. "On the subject of his interpreters he is diplomatic, has indiscriminately praised Conductors Koussevitzky, Beecham, Werner Janssen and his countryman Robert Kajanus. He has a comforting motto: 'Better have it played badly or wrong than not at all.'

"Sibelius has conceived much of his music wandering through the forests surrounding his house. When engrossed in his work he keeps irregular hours, prefers to compose late at night. He proudly remembers that in his younger days he often worked three nights and two days at a stretch. Seldom does he use the piano when composing. He conceives and elaborates his ideas in his mind and puts pen to paper only when every detail of the score has been thought out. Once his notes are down on paper, he seldom makes alterations, and has often sent scores to publishers without bothering to try them out on any instrument.

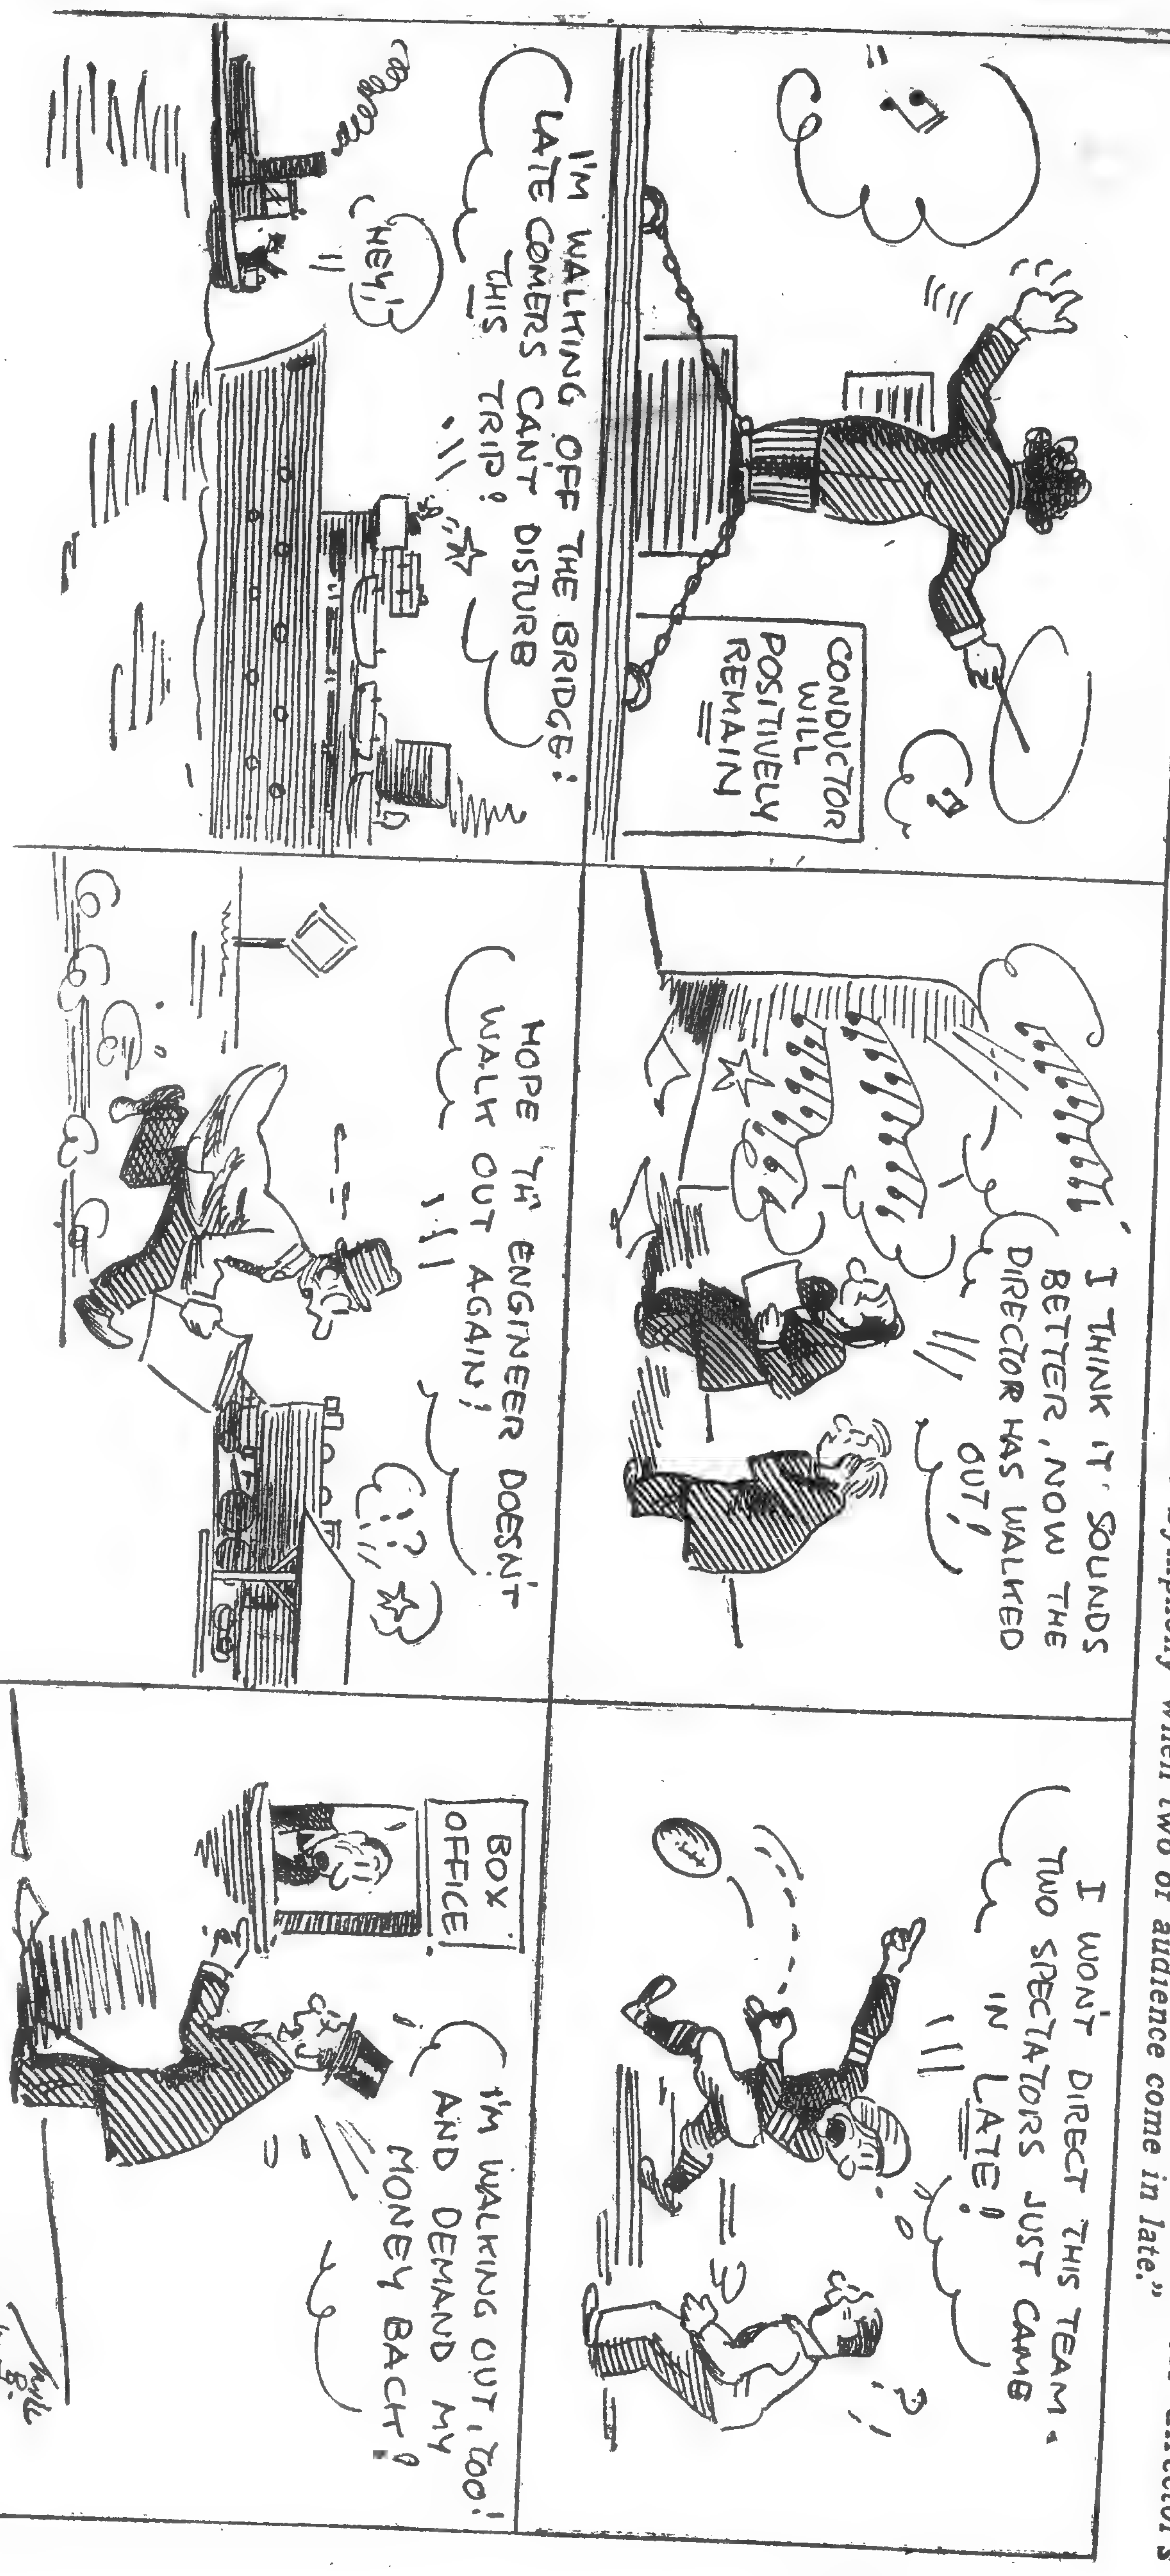
"His admiring wife says: 'Sibelius continues to live at a tremendous pace, with great intensity and energy. He is still like a young man full of dreams and hopes.' He stands erect as a general, his ivory-colored dome rising from strong, heavily-built shoulders; he still clothes himself with meticulous care, favors a double-breasted blue or gray lounge suit, a broad-brimmed felt hat; he wears specially built, handmade German shoes; on his numerous walks he stalks through the country swinging a heavy stick. And 72 or not, like all true Finns he takes his sauna (Finnish steam bath) once a week in the bathhouse that stands on the grounds near his house."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

DEC 15 1937

LET'S ALL WALK OUT

NEWS ITEM:—"Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, walks off director's stand in anger, in middle of Mozart Symphony when two of audience come in late."



CONDUCTOR WILL POSITIVELY REMAIN
I THINK IT SOUNDS BETTER, NOW THE DIRECTOR HAS WALKED OUT!
I WON'T DIRECT THIS TEAM. TWO SPECTATORS JUST CAME IN LATE!
I'M WALKING OFF THE BRIDGE! LATE COMERS CAN'T DISTURB THIS TRIP!
HEY!
HOPE TH' ENGINEER DOESN'T WALK OUT AGAIN!
BOX OFFICE
I'M WALKING OUT, TOO! AND DEMAND MY MONEY BACK!

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 16 1937

Audience Etiquette

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because late-comers were bustling in to their seats while the music was being played.

This, probably, was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament; but it was also a richly-deserved rebuke for the tardy, and if more performers would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goer would be much pleasanter.

The indignation at poor audience etiquette does not apply solely to concert hall patrons. Recently, Helen Hayes, premier American actress, with high sarcasm, suggested that some patron of the arts endow a chair in a university to teach people how to behave in the theater.

The starting-time of any concert or play is always announced in advance. If a patron can't get there in time, it's up to him to stand and wait until there is an intermission before hunting for his seat. By barging in while the music is being played he makes an unmitigated nuisance of himself. Mr. Koussevitzky did a good job in dramatizing the annoyance that the tardy arrival causes.

New York Post
SECOND SECTION SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1937 a ★★★★

As the Crow Flies

A Flashback to a Season of Youth in Old Milwaukee

By ERNEST L. MEYER

When my father came to Milwaukee from Hanover in 1887 there were four German daily newspapers and only two English. Grocery and drug stores, especially on the North and West sides of the city, had signs stuck in the windows reading: "English spoken here."

Things had changed a bit when I was a boy in Milwaukee in 1910. The new generation was forgetting the tongue of the Fatherland, and the Poles were ever moving in closer from the South Side. But the Germanic flavor still permeated the city with its tang of turnvereins, saengerbunds, bock beer, and an indefinable easy-going gemuetlichkeit that flowed through the city like an unhurried stream, going no place in particular.

We live—I am talking about the year 1910—in a double flat nicknamed Germania. This is because the five men who dwell in it as householders and boarders all work in the editorial room of the Germania, the evening daily German language newspaper. In that exquisite editorial room, unknown in this day, editors and reporters chipped together to hire a lad whose sole duty was to haul tin buckets of beer from the corner saloon. In the summer, I am sorry to report, he was grievously overworked.

A Fantastic Household

My father is editorial writer and assistant Sunday editor of the Germania. With us room Kurt Pabst, reporter, and Dr. Guido Schmidt, telegraph editor.

Kurt Pabst is short, skinny, with flaxen whiskers. He spends almost every night of his life playing solitaire in his room for vast imaginary sums. He takes the game seriously. Sometimes he bursts into the living room all excited and enraged. "Herrbott! I owe the bank $2,300. Has anybody ever seen such evil luck?" My mother sighs, for she knows that on rent day Kurt didn't have a dollar, but being a gentle person says nothing.

Guido Schmidt, who holds a Berlin Ph. D., has an enormous red Kaiser Wilhelm mustache which he ties up every night in a "Bart-binde" like precious spun gold. He wears a choke collar and clicks his heels when he greets you. He is a Prussian, and the other Germans in the house make fun of him, for they are from Hanover and Bavaria and don't take life so seriously.

They sometimes hope that Dr. Schmidt will lose his poise and become human by tripping on the tails of his cutaway, but he never does. Life has a way of thwarting our most simple desires.

Upstairs lives the life of the house. He is Dolfee Doellinger, police reporter. He has a bullet head of close-cropped hair, a tooth-brush mustache and he is a man of extraordinary inventions.

Now and then we are alarmed by a fusillade of shots upstairs. It is only Dolfee, shooting at mice in the hallway. Then he comes downstairs, dressed only in a nightshirt and top hat, sits down gravely at our piano, and plays a Largo with stubby, fat but masterful fingers. He is the best-known and best-beloved vagabond in town.

A Session of Skat

This is Tuesday night and the men are at skat in the kitchen. I am cramming for a high school exam in an adjoining room. The sound of their voices reaches me in a quiet monotone: "Nullo . . . null ouvert . . . Schueppen solo . . . Passe . . . Schneider."

During a pause my father's kindly voice calls my name, and I go into the kitchen. Nobody looks at me; they are scowling soberly at their cards. Even Dolfee with a Turkish fez perched lobsided on his head.

Nobody says a word, but I know what to do. There is a bucket on the table, and next to it a dime. I pick up the bucket and dime quietly and steal out. I walk to Gustav Ziegenstein's place at the corner.

There is nobody at the bar. Gustav and an old crony are playing chess at a table. They glance at me briefly and continue with their problem. I do not dare disturb Gustav for he has a wicked temper when bothered at chess, especially by upstart children. So I pluck a large pretzel from the glass bowl on the bar and munch it.

At length Gustav moves his bishop, snorts: "Check!" and he rises to wait upon me. He rinses the bucket, then holds it under the spurting tap.

"Ten cents worth, please."

"Hm. Skat tonight, I bet you."

"Yes. Father says give good measure."

"Who is playing by your house?"

I name the players. At the mention of Dolfee he looks up angrily.

"Dot loafer," he cries. "Dot lump! I haf a goot mind to put in der beer some paprika, jawohl."

I know what he means. Gustav hasn't forgiven Dolfee since the episode of Halley's comet. The papers were full of Halley's comet. A scientist prophesied that the earth might pass through the comet's tail and we'd all be gassed.

Everybody was uneasy. Especially Gustav, who was superstitious and not very bright. Dolfee learned of his fears and capitalized on them. He read Gustav imaginary extracts from newspapers telling the exact time of doom. He pointed out that Gustav could not take his liquor stock with him into the hereafter, and Gustav, pale and shaking, agreed.

On the night before the Great Doom, Gustav gave away his stock to all who might come. The whole neighborhood was there, led by Dolfee dressed in a monk's cassock. What a brawl. Next day Gustav still lived, though not so happily.

I take my pail and return home. The four are in the midst of a difficult play and no one has noticed my long absence on account of Gustav and his chess game. My father nods his thanks. I place the bucket next to the row of steins and return to my room and the chemistry book.

The monotone of "Nulle . . . Passe . . . Tournee . . ." mingles with the symbols for sulphuric acid and sodium chloride in a cabalistic but strangely soothing formula.

Bob Burns

HOLLYWOOD, Dec. 18.—As the holidays approach everything is beginning to take on that old Christmas spirit. The wives are beginnin' to bustle around and the husbands are gettin' that worried look again.

The other day, Grandpa Snazzy was readin' the want ads and Grandma says, "Well, Snazzy, tomorrow, I'm going to town to do some Christmas shoppin' if it's a pretty day—what is the weather forecast for tomorrow?" Without turnin' the page Grandpa said, "Rain, hail, snow, sleet, fog, thunder and flood."

Copyright, 1937

THE BOY GROWS OLDER

FINGERS OF GENIUS

The world still thinks of large, genial Yehudi Menuhin as the child prodigy of the violin. As a matter of fact, he will be 21 on January 22, has grown and shaved at least one mustache, probably more. The notion that he is still a child persists because he has been hailed as a child prodigy for 14 years, since he first appeared as soloist with the San Francisco Orchestra at the age of 7. He made his New York debut at 10, played with the Philadelphia Orchestra at 14. The parents of Yehudi were married at 18, and the genius' father recently announced they would be "very glad" if Yehudi married a young Dutch girl he has known for 10 years.

FAMILY PORTRAIT NO. 1
Mr. and Mrs. Moshe Menuhin, Yehudi (left), Yalta (center) and Hepzibah (right), photographed in 1924 when Yehudi, then 7, appeared on the concert stage for the first time.

FAMILY PORTRAIT NO. 2
The Menuhins on their California ranch, bought with Yehudi's immense earnings. Youngest daughter, Yalta, is on the left, with comely Hepzibah, pianist, who has appeared on the concert stage with Yehudi, next to her brother. Mrs. Marutha Menuhin, seated between her daughters, isn't convinced a girl should appear on the stage. The dog at Papa Menuhin's feet is interested only in sleep.

CHILD PRODIGY AS A CHILD
Yehudi at 8, with his teacher, Louis Persinger.

OFF TO CONQUER EUROPE
The violinist in knee pants, at 12, smiles under an ill-fitting cap as he departs for his first European concerts with Yalta and Hepzibah. Yalta was still losing her teeth.

FIRST MUSTACHE, AGE 16

FIRST DRESS SUIT, AGE 20

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 16 1937

Music and Traffic

Serge Koussevitzky in the years of his brilliant leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra has impressed the public as a man of self-command as well as commanding spirit and mental powers. Many will therefore be surprised to read that he left the stage in anger at latecomers during the concert in Pittsburg on Sunday.

Such incidents are not associated with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Neither the orchestra nor its conductor has needed the publicity that is gained by these explosions of temperament. In Philadelphia some years ago one of the joys of concertgoing was in seeing how the conductor would conduct himself. And Mr Toscanini is reported to have abandoned a rehearsal in London a few weeks ago. But that was apparently a behind-the-scenes affair so far as the public was concerned. A good many such incidents occur in preparation for public performance. But when the concert begins the conductor, like any performer, is supposed to go through with his job and bear any incidental annoyance. The whole audience should not be penalized because some persons have not arrived on time.

The old practice of beginning a concert with a familiar overture had its practical advantage. It seldom lasted long, and the latecomer was willing to wait in the lobby and take his seat in the interval between the opening number and the next one. When a program begins with a symphony it is more practical to treat the first movement as an "overture" and allow a sufficient interval after the first movement for latecomers to find their seats. This may not be ideal—though it was customary until a few years ago to allow intervals and permit applause between the movements of a symphony. But, whether ideal or not, this arrangement takes cognizance of the conditions under which an audience assembles.

One of these conditions is the constantly spreading area of residence since the automobile furthered the "decentralization" of urban living, which had already begun when persons living on the outskirts of cities were dependent upon suburban trains. Another condition is created by street traffic and parking problems. When St John Ervine was "guest critic" of the drama on the now-extinct New York World he discanted on a number of things that a native would have scorned to discuss or might have overlooked. He noticed, for instance, the "little hills" of New York city, the mere mention of which must have seemed naive or boresome to the habitue of Broadway. And he thought that traffic congestion in the theater zone made it something to wonder at when theater patrons who rode in taxis or private cars arrived in time for the first curtain.

It still seems a feat deserving commendation for a person to leave a New York office at 5 p. m., go home to the suburbs by train or motor, dress, eat dinner or even a buffet supper and return in time for a concert or play at 8.30. There has been a suspicion that fewer and fewer people have actually been doing this and that the changed patronage of plays in recent years has affected the development of drama.

Mr Koussevitzky's concert at Pittsburg was an afternoon affair. But geography and transportation are factors in the composition of audiences. Some persons could even think of a more accessible spot than Lenox as the site of a summer music festival.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 17 1937

Koussevitzky Brilliant As Series Opens

Bushnell Memorial Symphonic Season Triumphally Launched by Boston Orchestra

BY T. H. PARKER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the first concert of the Bushnell 1937-38 series in the foundation auditorium Tuesday night.

The program:

Symphony in G Major, No. 88	Haydn
Lieutenant Kiji, Orchestral Suite	Prokofieff
Tod und Verklaerung	Strauss
Til Eulenspiegel	Strauss

Setting aside the customary ceremonial programing which tradition assures us befits the beginning of another symphonic year, Dr. Koussevitzky flung open once again at Bushnell Memorial last night the doors of great music played with greatness. Their portals were not hung with the pomposities of Sibelius or the portentiousness of Beethoven as habit would suggest. Instead they were garlanded with laughter and festooned with great and minor gaieties, and the only ritualistic fanfare was the mocking flourish to which Lieutenant Kije was born and to which he was wafted away again. "C'est a rire," said Dr. Doussevitzky, and not even the cotton-batting clouds of "Tod and Verklaerung" cast a shadow on what was the merriest program with which a season ever opened here.

Thus major music got under way again, and it was good and right to see once more Bushnell's tawny big-top stretched at the marquee and to observe the aurora-boreal lighting effects of the hall, to be jostled along the aisles, to hear the particularly surging applause of a symphony audience, to see the crowded orchestra terrace under a strident cloudbank of tuning-up, and to inhale the scent of perfume mingled with that of mothballs and cough drops phenomenal to concert halls.

But apart from these pleasant inconsequentialities of atmosphere and the exhilirating surprise of so enormously lighthearted a program, what distinguished the opening and the evening was the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky and his resplendent orchestra in a thrilling performance. From the pure sparkling, smiling Haydn to the rowdy "Till," it was as always with the Boston, an event of superb interpretations and miraculous playing.

The Haydn was I think, new to Hartford. It could not have had a superior introduction than Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave it. As an assayer of classicism, Dr. Koussevitzky has gathered new insight and new purities each year. Haydn must be especially dear to his heart for last year he brought this composer to us, and this summer at Tanglewood and again last night, and more crystalline interpretations, more refinement of detailing, more sparkle of form and spirit now seem well nigh impossible. What seems a particularly conclusive evidence of Dr. Koussevitzky's homage to Haydn is the way in which he lets Haydn play his own compositions. To state Haydn with such simplicity, such almost reverential simplicity, such enriching literality, can only be the mark of completest sympathy and understanding between composer and interpreter.

Crammed as the evening was with magnificent playing in scores more complex than Haydn, the Symphony must be accounted the highest attainment orchestrally. The second movement was a marvel of limpidity on the part of the orchestra as it was of honesty in interpretation, and so rhythmic, so sturdy and yet so supple and fleeting were the third and fourth sections that they must remain vivid in memory for a long, long time.

As much as one hated to steal a moment from the music itself, it was worth it to watch Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting. It is difficult to imagine how he could have made less effort of it or exercised more economy of means for such maximum results. Measure after measure flew by with his beat almost imperceptible and no manual dynamic instructions visible. Then at the end of a period a sudden flurry, a whipping of the tempo, a flash and flourish to call up and push back the orchestral strengths, a stabbing signal to some entrance, and then on and on again the orchestra driving along under the magnetism of only a Jovian eye.

Prokofieff's music for the film "Lieutenant Kije" proved to be a simply captivating confection. It flashed and was utterly pungent with wit, and in its tootlings and pipings and tinkling completely ingenious in fabrication. More delightful music, with more bounding bits of stylization and freshness of manner is hard to imagine. Underneath it all lay a finely fashioned unity of means and of intention. All in all it is one of Prokofieff's smartest successes, though a novelty it be. What a gay person this unsubstantial Kije must have been in Prokofieff's mind, for even his funeral music conjured up a creature smiling gaily in his beard as he lay in a hearse of pink ice and cellophane drawn along to his grave by horses "truckin' on down." There doubtless his soul floated out in champagne bubbles.

The orchestra performance of "Kije" was completely brilliant in a score which demanded virtuoso endeavor from even the double-bass players. When the audience flung its applause out and Dr. Koussevitzky motioned for solo part players to rise, it seemed as if half the orchestra was called up for credit for special feats.

With the same brilliant investigation and investiture, the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky piled up the musical immensities of the two so-familiar Strauss works. The "Tod und Verklaerung" (translated as "Death and Transportation" in a suburban library recently) however vulgar it may be musically, a huge undertaking for any orchestra and so well was it done last night that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men almost made you feel there is something to it interiorally. The fantastic orchestrations of "Till" were set out in grand mockery, and the rowdy tale blown up as big as the giant balloon monsters in Macy's Thanksgiving parade, affording a hurricane of harlequinaderie for the evening's close.

URDAY RNING,

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

The News of the Week In Brief Review

Dec. 18/37

* * *

Concert Manners And Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky.

Pittsburgh music lovers for the first time had their audience manners rebuked by a concert figure when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, walked off Syria Mosque stage Sunday in the midst of a concert because persons had taken their seats while the orchestra was playing.

He had abruptly stopped the concert after the first offense, but when it happened again he quit altogether. Soon coaxed back to the podium, he led a nervously excited group of expert musicians through a magnificent rendition of his friend Sibelius' Second Symphony.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

1937

Two Symphony Members to Be Friday Concert Soloists

For the first time, two members of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra will be soloists at a Friday night concert when the orchestra gives its final Friday program of 1937 at 8:30 p.m. today at Northrop Auditorium.

Harold Ayres, concertmaster, and Frank Miller, first violincello, will be soloists. They will play Brahms' "Concerto for Violin and Cello" in A minor. Each has been soloist several times at Sunday afternoon concerts.

The remainder of the program also will be composed of Brahms music, with the "Academic Festival" overture opening and the famous Symphony No. 2 in D major closing the concert.

The orchestra will play Sunday at 3 p.m. in the final Sunday afternoon concert of the year and will play again on January 2 under Daniels Amfitheatrof.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director and regular conductor, will arrive from Europe in time to open the second half of the season's Friday night concerts on January 7. Amfitheatrof will go to Boston January 10 for seven concerts as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

CINCINNATI, O.
Dec. TIMES - STAR 17/37

EDITOR'S MAIL BOX

This column is intended as a medium for expressing the opinion of our readers. The views expressed are not to be considered those of the Times-Star. Anony-

Manners at the Symphony

To the Editor of the Times-Star:

We did not realize that the movies are creating a definite standard of manners which threaten to supersede the good manners in vogue at a concert until the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra management printed on the reverse of the program for the Young People's Concerts the following admonition:

"POLITE PEOPLE
Listen quietly to music—
Eat at a circus, but never at a concert—
Wait until the concert is finished before putting on wraps."

At first, these suggestions were indignantly resented by parents and other grown-ups, but any member of the Friday afternoon audience who attends for the sheer pleasure of enjoying a fine concert under the able baton of one of the world's most noted conductors, Eugene Goossens, harbors the secret hope that a similar admonition be printed in the Friday afternoon program. To the first and third of those printed on the Tuesday afternoon program we would like to add, "Polite people come early to a concert."

We read with much interest the news item from Pittsburgh that Serge Koussevitsky left the stage at ~~playing of a~~ Mozart Symphony by a concert he was conducting when two late-comers interrupted the the Boston Orchestra. We remember his evident anger at the concert here last week when he had to wait after the first movement of the Haydn Symphony for about seventy-five late-comers.

We wonder what he would do should he ever conduct one of our Friday afternoon concerts by our Symphony Orchestra when not two, but two hundred late-comers romp into Music Hall, noisily put down the seats, and then begin hurried apologies to their neighbors as to the reasons for the delay.

But, perhaps, late-comers are not quite as annoying as the early-leavers. They begin powdering noses, putting on wraps and gloves, while the last number is under way, and then bolt out of the hall the moment Mr. Goossens lays down his baton.

Besides good concert manners, which distinguish the musically informed from those acquainted with only movie theaters, there is some regard due those who attend a symphony concert for the purpose of enjoying good music excellently played.

M. D.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

DEC 18 1937

Symphony Chiefs Will Convene Here

Managers of Most American Orchestras to Attend.

On Monday at 10 a. m. the managers of most of the American symphony orchestras will meet at the Netherland Plaza to discuss their business problems.

Theo F. Gannon, manager of the Cincinnati orchestra, will be host. The orchestras which will be represented are: Boston, George E. Judd; Chicago, Henry E. Vogeli; Cleveland, C. J. Vosburgh; Detroit, Murray G. Paterson; Kansas City, W. M. Symon; Minneapolis, Mrs. Carlyle Scott; New York, Arthur Judson; Philadelphia, Alfred Reginald Allen; Rochester, Arthur M. See; Washington, C. C. Cappel; Indianapolis, Franklin M. Miner; Pittsburgh, Edward W. Specter; St. Louis, Arthur Gaines, and Cincinnati, Theo F. Gannon.

The only managers who will not be present are those on the west coast.

The program for the convention begins with the 10 a. m. meeting, followed by an informal luncheon at noon and meeting at 2:30 p. m., with a dinner in honor of the visiting managers at the Queen City Club at 7 p. m.

On Tuesday the managers again will meet at 10 a. m., adjourning for luncheon at noon to meet Cincinnati business leaders and representatives of the local newspapers. The final meeting of the convention will take place at 2:30 p. m.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
Dec. 19/37

Famous Musicians Honor Stradivari

BOSTON, Dec. 18. (AP) — A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 12 1937

Boston Symphony At Mosque Today

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Syria Mosque, starting at 3 o'clock, will open with Mozart's Symphony in A major. This symphony of Mozart is a product of his 18th year, and is scored for small orchestra. The second number will be the Prelude to Moussorgsky's Opera "Khovanstchina," a tone poem in miniature, which sets the mood for the opening scene, a public square in Moscow at dawn. Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" will complete the first part of the program.

The closing number will be the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, considered by many the greatest of his seven symphonies.

The critic of the New York Tribune wrote: "Koussevitsky was at his best in the superb creation of Sibelius, one of the most original, exciting, and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind. If Sibelius had written nothing but this single symphony, with its mysterious intensities, its haunting imaginative power, he would stand among the masters."

THE BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY, DECEMBER 13/37

Josef Hofmann Gives Eloquent Concert Here On Golden Anniversary of His Boston Debut

HIS PLAYING MADE A MEMORABLE OCCASION EVEN MORE MEMORABLE

Josef Hofmann, famous Polish musician, as he looks at the piano today, and (inset) as he appeared at the time of his first Boston concert in 1887.

Master Josef Hofmann, an 11-year-old musical prodigy, sat down at a piano in Boston's old Music Hall on Dec 23, 1887, and proceeded to astonish all present by the brilliance of his playing and improvising. The same Josef Hofmann, now 61 and a foremost artist of the world, sat down at another piano in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to give a concert commemorating the 50th anniversary of his first appearance here.

The large audience rose in homage as he walked upon the stage. More than two hours later—after an Olympian performance of a long program and an exceptionally generour number of encores—stamping of feet and shouts of "bravo" signified that a great occasion was over.

Golden Jubilees are rare in the world of music. Only to a chosen few is it given to celebrate publicly a round half-century of accomplishment and international fame. And still Josef Hofmann is at the height of his powers. The little boy with Dutch cut and sailor suit, who long ago played with an orchestra conducted by "Ad" Neuendorff and improvised upon a theme given to him by George Whitefield Chadwick, was not only a prodigy but a genius. The boy became a man, and the prodigy grew into a devoted, modest and truly great master of his art.

There must have been some in yesterday's audience whose memories go back to that wintry day in 1887. They may be envied, for they have been privileged to observe the greater part of his career. Perhaps the sheer beauty of tone, and the superb clearness of his playing of such music as Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, pieces by Schumann and his adored Chopin, brought back especial recollection of other performances in the intervening years.

Mr Hofmann came of a period when there were artistic giants, Anton Rubinstein and all the rest. Today he is among a few survivors who command the "grand style" of playing. Audiences of, say, 20 years hence, will unfortunately not realize what they have missed.

Only a giant could have brought out the poetry and the rhapsodic qualities so much in evidence yesterday. Even the mighty crashing of his left hand (which today's purists will tell you is really not in "good taste" for Beethoven or anyone else) was in itself a testimony to the brave and unequivocal style of an epoch that is virtually over.

None but a Pole could do so well as did Mr Hofmann by the four Chopin works—the E-flat minor Polonaise; the Nocturne, Op 9, No. 3; a B-flat Mazurka, and the romantic F minor Ballade (which as a child Hofmann played privately to another idol of the 19th Century, Hans von Buelow). There is another, overly sweet side to Chopin, but Mr Hofmann chose to lavish his gifts upon some of the most virile music Chopin ever wrote.

After intermission came four shorter pieces, three of which—Stojowski's "Orientale," an etude of Scriabin and Mr Hofmann's own "Kaleidoscope"—were marvels of technical brilliance. Thereupon began a series of encores that amounted almost to another concert, all of them vividly played.

C. W. D.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

[illegible] 9 1937

Stradivari Paid Tribute.

BOSTON, Dec. 18.— (AP) —A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today. Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

NEWARK, N. J.
LEDGER

DEC [illegible]

Heifetz Plays Tribute To Stradivari

BOSTON (AP)—A world-renowned

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

DEC 19 1937

Stradivari Is Honored By Concert in Boston

BOSTON, DEC. 18. — (AP). — A world-renowned violinist and a

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

DEC 19 1937

PAY TRIBUTE TO STRADIVARI

Jascha Heifetz And Boston Symphony Join In Concert

Boston, Dec. 18 (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-re-

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

[illegible] 9 1937

STRADIVARI TRIBUTE AT HUB

Boston, Dec. 18—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-re-

---

GIVES VARIED PIANO RECITAL

Post

Hofmann Exhibits Skill in Golden Jubilee

Dec. 13/37

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Most piano recitals, even those given by eminent pianists, are that and nothing more. But Josef Hofmann's recital in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, described on the programme as a Golden Jubilee recital, was an occasion. Fifty years ago Mr. Hofmann played in Boston as a boy of 11, and in the fullness of his powers he returns to show us that he can still play better than most of his colleagues, young or old.

Mr. Hofmann is perhaps the best all-around pianist now before the public. He may not play the music of Beethoven as profoundly as Mr. X, that of Schumann as poetically as Mr. Y, that of Chopin as fetchingly as Mr. Z, or that of Liszt as brilliantly as Mr. W. But he plays the music of these and other composers equally well and, as was said above, far better than most pianists can play it.

Mr. Hofmann's lack, and it was felt again yesterday, if less acutely than on certain other of his appearances here, is in the direction, if not of conviction, at least, of enthusiasm. And anyway, to play the piano in public for 50 years and still give the impression that piano-playing is an all-absorbing passion, would be almost too much to ask of anyone.

Perhaps some in yesterday's large audience found Mr. Hofmann's programme of consistent interest. This reviewer did not. The afternoon began promisingly with Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata, played as one may seldom hear it played, though even Mr. Hofmann could not make us forget the triteness of the final movement. Schumann's "Kreisleriana" which followed, in part, and that part was quite enough, is mostly a dull business. Of the four succeeding pieces by Chopin, only the B-flat minor Mazurka represented that composer in his more inspired mood: the others were the melancholy Polonaise in E-flat minor, the first and least valuable of the three B major Nocturnes, the last and least engrossing of the four Ballades.

It was possible to feel that the remainder of the recital, including the numerous encores, was the more entertaining portion, even though it did not escape trivialities. Listed on the programme were pieces by Stojowski, Schubert (with gildings by Godowsky), Scriabin and Mr. Hofmann, while the extras, played to an audience which clamored with increasing insistence, came from Moszkowski, Mendelssohn, Beethoven (the "Turkish March"), Chopin and unidentified others. Some of these were pieces of the showy sort, and Mr. Hofmann, with his enormous skill and enormous cleverness, can play such matter to the Queen's taste.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

DEC 19 1937

Heifetz Honors Stradivarius

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violi makers, Antonius Stradivarius, who died 200 years ago today. Jascha Heifetz played on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivarius in 1731. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Dec. 15/37

THE CHRISTIAN S Monitor

—Boston News—

Boston Quartet Opens Season

Quartets by Martinů, Mozart, and Tchaikovsky formed the program given in Jordan Hall last night by the Boston String Quartet, that distinguished local organization whose members are Harrison Keller, Paul Fedorovsky, Georges Fourel and Alfred Zighera. There was a large and extremely appreciative audience of chamber-music addicts.

Bohuslav Martinů, 47-year-old Czech composer, first achieved fame in 1925, when his "Half-Time"—a piece descriptive of a football game—was performed at the Contemporary Music Festival at Prague. To ask what the composer's "game" is in his third Quartet, played last night, would be too obvious a witticism. Yet it did at times seem as though he were absorbed, with a morose intensity enlivened by gleams of a faint dry humor in some deep but fantastically inconsequential game of his own invention.

In Mr. Slonimsky's "Music since 1900," Martinů is characterized as a "neo-contrapuntist." If that description was ever accurate (and we hesitate to dispute it), it is so no longer, for this quartet is neither neo- nor paleo-contrapuntal. Indeed, during most of its course its rambling melodies proceed either in unison or in strange and not inexpressive chordal sequences, sometimes terminating at long length in an unexpected common chord, but predominantly atonal in effect. By far the most interesting of the three movements is the first, in which fragments of melody and rhythm—including even some remote wisps of jazz—allotted to solo instruments are outlined in sharp relief against mysterious and shadowy backgrounds provided by the remaining instruments. It is perhaps in his remarkably subtle and imaginative syntheses of instrumental and harmonic color that Martinů's principal talent lies—which would suggest that, after all, pictorial music is his field. The Martinů quartet enjoyed a remarkably polished, confident, and sympathetic performance and was well received.

There was polish, too, and a remarkable effect of spontaneity plus unanimity in the performance of Mozart's tenderly whimsical E flat quartet (K. 428). There was also a quality that few chamber-music organizations achieve—a high-strung, mettlesome elasticity of gait that gave an almost disturbing vitality to the playing. This quality sometimes degenerated into restlessness and haste. Mr. Keller was often guilty of slighting the melodic essence of rapid passages, playing them as though they were mere excrescences or flourishes, to be minimized and tossed out of the way. With the acquisition of a more reposeful style, without loss of vivacity, this quartet could become a Mozart-playing instrument second to none. The players are evenly matched not only in proficiency but in a sort of keen-edged delicacy of tone and phrasing admirably suited to that purpose.

Tchaikovsky's D major quartet, op. 11, a facile and shallow work whose principal claim to survival is its famous Andante cantabile, concluded the evening bustlingly, perhaps even excessively so.

S. S.

The Arts in Boston

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Jascha Heifetz

Who Will Play Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto (First Time in America) With the Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week. He Will Also Play the Brahms Concerto at the Same Pair of Concerts bodying an exalted mood experienced before a glorious scenic expanse, sometimes showing, with the accents of caricature, human oddities.

Mr. Dehn knows when to exaggerate, when to suppress. He is intolerant of hypocisy and affectation. Once he is amused, or disapproves, he finds emphatic means of stating the fact, through distortion and relentless exaggeration.

Doll and Richards

Dry points by Ruth Doris Swett are shown at Doll and Richards, 138 Newbury Street. Native of North Carolina, Miss Swett has depicted many trees of her home environment. Among her prints are very able and beautiful portraits of long-leafed pine. In several studies of details she exhibits great patience and painstaking handling. It is not often that we see print makers today who work with such meticulousness, and rarely do we encounter such refinement.

Bell and Fletcher

Paintings and drawings by Norman Rockwell are on view at the galleries of Bell and Fletcher, 77 Newbury Street. Book illustrations, drawings depicting the life of Louisa Alcott, some Saturday Evening Post cover designs count among the exhibits. The style of Mr. Rockwell is familiar to us in its graphic presentation. The illustrator has a responibility to a text. He is not free, but must visualize the idea of another. Mr. Rockwell states his ideas with utmost clarity and with engaging wit.

D. A.

Worcester Gazette - Dec. 10/37

Josef Hofmann—50 Years Ago and Today

PRIVATE LIFE OF A MUSICAL GENIUS

An interview with the great pianist, Josef Hofmann

Sunday Telegram readers will enjoy this glimpse into the home life of the great pianist who is celebrating his Golden Jubilee on the American concert stage. An accomplished inventor, Mr. Hofmann also has some interesting ideas on bringing up boys, of whom he has three. Read about his boys—and his inventions—in next Sunday's Telegram.

86

SYMPHONY IN TRIO OF CONCERTOS

Post Dec. 18/37

Heifetz, Soloist, New Work by Prokofieff Heard

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For most of the audience the centre of interest at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was undoubtedly the masterly violin playing of Jascha Heifetz; but it might well have been the Second Concerto of Prokofieff which was played for the first time in America. Good performers are always with us, if not too many of the quality of Mr. Heifetz; a good piece in these days is much more of a rarity.

OVERSHADOWS BRAHMS

Placed in the centre of the programme, the new Concerto not only reduced to relative insignificance another novelty, a Concerto for orchestra by the Soviet composer Michael Starokadomsky which preceeded it; it even made the Violin Concerto of Brahms, which served as closing number, seem "old hat."

The problem of the violin concerto is a difficult and delicate one, due to the tonal disparity between the solo instrument and the accompanying forces. With his thickly textured symphonic orchestra and his conventional "tuttis" Brahms solves the problem far less successfully than Prokofieff, who has given us for once a violin concerto which is not lopsided. He was assisted furthermore, by the cutting down of the number of orchestral strings, giving the effect of something between the chamber-orchestra and the full symphonic body. Moreover, the orchestral part itself, is of such virtuoso stuff and the orchestral voices and that of the solo instrument are so closely interwoven that all of the unsavory impression of a violinist's show-piece forthwith disappears. Again to invoke comparison, the Concerto of Brahms, so often hailed as a symphony for violin and orchestra, seemed yesterday almost the solo concerto of commerce.

Continuously Melodious

So much for Prokofieff's texture and method. His music, which is after all still more important, is almost continuously melodious and never stalely so. Is it possible that the long musical depression is drawing to a close? One had fancied that all the good tunes must have been written, but Mr. Prokofieff has found plenty; the two chief themes of the first movement, especially the lyric almost lush second subject, the whole of the idyllic slow movement (a strange adjective to apply to contemporary music) and, though in different vein, the spirited, capricious, rythmically provocative Finale, with its liberal but always discreet spicing of percussion.

Let us hope that some of the tumultous applause was directed toward the composer, the orchestra and the wholly self-effacing Dr. Koussevitzky. The debt to Mr. Heifetz, moreover, was a double one.

Mr. Heifetz's Playing

Starokadomsky's Concerto is one more example of neo-classism, which is to say, 18th century form and texture with freely dissonant counterpoint. It might also be called eclectic, though a less polite but more accurate word would be synthetic. There are recognizable melodic ideas; the music "sounds," and it is effectively, if sometimes rather noisily, scored. The audience, which must have nursed sore palms last evening, liked it.

Admirable as was Mr. Heifetz's playing of the Concerto of Brahms, and no one in our day plays it as well, a final word must be said for the orchestral performance and, in particular, for the beautiful playing of the wind choir in the Adagio. After so much fiddling the cool tones of woodwinds and horns alone were good to hear.

Statistical note: Antonio Stradivari died 200 years ago today. Mr. Heifetz is playing his own "Strad" at this pair of concerts, and another, lent by Mrs. William Ellery, is on view in the first balcony gallery.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

EC 19 1937

Boston Symphony Honors Stradivarius

Boston, Dec. 18.—Marking the 200th anniversary of Antonio Stradivari's death, Jascha Heifetz and the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight played the new, tuneful second violin concerto by Serge Urokofieff.

Heifetz used his own "Strad" which netted the maker only about $60 but which is now valued at $60,000.

MUSIC

Globe Dec. 18/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It was one concerto after another at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The program began with the first performance in the United States of an Orchestral Concerto by the young Soviet composer Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky, whose name will offend the typesetter as much as his music pleased the Friday audience. Next came the American premiere of the Second Violin Concerto by another Russian, Serge Prokofieff, the solo part being taken by Jascha Heifetz. And the afternoon ended with Mr Heifetz giving a glorious performance to one of the greatest of masterpieces—the Violin Concerto by Brahms.

Dr Koussevitzky heard Starokadomsky's music at a concert of the International Society for Contemporary Music in Paris last Summer, when it proved to be outstanding in a mass of modern work. It is outstanding, if not a masterpiece, because it is honest, unforced and buoyant, reasonably melodic, free from the extravagance of dissonance for its own sake. In two words, the Orchestral Concerto "makes sense."

Starokadomsky confesses that he likes 18th century music best and his tunes indicate that he is at heart a diatonic soul. His modernism is found in the treatment of these tunes, which he likes to toss about from one section of the orchestra to another, with all the resources of modern rhythmic and instrumental effects. Yet this treatment is plainly eclectic and suggests that Starokadomsky is not so original as a creator of masterpieces must be.

The first movement of the Concerto is rugged and powerful rather than noisy; here Starokadomsky stands in the company of a few gifted souls. With the majority of young composers the shoe is on the other foot. His second movement is a passacaglia, beautifully written, the theme of which rises with great effect from the depths of double-basses and cellos. The theme might have been written by Handel, with a few notes altered for the sake of 20th century harmony. The last movement resembles the first, but it is not so forcefully constructed.

There is perhaps nothing in all the concerto literature for violin like Prokofieff's Second Concerto. In fact it is quite unlike Prokofieff's own earlier music, including his First Violin Concerto, which was a pretty crabbed affair. As Mr Heifetz plays it, the Second Concerto is distinguished for high spirits and a sense of wit, which gives way, in the slow movement to a sentimental interlude couched in modern musical speech. This may be hard to imagine, but such is the case. The deliberate "wrong note" harmony of the finale might be someone tossing off a popular ditty in two keys at once, just for a lark.

No great emotions will likely be aroused by this music, and the great concertos of the past will assuredly not suffer by comparison. But it does provide violinists with something different. One point of interest is the skill by which Prokofieff makes the solo instrument stand out from the tonal mass of a small orchestra wherein even the strings are reduced from conventional number. Many concertgoers like to catalogue music and composers in their minds. To this end it may be said that Prokofieff's unusual Concerto has a sole and distant counterpart in his "Classical Symphony."

Once again Mr Heifetz played as only a great virtuoso and artist can play. In honor of the observance of the 200th anniversary of the death of the unequalled violin maker, Antoni Stradivari, Mr Heifetz forsook his customary Guarneri violin, it was said, for the fine Stradivarius instrument which he possesses. The audience cheered him rapturously when the concert was ended.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra performed Starakadomsky and Prokofieff strikingly. Unaccountably however, there were some rough places in the Brahms Concerto.

A Stradavarius violin, dating from 1715, has been loaned by Mrs William Ellery and will be on view in the first balcony gallery of Symphony Hall through tonight's repetition of the program. Next week Sergei Rachmaninoff will be soloist in the Boston premiere of his Rhapsody for Piano on a Theme by Paganini. Dr Koussevitzky will also conduct a Concerto of K. P. E. Bach as orchestrated by Steinberg, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

C. W. D.

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER

DEC 19 193

HONOR MASTER

Musicians Pay Tribute to Antonio Stradivari.

BOSTON, MASS. (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world

Her Dec. 18/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Concerto for Orchestra Op. 14 — Starokadomsky
Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 63 — Prokofieff
Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 77 — Brahms

There is not much for criticism to do the morning after such a concert as this. The stale adjectives in the vocabulary of praise are worthless when confronted with one of the great musical experiences of a lifetime. You just cannot sit down and tick off phrases like "superb performance" when you have been so moved and excited by the music and its interpretation; or at least we cannot and are not going to do so.

The slightly incoherent tone of the foregoing paragraph will not lack meaning for yesterday's audience, for this really was one of the grandest concerts ever. The fact that it can and will be repeated tonight seems like a miracle. No one is going to forget very soon Mr. Heifetz's performance of the Brahms concerto, and we may hope that the singularly interesting new music in the first half of the program will also be remembered.

Anything new by Prokofieff we can be reasonably certain will be effectively written and usually entertaining, sometimes much more than that. But Starokadomsky was anybody's guess. Actually it was the most interesting music so far to come out of Soviet Russia in our experience, limited as it is, of creative art under Mr. Stalin. This work has much less bombast and much more intellectual vigor than the music of the highly publicized Shostakovitch. There is still some of the martial smashing and bashing that must be the delight of Soviet audiences; but over and above that we at once realize that Starokadomsky is a talented and intelligent composer.

It may be argued that this Concerto is a little dry, which is perhaps true. It is also fair to observe that the composer is inclined in the Sinfonia and the Toccata to prolong too much the development of his themes. But he does succeed in holding our attention, in persuading us by the vigor of his invention and the brilliance of his writing. Our only criticism of the Passacaglia would be that the basic theme is too indeterminate, so that the variations are a little difficult to follow. Dr. Koussevitzky also chose to announce this theme so softly that we hardly got to hear the theme at all until the first variation. Happily this work will be repeated at the next Monday-Tuesday concerts.

Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto is a fascinating work. The andante is positively Mozartian in spirit, without being in the least precious. The first movement is a most ingenious example of what a brilliant stylist, like Prokofieff, can do with conventional sonata form. Only the last movement is like the Prokofieff of the Piano Concertos and the First Violin Concerto. Harmonically this music is very much less dissonant than his earlier works, but it is in no sense flat. In fact it is the kind of attractive, well-made Concerto that ought to prove a great addition to the literature for violin and orchestra.

Who would not a hundred times rather listen to this than the Violin Concerto of Dvorak or that of Elgar? We should prefer to hear it right off again than Mendelssohn's Concerto; but we had better stop, for the sport of comparisons is dangerous and apt to end in being obliged to eat one's words. Mr. Heifetz gave the Concerto a marvellously adroit and polished performance. There are some beautiful melodies in it, and these he sang with the utmost tenderness and purity of tone. The orchestral playing, both in this and the Brahms, was splendid and in complete sympathy with the soloist. Both the Prokofieff and the Starokadomsky works were heard for the first time in the United States.

Finally there was the great Brahms Concerto, the performance of which by Mr. Heifetz we have already indicated was masterly. The volume of applause for him at the intermission and end of the concert was richly deserved. Such violin playing is a joy in itself. We have also Dr. Koussevitzky to thank for what has been to date the finest concert of the season, or any season, it is tempting and only slightly myopic to add!

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI HONORED AFTER TWO CENTURIES

Boston, December 18—(AP) — A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today. Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

DEC 19 1937

Stradivari Is Honored.

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today. Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

C. S. Monitor Dec. 18/37

Two items new to America—both from Soviet composers—graced the ninth Boston Symphony program of the season, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One was a Concerto for orchestra, by Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky, the other Prokofieff's Violin Concerto in G minor, No. 2. The Friday afternoon audience liked them both. Evidently conductor and listeners have decided not to look at music through political spectacles—a very sensible conclusion. For another unusual feature, there was a second violin concerto on the program, that of Brahms. Does that sound a little overboard on concertos, for an American audience? Ah, but Jascha Heifetz was the soloist. From him we could take three concertos.

The Soviet compositions were both interesting. Starokadomsky's is classical in form, romantic in mood. The opening Sinfonia, marked allegro risoluto, is vigorous, fresh, forthright. The Passacaglia's theme opens and closes the second movement in the basses pianissimo. The 14 variations that intervene are written with resource and imagination. In both these movements the composer remains true to his confessed love, the eighteenth century. The third movement falls away in musical content, but in it the composer seems to remember that after all he is a Russian, and he pays his respects to the forefathers. The whole work marches, but the Finale steps out with the gait of Tchaikovsky.

Prokofieff has had his classical phase. In this concerto he too seems to have gone romantic. The second theme of his first movement and the main theme of the Andante are frankly sentimental. In the sharply accented Finale he reveals again the humor and wit that are perhaps his most treasurable qualities, and like his younger colleague shows himself a true Russian in his orchestral colors. The prevailing tone of the concerto is cheerful, and, when it is not sentimental, vigorous. The writing is of course brilliant, although it does not appear to present so many difficulties to the soloist as the First Concerto. Like its predecessor, it is by no means a display piece for a violinist, but one in which the orchestra bears a goodly share of the musical responsibility. If the emotional themes mentioned do not pall on rehearing, the work may well become an addition to the repertory.

Mr. Heifetz, in fine fettle, played both works with his usual effortless mastery, and he received the customary ovation. He shared the honors generously with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra; justly so, for only with such collaboration as theirs could these superb performances have been realized. The conductor was never more sympathetic nor the orchestra more supple.

L. A. S.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Morning Star - Telegram

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI HONORED.

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A world-renowned violinist and a world re-

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 19 1937

ITEMS HERE AND THERE

THE Helsinki University Chorus from Finland, composed of sixty male voices, will make two appearances in this city. It will first be heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, Jan. 6, and also will offer a concert of its own Jan. 10. Both events will take place in Carnegie Hall. The chorus sails this week on the steamship Manhattan for its first American tour, which opens in Boston Dec. 31 and Jan. 1, when the visiting choristers will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During its stay in America, which terminates Feb. 2, the chorus will travel as far north as Duluth, Minn., and will give concerts at Harvard, Yale and Princeton Universities, the University of Michigan and the Principia School in St. Louis, Mo.

Winslow Homer Paintings at Symphony Hall

Water colors, a few drawings, lithographs and a small oil by Winslow Homer, lent by various owners, make up an interesting display in the First Balcony Gallery at Symphony Hall, which continues through Dec. 28.

It is an exhibition fortunately rich in examples of the two years' work Homer did in Tynemouth, England, in 1881-83, when his mature style developed. One of the very best of these water colors, "On the Cliff," which seems never to have been shown publicly in New England before, has been loaned by the Phillips Memorial Gallery in Washington through the courtesy of Mr. Duncan Phillips. A similar claim may be made for Mr. Phillips' "Rowing Home" (1890), presumably painted at Prout's Neck. The two water colors lent by Mrs. Warner have not been visible to the public since an early showing at the Museum of Fine Arts in 1890, and the brilliant wash drawing of the Tynemouth period, "Fisher Girl With Net," lent by Mrs. Frederick Lowell, is being seen in public for the first time since it left Homer's possession. Also of extraordinary interest are the five great water colors from the estate of Mrs. Charles Savage Homer, loaned through the good offices of Mr. Robert Macbeth of New York. With the exception of a possible dealer's exhibition, these five pictures are making their Boston debut, so we are informed.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Stradivarius Honored On Anniversary

Heifetz, Boston Symphony Play Tribute to Master Violin Maker, Dead 200 Years

Boston, Dec. 18.—(AP.)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antoni Stradivarius, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivarius in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One number was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff. The other concerto was Brahms's in D Major.

In Stradivarius, long life, he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy, he produced approximately 1100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540, each as compeletly pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heifetz values his Stradivarius at $50,000.

Varnish Secret.

A transparent mellow varnish, shading delicately between orange and yellow, is one mark a connoisseur recognizes in a Stradivarius, and one secret of the tone is the formula of the varnish and the manner of application—a secret that still baffles science.

Other characteristics are a subtle, individual curvature on the top and back, visible by turning the instrument so a ray of light traces the rise and fall of the wood: A superior quality of wood and grain; a characteristic swing or dash to the sound holes; individual accentuation of the corners terminating the inward curves at the sides and extreme skill in construction of the "purfling" on inlaid wooden edging which overhands the junction of the belly and the back with the sides.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

DEC 20 1937

In Tribute to Stradivari

Jascha Heifetz, shown here with his authentic Stradivari violin valued at $30,000, played two concertos for violin with the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday in a tribute to the greatest violin maker of all time—Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago. About 170 authentic "Strads" are known to exist in the United States. (A. P. Photo).

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

NOV 19 1937

FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT IN N. Y.

Orchestra Has Missed Big City Engagement Only Twice

NEW YORK, Nov. 18 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has plowed the snows, when necessary, for 51 consecutive winters to give a series of concerts in New York, began tonight its 52d season.

Two Were Postponed

In more than a half a century, the famous orchestra has missed a New York engagement only twice. Two concerts were postponed, none cancelled.

The first postponement was caused by the blizzard of 1888—the orchestra had started, but was forced to turn back. The other was caused by the death of a conductor.

Tonight's concert demonstrated anew for the audience, many of whom have followed the New York concerts of the Boston players for decades, that Serge Koussevitzky's 110 players form, certainly, one of the great orchestras of the world; that tonally it is perhaps the finest.

Koussevitzky chose for the opening programs two symphonies. One was Beethoven's "Eroica"; the other Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major.

Plays Three Concerts

On each of the five trips the orchestra plays three concerts; Thursday night in New York; Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon in New York. The first matinee will present a young French pianist, Jacques Fevrier, in his New York debut.

He will, curiously, play Ravel's Concerto for the Left Hand alone, first heard here with the same orchestra but a different soloist, Paul Wittgenstein.

Wittgenstein has only his left arm; Fevrier has both.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI HONORED.

Boston, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world re- Etc.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

DEC 19 193

Heifetz, Symphony Honor Stradivari

BOSTON, Dec. 18—(A. P.).—A world-renowned violinist and a world renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today. Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

19 1937

Orchestra, Violinist Pay Tribute to Stradivari

Boston, Mass., Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

19 1937

Tribute to Stradivari.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—Jascha Heifetz and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid ~~tribute to~~ the great violin maker, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today. Using a violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Heifetz played two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI PAID MUSICIANS' TRIBUTE

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—A world re- ETC.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES - DISPATCH

DEC 19 1937

The Arts

Heifetz Joins Orchestra In Tribute to Stradivari

BOSTON, (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined last night in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One ~~number~~ was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but in development of tunes and melody harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahms' in D Major.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1,100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heiftz values his Stradivari at $50,000.

NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN

19 1937

VIOLINIST HONORED

BOSTON, Dec. 18—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-re-

---

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

1937

Heifetz Performs Two Concertos in Stradivari's Honor

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a

LIMA, OHIO
NEWS

FAMED VIOLINIST HONORS GREATEST OF OLD MASTERS

BOSTON, Dec. 18 — (AP) — A world-renowned violinist and a

CHICAGO, ILL
HERALD - EXAMINER

19 193

Honor Stradivari on His 200th Year

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—(AP)—Jascha Heifetz and a world renowned

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

DEC 19 1937

HONOR VIOLIN MAKER

Heifetz and Koussevitzky Pay Tribute To Antonio ~~Stradivari~~

BOSTON, Dec. 18. — (AP) — A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orches-

---

WILKES BARRE, PA.
INDEPENDENT

DEC 19 1937

Heifetz Honors Old Violin Maker

Boston, Dec. 18. (UP)—Mark-

MONTGOMERY, ALA.
ADVERTISER

Recital Tribute To Violin Master

Dec. 19/37

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

DEC 19 1937

HEIFETZ, SYMPHONY PAY TRIBUTE TO STRADIVARI

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A world- ETC.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

DEC 19 1937

Tribute Is Paid To Great Violin Maker

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitsky conducted.

One number was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russion, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but in development of tunes and melody harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahms' in D Major.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1,100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540,—each as completely perigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heitetz values his Stradivari at $50,000.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 19 1937

Heifetz and C Honor Great

Join in tribute to fame est of all violin makers

Boston, Mass., Dec. 18 (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One number was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but, in development of tunes and melody, harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahams' in D major.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1,100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heifetz values his Stradivari at $50,000. Gently handling the instrument while discussing the maker before the concert, Heifetz lightly snapped his fingernails against the top surface, a sure way, he said, to indicate the superior Stradivari tone qualities.

Hardly a week goes by without some eager person bringing to the orchestra a violin discovered in the attic or other storage place with the report it had "been in the family at least 100 years."

But with the first note from the instrument, Heifetz could tell the violin was a poor one at the start and had not improved with the lapse of a century. False labels inside notoriously bad instruments are responsible for many false hopes.

A transparent mellow varnish, shading delicately between orange and yellow, is one mark a connoisseur recognizes in a Stradivari, and one secret of the tone is the formula of the varnish and the manner of application — a secret that still baffles science.

Other characteristics:

A subtle, individual curvature on top and back, visible by turning the instrument so a ray of light traces the rise and fall of the wood.

A superior quality of wood and grain.

A characteristic swing or dash to the sound holes, also known as the ff-holes.

Individual accentuation of the corners terminating the inward curves at the sides.

Extreme skill in construction of the "purfling" or inlaid wooden edging which overhands the junction of the belly and the back with the sides.

---

1 Dec. 22/37 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Raya Garbousova was, as the theatre press agents used to say, the "extra, added attraction" at the second Monday concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. The comely young Rusisan cellist played with the orchestra two numbers unheard so long at Symphony Hall that their performance might as well be called revival: Boccherini's B-flat Concerto, Op. 34 last figured on a Symphony program in 1923, and Tchaikovsky's Variations On a Rococo Theme had been slumbering since 1919.

In spite of occasional slips from pitch, Miss Garbousova produces a delightfully silken tone from her instrument. Her technic and interpretive artistry—as she proved on her first Boston visit two years ago—are poised and sound. Most of the pleasure to be derived from Boccherini's elegant and slightly dull music was found in Miss Garbousova's beautiful "singing" of the abundant melody. The orchestra part by itself is negligible. She likewise managed to make as much as can be made of Tchaikovsky's rather long-winded variations.

Dr Koussevitzky began a distinctly novel program with the Concerto For Orchestra by the young Soviet composer Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky. At its first United States performance by the Boston Symphony two weeks ago, this piece made a favorable impression. A second hearing confirmed opinion that Starokadomsky has learned better than many of his contemporaries to trim the size and length of his music to the character of his material. If the brass is used crudely, it is with a deliberate glance for legitimate effect of vigor. Where more than one modern piece is merely noisy, Starokadomsky's Concerto seems powerful.

In all his life Tchaikovsky never wrote more irresistible music than the overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet." No matter that it is long, full of the composer's mannerisms; "Romeo and Juliet" supplies a vivid account of the most vivid events in the tragic romance of Shakespeare's Veronese lovers. Tchaikovsky did neglect, however, to point up Mercutio's ungentlemanly behavior to Juliet's nurse. And that brings up the question: Just how should pungent Elizabethan speech be transformed into music? The performance last night, more restrained than that of a few weeks ago in the "regular" series, was wholly admirable.

This program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon. The next concerto in the Monday-Tuesday series, Jan 17 and 18, will be conducted by Daniele Amfitheatrof. C. W. D.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
SUNDAY COURIER

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI HONORED AT BOSTON CONCERT

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (U.P.)—Marking the 200th anniversary of Antonio Stradivari's death, Jascha Heifetz and the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight ~~played~~ the new, tuneful Second Violin Concerto by Serge Prokofieff.

Heifetz used his own "Strad" which netted the maker only about $60 but which is now valued at $60,000.

ELIZABETHTON, TENN.
STAR

DEC 19 1937

Famous Violin Maker Is Honored In Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 18. (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

(87)

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

DEC 20 1937

In Tribute to Stradivari

Jascha Heifetz, shown here with his authentic Stradivari violin valued at $30,000, played two concertos for violin with the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday in a tribute to the greatest violin maker of all time—Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago. About 170 authentic "Strads" are known to exist in the United States. (A. P. Photo).

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

NOV 19 1937

FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT IN N. Y.

Orchestra Has Missed Big City Engagement Only Twice

NEW YORK, Nov. 18 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has plowed the snows, when necessary, for 51 consecutive winters to give a series of concerts in New York, began tonight its 52d season.

Two Were Postponed

In more than a half a century, the famous orchestra has missed a New York engagement only twice. Two concerts were postponed, none cancelled.

The first postponement was caused by the blizzard of 1888—the orchestra had started, but was forced to turn back. The other was caused by the death of a conductor.

Tonight's concert demonstrated anew for the audience, many of whom have followed the New York concerts of the Boston players for decades, that Serge Koussevitzky's 110 players form, certainly, one of the great orchestras of the world; that tonally it is perhaps the finest.

Koussevitzky chose for the opening programs two symphonies. One was Beethoven's "Eroica"; the other Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major.

Plays Three Concerts

On each of the five trips the orchestra plays three concerts; Thursday night in New York; Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon in New York. The first matinee will present a young French pianist, Jacques Fevrier, in his New York debut.

He will, curiously, play Ravel's Concerto for the Left Hand alone, first heard here with the same orchestra but a different soloist, Paul Wittgenstein.

Wittgenstein has only his left arm; Fevrier has both.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI HONORED.

Boston, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world re-

Etc.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

19 193

Heifetz, Symphony Honor Stradivari

BOSTON, Dec. 18—(A. P.).—A world-renowned violinist and a world renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today. Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

1 9 1937

Orchestra, Violinist Pay Tribute to Stradivari

Boston, Mass., Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

9 1937

Tribute to Stradivari.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—Jascha Heifetz and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid ~~tribute to~~ the great violin maker, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today. Using a violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Heifetz played two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI PAID MUSICIANS' TRIBUTE

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—A world re-

Etc.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES - DISPATCH

DEC 19 1937

The Arts

Heifetz Joins Orchestra In Tribute to Stradivari

BOSTON, (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined last night in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One ~~number~~ was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but in development of tunes and melody harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahms' in D Major.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1,100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heiftz values his Stradivari at $50,000.

NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN

9 193

VIOLINIST HONORED

BOSTON, Dec. 18—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-re-

---

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

937

Heifetz Performs Two Concertos in Stradivari's Honor

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a

LIMA, OHIO
NEWS

7

FAMED VIOLINIST HONORS GREATEST OF OLD MASTERS

BOSTON, Dec. 18 — (AP) — A world-renowned violinist and a

CHICAGO, ILL
HERALD - EXAMINER

9 193

Honor Stradivari on His 200th Year

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—(AP)—Jascha Heifetz and a world renowned

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

DEC 19 1937

HONOR VIOLIN MAKER

Heifetz and Koussevitzky Pay Tribute To ~~Antonio Stradivari~~

BOSTON, Dec. 18. — (AP) — A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orches-

---

WILKES BARRE, PA.
INDEPENDENT

DEC 19 1937

Heifetz Honors Old Violin Maker

Boston, Dec. 18. (UP)—Mark-

MONTGOMERY, ALA.
ADVERTISER

Recital Tribute To Violin Master

Dec. 19 '37

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

DEC 19 1937

HEIFETZ, SYMPHONY PAY TRIBUTE TO STRADIVARI

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A world-

ETC.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

DEC 1 37

Tribute Is Paid To Great Violin Maker

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari, Jascha Heifetz per-

...... 29.50 to 79.50
Many
justable,
olors... .95 to 4.50
...... 3.95 to 14.50

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 19 1937

Heifetz and Orchestra Honor Great Stradivari

Join in tribute to famed Italian, greatest of all violin makers

Boston, ~~Mass.~~, Dec. 18 (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One number was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but, in development of tunes and melody, harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahams' in D major.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1,100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heifetz values his Stradivari at $50,000. Gently handling the instrument while discussing the maker before the concert, Heifetz lightly snapped his fingernails against the top surface, a sure way, he said, to indicate the superior Stradivari tone qualities.

Hardly a week goes by without some eager person bringing to the orchestra a violin discovered in the attic or other storage place with the report it had "been in the family at least 100 years."

But with the first note from the instrument, Heifetz could tell the violin was a poor one at the start and had not improved with the lapse of a century. False labels inside notoriously bad instruments are responsible for many false hopes.

A transparent mellow varnish shading delicately between orange and yellow, is one mark a connoisseur recognizes in a Stradivari, and one secret of the tone is the formula of the varnish and the manner of application — a secret that still baffles science.

Other characteristics:

A subtle, individual curvature on top and back, visible by turning the instrument so a ray of light traces the rise and fall of the wood.

A superior quality of wood and grain.

A characteristic swing or dash to the sound holes, also known as the ff-holes.

Individual accentuation of the corners terminating the inward curves at the sides.

Extreme skill in construction of the "purfling" or inlaid wooden edging which overhands the junction of the belly and the back with the sides.

---

1 Dec. 20 '37 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Raya Garbousova was, as the theatre press agents used to say, the "extra, added attraction" at the second Monday concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. The comely young Rusisan cellist played with the orchestra two numbers unheard so long at Symphony Hall that their performance might as well be called revival: Boccherini's B-flat Concerto, Op. 34 last figured on a Symphony program in 1923, and Tchaikovsky's Variations On a Rococo Theme had been slumbering since 1919.

In spite of occasional slips from pitch, Miss Garbousova produces a delightfully silken tone from her instrument. Her technic and interpretive artistry—as she proved on her first Boston visit two years ago—are poised and sound. Most of the pleasure to be derived from Boccherini's elegant and slightly dull music was found in Miss Garbousova's beautiful "singing" of the abundant melody. The orchestra part by itself is negligible. She likewise managed to make as much as can be made of Tchaikovsky's rather long-winded variations.

Dr Koussevitzky began a distinctly novel program with the Concerto For Orchestra by the young Soviet composer Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky. At its first United States performance by the Boston Symphony two weeks ago, this piece made a favorable impression. A second hearing confirmed opinion that Starokadomsky has learned better than many of his contemporaries to trim the size and length of his music to the character of his material. If the brass is used crudely, it is with a deliberate glance for legitimate effect of vigor. Where more than one modern piece is merely noisy, Starokadomsky's Concerto seems powerful.

In all his life Tchaikovsky never wrote more irresistible music than the overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet." No matter that it is long, full of the composer's mannerisms; "Romeo and Juliet" supplies a vivid account of the most vivid events in the tragic romance of Shakespeare's Veronese lovers. Tchaikovsky did neglect, however, to point up Mercutio's ungentlemanly behavior to Juliet's nurse. And that brings up the question: Just how should pungent Elizabethan speech be transformed into music? The performance last night, more restrained than that of a few weeks ago in the "regular" series, was wholly admirable.

This program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon. The next concerto in the Monday-Tuesday series, Jan 17 and 18, will be conducted by Daniele Amfitheatrof. C. W. D.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
SUNDAY COURIER

DEC 19 1937

STRADIVARI HONORED AT BOSTON CONCERT

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (U.P.)—Marking the 200th anniversary of Antonio Stradivari's death, Jascha Heifetz and the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight ~~played~~ the new, tuneful Second Violin Concerto by Serge Prokofieff.

Heifetz used his own "Strad" which netted the maker only about $60 but which is now valued at $60,000.

ELIZABETHTON, TENN.
STAR

DEC 19 1937

Famous Violin Maker Is Honored In Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 18. (AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
DEC 29 1937

Raya Garbousova Symphony Soloist

Russian Girl 'Cellist Enchants in Boccherini and Tschaikowsky

It was broad and accommodating program making that Dr. Koussevitzsky gave the Monday night and the Tuesday afternoon audiences of this week at Symphony Hall. He led the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a third and fourth performance through the recently composed Concerto for Orchestra of a 36 year old Soviet musician—Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky. Modern, but clear-charactered, it enlists interest by its rhythmic Sinfonia section (which might be a trifle more sharply accented in its playing); its instrumentation expanding dynamically; its dirgelike opening Passacaglia developing lyrically in something akin to the sounds of Nature and far more normal and wholesome than some of the moderns when they occasionally fall into Debussyism as temporary concession to beauty; and its triumphant Toccata that may be taken as celebration of great works accomplished. "As you like it." This hearer was held.

Then, for the ones who turned away, the infallibly pleasing Boccherini to win back their attention. This Concerto for Violincello in B flat major Op. 34 was so exquisitely simple of theme, so artfully written to set and reveal the delicate virtues of a technician of the solo instrument, that from his Eighteenth Century elegance, old Boccherini of Italy may be fancied to have foreseen the slender, fairhaired Russian young woman soloist and her esteemed compatriot who subtly moulded his orchestral forces to illumine her graces. Raya Garbousova has an apparently small tone but rounded in its light resonance, consistent in register. Set off against the virtuoso support of the Boston Symphony, it remained ever the solo instrument. One of her cadenzas (by other than Boccherini) included a passage played with fairylike touch continuously taken. A sustained tone against a rapidly timed passage for the orchestra seemed the height of felicitous writing.

"Now if a work demanding a broader style could be given," one thought, and here was another example of Garbousova's abilities in the Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violincello, Op. 33 of Tschaikowsky. Then Michele, one time Boston cellist, came to mind but all comparison was forgotten in the technical marvels of chromatics as impossibly perfect as running water; in an arcando of the most unimagined musical tone; in a concluding held tone of flutelike quality that was twinned by another instrument one took for a real woodwind. To note the entrances or joinings of soloist and orchestra is only once again to point out a Koussevitzkyian felicity.

Were there any still unsatisfied, the Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia fulfilled desire with its romance, its brilliance and its pathos. After Garbousova's miracles and charms of person, attention strayed in this big symphonic piece—sure of frequent return to programs. Yet for the first time one came to reflect how ideally vernal, with the lift of youth, these Veronese lovers' tale was told in comparison with the more lustful loves of Tristan and Isolde.

A. C. R.

(88)

Soviet Art Tested by Brahms

Trans. Dec. 18/37

Jascha Heifetz Wins Ovation for His Interpretation Of New Prokofieff Concerto and That of Brahms

By Redfern Mason

There is only one unpardonable sin in conductors. It is dullness. That is the sin against the Holy Ghost of music, and Serge Koussevitzky has not a touch of it. That he is brilliant as an interpreter Boston well knows: but I wonder if they sense his ingenuity in program-making.

Yesterday he gave us a taste of the art of Soviet Russia, and then—was it to take the taste out of our months?—he gave us the Violin Concerto of Johannes Brahms, which is a work steeped in romantic classicism.

The audience was on the qui vive. Could it be that these Marxians were capable of creating beauty? So they listened with keen interest to the Concerto for orchestra of Starokadomsky, one of whose names is Michael and another Leonidas. And the work did not belie this lusty nomenclature. It was courageous, year—saying, from the first, energetic too, with not so much as a suspicion of pessimism about it. Did that rasping brass and that groan of the tuba signify fierce antagonism to the Tsarist regime? Conceivably so; but, whatever it meant, it was not music to which you could be indifferent.

There was beauty in the slow movement. The Soviets have not banished loveliness from their cosmos. The concluding movement is a toccata, almost insolent in its audacity at times, with a fugato which proved that Starokadomsky is content to learn from the past.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave of his best to this music of a regime wtih which he has probably little sympathy. The audience, perhaps not caring overmuch for the social significance of the score, applauded it as impartially as if it had been written by a member of our Liberty League. They were not to be robbed of their pleasure by the thought that the composer voiced a political attitude which was not their own.

As if to emphasize his complete artistic tolerance the director gave us the second violin concert of Serge Prokofieff, with Jascha Heifetz to plead the cause of the composer with the eloquent tones of his fiddle. It is a work of widely diffused lyricism. Manifestly the Soviet instruments have not lost the power to sing. Not markedly racial, the themes are of unmistakable beauty, and the Heifetz violin made them fall on delighted ears. Yet it was a beauty that spoke of something far different from what the classic concerto has accustomed us to expect. Prokofieff has his own way of elaborating a musical conceit.

There is a refreshing novelty of procedure in his work and it is not impossible that, when the public has heard the concerto a dozen times, it will be taken to the popular heart.

Both of these works have been composed during the last four years. They are therefore representative of contemporary Russian thought, and yesterday they were given their first performance in the United States. Perhaps the most notable thing about them is that the Slavism of the composers is not less manifest than is their manifest indebtedness to the great masters of the past. That fact is important. It means that in music, as in social development, what is worth preserving, the philosophy that endures, is a growth. The wisdom of today is necessarily indebted to the wisdom of the past. As Cardinal Newman has pointed out in his "Development of Christian Doctrine," the work in which he wrote himself out of the Anglican into the Roman church, if a system is sound it will continue to exist; if it is unsound, it will go the way of corruption.

The audience did not express its views on the inner significance of the music to which they had been listening. But they obviously were not antagonized by it. On the contrary, it intrigued them. The French Revolution gave us nothing better than the "Marseillaise" and the "Ca ira"; but these Russians have produced works in which people who certainly cannot be accused of entertaining subversive ideas can take pleasure.

The Brahms Concerto brought the concert to a magnificent conclusion. No need to use the "Exit in case of Brahms"; people loved it and they did not know which to admire the more, Heifetz, who has come into his artistic maturity, or the astute Koussevitzky, who brings the tendencies of today into comparison with the gospel of Brahms

The work was superbly played and the well remembered strains fell on the ear as gratefully as if they were the revelation of a new heaven and a new earth. Heifetz made good the claim of his admirers that he is one of the apostolic succession of fiddlers. Nay, when the performance came to an end, the members of the orchestra were, if possible, even more enthusiastic than was the audience.

Throwing aside their traditional reserve our Bostonians applauded with a heartiness that was worthy of Vienna. They gave another proof that the most important thing in the history of a symphony orchestra is the public which listens to it. It has taken Vienna centuries to create its public; Boston has done as much in half a century.

CANTON, O.
REPOSITORY

MUSIC

Her. Dec. 28/37

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert in the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall and will be repeated this afternoon. Raya Garbousova, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Concerto for Orchestra Op. 14	Starokadomsky
'Cello Concerto in B flat major	Boccherini
Variations on a Rococo Theme for 'cello and orchestra Op. 33	Tchaikovsky
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-Fantasia	Tchaikovsky

This was a singularly interesting concert, chiefly for its variety and its performance. There was variety even with two works by Tchaikovsky, since those works represent opposite poles of the composer's imagination. On the side of performance Miss Garbousova, an expert 'cellist as we have had previous occasion to observe, gave two excellent interpretations of music that is not very frequently heard.

Concertos for 'cello are apt to be dull and to show a composer in a lesser flight of genius. If a man from Mars were to hear, during his stay on earth, only the 'cello concertos of Haydn, Schumann, Dvorak, Elgar and Saint-Saens, he might be inclined to judge harshly of the reputations of those composers. Boccherini, on the other hand, is a horse of a different color.

We do not expect his music to be more than grateful for the instrument and pleasing to the ear. Fortunately Miss Garbousova did not follow the practice of some 'cellists who overload this simple music with a fire-eating personality. She played it with beauty of tone, but without exaggeration. Since, however, she was going to play after the intermission, she might have let us take her technical accomplishments for granted and spared us those nasty cadenzas.

Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme are a charming experiment in style and are well worth hearing more often. The music has brilliance and lyric beauty and is nearest in spirit to the composer's ballets, furthest from the symphonies. The ornamentation, in the sense that the title and the nature of the theme imply, is graceful and artfully designed and does not become laborious.

Miss Garbousova and the orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, played this work with great delicacy and alertness. Miss Garbousova was cordially applauded, though the audience seemed, after the demonstrations on the last two Fridays and Saturdays, a little indifferent. It remained for the romantic intensity and a splendid performance of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" to rouse the public to a realization of what an excellent concert this had been.

We have not left ourselves much space for a consideration of the new work by Starokadomsky, although it was discussed at length in these columns when first played, Dec. 17. It is impressive music, admirable for its construction and its presentation. The last movement, or toccata, still seems to us the weakest, when the composer is beguiled into too prolonged a discussion of his ideas.

The Passacaglia needs to be followed with the closest attention in order to appreciate its merits, whereas it is easy to take immediate pleasure in the first movement. This must surely be one of the best works of art to have been produced by Soviet Russia.

SEATS AT SYMPHONY FOR CONCERT SERIES

Seats for Flagstad and the Philadelphia Orchestra will be available at the Symphony Hall box office until Saturday of this week to those desiring to subscribe to the remaining four events in the Aaron Richmond Symphony Hall series for which the next attraction will be Marian Anderson on Sunday afternoon. The closing event of this series will take place Friday evening, March 11.

'Cellist, Musician, Artist

Trans. Dec. 26/37

RAYA GARBOUSOVA

Russian 'cellist appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

Real Story Behind the Outburst of Koussevitzky "Temperament"

Post - Dec. 19/37

What really happened to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky when he was leading Mozart's superb Symphony in A Major last week for Pittsburgh's "music lovers"?

During the past week local musical circles buzzed with the rumor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's beloved maestro suddenly slammed down his baton after beginning the second movement of the famous symphony and angrily strode from the stage.

Here's the real story behind this apparent exhibition of temperament:

It happened in the Syria Mosque, the Smoky City's symphony hall, Serge Koussevitzky, one of the nation's most capable and well known maestros, had just begun the Andante movement of Mozart's 29th Symphony.

The conductor turned to direct the violins on the left of the stage when he was suddenly thrown off stride by a sudden flash of light from an opened doorway just off the stage.

The leader halted his baton in midbeat and a man and woman who, in direct violation of the rule that all doors must remain closed during the playing of a symphony selection, had discovered one unguarded door and made their entrance.

Discourtesy to His Art

As Mr. Koussevitzky held his baton at rest, the couple stopped dead in their tracks. The leader resumed. Then the couple darted for seats, ignoring ushers who sought futilely to bar their way.

The conductor then laid down his baton and left the stage.

Off the stage, he exploded. "The fools, better they should stay at home, in bed," he cried. "I will not go back there, never! They should have some respect for the art."

After three minutes, he was calmed, and returned to the podium to resume the movement for the third time, this time completing it without incident.

The audience of 3500 was wholly in sympathy with the director. They met his return with an enthusiastic burst of applause, and one music-lover cried bitterly, "We certainly have been put in our place. I'd like to wring the necks of that couple."

With few exceptions, all agreed that the incident was a "good lesson for Pittsburgh." The smoky city's reputation in courtesy to artists has always been somewhat doubtful. Once before, Pittsburgh's own conductor, Emil Paur, halted in the midst of a rendition, sat down on the podium, and just waited until the audience quieted.

At another time, Leopold Stokowski, leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra, stopped a concert in Pittsburgh because a group of workmen were noisily conversing underneath the stage.

When Koussevitzky later led his orchestra into Sibelius' Symphony in D Major, any ill-effects of the previous interruption seemed to have entirely disappeared. He himself said gratefully that his men reached "magnificent heights" in presenting the Finnish composer's works.

A Good Lesson

After the concert, the maestro wrote to his friend, Sibelius:

"I write to tell you what I think of audiences that do not behave. We have played nine concerts in ten days. It is a great strain. This afternoon in Pittsburgh some people walk in when I am conducting Mozart, and it is too much—I leave the stage.

"What is it, my friend, that makes them act so? They buy good seats, and then they come late. They should not do this. They must learn respect for the art, respect for the music, respect for the musicians."

There you have the whole story as it really happened. If you are one of those traditional late-comers, you will perhaps attribute the entire incident to temperament. On the other hand, if you are a real symphony enthusiast, you will agree that it is not only a good lesson for Pittsburgh audiences, but for individuals everywhere.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES - PICAYUNE

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY

Post Dec. 28/37

All Russian Music to Be Repeated Today

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the most enjoyable concerts of the current Symphony season was that of last evening which, according to the new ordering of the Monday and Tuesday concerts, will be repeated this afternoon. Russian music is in the air just now! There was a Russian programme by the forces of the Federal Music Project at Sanders Theatre Sunday evening, and 24 hours later Dr. Koussevitzky was offering music by Tchaikovsky and Starokadomsky. And if there was also a 'cello concerto of the Italian Boccherini the soloist was again Russian, the accomplished and attractive Raya Garbousova.

When Starokadomsky's Concert for orchestra was played here for the first time, at a recent pair of "regular" concerts, it proved a well-made work which suffered by comparison with the pieces which followed it. Last evening, with Boccherini and Tchaikovsky replacing Prokofieff and Brahms, it suffered the same fate. The difficulty is that these other composers have been speaking with a voice unmistakably their own, while Starokadomsky, still relatively at his beginnings, has not assimilated the various sources of his style. In this Concerto we hear Bach, Stravinsky and Scriabin. Indeed, if we were to hear Starokadomsky again we would not know him.

Boccherini's Concerto in B-flat major, last heard here in 1923, is a singularly delightful composition, in which Italian warmth is wedded to 18th century elegance. Last evening's performance was no less ingratiating than the music. For her other piece Miss Garbousova chose Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, which had gone unheard here even longer. It deserved no such neglect, for it is a singularly deft and gracious piece, affording the soloist all manner of opportunity and gratefully written for the orchestra as well. The concert ended with another repetition from earlier in the season, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture. Again the performance was to a degree vivid, dramatic and emotionally songful.

STRADIVARI'S MEMORY HONORED BY RECITAL

By The Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 18. — A World renowned violinist and a world renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing on a rich toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Musicians Honor Antonio Stradivari

BOSTON, Dec. 18—(AP)—A world

(As above right) ETC.

MUSICAL TRIBUTES PAID STRADIVARIUS

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—A renowned violinist and a great sym-

ETC.

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
POST

DEC 19 1937

ETC.

Concert Tribute Paid to Greatest of Violin Makers

Heifetz Plays to Honor Memory of Antonio Stradivari

(The Associated Press)

Boston, Dec. 18.—A world-renowned

ETC.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

(89)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 19 1937

A TRIBUTE TO STRADIVARI

—Associated Press Photo

Jascha Heifetz, Shown Here With His Stradivari Violin Valued at $30,000. Played Two Concertos for the Violin With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night in a Tribute to the Greatest Violin Maker of All Time—Antonio Stradivari, Who Died 200 Years Ago. About 170 Authentic "Strads" Are Known to Exist in the United States.

Boston Honors Antonio Stradivari, World's Greatest Maker of Violins

Jascha Heifetz Plays $50,000 Instrument Famed Italian Manufactured; Koussevitzky Conducts; Soloist Able to Spot Real "Strad" Easily

Boston, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One number was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but, in development of tunes and melody, harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahms' in D-major.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heifetz values his Stradivari at $50,000. Gently handling the instrument while discussing the maker before the concert, Heifetz lightly snapped his fingernails against the top surface, a sure way, he said, to indicate the superior Stradivari tone qualities.

Hardly a week goes by without some eager person bringing to the orchestra a violin discovered in the attic or other storage place with the report it had "been in the family at least 100 years."

But with the first note from the instrument, Heifetz could tell the violin was a poor one at the start and had not improved with the lapse of a century. False labels inside notoriously bad instruments are responsible for many false hopes.

A transparent mellow varnish, shading delicately between orange and yellow, is one mark a connoisseur recognizes in a Stradivari, and one secret of the tone is the formula of the varnish and the manner of application—a secret that still baffles science.

Other characteristics:

A subtle, individual curvature on the top and back, visible by turning the instrument so a ray of light traces the rise and fall of the wood:

A superior quality of wood and grain;

A characteristic swing or dash to the sound holes, also known as the FF-holes:

Individual accentuation of the corners terminating the inward curves at the sides:

Extreme skill in construction of the "purfling" or inlaid wooden edging which overhangs the junction of the belly and the back with the sides.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
DE[illegible] 193[illegible]

Heifetz and Prokofieff Lead Stradivari Tribute

AP Dispatch—etc. as below

TORONTO, CAN.
GLOBE
DEC 20 1937

Ace of Violin Makers Paid Homage in Music

Heifetz, Boston Orchestra Give Concert on 200th Anniversary of Death of Antonio Stradivari

Boston, Dec. 19 (AP).—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined Saturday night in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One number was the first performance in the United States of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but, in development of melody, harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahm's in D Major.

Nearly Half Output Lost.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1,100 instruments, of which nearly one-half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in the United States. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heifetz values his Stradivari at $50,000. Gently handling the instrument while discussing the maker before the concert, Heifetz lightly snapped his fingernails against the top surface, a sure way, he said, to indicate the superior Stradivari tone qualities.

False Labels Buoy Hopes.

Hardly a week goes by without some eager person bringing a violin discovered in the attic or other storage place with the report it had "been in the family at least 100 years."

But with the first note from the instrument, Heifetz could tell the violin was a poor one at the start and had not improved with the lapse of a century. False labels inside notoriously bad instruments are responsible for many hopes.

A transparent mellow varnish, shading delicately between orange and yellow, is one mark a connisseur recognizes in a Stradivari, and one secret of the tone is the formula of the varnish and the manner of application—a secret that still baffles science.

Audiences in Canada Called Brighter Than in U.S.

The unexplored part of the Antarctic continent is larger than the United States and Mexico combined, according to Dr. Laurence M. Gould, second in command of Byrd's first Expedition, who lectured before the Royal Canadian Institute in Convocation Hall, Saturday night. Evidence of immense coal deposits was found, said the speaker who supported the view, expressed by Professor Griffith Taylor of the University of Toronto that the Antarctic probably has more coal than any other place in the world. He preferred lecturing to Canadian audiences, said Dr. Gould, because he found them more understanding. No one in Canada had ever asked him what he called the inexcusable question "What is the use of it all?"

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, offered a program, Russian in aspect since it embraced works from both the old and the new Russia and included a Caucasian girl, Raya Jarbousova, as soloist.

The program opened with Starokadomsky's Concerto for Orchestra and proceeded to the Boccherini Concerto in B flat major, for cello and orchestra, After the intermission came a second cello item, Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, and to close, the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia.

The Starokadomsky work was recently reviewed in this column, following its first performances here at a Friday concert. It is music to which one should bring alert faculties, if he would gain the most from it. The performance last night in every way equalled that of the previous performance. In fact, in some respects it seemed to this commentator that several passages in the final movement came through with even greater clarity.

Miss Garbousova again played with assurance and with complete control of her bow arm. It was unfortunate that her intonation did not match the dexterity with which she accomplished difficult passages in bowing. There were moments, however, numbers of them, when her tone was of a lovely quality and her technique fully adequate to the task in hand.

The final orchestral work was endowed with all the effulgence which Dr. Koussevitzky can summon when the text is of material which warrants the display of this characteristic, and orchestra and conductor were generously applauded.

G. M. S.

ELL SUNDAY
Dec. 26/37

RAYA GARBOUSOVA,
Russian Cellist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Will Conduct Four Times This Week

New Bedford Standard

Dr. Koussevitzky Plans Two Tempting Programs For Boston Symphony

Dec. 28/37

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has excelled even his own highly reputed program making in the two pairs of concerts he announces for this holiday week. Both music and artists assisting have the lure of novelty. A recently produced and well received Soviet symphony was repeated last evening and will be in the duplicate program this afternoon. This Monday and Tuesday's pair brings for a second time with this orchestra the young Russian 'cellist Raya Garbousova. For the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pair of concerts (December 31 and January 1) Dr. Koussevitzky presents for the first time in America the Helsinki University Chorus from Helsingfors, Finland. This men's chorus will introduce to America two compositions for chorus and orchestra by their illustrious fellow-countryman, Jean Sibelius, "The Captive Queen" and another, to replace "The Origin of Fire" first discovered as lost. Dr. Koussevitzky's readings of Sibelius scores are world-noted. Except for the Boston concerts and one with the Boston orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York, the following Thursday, the Helsinki chorus on their tour make no other appearances with orchestra.

For last evening and today at the three o'clock "Commuters' Matinee", the program includes the Concerto in B flat major of Boccherini (graceful-writing contemporary of Haydn) and the Rococo Variations of Tschaikowsky with Garbousova, equally distinguished for her personal beauty and that of her playing. Few men are pre-eminent as recitalists on the 'cello and Garbousova, who is nearly alone among women 'cello soloists, has won extremely high standing among her male rivals.

The Concerto for Orchestra of the young Soviet composer, Starokadomsky, which was recently giv-

cont. left

MAURICE RAVEL, COMPOSER, DEAD

Celebrated French Musician Wrote 'Bolero'

PARIS, Dec. 28 (AP)—Maurice Ravel, 62, France's most celebrated modern composer, whose works included the widely known "Bolero," died today.

Death was caused by a cerebral hemorrhage after he had undergone grave head surgery. The musician had been failing in health for years.

Besides "Bolero," his best known works included "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs," piano compositions; "Quatuor en Fa," the symphonic "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse," the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe," "Sheherazade" and a late piano concerto.

Ravel won the second prize in the 1901 competition for the Prix de Rome, much-sought French scholarship for study in Italy, causing murmurs of protest among critics, who thought he should have had the top honor.

A major controversy burst, however, in 1905, when the musician, who had reached the age limit of 30, was rejected at the preliminary examination.

The Liberal press, critics and music circles charged that Ravel, whose originality and disregard for tradition had aroused opposition among classicists, was being "persecuted" by the jury of the Institute of France.

Critics, pointing out he already had written a string quartet and other recognized works, protested that bias caused his elimination from preliminaries designed simply to reject incompetent candidates.

An aftermath of the controversy was the resignation of one of the jurors, Theodore DuBois, as director of the conservatory of music. He was replaced by Gabriel Faure, who was a teacher and vigorous champion of Ravel.

The composer frequently was the center of controversy after 1905, his "Histoires Naturelles" in 1907 provoking a new storm.

Later, many of his works became modern classics.

Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, France. He studied composition, harmony and pianoforte at the National Conservatory in Paris.

Ravel was appointed director of the American Conservatory at the Fontainebleau Summer School of Music in 1934, but his health forced him to abandon the post.

He underwent an operation Dec. 17 and another last Wednesday. His physician said the musician never spoke after the first operation.

Dies in Paris

MAURICE RAVEL

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 19 1937

(89)

A TRIBUTE TO STRADIVARI

—Associated Press Photo

Jascha Heifetz, Shown Here With His Stradivari Violin Valued at $30,000. Played Two Concertos for the Violin With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night in a Tribute to the Greatest Violin Maker of All Time—Antonio Stradivari, Who Died 200 Years Ago. About 170 Authentic "Strads" Are Known to Exist in the United States.

Boston Honors Antonio Stradivari, World's Greatest Maker of Violins

Jascha Heifetz Plays $50,000 Instrument Famed Italian Manufactured; Koussevitzky Conducts; Soloist Able to Spot Real "Strad" Easily

Boston, Dec. 18.—(AP)—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined tonight in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago today.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One number was the first performance in America of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but, in development of tunes and melody, harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahms' in D-major.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1100 instruments, of which nearly one half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in America. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heifetz values his Stradivari at $50,000. Gently handling the instrument while discussing the maker before the concert, Heifetz lightly snapped his fingernails against the top surface, a sure way, he said, to indicate the superior Stradivari tone qualities.

Hardly a week goes by without some eager person bringing to the orchestra a violin discovered in the attic or other storage place with the report it had "been in the family at least 100 years."

But with the first note from the instrument, Heifetz could tell the violin was a poor one at the start and had not improved with the lapse of a century. False labels inside notoriously bad instruments are responsible for many false hopes.

A transparent mellow varnish, shading delicately between orange and yellow, is one mark a connoisseur recognizes in a Stradivari, and one secret of the tone is the formula of the varnish and the manner of application—a secret that still baffles science.

Other characteristics:

A subtle, individual curvature on the top and back, visible by turning the instrument so a ray of light traces the rise and fall of the wood;

A superior quality of wood and grain;

A characteristic swing or dash to the sound holes, also known as the FF-holes;

Individual accentuation of the corners terminating the inward curves at the sides;

Extreme skill in construction of the "purfling" or inlaid wooden edging which overhangs the junction of the belly and the back with the sides.

VELL SUNDAY

Dec. 26/37

RAYA GARBOUSOVA,
Russian Cellist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TORONTO, CAN.
GLOBE

DEC 20 1937

Ace of Violin Makers Paid Homage in Music

Heifetz, Boston Orchestra Give Concert on 200th Anniversary of Death of Antonio Stradivari

Boston, Dec. 19 (AP).—A world-renowned violinist and a world-renowned symphony orchestra joined Saturday night in tribute to the greatest of violin makers, Antonio Stradivari, who died 200 years ago.

Playing for this occasion on a rich-toned violin made by Stradivari in 1731, Jascha Heifetz performed two concertos for violin. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

One number was the first performance in the United States of the second concerto of the contemporary Russian, Sergei Prokofieff, a work decidedly modern in instrumentation but, in development of melody, harking back to composers contemporaneous with Stradivari. The other concerto was Brahm's in D Major.

Nearly Half Output Lost.

In Stradivari's long life—he died at the age of 93 in Cremona, Italy—he produced approximately 1,100 instruments, of which nearly one-half have been lost. Only about 170 of his instruments are known to exist in the United States. In Europe there are an additional 540—each as completely pedigreed as a thoroughbred horse.

Heifetz values his Stradivari at $50,000. Gently handling the instrument while discussing the maker before the concert, Heifetz lightly snapped his fingernails against the top surface, a sure way, he said, to indicate the superior Stradivari tone qualities.

False Labels Buoy Hopes.

Hardly a week goes by without some eager person bringing a violin discovered in the attic or other storage place with the report it had "been in the family at least 100 years."

But with the first note from the instrument, Heifetz could tell the violin was a poor one at the start and had not improved with the lapse of a century. False labels inside notoriously bad instruments are responsible for many hopes.

A transparent mellow varnish, shading delicately between orange and yellow, is one mark a connisseur recognizes in a Stradivari, and one secret of the tone is the formula of the varnish and the manner of application—a secret that still baffles science.

Audiences in Canada Called Brighter Than in U.S.

The unexplored part of the Antarctic continent is larger than the United States and Mexico combined, according to Dr. Laurence M. Gould, second in command of Byrd's first Expedition, who lectured before the Royal Canadian Institute in Convocation Hall, Saturday night. Evidence of immense coal deposits was found, said the speaker who supported the view, expressed by Professor Griffith Taylor of the University of Toronto that the Antarctic probably has more coal than any other place in the world. He preferred lecturing to Canadian audiences, said Dr. Gould, because he found them more understanding. No one in Canada had ever asked him what he called the inexcusable question "What is the use of it all?"

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

DEC 19 1937

Heifetz and Prokofieff Lead Stradivari Tribute

AP Dispatch—etc. as below

Nov. Dec. '37

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, offered a program, Russian in aspect since it embraced works from both the old and the new Russia and included a Caucasian girl, Raya Jarbousova, as soloist.

The program opened with Starokadomsky's Concerto for Orchestra and proceeded to the Boccherini Concerto in B flat major, for cello and orchestra, After the intermission came a second cello item, Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, and to close, the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia.

The Starokadomsky work was recently reviewed in this column, following its first performances here at a Friday concert. It is music to which one should bring alert faculties, if he would gain the most from it. The performance last night in every way equalled that of the previous performance. In fact, in some respects it seemed to this commentator that several passages in the final movement came through with even greater clarity.

Miss Garbousova again played with assurance and with complete control of her bow arm. It was unfortunate that her intonation did not match the dexterity with which she accomplished difficult passages in bowing. There were moments, however, numbers of them, when her tone was of a lovely quality and her technique fully adequate to the task in hand.

The final orchestral work was endowed with all the effulgence which Dr. Koussevitzky can summon when the text is of material which warrants the display of this characteristic, and orchestra and conductor were generously applauded.

G. M. S.

Will Conduct Four Times This Week

New Bedford Mercury

Dr. Koussevitzky Plans Two Tempting Programs For Boston Symphony

Dec. 28/37

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has excelled even his own highly reputed program making in the two pairs of concerts he announces for this holiday week. Both music and artists assisting have the lure of novelty. A recently produced and well received Soviet symphony was repeated last evening and will be in the duplicate program this afternoon. This Monday and Tuesday's pair brings for a second time with this orchestra the young Russian 'cellist Raya Garbousova. For the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pair of concerts (December 31 and January 1) Dr. Koussevitzky presents for the first time in America the Helsinki University Chorus from Helsingfors, Finland. This men's chorus will introduce to America two compositions for chorus and orchestra [illegible] "The Origin of Fire" [illegible] as lost. Dr. Koussevitzky's readings of Sibelius scores are world-noted. Except for the Boston concerts and one with the Boston orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York, the following Thursday, the Helsinki chorus on their tour make no other appearances with orchestra.

For last evening and today at the three o'clock "Commuters' Matinee", the program includes the Concerto in B flat major of Boccherini (graceful-writing contemporary of Haydn) and the Rococo Variations of Tschaikowsky with Garbousova, equally distinguished for her personal beauty and that of her playing. Few men are pre-eminent as recitalists on the 'cello and Garbousova, who is nearly alone among women 'cello soloists, has won extremely high standing among her male rivals.

The Concerto for Orchestra of the young Soviet composer, Starokadomsky, which was recently giv-

cont. left

MAURICE RAVEL, COMPOSER, DEAD

Celebrated French Musician Wrote 'Bolero'

PARIS, Dec. 28 (AP)—Maurice Ravel, 62, France's most celebrated modern composer, whose works included the widely known "Bolero," died today.

Death was caused by a cerebral hemorrhage after he had undergone grave head surgery. The musician had been failing in health for years.

Besides "Bolero," his best known works included "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs," piano compositions; "Quatuor en Fa," the symphonic "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse," the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe," "Sheherazade" and a late piano concerto.

Ravel won the second prize in the 1901 competition for the Prix de Rome, much-sought French scholarship for study in Italy, causing murmurs of protest among critics, who thought he should have had the top honor.

A major controversy burst, however, in 1905, when the musician, who had reached the age limit of 30, was rejected at the preliminary examination.

The Liberal press, critics and music circles charged that Ravel, whose originality and disregard for tradition had aroused opposition among classicists, was being "persecuted" by the jury of the Institute of France.

Critics, pointing out he already had written a string quartet and other recognized works, protested that bias caused his elimination from preliminaries designed simply to reject incompetent candidates.

An aftermath of the controversy was the resignation of one of the jurors, Theodore DuBois, as director of the conservatory of music. He was replaced by Gabriel Faure, who was a teacher and vigorous champion of Ravel.

The composer frequently was the center of controversy after 1905, his "Histoires Naturelles" in 1907 provoking a new storm.

Later, many of his works became modern classics.

Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, France. He studied composition, harmony and pianoforte at the National Conservatory in Paris.

Ravel was appointed director of the American Conservatory at the Fontainebleau Summer School of Music in 1934, but his health forced him to abandon the post.

He underwent an operation Dec. 17 and another last Wednesday. His physician said the musician never spoke after the first operation.

Dies in Paris

MAURICE RAVEL

Harvard Club to Give Dinner to Symphony

Trav. Dec 28

Unusual Event Will Occur Jan. 28—Koussevitzky Expresses Elation

The Harvard Club of Boston will give a dinner in honor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Jan. 28.

It seems only natural, but the fact is it's never been done before. There will be about 500 men in Harvard Hall on Commonwealth avenue that night, among them about 100 musicians, without instruments.

The cultural implications of the dinner for the hosts, the guests and the city will be spoken by Bentley Wirt Warren, Serge Koussevitzky and James Rowland Angell. Edward A. Taft will be toastmaster.

There is no end of reasons why the Harvard Club of Boston should have the Boston Symphony Orchestra in to break bread, but Charles H. Watkins, chairman of the entertainment committee for the Harvard Club, will tell you there is no particular reason for this particular dinner.

Higginson Was Founder

The late Henry Lee Higginson, first president of the Harvard Club of Boston, was founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony orchestra. To Serge Koussevitzky, who crosses the Charles River Thursday nights to bring music to Cambridge, Harvard gave its doctorate of laws in 1929. He is a member of the Harvard Club of Boston. So is G. E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

President-emeritus Angell of Yale University, who received a Harvard honorary doctorate of laws, too, is now educational adviser to the National Broadcasting Company. N. B. C. brought Dr. Koussevitzky's and Boston's music to the nation on a coast-to-coast hookup. Edward A. Taft is not only president of the Har-

Continued on Page 2—Column 3

MAURICE RAVEL

30

The death on Tuesday of one of the greatest modern composers, Joseph Maurice Ravel, means something more than the passing of an important contemporary figure in the arts. As Dr. Koussevitzky pointed out, it does in a sense signify the end of an era. To be sure that era may be said to have ended more exactly some years before, even earlier than the period when Ravel's illness prevented him from creative activity.

Like Debussy, Ravel was a consummate craftsman, and both composers explored the possibilities of writing modern music on old forms. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," for example, is one of the loveliest suites in existence and is ingeniously archaic. For sheer beauty of tone for tone's sake there is nothing quite like it. In this connection it should be said that Ravel's greatest claim to fame was his extraordinary skill as an orchestrator. His taste in this difficult art was impeccable. Students will unquestionably read his scores, as they do those of Rimsky-Korsakoff, to guide them in their own attempts at instrumentation.

Ravel will be remembered in the future for works like the "Tombeau de Couperin" and "Daphnis and Chloe," for his chamber music and his songs, rather than for a tour de force, clever as it is, like the Bolero. Ravel has figured prominently in his own day, and there will not lack detractors who will say that his works, like those of Spohr and Meyerbeer and Raff, will be soon forgotten. But analogies of that sort are a little too easy. Ravel brought something to the art of music that was different from any other composer's talent. He created, of course, some imitative and unimportant works, but the world will be grievously the worse if it chooses to neglect those of his compositions that rejoice in an exquisite texture of sound and perfection of workmanship.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

19 1937

Gardner Read's Symphony

A suite for strings by Gardner Read, whose symphony was played by the New York philharmonic-symphony under John Barbirolli, has been accepted by Serge Koussevitzky for performance by the Boston symphony this season.

Concerto for Orchestra of "The Origin of Fire" just discover-the young Soviet composer, Staro- ed as lost. Dr. Koussevitzky's kadomsky, which was recently giv- readings of Sibelius scores are

---

France's Foremost Composer Dies

MAURICE RAVEL

Trans. Dec 28

Ravel Dies in Paris, 62; Conducted Here in 1928

French Composer Ill for Six Years—Center of Critical Storm

PARIS, Dec. 28 (AP)—Maurice Ravel, the composer, died today as a result of a head operation. He was sixty-two.

Ravel, who had been in failing health for years, had undergone the operation last Wednesday. His brother Edouard was at his bedside when he died.

Death ended the agony which the composer had suffered intermittently for six years and which had curtailed his work.

Once criticized as the writer of "dangerous and anarchist" music, Ravel had finally gained recognition as the foremost of modern French composers. His best known works included: "Bolero"; the piano compositions, "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs"; the string quartet, "Quatuor en Fa"; symphonic works, "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse," and a late piano concerto.

Of Basque blood, Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, and studied composition and harmony and pianoforte at the National Conservatory of Music in Paris. He was the frequent center of musical controversy. In

Continued on Page 2—Column 4

Koussevitzky Mourns His Friend; Sees Passing of a Colorful Period

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was so moved today when he heard of the death of Maurice Ravel that he found difficulty in giving expression to his feelings.

"His passing," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "is a symbol of the passing of the most brilliant and colorful period of orchestral music. His loss is irremediable. I am too deeply shocked to express my feeling objectively, for today I have lost a great personal friend."

Dr. Koussevitzky was one of the earliest and most sincere admirers of Ravel's music in this country, but Boston was no more alert than the rest of the world to accept the composer as a master.

By 1928, however, when Ravel conducted his first and only concert here, his work had become familiar and respected. It was on Jan. 13 in that year that he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own music.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the composer have been friends and

Continued on Page 2—Column 4

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 26 1937

RAYA GARBOUSOVA ON BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Great beauty and great artist is Raya Garbousova, Russian 'cellist, who will be soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the "Commuters' Matinee" to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Tuesday, December 28, at 3.00. Miss Garbousova is one of the very few women to gain international acclaim as a virtuoso of the violoncello.

Starting her musical studies on the piano as a child, she turned to the 'cello after attending a performance by Koussevitzky on the bass viol.

The "Commuters' Matinees," of which five monthly concerts remain, attract music-lovers from as far as Castine, Maine. On the forthcoming program will be included a striking composition, just introduced to America by Koussevitzky. It is the "Concerto for Orchestra" by Michael Starokadomsky, brilliant young Soviet composer.

Maurice Ravel, Composer, Dies in Paris at 62

Six-Year Illness Curtailed Work—Center of Critical Storm

Continued from Page One

1905 the elimination competition for the Prix de Rome scholarship aroused charges that he was "persecuted" by the Classical Institute of France and he became famous overnight.

His "Histoires Naturelles" in 1907, musical sketches of animals, caused a new storm among critics. Later, many of his works became modern classics, frequently heard in the United States. His song set "Sheherazade" for voice and orchestra and his widely played musical comedy "L'Heure Espagnole" were produced at the Paris Opera.

Ravel's music combines the Gallic instinct for color and subtlety of expression with a directness of rhythm wholly lacking in many French modernists. He was never content merely to sit still and play with colored pebbles, as one writer accused DeBussy of doing.

cont above

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

DEC 29 1937

RAVEL, NOTED COMPOSER OF FRANCE, DIES

Modernist Fails To Recover From Grave Head Operation

Musician Was Center Of Controversial Storm In 1905

[By the Associated Press]

Paris, Dec. 28 — Maurice Ravel, France's most celebrated modern composer, whose works included the widely known "Bolero," died today at the age of 62.

Death was caused by a cerebral hemorrhage, after he had undergone grave head surgery. The musician had been failing in health for years.

Besides "Bolero," his best-known works included "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs," piano compositions; "Quatuor En Fa"; the symphonic "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse"; the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe"; "Sheherazade," and a late piano concerto.

Ravel won the second prize in the 1901 competition for the Prix de Rome, much-sought French scholarship for study in Italy, causing murmurs of protest among critics who thought he should have had the top honor.

Major Controversy Burst

A major controversy burst, however, in 1905 when the musician, who had reached the age limit of 30, was rejected at the preliminary examination.

The liberal press, critics and music circles charged that Ravel, whose originality and disregard for tradition had aroused opposition among classicists, was being "persecuted" by the jury of the Institute of France.

Critics, pointing out he already had written a string quartet and other recognized works, protested that bias caused his elimination from preliminaries designed simply to reject incompetent candidates.

An aftermath of the controversy was the resignation of one of the jurors, Theodore Dubois, as director of the Conservatory of Music. He was replaced by Gabriel Faure, who was a teacher and vigorous champion of Ravel.

Provoked New Storm

The composer frequently was the center of controversy after 1905, his "Histoires Naturelles" in 1907 provoking a new storm.

Later, many of his works became modern classics.

Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, France. He studied composition, harmony and pianoforte at the National Conservatory in Paris.

Ravel was appointed director of the American Conservatory at the Fontainebleau summer school of music in 1934, but his health forced him to abandon the post.

Twice Operated Upon

He underwent an operation December 17 and another last Wednesday. His physician said the musician never spoke after the first operation.

Death occurred in a private hospital. Tonight a line of mourners filed past the bier in the chapel of the hospital, where the body was placed pending arrangements for the funeral by Ravel's brother, Edouard.

The musician, a bachelor, passed his last years virtually alone at his home, west of Paris, declining to be decorated by the Government and plunged into despair by the illness which cut short his career.

Directness Of Rhythm

Ravel's music combines the Gallic instinct for color and subtlety of expression with a directness of rhythm wholly lacking in many French modernists. He never was content merely to sit still and play with colored pebbles, as one writer accused Debussy of doing.

Although personally he may not have been distinguished by boisterous humor, his music invariably was witty, as in his opera "L'Heure Espagnol," and his "Mother Goose" suite.

As an orchestrator he was unsurpassed by any composer of his generation, and these two qualities had much to do with his popularity in America.

Introduced To America

His American journey, under auspices of Pro Musica, a society founded in the interest of modern music in the 'twenties, was not a triumphal tour, although it served to introduce him to Americans as conductor and pianist, as well as composer.

He aroused interest by declaring that his model as a composer was Edgar Allan Poe. Poe's "Philosophy of Composition" led Ravel to abandon "the formlessness of the early French impressionists in favor of a return to classic standards," he insisted.

Regrets Death Of Ravel

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today said the "passing of Maurice Ravel is the passing of one of the most brilliant and colorful periods of orchestral composition." Ravel, visiting the United States about ten years ago, was a guest conductor of Koussevitzky, directing some of his own compositions.

(90

Maurice Ravel, Noted Composer, Dies in Paris

MAURICE RAVEL

Often Center of Controversies; His "Bolero" Widely Known

PARIS, Dec. 28 (AP) — Maurice Ravel, the celebrated French composer, died today as a result of a grave head operation. He was 62 years old.

Ravel, who had been in failing health for years, had undergone the operation last Wednesday Late last night his physicians reported his condition was causing serious concern. His brother, Edouard, was at his bedside when he succumbed, at a private hospital, at 3:30 A. M.

Dr. Clovis Vincent said death ended the agony which the composer had suffered intermittently for the last six years and which had curtailed his work.

Once criticized as the writer of

(Continued on Page Twenty-one)

LAUNDRY BURNS

Succumbs at Paris Home; His 'Bolero' Widely Known

(Continued from First Page)

"dangerous and Anarchist" music, Ravel had finally gained recognition as the foremost of modern composers.

His best-known works included "Bolero," the piano compositions, "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs"; the string quartet, "Quatuor en Fo"; symphonic works besides "Bolero," "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse," and a late piano concerto.

Of Basque blood, Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, France, and studied composition and harmony and pianoforte at the National Conservatory of Music in Paris.

He was the frequent center of musical controversy which started in 1905. In that year the elimination competition for the Prix de Rome scholarship aroused charges that he was "persecuted" by the Classical Institute of France and he became famous over night.

His "Histoires Naturelles" in 1907, musical sketches of animals, caused a new storm among critics.

WORKS FAMILIAR IN U. S.

Later, many of his works became modern classics, frequently heard in the United States. His song set "Sheherazade" for voice and orchestra and his widely played musical comedy "L'Heure Espagnole" were produced at the Paris opera.

Appointed director of the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau summer school of music in 1934, his delicate health forced him to abandon his post.

A bachelor, he lived in a suburban home, "Le Belvedere," at Montfort L'Amaury, west of Paris.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 26 1937

GARBOUSOVA SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Raya Garbousova, the brilliant young Russian 'cellist who appeared with the Boston Symphony

---

implied criticism, the peculia irony of his genius which evoke terror and pity for suffering hu manity.

THE IMPORTANCE OF LIV
ING, by Lin Yutang. A John Da
Book. Published by Reynal
Hitchcock, New York.
One of the outstanding books o

Harvard Club to Give Dinner to Symphony

Trav, Dec 28

Unusual Event Will Occur Jan. 28—Koussevitzky Expresses Elation

The Harvard Club of Boston will give a dinner in honor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Jan. 28.

It seems only natural, but the fact is it's never been done before. There will be about 500 men in Harvard Hall on Commonwealth avenue that night, among them about 100 musicians, without instruments.

The cultural implications of the dinner for the hosts, the guests and the city will be spoken by Bentley Wirt Warren, Serge Koussevitzky and James Rowland Angell. Edward A. Taft will be toastmaster.

There is no end of reasons why the Harvard Club of Boston should have the Boston Symphony Orchestra in to break bread, but Charles H. Watkins, chairman of the entertainment committee for the Harvard Club, will tell you there is no particular reason for this particular dinner.

Higginson Was Founder

The late Henry Lee Higginson, first president of the Harvard Club of Boston, was founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony orchestra. To Serge Koussevitzky, who crosses the Charles River Thursday nights to bring music to Cambridge, Harvard gave its doctorate of laws in 1929. He is a member of the Harvard Club of Boston. So is G. E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

President-emeritus Angell of Yale University, who received a Harvard honorary doctorate of laws, too, is now educational adviser to the National Broadcasting Company. N. B. C. brought Dr. Koussevitzky's and Boston's music to the nation on a coast-to-coast hookup. Edward A. Taft is not only president of the Har-

Continued on Page 2—Column 3

MAURICE RAVEL

Her 12-30

The death on Tuesday of one of the greatest modern composers, Joseph Maurice Ravel, means something more than the passing of an important contemporary figure in the arts. As Dr. Koussevitzky pointed out, it does in a sense signify the end of an era. To be sure that era may be said to have ended more exactly some years before, even earlier than the period when Ravel's illness prevented him from creative activity.

Like Debussy, Ravel was a consummate craftsman, and both composers explored the possibilities of writing modern music on old forms. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," for example, is one of the loveliest suites in existence and is ingeniously archaic. For sheer beauty of tone for tone's sake there is nothing quite like it. In this connection it should be said that Ravel's greatest claim to fame was his extraordinary skill as an orchestrator. His taste in this difficult art was impeccable. Students will unquestionably read his scores, as they do those of Rimsky-Korsakoff, to guide them in their own attempts at instrumentation.

Ravel will be remembered in the future for works like the "Tombeau de Couperin" and "Daphnis and Chloe," for his chamber music and his songs, rather than for a tour de force, clever as it is, like the Bolero. Ravel has figured prominently in his own day, and there will not lack detractors who will say that his works, like those of Spohr and Meyerbeer and Raff, will be soon forgotten. But analogies of that sort are a little too easy. Ravel brought something to the art of music that was different from any other composer's talent. He created, of course, some imitative and unimportant works, but the world will be grievously the worse if it chooses to neglect those of his compositions that rejoice in an exquisite texture of sound and perfection of workmanship.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
19 1937

Gardner Read's Symphony

A suite for strings by Gardner Read, whose symphony was played by the New York philharmonic-symphony under John Barbirolli, has been accepted by Serge Koussevitzky for performance by the Boston symphony this season.

The Concerto for Orchestra of the young Soviet composer, Staro-kadomsky, which was recently giv-

"The Origin of Fire" just discovered as last Dr. Koussevitzky's readings of Sibelius scores/Am

cont. left

France's Foremost Composer Dies

MAURICE RAVEL

Trans. Dec 28

Ravel Dies in Paris, 62; Conducted Here in 1928

French Composer Ill for Six Years—Center of Critical Storm

PARIS, Dec. 28 (AP)—Maurice Ravel, the composer, died today as a result of a head operation. He was sixty-two.

Ravel, who had been in failing health for years, had undergone the operation last Wednesday. His brother Edouard was at his bedside when he died.

Death ended the agony which the composer had suffered intermittently for six years and which had curtailed his work.

Once criticized as the writer of "dangerous and anarchist" music, Ravel had finally gained recognition as the foremost of modern French composers. His best known works included: "Bolero"; the piano compositions, "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs"; the string quartet, "Quatuor en Fa"; symphonic works, "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse," and a late piano concerto.

Of Basque blood, Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, and studied composition and harmony and pianoforte at the National Conservatory of Music in Paris. He was the frequent center of musical controversy. In

Continued on Page 2—Column 4

Koussevitzky Mourns His Friend; Sees Passing of a Colorful Period

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was so moved today when he heard of the death of Maurice Ravel that he found difficulty in giving expression to his feelings.

"His passing," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "is a symbol of the passing of the most brilliant and colorful period of orchestral music. His loss is irremediable. I am too deeply shocked to express my feeling objectively, for today I have lost a great personal friend."

Dr. Koussevitzky was one of the earliest and most sincere admirers of Ravel's music in this country, but Boston was no more alert than the rest of the world to accept the composer as a master.

By 1928, however, when Ravel conducted his first and only concert here, his work had become familiar and respected. It was on Jan. 13 in that year that he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own music.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the composer have been friends and

Continued on Page 2—Column 4

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
DEC 26 1937

RAYA GARBOUSOVA ON BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Great beauty and great artist is Raya Garbousova, Russian 'cellist, who will be soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the "Commuters' Matinee" to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Tuesday, December 28, at 3.00. Miss Garbousova is one of the very few women to gain international acclaim as a virtuoso of the violoncello.

Starting her musical studies on the piano as a child, she turned to the 'cello after attending a performance by Koussevitzky on the bass viol.

The "Commuters' Matinees," of which five monthly concerts remain, attract music-lovers from as far as Castine, Maine. On the forthcoming program will be included a striking composition, just introduced to America by Koussevitzky. It is the "Concerto for Orchestra" by Michael Starokadomsky, brilliant young Soviet composer.

Maurice Ravel, Composer, Dies in Paris at 62

Six-Year Illness Curtailed Work—Center of Critical Storm

Continued from Page One

1905 the elimination competition for the Prix de Rome scholarship aroused charges that he was "persecuted" by the Classical Institute of France and he became famous overnight.

His "Histoires Naturelles" in 1907, musical sketches of animals, caused a new storm among critics. Later, many of his works became modern classics, frequently heard in the United States. His song set "Sheherazade" for voice and orchestra and his widely played musical comedy "L'Heure Espagnole" were produced at the Paris Opera.

Ravel's music combines the Gallic instinct for color and subtlety of expression with a directness of rhythm wholly lacking in many French modernists. He was never content merely to sit still and play with colored pebbles, as one writer accused DeBussy of doing.

cont. above right

American Conservatory at the Fontainebleau summer school of music in 1934, but his health forced him to abandon the post.

Twice Operated Upon

He underwent an operation December 17 and another last Wednesday. His physician said the musician never spoke after the first operation.

Death occurred in a private hospital. Tonight a line of mourners filed past the bier in the chapel of the hospital, where the body was placed pending arrangements for the funeral by Ravel's brother, Edouard.

The musician, a bachelor, passed his last years virtually alone at his home, west of Paris, declining to be decorated by the Government and plunged into despair by the illness which cut short his career.

Directness Of Rhythm

Ravel's music combines the Gallic instinct for color and subtlety of expression with a directness of rhythm wholly lacking in many French modernists. He never was content merely to sit still and play with colored pebbles, as one writer accused Debussy of doing.

Although personally he may not have been distinguished by boisterous humor, his music invariably was witty, as in his opera "L'Heure Espagnol," and his "Mother Goose" suite.

As an orchestrator he was unsurpassed by any composer of his generation, and these two qualities had much to do with his popularity in America.

Introduced To America

His American journey, under auspices of Pro Musica, a society founded in the interest of modern music in the 'twenties, was not a triumphal tour, although it served to introduce him to Americans as conductor and pianist, as well as composer.

He aroused interest by declaring that his model as a composer was Edgar Allan Poe. Poe's "Philosophy of Composition" led Ravel to abandon "the formlessness of the early French impressionists in favor of a return to

---

Although personally he may not have been distinguished by boisterous humor, his music was invariably witty, as in his opera "L'Heure Espagnol," and his "Mother Goose" suite. As an orchestrator he was unsurpassed by any composer of his generation, and these two qualities had much to do with his popularity in America.

He had the courage of his convictions. It is related that when the infallible Arturo Toscanini conducted the inevitable "Bolero" in Paris, the composer disagreed violently with the tempo chosen and had to be forcibly restrained from shouting his disapproval.

Ravel aroused interest by declaring that his model as a composer was Edgar Allan Poe. Poe's "Philosophy of Composition" led Ravel to abandon "the formless ess of the early French impr onists in favor of a return lassic standards," he insisted.

10S

For the most part Ravel avoi d posts which would keep hi nuch before the public. He d ccept, however, the directorsh f the American Conservatory Iusic at Fontainebleau, succee ng Charles Widor. Ill healt revented his doing much wit he position, however.

Ravel Conducted in Boston in 192

Continued from Page One

close associates in music fo years. Ravel's Piano Concert was first performed in Bosto n 1932 by Dr. Koussevitzky' orchestra, though that perform ance was almost a dead hea with another on the same da by Stokowski in Philadelphia

Ravel had promised that prem ere to Koussevitzky to help cel ebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra. But the composer was not in good health even then and it took him a year longer than he had expected to finish the work. When it was done his contract with Koussevitzky was already broken.

Stokowski, who also is an admirer of Ravel and who likes to have "first" performances, asked for the concerto. It was tactful of the composer to let them both have it for the same day.

The Philadelphia program that day began with the long Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, Koussevitzky's with a lighter, briefer composition by Henri Martelli. Thus it happened that Koussevitzky's first number was finished first and he was first to begin the new Ravel concerto.

Critical comment, comparing the two performances, described Stokowski's as "brilliant, electric"; Koussevitzky's as distinguished by more elegance and finesse. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the pianist in Boston, Sylvan Levin played with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Audiences in both cities liked the music, but that had been

Maurice Ravel, Noted Composer, Dies in Paris

(90s

MAURICE RAVEL

Often Center of Controversies; His "Bolero" Widely Known

PARIS, Dec. 28 (AP)—Maurice Ravel, the celebrated French composer, died today as a result of a grave head operation. He was 62 years old.

Ravel, who had been in failing health for years, had undergone the operation last Wednesday Late last night his physicians reported his condition was causing serious concern. His brother, Edouard, was at his bedside when he succumbed, at a private hospital, at 3:30 A. M.

Dr. Clovis Vincent said death ended the agony which the composer had suffered intermittently for the last six years and which had curtailed his work.

Once criticized as the writer of

(Continued on Page Twenty-one)

LAUNDRY BURNS

Succumbs at Paris Home; His 'Bolero' Widely Known

(Continued from First Page)

"dangerous and Anarchist" music, Ravel had finally gained recognition as the foremost of modern composers.

His best-known works included "Bolero," the piano compositions, "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs"; the string quartet, "Quatuor en Fo"; symphonic works besides "Bolero," "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse," and a late piano concerto.

Of Basque blood, Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, France, and studied composition and harmony and pianoforte at the National Conservatory of Music in Paris.

He was the frequent center of musical controversy which started in 1905. In that year the elimination competition for the Prix de Rome scholarship aroused charges that he was "persecuted" by the Classical Institute of France and he became famous over night.

His "Histoires Naturelles" in 1907, musical sketches of animals, caused a new storm among critics.

WORKS FAMILIAR IN U. S.

Later, many of his works became modern classics, frequently heard in the United States. His song set "Sheherazade" for voice and orchestra and his widely played musical comedy "L'Heure Espagnole" were produced at the Paris opera.

Appointed director of the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau summer school of music in 1934, his delicate health forced him to abandon his post.

A bachelor, he lived in a suburban home, "Le Belvedere," at Montfort L'Amaury, west of Paris.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
C 26 1937

GARBOUSOVA SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Raya Garbousova, the brilliant young Russian 'cellist who appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra in its longer series when she visited America two years ago, will be the soloist at the orchestra's second pair of concerts in the Monday and Tuesday series, which takes place in Symphony hall tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon. Miss Garbousova will be heard with the orchestra in the 'Cello Concerto in B flat major, by Boccherini, the contemporary of Haydn, and in the Rococo Variations of Tchaikovsky. Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral Concerto of Michael Starokadomsky, the young Russian composer who in this work has become known in western Europe and in this country. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

(91)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 29 1937

MAURICE RAVEL, 62, COMPOSER, IS DEAD

French Author of Many Well-Known Works Was Master of Instrumentation

CAME HERE AS CONDUCTOR

'Bolero,' 'Mother Goose' Suite, 'Scheherazade' and 'Pavane' Among Compositions

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 28.—Maurice Ravel, one of the best known French composers, died in a clinic here today at the age of 62. He had been operated upon on Dec. 17 for a brain ailment from which he had been suffering for some years.

His compositions, notably "Scheherazade," "La Mère l'Oye," "Pavane pour une infante défunte" and "Bolero," pleased concertgoers the world over. He had been professor at the American School of Music in Fontainebleau.

Wrote in Many Forms

Maurice Ravel ranked as one of the outstanding composers of music of the twentieth century. He wrote in many forms, for piano, voice, opera, ballet, chamber ensembles and orchestra. Perhaps his most significant contribution was his mastery of instrumentation.

It was said of him that his genius had a fantastic turn, but a critic pointed out that "form, form, form, present in the small works as in the biggest and freest ones," was always the foundation of his music.

Speaking of his own aims and ideals, Mr. Ravel once said:

"Of course, if I ever did a perfect piece of work I would stop composing immediately. One just tries, and when I have finished a composition I have 'tried' all I can; it's no use attempting anything more in the same direction. One must seek new ideas."

Mr. Ravel deliberately fashioned his musical style and followed his self-appointed path. When he was asked about the need for a composer to write with sincerity, he replied: "I don't particularly care about this 'sincerity.' I try to make art."

He illustrated his point by saying that he had worked on a violin and piano sonata for four years, three of which were spent in taking out the notes that were not necessary.

Began Piano Lessons at 12

Mr. Ravel was born in Ciboure, near St. Jean-de-luz, March 7, 1875. His mother was of Basque descent, his father came of French and Swiss people. When he was 12 years old he was taken to Paris for lessons in piano and theory. Two years later his serious training began when he entered the Paris Conservatory as a piano student. In a few seasons his talent won him an honorary medal and entry to the advanced class of Charles de Bériot. Supplementing his piano work were his classes in harmony with Emile Pessard, counterpoint and fugue with André Gedalge and composition with Gabriel Fauré.

His own tastes led him to study the music of Satie, Liszt, Chabrier and many of the Russians, principally Rimsky-Korsakoff, all of whom exerted some influence upon his work. But from the first, as is revealed in his earliest known compositions, his style was a personal one.

The first public hearings of his music were unfavorably reviewed by the few critics who paid attention to them. That fact, however, set up the story that Ravel was a dangerous political revolutionist—a story that spread to musical officialdom and seriously hindered the young composer's early efforts at recognition. Thus, having won the second place in the Prix de Rome in 1901, he tried unsuccessfully for the first prize in the following two years.

Ruled Ineligible by Jury

In 1905 the jury ruled him ineligible in the preliminary contest, designed only to eliminate obviously incompetent candidates. Since his string quartet, his "Pavane" and "Jeux d'eau" for piano had been performed and published, this verdict was patently unfair. Important critics who had little sympathy with Mr. Ravel's music protested vigorously, but as far as concerned the Prix de Rome, in vain.

Recognition of Mr. Ravel's gifts, however, was not slow in coming. There was no ignoring early works like "Jeux d'eau" (1901), "Gaspard de la nuit" and the "Mother Goose" suite (1908). Of later works the "Scheherazade," "Alborada del gracioso," "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse"—all for orchestra—were notable contributions.

Manuel

MAURICE RAVEL

Other important works are the F major string quartet, Introduction and Allegro for harp, quartet, flute and clarinet; "Tzigane" for piano and violin, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" for orchestra, the comic opera "L'Heure Espagnole," and many songs.

The opera was given by the Metropolitan Opera Company in the season of 1925-26, with Lawrence Tibbett in a leading role. Two years later Mr. Ravel came to America, appearing as pianist and conductor in his own works.

Perhaps more than any other of his compositions, the now ubiquitous "Bolero" for orchestra spread the name of Ravel throughout the world. Its first hearings created storms of enthusiasm and dissent, but it is now firmly entrenched in the concert repertoire. Based on a single theme, its entire power resides in its masterly orchestration and cumulative effect.

As a writer of ballet music, Mr. Ravel's importance was such that, when the Diaghileff Ballet Russe brought out "Daphnis et Chloe" in 1912, it was deemed by one critic a "date notable in the revival of the French ballet as well as in Ravel's career." The ballet had its American première in Philedalphia in 1936 with the Philadelphia Orcestra by an ensemble of sixty dancers under the direction of Catherine Littlefield.

Assiduously avoiding public attention, Ravel rarely accepted prominent posts or honors. Twice he was proposed for the Legion of Honor, but he declined. Three years ago he accepted the position of director of the American Conservatory of Music at Fountainebleau, but ill health prevented him from continuing his responsibilities.

RADIO TRIBUTE PLANNED

Broadcast Will Be Dedicated to Composer Tomorrow

Alfred Wallenstein, musical director of WOR, will dedicate his "Sinfonietta' concert tomorrow to the memory of Maurice Ravel. Mr. Wallenstein, who was a personal friend of the French composer, will offer during the broadcast over WOR at 9:30 P. M. "La Tombeau de Couperin," the Debussy-Ravel "Dance" and "Pavane."

Yesterday afternoon the symphony orchestra conducted by Howard Barlow over WABC's network included excerpts from Mr. Ravel's works in addition to a spoken tribute to the composer.

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Serge ~~Koussevitzky,~~ director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today said the "passing of Maurice Ravel is the passing of one of the most brilliant and colorful periods of orchestral composition."

RAVEL, ONE OF GREATER COMPOSERS

Post — Dec 29/37

His Conducting of Own Works Here Recalled

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Until yesterday we could count Maurice Ravel among the few living composers who really mattered. Already such things as the String Quartet, the Sonatine, "The Tomb of Couperin," the "Mother Goose" suite, the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe" and "La Valse" are accounted classics; models of perfection of style and workmanship, unmistakably individual . . . Now Ravel, the man, belongs to the past; his music to the present and to the future.

LED BOSTON SYMPHONY

As these distinguished figures pass from the scene, it is no small satisfaction to have encountered them in the flesh. Like D'Indy, Respighi and Glazounov, Ravel had conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own music. That was on Jan. 13 and 14, 1928. On the evening of April 2, he reappeared in Symphony Hall, as pianist, in a concert of his smaller compositions for voice, piano and strings variously assembled. In January also there had been a reception at Harvard when a privileged few met the great little man —he was very tiny—face to face.

It was the disparity between Ravel's mental and physical stature that first impressed. "A smallish man, nervously quick of movement, is M. Ravel," wrote your correspondent in his review of the Friday afternoon Symphony concert, "with hair almost white, though his years are but 52. When he stepped briskly upon the stage yesterday afternoon, orchestra and audience rose in greeting and in merited tribute to one who holds a place of dominating importance in contemporary music."

Ravel conducted, as the expression goes, like a composer, but he knew what he wanted of an orchestra a how to get it. And one performan that of "La Valse," with which th concert concluded, remains in the memory as of particular eloquence and vitality.

The other pieces heard on this memorable afternoon and evening were "The Tomb of Couperin," the three songs with orchestra being collectively entitled "Scheherazade," sung by Lisa Roma, Ravel's orchestration of Debussy's Dance and Sarabande and his "Spanish Rhapsody."

A Skilful Pianist

At the April concert, in which he proved himself a skilful if unobtrusive pianist, he was assisted by Esther Dale, soprano; Georges Laurent, flutist; Alfredo San Malo, violinist, and Boris Hambourg, 'cellist. The programme listed the "Scheherazade" songs, accompanied this time by piano and flute, the "Chansons Madecasses," accompanied by piano, violin and 'cello, the sonata for violin and piano and sundry songs and piano pieces.

Boston had been promised the first performance of Ravel's Piano Concerto, as an event of the Symphony Orchestra's 50th anniversary season, 1930-1931, but, unfortunately, the composer was prevented by illness from finishing the work in time; the contract of Dr. Koussevitzky was broken, and in 1932 a double premiere took place in Boston and Philadelphia, with Dr. Koussevitzky and Leopold Stokowsky as the two conductors and Jesus Maria Sanroma and Sylvan Levin as the respective pianists.

Place on Yearly Lists

To return to the review of the Symphony Concert of Jan. 13, 1928, that notice began with the following significant statement: "Since 1913 not a year has passed without the performance at our Symphony Concerts of one of more compositions by Maurice Ravel, a record, as it happens, that no other living maker of music can equal."

"His loss is irremediable," said Director Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "I am too greatly shocked to express my feelings objectively, for I have lost today a great and personal friend."

FLINT, MICH.
SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS

DEC 7 - 1937

Boston Symphony Plays Tomorrow

Will Give Concert In Ann Arbor

Ann Arbor, Dec. 6 — Serge Koussevitzky will bring the distinguished Boston Symphony orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral Union series tomorrow night at 8:30 o'clock, in Hill auditorium.

This will constitute the seventh annual trip which this group has made to Ann Arbor. During this period, Dr. Koussevitzky has played a variety of compositions both classic and modern; and on this occasion the following varied and interesting program has been arranged:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B & H No. 13) ....Haydn
  Adagio; Allegro
  Largo
  Menuetto; Trio
  Finale; Allegro con spirito
"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60 ....Prokofieff
  Birth of Kije
  Romance
  Kije's Wedding
  Troika
  Burial of Kije
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 ....Sibelius
  Allegretto
  Tempo andante, ma rubato
  Vivacissimo; Lento e suave
  Finale: Allegro moderato

MAURICE RAVEL, COMPOSER, DIES

Globe — Dec 28/37

Surgery Fails to Save Noted French Master

"Bolero" and "Jeux d'Eau" Among His Many Works

PARIS, Dec 28 (A P)—Maurice Ravel, France's most celebrated modern composer, whose works included the widely-known "Bolero," died today at the age of 62.

Death was caused by a cerebral hemorrhage after he had undergone grave head surgery. The musician had been failing in health for years.

Besides "Bolero," his best-known works included "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs," piano compositions; "Quatuor en Fa"; the symphonic "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse"; the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe"; "Sheherazade"; and a late piano concerto

Ravel won the second prize in the 1901 competition for the Prix de Rome, much sought French scholarship for study in Italy, causing murmurs of protest among critics who thought he should have had the top honor.

A major controversy burst, however, in 1905 when the musician, who had reached the age limit of 30, was rejected at the preliminary examination.

The liberal press, critics and music circles charged that Ravel, whose originality and disregard for tradition had aroused opposition among classicists, was being "persecuted" by the jury of the Institute of France.

The composer frequently was the center of controversy after 1905, his "Histories Naturelles' in 1907 provoking a new storm. Later, many of his works became modern classics.

Ravel was born March 7, 1875, at Ciboure, France. He was appointed director of the American Conservatory at the Fontainebleau Summer School of Music in 1934 but his health forced him to abandon the post.

The musician, a bachelor, passed his last years virtually alone at his home, west of Paris, declining to be decorated by the Government and plunged into despair by the illness which cut short his career.

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

DEC 27 1937

WHAT OTHER EDITORS SAY

ANNOYANCE AT CONCERTS

The good people of Pittsburgh were given a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage because late-comers were bustling into their seats while the music was being played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky waving his baton, has featured for some time the annual series of musical events at Rutgers University and again will close his season's program, which adready has appealed to a great many.

The famous conductor's act in Pittsburgh probably was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament but it also was a richly deserved rebuke for the tardy. If more conductors would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goer would be much pleasanter. Later-comers not only annoy the conductor and his musicians; they annoy those who have arrived on time.

The starting time of any concert is always announced in advance and emphasized. If a patron cannot get there on time, it is up to him to stand and wait until there is an intermission before hunting for his seat. The starting time of the program of the New English Singers of London in the Rutgers gymnasium on Wednesday evening was emphasized and it was specifically requested that all be in their seat at that time.

Although the first number was about 10 minutes behind scheduled time, a few were late. They were compelled to wait until the first number had been concluded. There will be more respect for the starting time when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays here, because Mr. Koussevitzky did a good job in dramatizing the annoyance that the tardy arrival causes.—NEW BRUNSWICK HOME-NEWS.

Replace Lost Symphony By Radio

Am — Dec 28/37

Amer Dec 28

Without waiting to count the cost, Boston Symphony orchestra officials today ordered photographs of the score of Jan Sibelis' choral symphony, "Origin or Fire," which went astray in the mails, be transmitted by radio from Leipsig, Germany, to Boston immediately.

The score and parts for the symphony, which is one of Sibelius' few unpublished works and is still in manuscript form, were mailed from Leipsig on November 18, in two packages. One was received, but the other mysteriously disappeared.

The package which was lost contained the score and some of the parts of the symphony, essential to its performance.

14 SHEETS ORDERED

It was at first feared that there might not be another copy of the symphony in existence.

According to James M. Burk, publicity director of the Boston Symphony, the missing parts are available in Germany, and it is these parts which will be radioed to America. Copyists for the orchestra then will reconstruct the score.

These parts, comprising 14 sheets will be transmitted as radio photographs.

The speedy aid of science will enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to present the Sibelius symphony for the first time on Friday as originally planned.

It was announced that when the

Continued on Page 4, Column 3

[illegible] be dispatched [illegible] front soon.

International News Photograph Service

Lost Symphony Score by Air

Continued from First Page

score was given up as lost Conductor Koussevitzky would rearrange his program, but this will not be necessary.

WILL COST $700

The radio photographs will be transmitted from Germany to New York and rushed to Boston, and work on arrangement of the score will begin upon arrival here.

In sending by radio the 14 pages of manuscript, four sheets of the score, reduced to one page 8½ by 11 inches, will be transmitted at a time.

This will cost the Boston Symphony Orchestra approximately $700, as the rate for sending 8½ by 11 sheets is $190 a page.

On receipts of the photographs, the minatures of the pages will be enlarged to conventional size and opies made for the orchestra nembers.

This transmission of the work f the Finnish composer, who recently observed his 72nd birthday, s particularly notable in that this s the first time radio has been esorted to in such an emergency.

When presented at Symphony Hall on Friday, "Origin of Fire" will take only ten minutes to be played.

92

Sibelius Pages Radioed Over Ocean to Boston

Dec 28, 1937

By John D. Beaufort

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

When Dr. Serge Koussevitsky raises his baton for attention preparatory to conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Helsinki University Male Chorus through Jan Sibelius's "The Origin of Fire," Friday afternoon, few in the hushed Symphony Hall audience will realize that the performance of this number was made possible by the eleventh-hour dispatch of a radio-photo bearing some missing parts.

Today, while the chorus was rehearsing in the Common Room of Lowell House, Harvard, the radio photo was being flashed from Leipzig, Germany, to New York. Thence, it will be brought to Boston by train, re-photographed and enlarged and the parts copied. And, for what is believed the first time ever, parts of a musical score will have been transmitted by radio in this way.

Decision to use the radio, first suggested almost as a joke, was arrived at when a package of parts went astray in the mails, according to John N. Burk, Symphony program annotator. Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from Sibelius's publishers, Breitkopf and Hartel, Leipzig, on Nov. 18, in time to catch the Europa. One of the packages arrived, but the other did not. In fact, Dr. Koussevitzky had already planned to substitute another of Sibelius's choral-orchestral works for "The Origin of Fire" on his program.

As a last resort, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, yesterday telephoned to Richard G. Appel of the Boston Public Library music department, asking if perchance the library had a copy of the work.

"No, we haven't," replied Mr. Appel, adding with a laugh, "I guess the only way you'll get it will be by radio photo.'

Mr. Judd didn't laugh. He sat right down and had the following wire sent to Breitkops:

"Sibelius Ukko Ursprung Des Feuers parcel containing score viola cello and bass parts failed to arrive. Boston Symphony Concert with Finnish University Chorus this Thursday (the rehearsal) desperate situation. Send immediately greatest speed radio photos of all pages missing parts not score. Pages to be reduced so that four will go on one 8x11 inches radio photo."

Came the answer today:

"Sibelius radio photos under way Breitkopf and Hartel."

Thus, what will be realized as warm Sibelius fire music on Friday was nothing but a monotonous, high-pitched whirr as it sped across the cold Atlantic today. In all, 14 pages of the original must be transmitted, said Mr. Burk. flUpon receipt, the miniatures will be enlarged and sufficient copies will be made to accommodate the orchestra.

Along with "The Captive Queen," "The Origin of Fire" will be given its American première at Symphony Hall this week. Lacking a conductor's score, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the second number from a piano arrangement.

Meanwhile, unaware of the dramatic solution of the crisis, some 50 fresh-faced young choristers filled the Lowell House Common Room at Harvard to bursting with sound as

(Continued on Page 10, Column 4)

See last at this page

RARE MUSICAL SCORE IS LOST

Boston Symphony Hunts Sibelius Work Sent From Germany

Apparently lost somewhere between Europe and Boston, the original manuscript—possibly the only copy in existence—of an unpublished choral-symphonic score by the great Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, became yesterday the object of an intensive search by U. S. postal authorities and officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The vanished work, "The Origin of Fire," written in 1902, was to have been given its first performance in Amercia Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki University Chorus. The chorus, 59 strong, had not learned of the loss when they arrived in Boston yesterday after a two-weeks voyage from Finland via New York.

The manuscript was in one of two packages that were mailed to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky by Sibelius' publishers in Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18, John N. Burk, program annotator for the orchestra, said yesterday.

Both were marked for the liner Europa, he said, and one package, containing fragments of the voice and orchestral parts, arrived safely and on time two weeks ago.

Owing to the possibility that the Christmas mailing rush might have

(Continued on Page Nine)

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1937 B

Choral Music from Sibelius, With Finnish Singers to Assist

Trans

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening became a matter of international concern when the loss of some of the parts of one of the numbers to be sung by the Helsinki University Chorus became known. But the modern miracle of transmission of photographs by telegraph and radio has made the performance of the original choral program without change.

Meanwhile the first orchestral number of the originally announced program has been withdrawn. The latest version of the complete list is now: Third Symphony by Brahms and, by Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daughter" and "Finlandia" for orchestra, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen" for chorus and orchestra. This department is still in some uncertainty whether the choral works will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky or by the regular conductor of the chorus, Martti Turunen.

"The Origin of Fire" was composed for the inauguration of the Finnish Theater of Helsinki (Helsingfors) in 1902, and was sung on that occasion by a chorus of 350 voices under the direction of the composer. The words are taken from the "Kalevala," the national epic of Finland, and they recount how the vengeful mistress of Pohjola captured and hid the sun and the moon, thus throwing the world into a dreadful darkness until the god Ukko kindled the fire for two new heavenly luminaries.

"The Captive Queen" is one of Sibelius's patriotic compositions. The words are from an allegorical poem by Paavo Cajander, Finnish poet who, incidentally, translated the whole of Shakespeare into his own native tongue. The poem is one of that group and of that time that demanded a symbolical treatment of a subject to disguise its really patriotic nature (Finland, it will be remembered, was a part of the Russian Empire before the Great War). In this regard the music of "The Captive Queen" resembles that of "Finlandia."

The thirteen stanzas of the poem end on a hopeful prophecy of Finland's eventual independence, a prophecy that came true not long after the death of the poet in 1913:

Take heart! The hero cometh.
Lo! O'er the distant field;
See, the dawn's light, up-rising.
Gleams on his helmet and shield.
The battle-cry rings free:
"For our glorious queen and for freedom!
Who dares to follow me?" . . .
She flung the tyrant's fetters down
And met the youth with a gracious mien.
The people round her pressed and hailed
Their long-lost Captive Queen.

Her - Dec

Lost Score Radioed from Germany In Time for Symphony Here Friday

Her Dec 29/37

The lost score of Jan Sibelius' unpublished "Origin of Fire" was successfully transmitted by transatlantic radio from Germany last night, and will be given Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by the famed choir of the Finnish university, in its American debut.

A hitch in the transoceanic mail service was responsible for the loss of the instrumentalists' parts to the symphony, a choral work completed by the renowed Finnish composer 35 years ago.

LOST IN MAILS

Part of the score was received by Boston Symphony officials in one of two packages mailed from Leipsig, Germany, Nov. 18. The more important packet, however, containing parts for the instrumentalists, was somehow lost in the mails and never reached the Boston orchestra.

The missing orchestral parts therefore were taken from the original manuscript and yesterday were sent across the ocean in the same manner in which photographs have been wirelessed across the sea.

The radio transmission was pronounced completely successful; photographic prints of the missing parts of the score were finished in New York and placed on the midnight train for Boston last night.

A Boston Symphony official said last night that the noted Finnish university chorus, which is to sing the Sibelius piece with the Symphony this week-end, was familiar with the work and that only two rehearsals, today and tomorrow, would be needed to present the finished performance Friday and Saturday.

MAKESHIFT UNNECESSARY

Serge Koussevitsky, director of the orchestra, had arranged a substitute program in the event that the Sibelius score failed to arrive in time for the performance, but this makeshift was abandoned last night.

The mechanics of the radio transmission involved a multiple process operation on each side of the Atlantic.

Twelve of the 14 pages of the original manuscript first were reduced to a size which permitted four to be contained on a single sheet 8½ by 11 inches.

These pages then were transmitted as single units and after reception in New York were reproduced, enlarged and duplicated for the musicians.

Joseph Mann, noted orchestra player, arranger and copyist, was engaged by RCA Communications, Inc., which completed arrangements for the transoceanic broadcast, to inspect and edit the score. In New York, RCA described the entire procedure as "routine," while admitting that it was the first similar project attempted by the company.

Boston Symphony officials said yesterday that the missing parts of the score would arrive in ample time for rehearsal and ultimate performance. The orchestra will be assisted by the Helsinki (Helsingford) University Chorus, which opens its American tour in this city.

Meantime, every effort by the Symphony and postal officials failed to trace the missing score which should have arrived more than a fortnight ago.

REICH RADIOPHOTO SENDS LOST SIBELIUS TO BOSTON

Symphony May Get Missing Score in Time for Friday Concert

Dec. 28/37

JEAN SIBELIUS

With the help of transatlantic radio-photo transmission, the Boston Symphony Orchestra hopes to be able to procure the missing parts of the Sibelius manuscript score in time for the Friday afternoon concert, at which the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus of fifty-five members will sing.

Breitkopf and Haertel, Sibelius's Leipzig music publishers have notified Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, that photographic radio transmission of the score would begin immediately. Radio pictures of the unpublished manuscript score of "The Birth of Fire," are being flashed to the Associated Music Publishers, New York agents of the Leipzig firm.

As soon as the last of the pictures arrive in New York, they will be rushed here by train, it being impossible to use a plane because of bad weather conditions.

Once the radio pictures of the full score of the choral-symphonic composition and the string parts come to Symphony Hall, they will be enlarged and copies made for the various members of the orchestra. It will be necessary to employ extra people in order to have the complete score arranged in time for rehearsal before the week-end concert.

It would be impossible to re

Continued on Page 2—Column 3

SIBELIUS' SCORE LOST IN MAILS

"The Origin of Fire" Was on Way to Boston Symphony

The original manuscript of "The Origin of Fire," an early work of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, which was to have been performed Friday and Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Helsinki University Chorus for the first time in America, has disappeared en route from Europe to Boston, John N. Burk, programme annotator of the orchestra, revealed last night.

SIBELIUS' SCORE LOST IN MAILS FROM EUROPE

Continued From First Page

The manuscript is possibly the only one in existence of the unpublished work which was written in 1902, although it is likely that Sibelius' publishers in Leipzig, Germany, have copies of the various parts and can complete a new score, Mr. Burk said.

The package lost was one of two—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—mailed on Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa. The package containing the parts arrived two weeks ago. Postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

Will Substitute Work

That the package was delayed by the holiday mail rush is unlikely, Mr. Burk said, as he announced that another Sibelius choral work will be substituted in Friday's programme by Serge Koussevitsky, symphony conductor.

"It is a bit far-fetched to say that the score is lost forever, for the publishers have copies of parts from which they can assemble a complete score," said Mr. Burk. "I do not know that they have, but it is likely."

"The Origin" a Short Piece

Sibelius has left several of his works unpublished, among them the Kullervo Symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"The Origin of Fire," which was to have been included in the opening concert of the Helsingfors University chorus' American tour, is a short piece which has been received enthusiastically in Europe.

It was taken from the text of Kalevala, Finland's national epic.

SCIENCE MONITOR, B

Finnish Singers Practice Amid Colonial Scene

(Continued from Page 9)

they rang out music of their native land in rehearsal this morning. The Helsinki University Male Chorus is now making its first concert tour of the United States—an occasion which links modern Finland with the colonial America of 300 years ago, when Finns and Swedes settled on the Delaware River. So it seemed rather appropriate that their fine, clear voices should be heard in a room decorated by a mural pageant of early American history.

The Helsinki University Chorus was founded in 1883 and is said to be the leading men's singing organization in Finland. Its members are all University of Helsinki students or graduates. Sibelius, whose works they will present Friday and Saturday, is an honorary member of the organization.

Following an additional rehearsal today as well as visits to Massachusetts Institute of Technology and other points of interest, the young men will be given a dinner this evening. Their first rehearsal under Dr. Koussevitzky comes tomorrow morning. After Boston, the chorus will journey to Worcester, New York (they made an appearance over the RCA Magic Key program on Sunday), Princeton, N. J., Washington, Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis, Ann Arbor and New Haven. They will return for a concert in Cambridge on Jan. 7.

One of their most impressive experiences so far in this country—they have been here since Dec. 22—was hearing the Boston Symphony last week-end

95

THE BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, DECEMBER 28,

FINNISH CHORISTERS ARRIVE IN BOSTON

Helsinki University chorus met at Back Bay station by G. Wallace Woodworth, director of Harvard University Glee Club, who is seen at right shaking hands with Martti Turunen, conductor of the chorus, while Prof. K. T. Jutila, representative of the Finnish government, and George Sjoblom, tour manager, beam their approval. The chorus will have its official American debut in a joint concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon.

Finnish Glee Club Reaches Boston; But New Sibelius Work Is Missing

(Continued from First Page)

delayed its delivery a few days, serious concern for the valuable and perhaps irreplaceable manuscript's safety was not felt until about a week ago, Burk said. But yesterday, when it was still missing, orchestra officials appealed to the U. S. postoffice to try to trace it.

The value of the manuscript in terms of money, Burk said, would be impossible to estimate, especially if it is, as is feared, the only copy.

"It is very unlikely," he added, "that Breitkopf and Haertel, the publishers in Leipzig, made a transcription of it before sending it. Whether it is lost or stolen, I am afraid it may be gone forever."

SEVERAL COMPOSITIONS

Sibelius, who is generally considered the greatest of living composers, has left several of his outstanding compositions, including the majestic Kullervo Symphony for orchestra and chorus, unpublished.

"The Origin of Fire," a relatively short score requiring only 10 minutes to perform, is a translation into music of part of the Kalevala, the great national epic poem of Finland. It has been given in Europe on a few rare occasions in past years, but never in this country.

WORK SUBSTITUTED

Because of its mysterious disappearance, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted another Sibelius choral work on the program for Friday's concert, with which the internationally celebrated singers from the Finnish university will make their American debut. They will however, be able to present another little-known Sibelius work, "The Captive Queen."

The singers, primed for a strenuous musical invasion of America and Canada that will take them to 21 cities in little more than a month, were welcomed at Back Bay station yesterday afternoon by officials of the orchestra and G. Wallace Woodworth, director of the Harvard University Glee Club.

Harvard Club to Give Dinner to Symphony

Unusual Event Will Occur Jan. 28—Koussevitzky Expresses Elation

The Harvard Club of Boston will give a dinner in honor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Jan. 28.

It seems only natural, but the fact is it's never been done before. There will be about 500 men in Harvard Hall on Commonwealth avenue that night, among them about 100 musicians, without instruments.

The cultural implications of the dinner for the hosts, the guests and the city will be spoken by Bentley Wirt Warren, Serge Koussevitzky and James Rowland Angell. Edward A. Taft will be toastmaster.

There is no end of reasons why the Harvard Club of Boston should have the Boston Symphony Orchestra in to break bread, but Charles H. Watkins, chairman of the entertainment committee for the Harvard Club, will tell you there is no particular reason for this particular dinner.

Higginson Was Founder

The late Henry Lee Higginson, first president of the Harvard Club of Boston, was founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony orchestra. To Serge Koussevitzky, who crosses the Charles River Thursday nights to bring music to Cambridge, Harvard gave its doctorate of laws in 1929. He is a member of the Harvard Club of Boston. So is G. E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

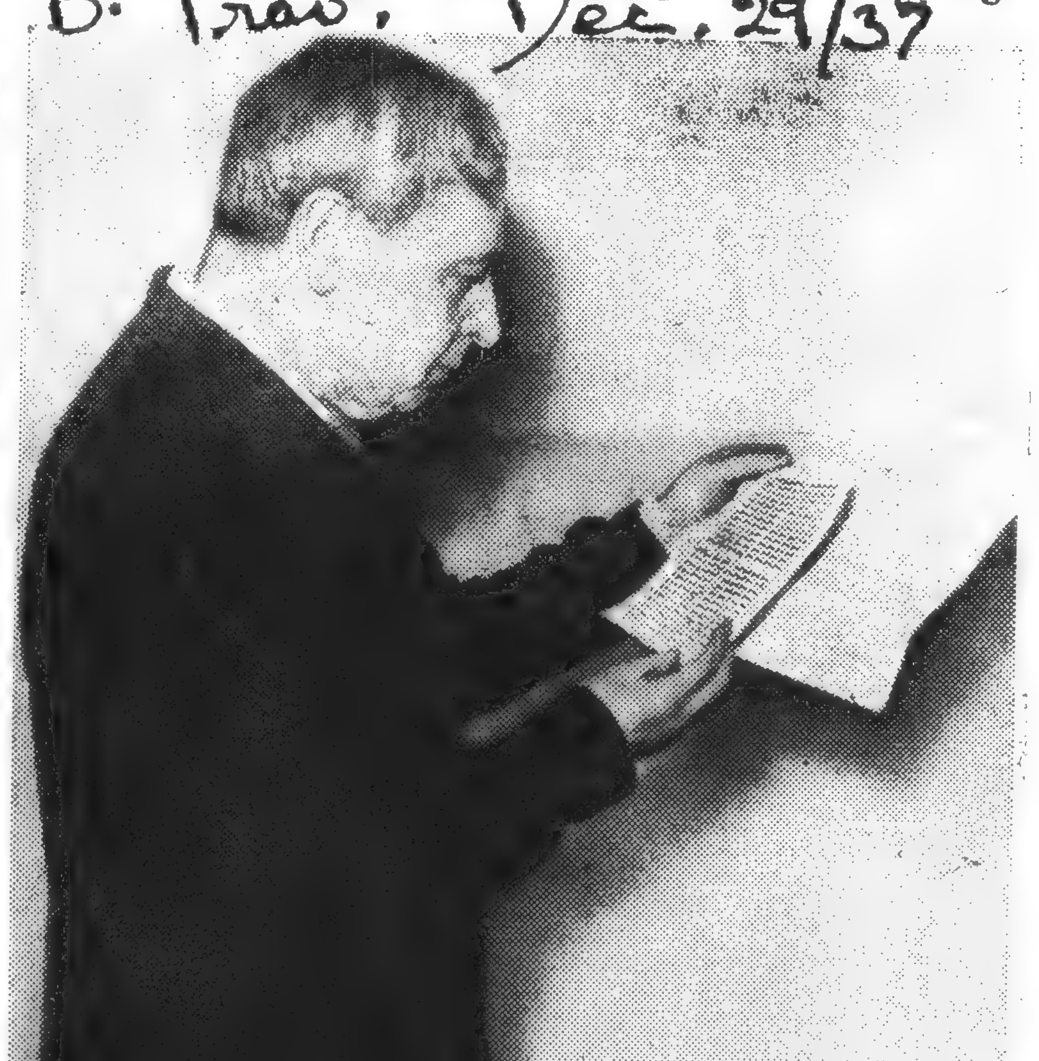
President-emeritus Angell of Yale University, who received a Harvard honorary doctorate of laws, too, is now educational adviser to the National Broadcasting Company. N. B. C. brought Dr. Koussevitzky's and Boston's music to the nation on a coast-to-coast hookup. Edward A. Taft is not only president of the Har-

Continued on Page 2—Column 3

9

Radioed Music Score Ready for Symphony

B. Trav. Dec. 29/37



Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, getting his first glimpse at the radioed score of Jan Sibelius' unpublished "Origin of Fire." The leader is wearing his rehearsal jacket.

Sibelius' Symphonic Score Mysteriously Lost in Mails

Work of Famous Finnish Composer Due to Be Presented in Boston Friday

The mysterious disappearance of a manuscript of a choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius while en route from Europe to Boston was revealed yesterday by Boston Symphony Orchestra officials. The manuscript is the original, and there may not be a copy in existence.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

One of Packages Here

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on Nov 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator, said.

The package containing the parts arrived "about two weeks ago," but the complete score hasn't turned up yet, and postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

"It is unlikely the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "but the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

Symphony—

Continued from the First Page

He deprecated the theory the score may have been delayed in the Christmas mailing rush by pointing to the fact that the other packages had arrived on time. It would be impossible to estimate its financial value, he said.

Substitute Work Friday

The strange disappearance forced Conductor Serge Koussevitzky to substitute another Sibelius choral work for Friday's concert, which will open the Helsinki chorus' American tour. Koussevitzky has been described by the composer as one of his outstanding interpreters, along with Werner Janssen of the Baltimore Symphony, and Sir Thomas Beecham, English conductor.

Sibelius has left several of his great works unpublished, Burk said, among them the Kullervo symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a comparatively short piece requiring only 10 minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic, the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha." Burk said he doubted that Breitkopf and Haertel, the Leipzig publishers, made a copy.

Hunt for Reproductions

At Symphony Hall last night it was said that reproductions of the missing orchestral parts are being sought, and that if they can be obtained a performance of "The Origin of Fire" will be possible at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday.

If these parts cannot be secured, it is planned to fill the gap with unaccompanied numbers sung by the Helsinki chorus.

SIBELIUS' SCORE BY AIR WAVES

Post 29/37

Missing Parts Radioed From Leipzig to Symphony

In time for its first American performance Friday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were carried by the air waves across the Atlantic Ocean last night to take the place of ones which had been lost in the mails bound from Leipzig, Germany.

CELLO AND VIOLA PARTS

The lost parts, for cello, viola and double-bass of "Origin of Fire" disappeared with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score after they had been placed in the mails by the musical publishers. A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived here two weeks ago.

Yesterday Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided that a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the parts missing could be obtained. The choral score, he explained, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

First Ocean-Crossing Score

He said that he believed that it was fortunate that the publishers made copies of the parts. "I only hope that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures, according to the announcement made here last night were received in New York and were put on the midnight train to arrive in Boston early [illegible] this morning. It was the first [illegible] a symphonic score was ever flashed across the ocean in that manner.

Correct Blurred Notes

To transmit the pictures of the score by wireless, four sheets reduced to a page 8½ inches by 11 inches were transmitted at one time. There are 14 sheets. They will be reproduced and enlarged for the musicians.

Any of the notes that may have been blurred in the radio transmission will be inspected and filled in by Joseph Mann, an orchestra player and expert music copyist. The sending of the pictures from Germany was described by RCA Communications, Inc., as a mere "routine."

Score Never Presented

Officials of the Symphony Orchestra said last night that arrival of the pictures today will leave plenty of time for rehearsal with the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus, which opens its American tour Friday, featuring the music of Sibelius.

"Origin of Fire" was never printed, probably because the genius of Sibelius was not widely appreciated in 1902, when it was sent to the publishers. It has been presented successfully in Europe several times and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic.

WILKES BARRE, PA.
RECORD

DEC 29 1937

MISSING MUSIC RADIOED TO U. S.

Parts of Sibelius Work in Time for American Debut

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP) — Missing parts or an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic Ocean tonight, Boston Symphony orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola, and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

NORWICH. N. Y.
SUN

DEC 28 1937

SEND RADIO PICTURES OF LOST MUSIC SCORE

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—The Boston symphony's score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," scheduled for presentation Friday, went astray in the mails from Leipzsig, Germany, it was learned today. To insure presentation of the program the publishers are sending radio pictures of the score "immediately" it was said this afternoon.

Buffalo Courier Express

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

Planning a Musical Attack

By a Staff Photographer

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Martti Turunen

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra and Conductor of the Finnish Male Chorus of Helsinki University Discuss Presentation of Works by Jan Sibelius, the Finnish Composer

Sibelius Composition 'Saved' In Symphony Hall Melodrama

The climax of an old-fashioned melodrama—the hero's arrival with the mortgage money just as the villain was foreclosing on the old homestead—was never more exciting than the atmosphere in Symphony Hall this morning as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky showed his players the first telephoto parts of a Sibelius composition which had been flashed to America in the nick of time for Friday's concert.

Indeed, the whole chain of events since 11:30 yesterday morning when the words "pictures on the way" were radioed over the Atlantic have been in the very best Nick Carter tradition.

Necessity to use radio in this manner occurred when certain parts of an unpublished choral-orchestral work by Jan Sibelius, mailed from Germany on Nov. 18, failed to arrive. Their disappearance became doubly alarming when it was thought that no other copies existed. The work, "The Origin of Fire," will be given its American première on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki University Male Chorus of Finland, which opens its American concert tour in Boston.

The cable which told that the telephoto transmission was under way was sent by Breitkopf and Hartel, Sibelius' publishers, in Leipzig, to their American representative, the Associated Music Publishers in New York. It has been learned since that the 14 pages of manuscript were sent over telephone wires to Berlin before they began their invisible trans-Atlantic crossing.

At 3:30 yesterday afternoon, the photo division of RCA in New York received the message, "coming in." Slowly the rows of staves began to appear on the photo printing machine. The original pages had been reduced so that four of them went on one page, 8½ by 11, for reasons of economy.

The transmission was completed at 11:25 p. m. last night, just seven hours and 55 minutes after it had been started. Karl Bauer, representative of the Associated Music Publishers, who had superintended

(Continued on Page 10, Column 4) Cont.

Sibelius Composition 'Saved' in Melodrama

(Continued from Page 9)

the entire transmission, rushed for the midnight train to Boston.

Mr. Bauer was met at Back Bay Station this morning by George E. Judd, Symphony manager, and together they roused a photostatic operator from bed and set him to planning the task of enlarging 14 pages of manuscript from their small 2½x [illegible] inch size by about four times. To eliminate all smudges and assure clear copies for the 32 musicians who will use the enlargements, Joseph Mann, member of the Boston Symphony trumpet section and an expert music copyist, will be in charge of retouching the pages.

It was thought at first that the music would be ready for this morning's 10 o'clock rehearsal, but Mr. Mann and the photoengraver did not begin work until almost noon. Everything will be in readiness for tomorrow's rehearsal.

The general excitement was not diminished by the discovery that among the Finnish choristers arriving at the hall for their first rehearsal with the orchestra was the grandson of Sibelius, the composer whose works will take up the entire second half of this week's program. He is Martti Paldheimo and he sings second bass. Mr. Paldheimo seemed a bit startled as photographers posed him with Dr. Koussevitzky, appropriately enough, under the bust which Mme. Koussevitzky made of Sibelius.

The intermission, usually considered a period of brief rest for the conductor, was anything but that, today. Dr. Koussevitzky chatted briefly with Mr. Paldheimo, posed for photographers looking at the radio photo which he had brought from the podium downstairs, greeted an important delegate who brought plans for the music shed contemplated for the Berkshire Music Festival and discussed the interpretation of the Sibelius choral works with Martti Turunen, conductor of the Helsinki chorus.

At 11:45, the rehearsal bell rang and soon Dr. Koussevitzky was back on the podium. Besides "The Origin of Fire," the Friday and Saturday program will contain Brahms Symphony Number 3, and "Pohjola's Daughter," "Finlandia," and "The Captive Queen" of Sibelius. The last-mentioned, like "The Origin of Fire," is having its American première performance.

The denouement of the dramatic race against time will not be reached until tomorrow morning when the five bass viol, five cello and six viola parts are used for the first time. But the performance of "The Origin of Fire" is assured now. Radio has saved the day. And, presumably, Symphony Hall will settle back once more to its customary unruffled calm.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 27 1937

Original Manuscript Of Symphony Vanishes

Sibelius Score Feared Lost Between Europe and U. S.

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP).—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston symphony orchestra official disclosed today. The unpublished work, "origin of fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

Two packages, one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts, were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator said. The package containing the parts arrived "about two weeks ago," but the complete score hasn't turned up yet.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

[illegible]

HERE'S A SYMPHONY THAT'S REALLY LOST

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP).—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston symphony orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

DEC 29 1937

Part of Symphonic Score Radioed Across Atlantic

Vanished in Mail and Boston Orchestra Wanted It

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic Ocean tonight, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said.

The lost parts—for cello, viola, and bass viol—or "origin of fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers. A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists. "It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictured parts were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train. It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 29 1937

LOST CHORAL SCORE FACSIMILE RADIOED

Part of Sibelius Symphony Is Flashed From Berlin for Use on the Boston Program

SEVERAL HOURS ON WAY

Sheets Missing From Ocean Mail Reduced by Photography, Then Scanned by Beam

Part of the choral symphonic score of "Ukko, the Fire Maker," by Jean Sibelius, which was lost in the mails on the way from Germany, was flashed from Berlin by facsimile radio yesterday so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might present it in a concert on Friday night.

The transmission began about 5:27 P. M., Eastern standard time, and required several hours for the light beams actuated by radio to reconstruct the score at facsimile receiving headquarters of RCA Communications, 66 Broad Street.

It was explained by the Associated Music Publishers, Inc., of New York, that two packages were mailed from Leipzig on Nov. 18, but only one was received. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, said he would have to rearrange the program because the complete score had not arrived.

The Leipzig music publishers, Breitkopf & Haertel, were informed of what had happened, and in what was called "a desperate emergency" turned to radio for transmission from the sole remaining copy in Europe.

From Leipzig a wire facsimile system carried the lost music to Berlin, where a radio facsimile channel flashed the pages, reduced in size photographically, to New York. Delivered here to Ernest R. Voigt, sales manager of the Associated Music Publishers, the lost part of the composition was enlarged by photography to near the original dimensions, and arrangements were made late last night for a special messenger to carry the sheets to Boston.

Mr. Voigt explained that in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky planned to put men to work on the job of transcribing enough copies for the orchestra players to use at the concert.

For the purposes of wire and radio facsimile the manuscript pages were photographically reduced in size so that four music sheets placed close together measured less than 8½ by 11 inches, and were transmitted as one unit. Three such units carried the entire lost parts, which were for the violas, cellos and double bass instruments of the orchestra.

Each facsimile unit of 8½ by 11 inches requires seventy-two minutes in the sending-receiving process, when scanning the photographic film at intervals of 100ths of an inch. The film is then developed like any other film.

The men of the receiving depot at 66 Broad Street reported the Sibelius music the first ever transmitted over the transoceanic system in their memory.

8, 1937 Buffalo Courier Express Dec. 8/37

SYMPHONY OF SORROW

Musicians Mourn Oboist's Death

Musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave their usual brilliant performance at Elmwood Music Hall although, unknown to the large audience, they were mourning the loss of one of their most noted confreres.

After the concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director, revealed the orchestra had been notified as it left Rochester yesterday morning that Henry Stanislaus, internationally-known oboist, had died of pneumonia in a Boston hospital.

Mr. Stanislaus, a native of England, had lived in Boston for the last 25 years and annually made the symphony's tour. Just prior to the start of the current tour he was taken ill and removed from his home to the hospital. The orchestra will move on to Ann Arbor, Mich., this morning.

◆

MUSIC REVIEW

By
ISABELLE WORKMAN EVANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its magnificent leader, Sergei Koussevitzky, returned to Buffalo for a performance last night in Elmwood Music Hall, which will long be remembered by those fortunate ones present. The superb artistry and the amazing technical perfection of this body of fine musicians is sufficient to please the most critical connoisseur or to inspire the most apathetic layman. The concert was a presentation of Zorah B. Berry.

The Symphony in G Major, No. 88 by Haydn was the delightful opening number of the program. This perfectly disciplined band of artists, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky since 1924, provided an interpretation with freedom of expression and opalescence of tone to delight the listener. An interesting program note informs one that this symphony was first performed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the year 1889, just 80 years after the death of the composer. The vivid coloring, the rhythmic line, the mellifluent phrasing, the perfect control of the leader and the inspired response of the men, were all qualities of the performance which elicited rapturous applause from the audience.

An interesting feature of the program was the playing of the orchestral suite, Lieutenant Kije, Op. 60 by Prokofieff. This cleverly orchestrated number was published in 1934 and was given its first performance in the United States by the Boston Orchestra in October of this year. The music, which depicts many incidents in the life of a ficticious Russian officer, Kije, possesses extremely effective and clever instrumentation. The unusual solo passages were adroitly played and the entire composition was given a lucid and enjoyable performance.

The massive tonal effects of the Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius, offered great contrast to the delicacy of the opening Haydn opus. Dr. Koussevitzky imparted great contrast in moods and provided restraint and reserve in building up his climaxes which evoked storms of applause from the enraptured listeners. Dr. Koussevitzky returned many times to the podium to acknowledge the acclaim, which left no doubt that the evening was a memorable one.

Among the vast and enthusiastic audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Cameron Baird. Mrs. Baird was wearing a stunning quilted wrap of white velvet, with a round collar of mink, over a deep blue printed evening gown. Bishop and Mrs. Cameron J. Davis were seen, Mrs. Davis in a becoming brown chiffon gown with a brown velvet wrap trimmed with mink. Mrs. Nelson G. Russell wore a long black velvet wrap with a white fox collar and Mrs. Roger G. Cooley, who was present with her husband, was also wearing black velvet with a white fox collar. Mr. and Mrs. Frederick A. Gilbert were seen, Mrs. Gilbert in a straight black velvet wrap over a gown of black lace. Miss Katherine Eagan was in deep purple with a black wrap.

Among others noticed were Mrs. William B. Hoyt, Mrs. Ansley W. Sawyer, Mrs. Willard H. Pleuthner, Mrs. George B. Barrell, Mrs. Charles L. Wilson, Miss Rachel Wilson, Mrs. George G. Davidson, Jr., Jerome P. Davidson, Nathaniel Barrell, Mrs. Andrew Thompson, Andrew Thompson, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. James C. Sweeney, Mrs. Carlos C. Alden, Mrs. George B. Mathews, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson M. Graves, Mrs. Carlton M. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Crawford D. Wettlaufer, Dr. and Mrs. Franciscus Visser't Hooft, Miss Jane Schabacker, Mrs. Edgar B. Black, Mr. and Mrs. Raymond W. Wattles, Mr. and Mrs. Philip M. B. Boocock, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph H. Morey, Miss Gertrude and Miss Grace R. Smith, Joseph H. Morey, Jr., Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey, Mrs. Jane Hyde Acheson, Miss Betty Hyde, Miss Mildred Miles.

Also seen at the concert were Dr. and Mrs. Albert H. Garvin, Douglas H. Purdy, Miss Ruth Danahy, Mr. and Mrs. John S. N. Sprague, Miss Patricia Oishei, Miss Mary Louise O'Brien, Mrs. Arthur Victor, Mrs. Arthur Victor, Jr., Mrs. Michael Cohn, Miss Doris Cohn, Miss Eliza B. Sears, Miss Marion Darby, Charles A. Pankow, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Forsyth, Mrs. Thomas S. Hemenway, Miss Josephine Hemenway, Dr. and Mrs. Jay I. Evans, Miss Suzanne P. Carr, Davis Plummer, Miss Jane Gilbert, Miss Nancy Gilbert, Corning Townsend, Jr., Charles Y. Neff, C. William Pooley, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. James Allen Fusca, Miss Emily McDonnell, Mrs. Irving Miller Snow, Miss Mildred Snow, Mr. and Mrs. Leigh H. Brown, Miss Mary Louise Kittinger, Dr. J. Edwin Alford, Miss Geraldine Case, Miss Priscilla Faxon, Mr. and Mrs. James O. Moore, Jr., Harry Moffat, Mr. and Mrs. Dorr Temple Denton, Mr. and Mrs. Harold N. Hecht, Gleason Lapey, Buell Critchlow, Mrs. Frank L. Danforth, Miss Ada Jeannette Banta, Miss Margaret Curtiss, Miss Elizabeth Bissell, Miss Polly Fenton, Miss Janice Brainard, George R. Wilkins and Walker Wilkins and Joseph Phillips.

Some Attitudes in Criticism; Prokofieff's Concerto

Trans Dec. 18/37

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto invites a little more discussion than was possible to devote to it in the course of a review which had to take into account another new work, the brilliant playing of Mr. Heifetz and the total impression of a remarkable concert. The concert is now over a week old, so that we shall have to assume that the reader's impression remains vivid. Dramatic critics can and do give their second thoughts to new plays which are still running; but for music critics to follow the same practice very often would result in some stale articles. Prokofieff's Concerto, at the same time, is an unusually fine work in a field which can do with new additions; and it is with an eye to making propaganda for it that we venture to call attention to some of its qualities in relation to the attitudes of mind that listen and then approve or reject it.

Make no mistake. This Concerto, attractive as it is, will meet with a certain amount of highy critical opposition, and indeed it already has. One man wrote of it: "Excepting some adorable measures in the early part of the andante, it impressed at least one listener as another of those modern creations in which the violin is made to sound like anything but. More of a work of will than of inspiration." Here we have two hostile attitudes which, leaving others aside for a moment, we may proceed to deal with.

Who is to say what is suitable for the violin and what is not? The professional violinists? How about Leopold Auer's declaration that the Violin Concerto of Tchaikovsky was "impossible to play," and a somewhat similar opposition to Sibelius's Concerto? Prokofieff's Second Concerto is a great deal more sympathetic to the instrument than his First, which is none the less no insignificant work in this form. The professional musician has often in the past been hostile to music on technical grounds, which time has subsequently cut from under him. It is unwise to lend too friendly an ear to and base a final opinion on him.

Chopin, the most widely played of all piano composers, wrote for the piano beautiful singing melodies. Surely that is against the instrument's fundamental character, which is percussive and in which manner the modern composers write. To be consistent, if you are going to censure Prokofieff for writing out of character for the violin, you ought also to blame the whole romantic school of piano composers in the same terms. In point of fact a great composer can do things which may seem against nature and can reveal new possibilities in musical materials when the dice appear to be loaded against him.

So much for the first objection. It is our opinion that this Concerto is not at all unreasonably anti-violinistic and that the critic who thought so may have heard an inferior performance. His second objection can not be answered so easily for the reason that it lies at the bottom of the whole subject of criticism. When is a work inspired and when is it machine-made? Are these not merely terms with which we seek to give reasons for our like or dislike? "I don't like it" is a more honest expression than, "In this work the author was obviously uninspired," and does the speaker more credit, even if it can not advance us very far.

It is a common habit of criticism to separate thought from imagination, intellect from inspiration, and to imply that the latter is vastly to be preferred. Henry Hazlitt in his "The Anatomy of Criticism" wrote a most welcome chapter, called "Vivisecting Signor Croce." During the course of his dissection of the Italian philosopher of aesthetics he said: "It is impossible, of course, to separate the imagination from the intellect: both words are merely hypostatizations of processes; they are merely the nouns for 'to imagine' and 'to think,' and it is next to impossible to think without imagining and certainly impossible to imagine without thinking."

Naturally this does not dispose of the objection that someone does not like Prokofieff's Concerto, but it suggests that his reasons for dislike are less lofty than he supposes. It is almost impossible for us to understand how anyone can honestly say that he hates Prokofieff's music. One of his greatest advantages is that he seldom writes an ineffective or clumsy page. He is rarely tedious. He is, in short, a brilliant stylist. You may disagree that his music will live, that is not the issue; but you cannot deny him the virtues that are plain to the contemporary ear.

Other unfriendly critical attitudes come to mind as probably directed against this Concerto. There is the extremist theory that it must be a retrogression in Prokofieff's development, because it does not do without tonality and key center and because the first two movements are unlike any of his previous music. There is the childish notion that because the Concerto is pleasing on a first hearing it must be superficial. There is that hoary concept of music critics that you ought to be able to remember more of the tunes. We should not even mention this preposterous criterion, if we had not recently read it in another connection in a newspaper column. One example is sufficient to scotch it: Everyone remembers one theme of the Franck Symphony—indeed you can't forget it for days afterwards—whereas the melodies of Bach have far less "stickiness," if that is the word. The problem is possibly physical and does not properly belong in the realm of artistic consideration.

We have mentioned a few of the theoretical objections that might be made to Prokofieff's recent Concerto. Undoubtedly there are others, none of which can seriously damage the fine qualities of this work. In the heat of the discussion and in the process of skating over some philosophical thin ice we have not had time to come more closely to grips with the work itself and still another criticism of it which could justly be made. At the risk of laboring the subject we shall continue it next Sunday. As Ernest Newman sometimes writes when he is engaged on a series of articls: "Another fascinating installment, accordingly next week!"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
DEC 31 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY SIBELIUS

Two choral scores of Sibelius will have their first hearing in New York at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 6—"The Origin of Fire" from the "Kalevala," and "The Captive Queen." At that concert the Helsinki University Chorus, now making its first visit to this country, will make its only appearance with orchestra in New York. The program, to be conducted by Sergei Koussevitzky, also includes Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter" and the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major.

Emma Boynet, the French pianist, will appear as soloist at the concert of Saturday afternoon, January 8, playing in Mozart's Concerto in C major, K.467. A Concerto for Orchestra by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach will open the program, which will close with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor.

On Friday evening, January 7, Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the Boston orchestra at the Brooklyn Institute in the Beethoven Eroica Symphony, Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

MUSIC

Her Dec

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 10th regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The soloist in one of his own compositions not previously heard in Boston was Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist. The program was as follows:

C. P. E. Bach
Concerto in D major for stringe, arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg
Rachmaninoff
Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini for piano and orchestra
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 5 in E minor Op. 64

Yesterday was emphatically Rachmaninoff's concert, and he certainly deserved the ovation he received. The Rhapsody, which was scheduled to be played here last season and unavoidably postponed, is a brilliant work of exhibition. Whether it can ever be rated more than as a highly effective technical study, with one or two romantic interludes of lush beauty, is extremely doubtful. Indeed, almost any other pianist might make something rather trashy out of it. Any treatment, other than a sensitive and unexaggerated interpretation, would neither do justice to the ingenuity of the variations nor enhance the effect of the composition as a whole.

As a performer Mr. Rachmaninoff is an alchemist. For example, as a composer he unfolds, in the course of this Rhapsody, the full virtuoso bag of tricks. Without being either blatant or meretricious, he nevertheless unashamedly discloses most of the ear-tickling devices and conquers most of the technical dragons known to the trade. He at once astounds and delights us. But what is really astonishing is that he transforms this stunt by the force of his personality and the integrity of his performance into something actually convincing. That is to say that momentarily the Rhapsody is something more than a piece of display.

The phenomenon of Rachmaninoff at the piano has often been described, but it is still miraculous. He approaches the instrument as though it were one of the most unsavory machines ever designed for human discomfort. Even the first few notes are struck with a "this will never do" air, as though he were dipping a toe into cold water before bathing. When he has taken the plunge, however, we are conscious of nothing except the absolute mastery with which he solves the problems confronting him.

The Rhapsody is not only difficult for the soloist; it also provides a devilish task for the orchestra and conductor. The entrances and details of accompaniment are tricky and must be exact. These matters were attended to by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra with a skill that was never fussy, but on the contrary gave an impression of intense vitality. The performance was in all respects a triumph.

Emanuel Bach's Concerto is a work which we should like some time to hear in a chamber music version, if not in its original form. Steinberg's orchestration in the first and third movements at least, offers a peculiar lack of balance between the thunder of a full body of modern strings and the faint pipings of the wood-wind. Surely the scales could be evened up a bit? Yet the English horn solo in the andante, so finely played yesterday by Mr. Speyer, is well worth hearing.

Tchaikovsky's stirring and morbid music did not come amiss at the end of this concert. Very few people could have wanted a radical change of mood after the excitement of Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody. The Fifth Symphony, for all its familiarity, seldom fails to work a vast majority of the audience up to an emotional pitch. Nor could it fail under so sonorous an interpretation as we heard yesterday.

The concert will be repeated this evening. Next week the Helsinki University Chorus from Finland will sing two works of Sibelius, unheard in America before, with the orchestra. Bach's 5th Brandenburg Concerto and Brahms's Third Symphony will also be played.

PLAYS OWN RHAPSODY AS SOLOIST

B. Post

Rachmaninoff Gives New Work With Symphony

Dec. 7. /37

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In advance of virtually every symphony concert certain subscribers will send in their tickets for re-sale; but yesterday, though 'twas the day before Christmas, none availed themselves of this privilege. And the reason was not far to seek: the soloist was Sergei Rachmaninoff, playing with the orchestra his own Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, never before heard in this city.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S FIFTH

Besides this extra added attraction, as the playbills sometimes put it, yesterday's concert, as will that of this evening, offered one of the most popular of symphonies, one in which Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have long excelled, Tchaikovsky's fifth.

The remaining number, a mild preface to so much tonal excitement, was, and will be, the concerto for viols by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, transcribed for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, at the behest of Dr. Koussevitzky, and of frequent occurrence on the latter's programmes. Of it, it may be said again, that the two allegros are typical of their period and that the intervening andante is deeply expressive, with one recurring phrase which threatens always to lapse into one of the most poignant motives in "Parsifal." The whole concerto, needless to say, was beautifully played.

Rachmaninoff's Work

For the theme of his rhapsody, in the form of variations, composed in 1934, Mr. Rachmaninoff chose that of the last of the 24 caprices of Paganini, which Brahms subjected to further variations in his extensive Opus 35 for the piano, aparently exhausting its possibilities. And now comes the Russian and finds even more things to do with it. Occasionally we are reminded of Brahms' treatment of this exceedingly simple tune, but for the most part Mr. Rachmanioff bends it to his own composing personality.

Possibly it was because Paganini's theme is in A minor, the key of Mr. Rachmanioff's "Island of the Dead," wherein that compser uses the ancient plainsong Dies Irae, that he saw fit to weave this lugubrious melody into the core of his rhapsody, asserting it triumphantly at the end. But to this listener its presence there seemed incongruous.

A Composer Who Plays

Taken as a whole, this rhapsody is no more than conventionally effective. There is much brilliant writing both for the orchestra and for the pianoforte; there are songful medolies in the best Rachmaninoffian style, and some lively syncopations. Possibly the piece will appeal to other pianists, but in the meanwhile it makes yet another serviceable vehicle for its distinguished author, who as soloist with orchestras apparently plays only his own music. After all, though many do not seem to realize it, Mr. Rachmaninoff is primarily a composer who plays, not a pianist who composes.

Cordially Received

Always a darling of the public, Mr. Rachmaninoff can confidently expect a demonstration whenever he appears with an orchestra, and yesterday the enthusiasm seemed to mount even higher than usual, albeit the rhapsody has not the value of the second and third concertos. The fourth is not yet known to us of Boston.

To accept Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, in toto, one must be immune both to arrant sentalimentality and to bombast. In yesterday's prevervid performance the obvious weakness of the music were, so far as was humanly possible, burned away. And at the end came yet another tumult of applause.

SALINA, KAN.
JOURNAL
DEC 28 1937

RADIO SAVES ORCHESTRA

It Provides Score Which Had Gone Astray

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston symphony orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while enroute from Leipsig, Germany.

The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
9 1937

SYMPHONY PARTS RADIOED ACROSS ATLANTIC OCEAN

Boston Orchestra to Get Them in Time to Play Friday

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (AP) — Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic Ocean last night, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

Manuscript Vanishes

The lost parts—for cello, viola, and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Ger., on Nov. 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

Received in N. Y.

The pictures were received in New York early last night, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

Four sheets, reduced to a page 8½ by 11 inches, were transmitted at one time, and will be reproduced and enlarged here for the musicians.

Joseph Mann, an orchestra player, and an expert coypist, will inspect and fill in any notes that may be blurred.

In New York, RCA Communications, Inc., described the procedure as "routine."

Arrive in Time

Symphony officials said arrival of the pictures this morning would leave "plenty of time" for rehearsal with the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus, which opens its American tour Friday, featuring the music of the Finnish master.

"Origin of Fire" never was printed, partly because Sibelius' genius was not widely appreciated in 1902, when it was sent to the publishers. It has been presented successfully in Europe several times, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 2 1937

Original Script for Symphony Missing in Mail

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (UP)—Postal inspectors sought today to solve the mysterious disappearance of the original manuscript of "the origin of fire," an early unpublished work of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius.

Mailed at Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa to America, the manuscript vanished en route to the Boston Symphony orchestra, which with the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus, was to give the work its first American performance Friday.

Another package mailed at the same time and containing some of the choral and instrumental parts, was received nearly two weeks ago.

"The Origin of Fire," written in 1902, was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's national epic. If copies of the manuscript cannot be obtained, another Sibelius choral work will be substituted at Friday's concert.

John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator, believed it "far-fetched" to say that the score was lost forever, pointing out that the publishers may have copies of parts from which a complete score may be assembled.

(98)

WEDNESDAY, Boston Traveler DECE

SYMPHONY GETS DOWN TO WORK

29/37

Unusual picture of the Boston Symphony orchestra in rehearsal today at Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitzky, director, is shown in his rehearsal jacket. Note the empty seats, musicians clad in business suits, sweaters smocks and rolled up sleeves as they prepare to toil with the radioed score of Jan Sibelius' "Oring of Fire.'

Arrives from New York After Being Wirelessed From Germany

A duplicate of the lost score of Jan Sibelius' unpublished symphony, "Origin of Fire," arrived in Boston by train early today following its transoceanic transmission by radio photography, and plans were immediately made to place the score before members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first rehearsal either late today or tomorrow morning.

BROUGHT BY AGENT

The Finnish composer's little-known work was brought to Symphony Hall by Karl Bauer, a representative of Associated Music Publishers of New York. American agents of the European publishing house of Breitkopf & Haertel.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance will be given Boston music lovers on

Cont.

RADIOED MUSIC SCORE ARRIVES

Symphony Rehearses 'Origin of Fire' Today

(Continued from First Page)

Friday evening even though the orchestra will have little time to learn the work. He pointed out that the Helsinki University chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

The musical score had to be duplicated by radio photography because the orchestral parts became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston. A second package, containing choral parts, arrived here two weeks ago.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

CALLED IT PUZZLE

Bauer arrived in Boston on the 6:30 train this morning after standing beside the operator in the RCA Communications, Inc., receiving room watching the transmission by transatlantic radio.

He said that operators were puzzled by the score and called it a "Chinese puzzle."

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipsig, Germany, before it was mailed to the Boston Symphony orchestra, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper. Then, it was enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians.

A Boston photostatic operator was assigned by the directors of the orchestra to make enlarged copies so that the musicians will be able to read the music.

Joseph Mann, trumpeter of the orchestra, was shown the miniature score the first thing this morning. It will be his work to "touch up" any missing or blurred copies and see that the score is correct for playing. Officials of Symphony Hall said that Mann, a specialist in his field, has many times in the past worked on torn and mutilated scores very successfully.

The directors declined to say just who will foot the transmission costs, estimated close to $1000 in all. The first transmission was from Leipzig to Berlin over the telephone wires and thence by radio to ew York, via RCA. The total time required was slightly over 12 hours. Radio transmission alone required eight hours.

Conductor Koussevitzky was shown the first scores at 10 o'clock rehearsal this morning. He mounted his stand and rapped for order. First he asked for a one minute tribute to his friend and composer, Maurice Ravel, who died in Paris yesterday. Following the tribute he showed the score to the players who said they could read every note of the small script which was 2¼ by 3¼.

Martti Turunen

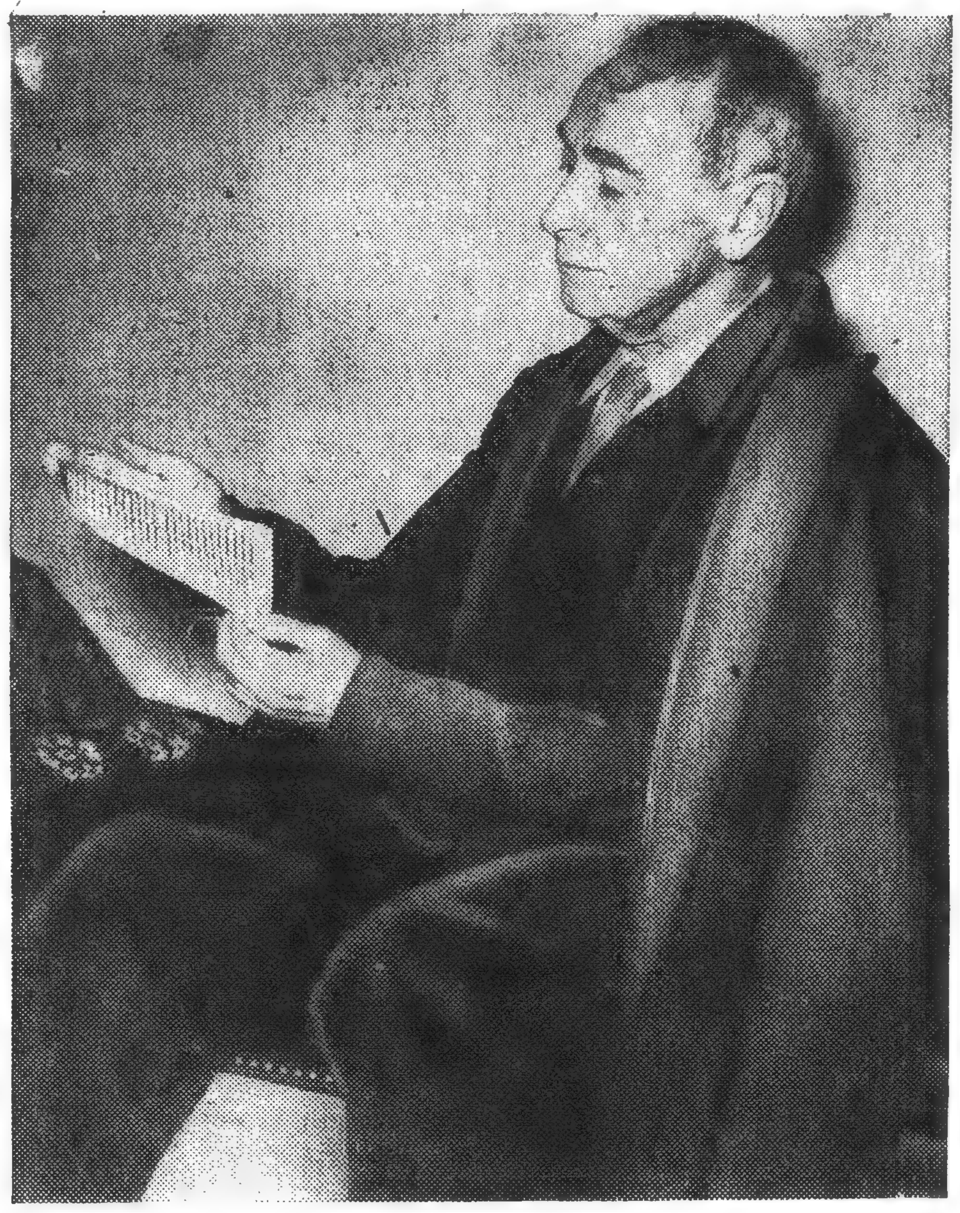
Conductor of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland, Which Will Make Its American Début Friday and Saturday at the Boston Symphony Concerts

---

ON GLOBE—THURSDAY, DECEMBER

Grandson of Sibelius in Chorus Here to Appear With Symphony

30/37



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra examines radio-photo of missing parts of Sibelius score.

A modest bass singer in the Helsinki University Chorus from Finland, here for concerts tomorrow and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was revealed yesterday as the grandson of Jean Sibelius, greatest living composer.

The identity of the grandson, Martti Paloheimo, was revealed shortly after the arrival in Boston of radio photos of the missing parts of the unpublished Sibelius composition "Origin of Fire," which have been lost in the mails.

Paloheimo, an undergraduate at Helsinki, sought to keep his relationship with Sibelius a secret, because he intends to stand on his own feet. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony, talked with the young man for some time, asking questions about the great composer, with whom he is very friendly.

Radio photos of the missing music reached here yesterday from Germany and members of the chorus and the orchestra began at once to prepare copies.

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, TUESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1937

Finnish Singers Practice Amid Colonial Scene

Amid the scenes of American colonial history which adorn the walls of the Lowell House Common Room, some 50 young men from the Helsinki University of Helsingfors, Finland, sang music of their homeland this morning.

They are members of the Helsinki University male chorus now making its first concert tour of the United States and to appear in Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week.

While their coatless director, Martti Turunen, accompanied and coached them from the piano, the fresh-complexioned young men reached smooth crescendos.

It seemed rather appropriate that these Finnish students and graduates should be rehearsing in a room decorated by a mural pageant of American revolutionary history. For the present tour commemorates the 300th anniversary of the first permanent settlement on the Delaware River, in which the Finns and Swedes both participated.

In fact, in welcoming the Helsinki chorus, America also welcomes Finland's first contribution to the June, 1938, Delaware Tercentenary, in which the United States, Finland, Sweden and the states of Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey as well as Finnish and Swedish Americans are participating.

As the chorus finished its preliminary rehearsal this morning, Symphony Hall had still received no word of "Origin of Fire," the original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by Jan Sibelius which was scheduled for an American premiers at this week's pair of concerts.

According to John N. Burk, Boston Symphony program annotator, two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on Nov. 18, in time to catch the Europa. One of the packages has arrived but the other has not. So Dr. Koussevitzky has substituted another Sibelius choral work. The orchestra and chorus will, however, present the first performance in America of "The Captive Queen," another Sibelius composition.

Finnish Tones at Harvard

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

By a Staff Photographer

Helsinki University Chorus Rehearses Before Director Martti Turunen

---

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

DEC [illegible] 1937

Radio to Rescue Of Symphony Program

Boston (AP) — Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the choral symphonic score of San Sibelius' "Origin of Fire", which went astray in the mails while enroute from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

MARTTI TURUNEN, M. A.
composer.
Conductor of the Helsinki
University Chorus.

PROF. K. T. JUTILA, Ph. D.
Former minister of agriculture.
Official representative of the Republic of Finland on the concert tour of the Helsinki University Chorus in the United States of America and Canada commemorating the Delaware Tercentenary festivities

YLIOPPILASKUNNAN LAULAJAT
The Helsinki University Chorus

PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD - NEWS

DEC 30 1937

Radio Photo Makes Music News

DESTINY HAS MADE of a fugitive piece of music written by Jan Sibelius, the great Finnish composer, one of the most famous musical scores in the world.

Written some years ago, and played with success in various cities of Europe, but never printed, this short choral-symphonic bit called "Origin of Fire" is down as a novelty to be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concert to be presented in the Hub City tomorrow under the baton of Director Serge Koussevitzky.

It looked for a few days as though the number would have to be cancelled, and thereby hangs the tale.

The original score of M. Sibelius was mailed from Leipzig on November 18 by his publisher along with a second package containing only the separate orchestral parts, via the liner Europa. In due time the Europa arrived at her pier in Manhattan and Uncle Sam's mail delivered the orchestral parts to M. Koussevitzky. But not the complete original score. That has not arrived yet, despite frantic searchings, and it may be that the world of art has lost this valuable original.

But the composition is safe, and this number will be played tomorrow just the same. In distant Leipzig the publisher got busy. He had photographs of the original score, and these he sent to New York by radio, where they were duly received and rushed to Boston.

All this commotion about a short piece of music requiring only about twelve minutes in the playing is of interest, and deep interest, because it has used radio photo to write a new chapter in the history of music.

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

DEC 28 1937

Radio to Rescue Of Boston Symphony

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipzig, Germany.

The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finhish composer's work Friday was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

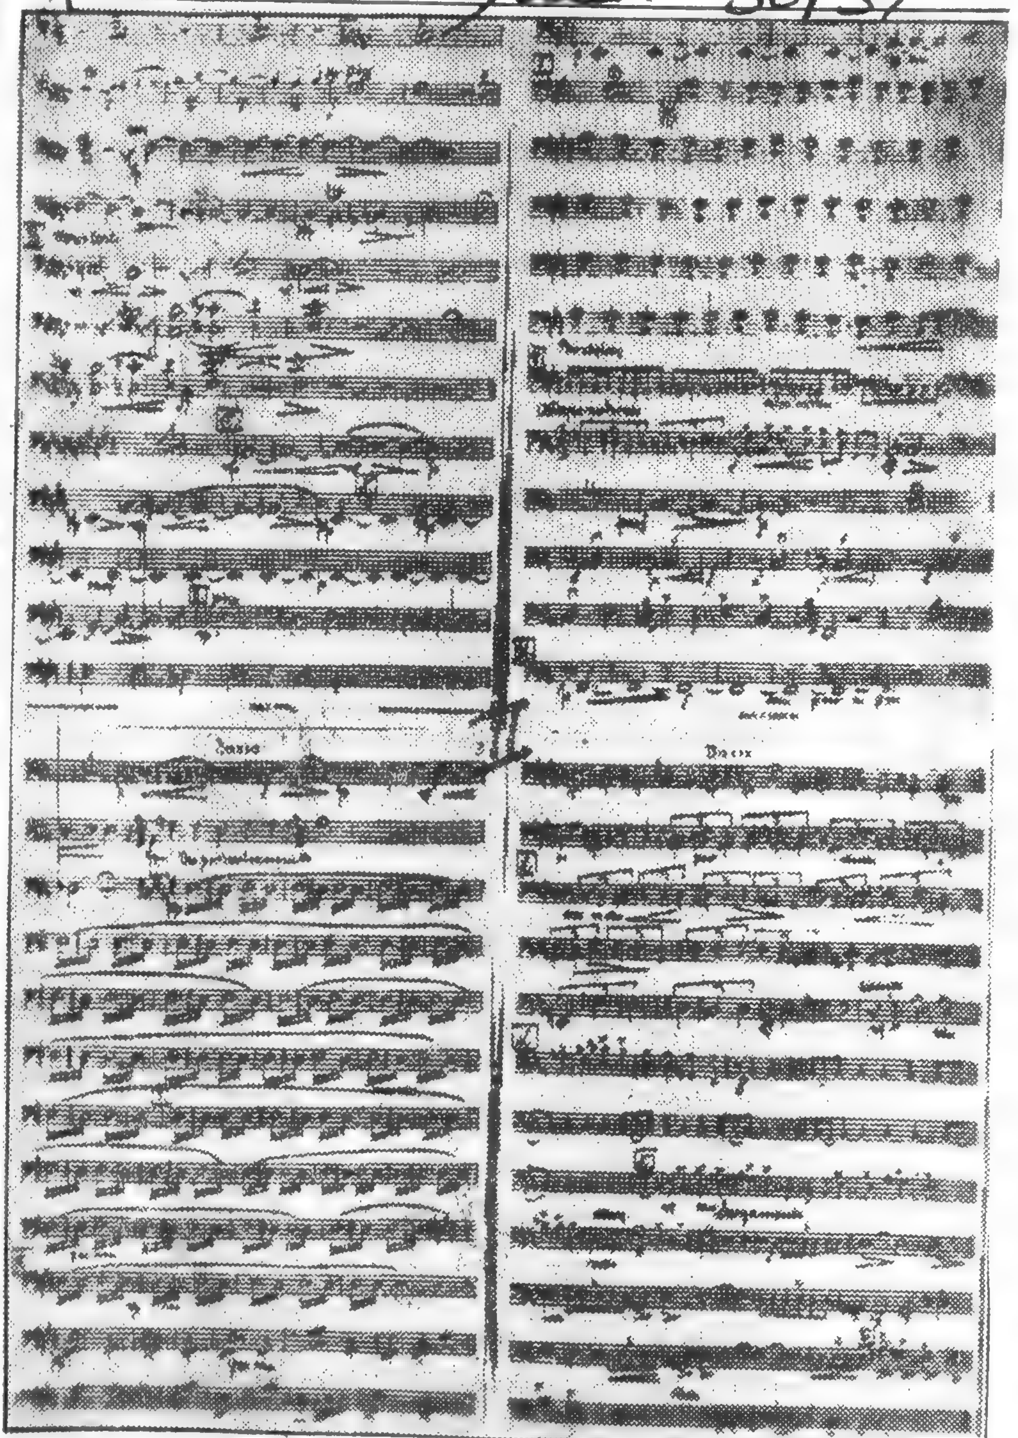
KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

DEC 28 1937

Boston, Dec. 28, (P)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the choral-symphonic score of San Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while enroute from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin immediately."

There's Music in the Air

Trans. Dec. 30/37



This is a photograph of a "take" of the radio-photograph of "The Origin of Fire," a new composition by Jean Sibelius, transmitted from Leipzig to the Boston Symphony after the original score had been lost. The orchestra will give the music its first American performance tomorrow afternoon, and repeat it on Saturday.

RENO, NEV.
GAZETTE

MUSICAL SCORE IS TRANSMITTED BY RADIO PICTURE

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP) — Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~the~~ choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Orchestra officials said four sheets of the score, reduced to a page 8½ by eleven inches, would be transmitted at a time. In all, fourteen pages of the original must be transmited, they said. Upon receipt, they explained, the miniatures must be enlarged to conventional size and sufficient copies made to accommodate the orchestra.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1937

Choral Music from Sibelius, With Finnish Singers to Assist

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening became a matter of international concern when the loss of some of the parts of one of the numbers to be sung by the Helsinki University Chorus became known. But the modern miracle of transmission of photographs by telegraph and radio has made the performance of the original choral program without change.

Meanwhile the first orchestral number of the originally announced program has been withdrawn. The latest version of the complete list is now: Third Symphony by Brahms and, by Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daughter" and "Finlandia" for orchestra, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen" for chorus and orchestra. This department is still in some uncertainty whether the choral works will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky or by the regular conductor of the chorus, Martti Turunen.

"The Origin of Fire" was composed for the inauguration of the Finnish Theater of Helsinki (Helsingfors) in 1902, and was sung on that occasion by a chorus of 350 voices under the direction of the composer. The words are taken from the "Kalevala," the national epic of Finland, and they recount how the vengeful mistress of Pohjola captured and hid the sun and the moon, thus throwing the world into a dreadful darkness until the god Ukko kindled the fire for two new heavenly luminaries.

"The Captive Queen" is one of Sibelius's patriotic compositions. The words are from an allegorical poem by Paavo Cajander, Finnish poet who, incidentally, translated the whole of Shakespeare into his own native tongue. The poem is one of that group and of that time that demanded a symbolical treatment of a subject to disguise its really patriotic nature (Finland, it will be remembered, was a part of the Russian Empire before the Great War). In this regard the music of "The Captive Queen" resembles that of "Finlandia."

The thirteen stanzas of the poem end on a hopeful prophecy of Finland's eventual independence, a prophecy that came true not long after the death of the poet in 1913:

Take heart! The hero cometh,
Lo! O'er the distant field;
See, the dawn's light, up-rising,
Gleams on his helmet and shield.
The battle-cry rings free:
"For our glorious queen and for freedom!
Who dares to follow me?" . . .
She flung the tyrant's fetters down
And met the youth with a gracious mien,
The people round her pressed and hailed
Their long-lost Captive Queen.

(97)

MARTTI TURUNEN, M. A.
composer.
Conductor of the Helsinki
University Chorus.

PROF. K. T. JUTILA, Ph. D.
Former minister of agriculture.
Official representative of the Republic of Finland on the concert tour of the Helsinki University Chorus in the United States of America and Canada commemorating the Delaware Tercentenary festivities

YLIOPPILASKUNNAN LAULAJAT
The Helsinki University Chorus

PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD - NEWS

DEC 30 1937

Radio Photo Makes Music News

DESTINY HAS MADE of a fugitive piece of music written by Jan Sibelius, the great Finnish composer, one of the most famous musical scores in the world.

Written some years ago, and played with success in various cities of Europe, but never printed, this short choral-symphonic bit called "Origin of Fire" is down as a novelty to be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concert to be presented in the Hub City tomorrow under the baton of Director Serge Koussevitzky.

It looked for a few days as though the number would have to be cancelled, and thereby hangs the tale.

The original score of M. Sibelius was mailed from Leipzig on November 18 by his publisher along with a second package containing only the separate orchestral parts, via the liner Europa. In due time the Europa arrived at her pier in Manhattan and Uncle Sam's mail delivered the orchestral parts to M. Koussevitzky. But not the complete original score. That has not arrived yet, despite frantic searchings, and it may be that the world of art has lost this valuable original.

But the composition is safe, and this number will be played tomorrow just the same. In distant Leipzig the publisher got busy. He had photographs of the original score, and these he sent to New York by radio, where they were duly received and rushed to Boston.

All this commotion about a short piece of music requiring only about twelve minutes in the playing is of interest, and deep interest, because it has used radio-photo to write a new chapter in the history of music.

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

DEC 28 1937

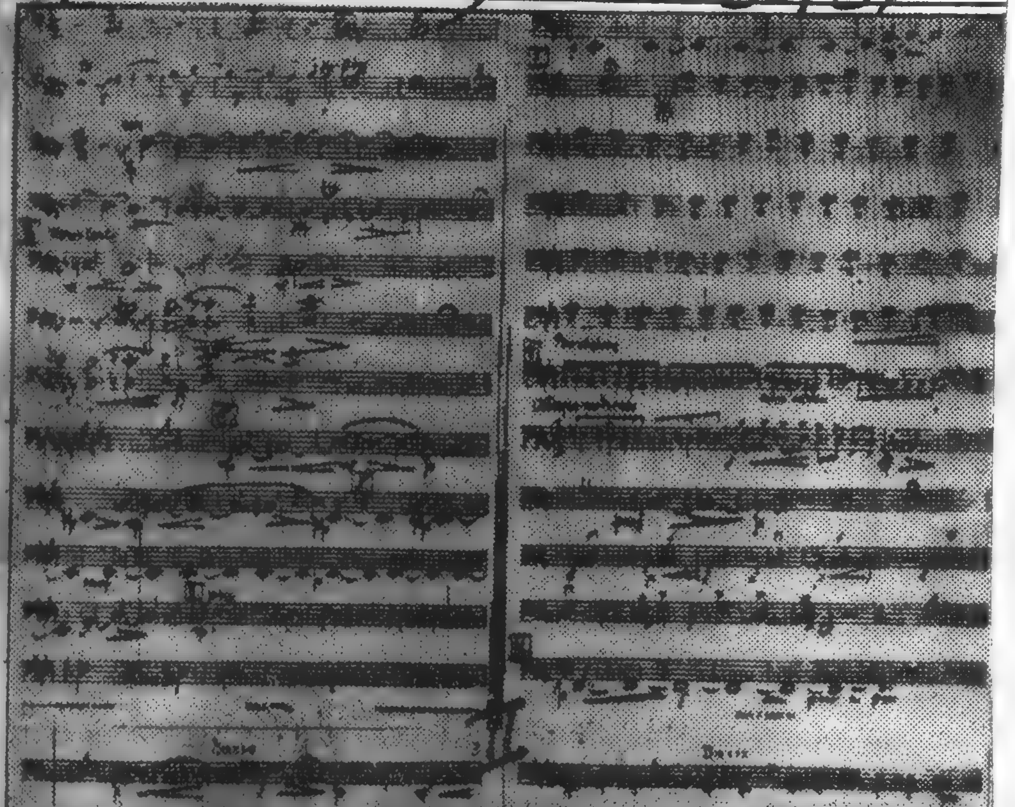
Radio to Rescue Of Boston Symphony

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphony score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipzig, Germany.

The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

There's Music in the Air

Transcript, Dec. 30/37



This is a photograph of a "take" of the radio-photograph of "The Origin of Fire," a new composition by Jean Sibelius, transmitted from Leipzig to the Boston Symphony after the original score had been lost. The orchestra will give the music its first American performance tomorrow afternoon, and repeat it on Saturday.

RENO, NEV.
GAZETTE

DEC 28 1937

MUSICAL SCORE IS TRANSMITTED BY RADIO PICTURE

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP) — Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~the choral~~-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Orchestra officials said four sheets of the score, reduced to a page 8½ by eleven inches, would be transmitted at a time. In all, fourteen pages of the original must be transmitted, they said. Upon receipt, they explained, the miniatures must be enlarged to conventional size and sufficient copies made to accommodate the orchestra.

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

DEC 28 1937

Boston, Dec. 28, (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the ~~choral-symphonic~~ score of San Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while enroute from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin immediately."

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1937

Choral Music from Sibelius, With Finnish Singers to Assist

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening became a matter of international concern when the loss of some of the parts of one of the numbers to be sung by the Helsinki University Chorus became known. But the modern miracle of transmission of photographs by telegraph and radio has made the performance of the original choral program without change.

Meanwhile the first orchestral number of the originally announced program has been withdrawn. The latest version of the complete list is now: Third Symphony by Brahms and, by Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daughter" and "Finlandia" for orchestra, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen" for chorus and orchestra. This department is still in some uncertainty whether the choral works will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky or by the regular conductor of the chorus, Martti Turunen.

"The Origin of Fire" was composed for the inauguration of the Finnish Theater of Helsinki (Helsingfors) in 1902, and was sung on that occasion by a chorus of 350 voices under the direction of the composer. The words are taken from the "Kalevala," the national epic of Finland, and they recount how the vengeful mistress of Pohjola captured and hid the sun and the moon, thus throwing the world into a dreadful darkness until the god Ukko kindled the fire for two new heavenly luminaries.

"The Captive Queen" is one of Sibelius's patriotic compositions. The words are from an allegorical poem by Paavo Cajander, Finnish poet who, incidentally, translated the whole of Shakespeare into his own native tongue. The poem is one of that group and of that time that demanded a symbolical treatment of a subject to disguise its really patriotic nature (Finland, it will be remembered, was a part of the Russian Empire before the Great War). In this regard the music of "The Captive Queen" resembles that of "Finlandia."

The thirteen stanzas of the poem end on a hopeful prophecy of Finland's eventual independence, a prophecy that came true not long after the death of the poet in 1913:

Take heart! The hero cometh,
Lo! O'er the distant field;
See, the dawn's light, up-rising,
Gleams on his helmet and shield.
The battle-cry rings free:
"For our glorious queen and for freedom!
Who dares to follow me?" . . .
She flung the tyrant's fetters down
And met the youth with a gracious
mien,
The people round her pressed and hailed
Their long-lost Captive Queen.

JEAN COCTEAU

Author Cocteau (left), 61, is a jack-of-all-arts who for 30 years has been a top name among French literati. While no man to steady the French for these troubled times, he is a popular leader in the sense of being as much as anyone the cultural moderator of Paris. He has written three novels, besides an eruption of ballets and plays, one of which achieved the great distinction of being banned in Paris. His writing is almost irritatingly sophisticated, but he has attracted a huge coterie of admirers. He has attracted more with two surrealistic movies and recently adapted A Streetcar Named Desire for the Paris stage. A number of Cocteau's fawning young disciples trooped along when he and Karsh went to a friend's house to make this portrait. Karsh found that Cocteau, who criticizes actors for not knowing what to do with their hands, knew just what to do with his own. Dramatic and alive with a sensuous eloquence, they are arrestingly accented here.

JEAN-LOUIS BARRAULT

Actor Barrault (right), 39, is the most distinguished of the newer theatrical personalities in France. He led a revolt of eight leading players who resigned from the state-subsidized Comédie Française in 1946, then set up his own repertory company, a venture that proved highly successful. He is also a talented director, exploiting the technique of pantomime to maintain an almost wordless dramatic continuity. A critic reported from Paris, "Barrault uses the stage with such flexibility that at times he gets effects one would ordinarily think possible only on the screen." A movie starring Barrault, Children of Paradise, which was made during the war, had a successful run in the U.S. At the Marigny Theater, where this portrait was made in a promenade, Karsh found Barrault charming but highly nervous. He did not seem to know what to do with his hands. "He complained bitterly," Karsh said, "that they froze on him."

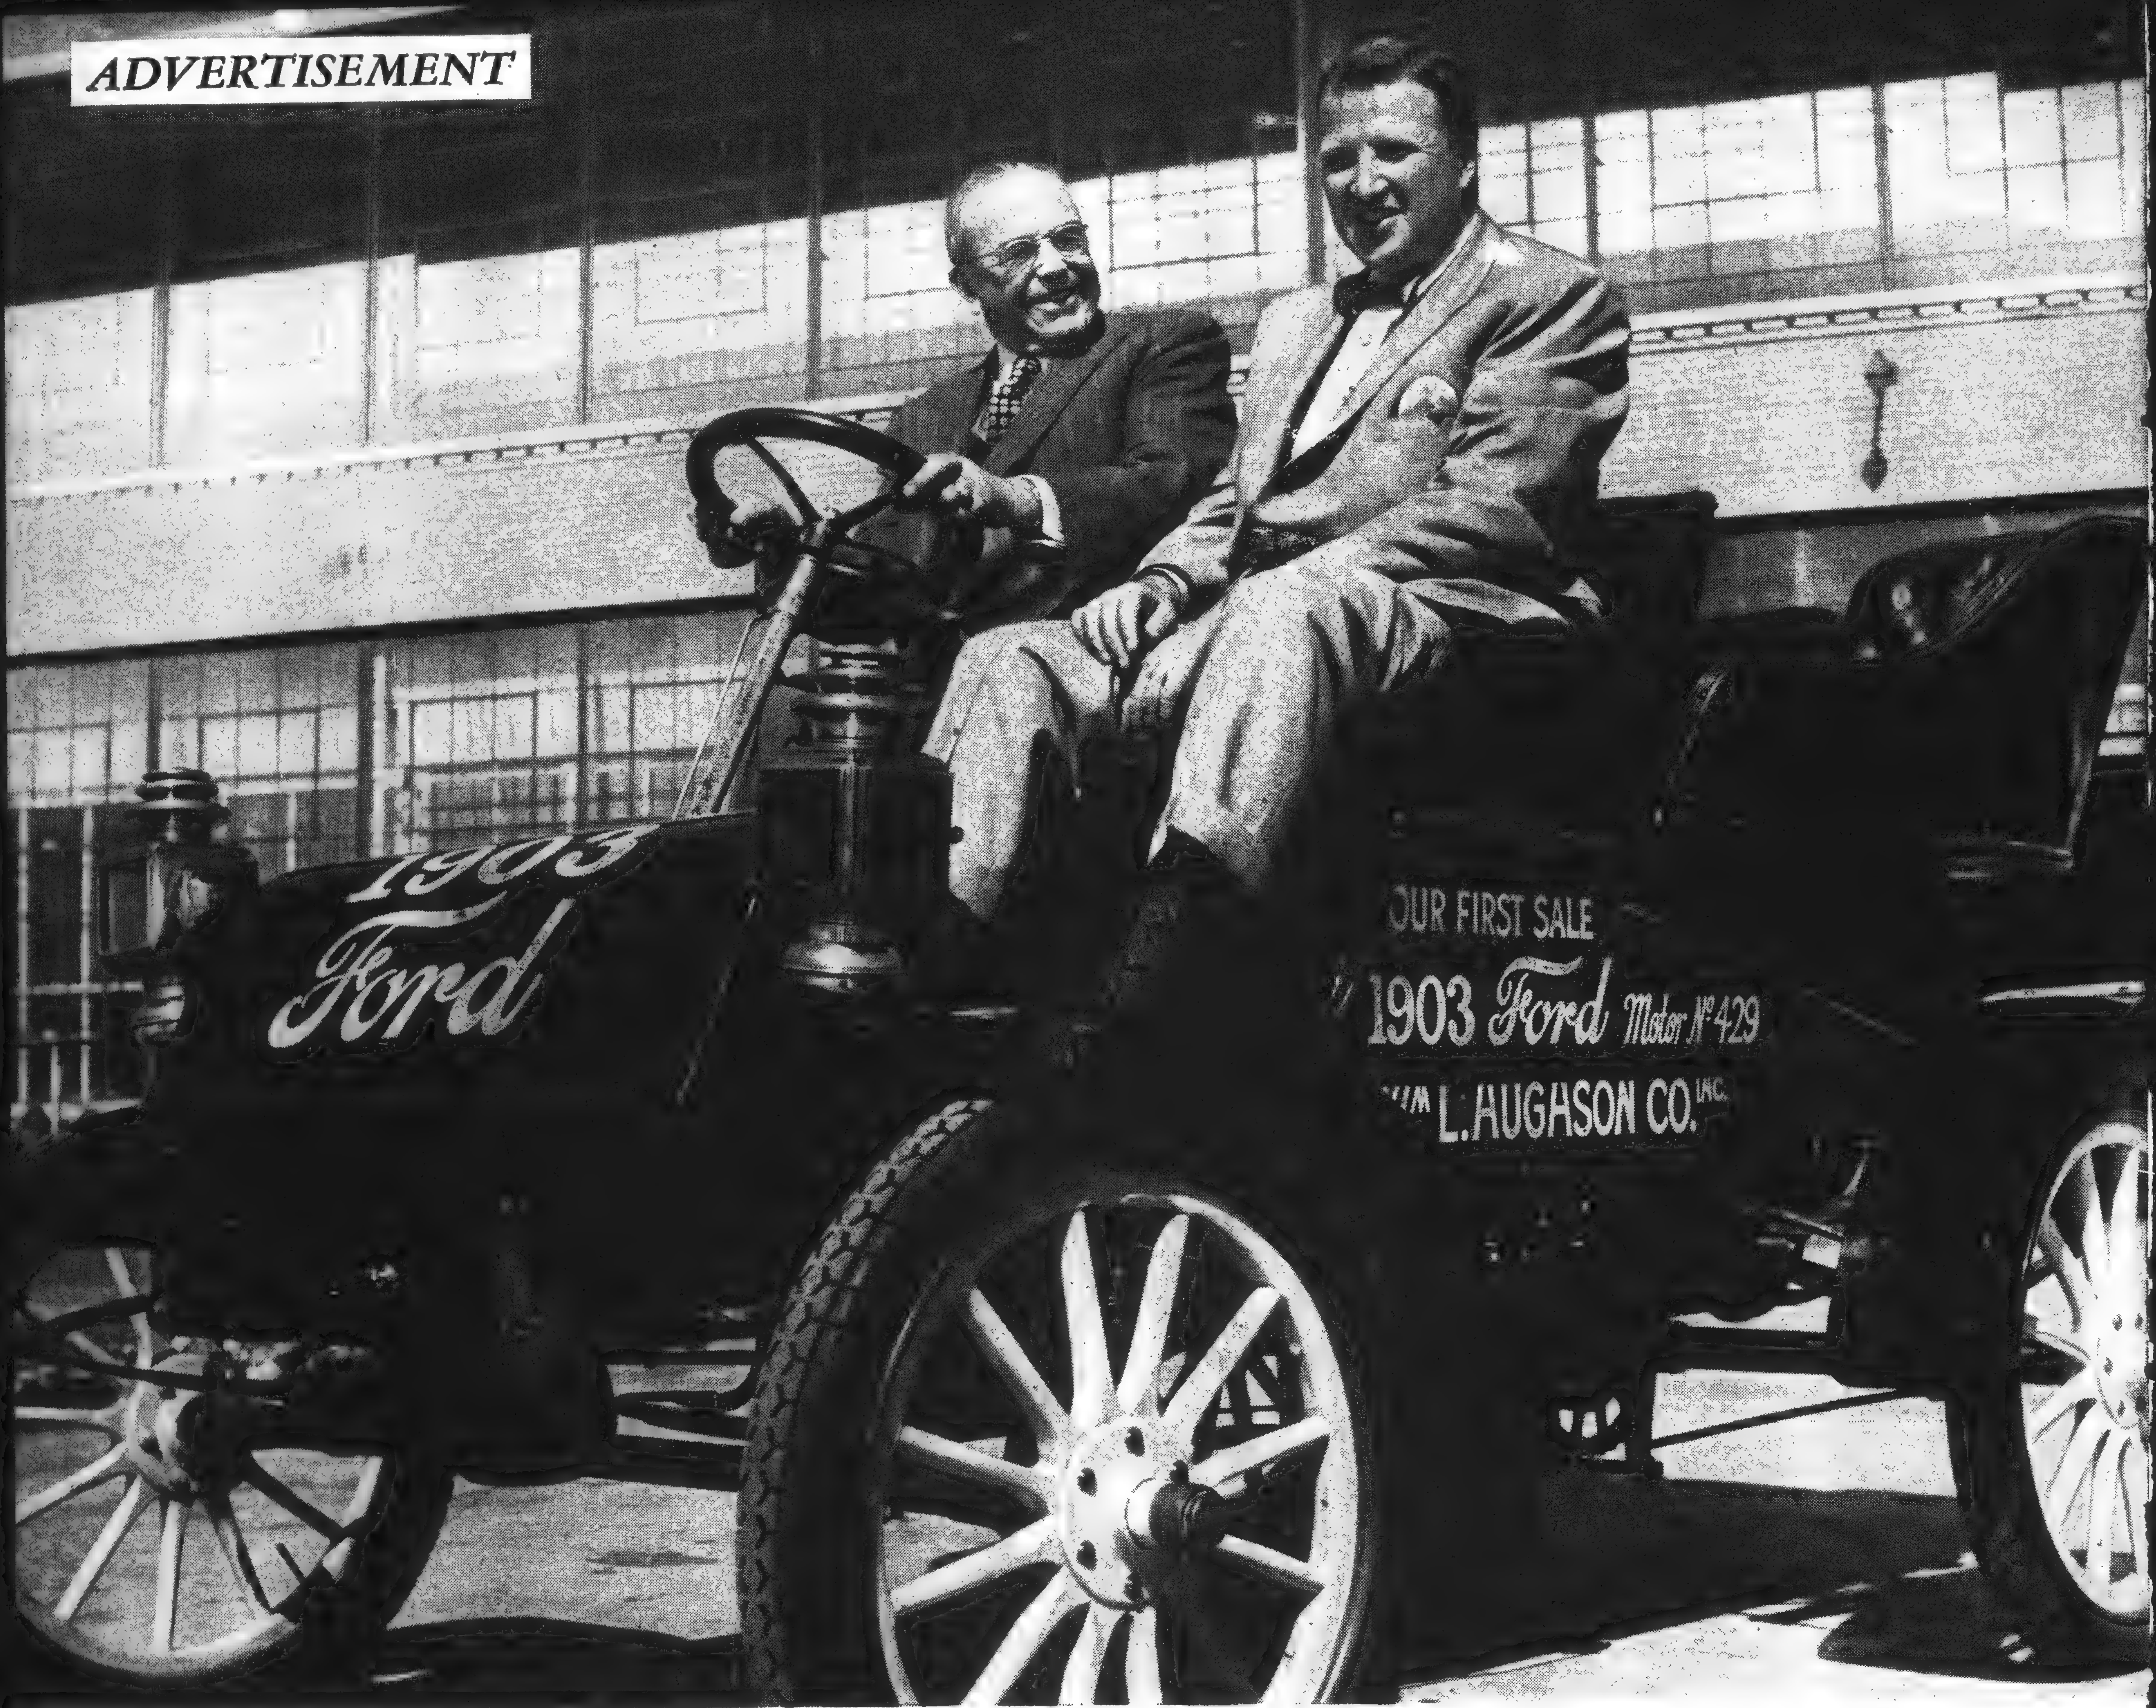
HENRY BERNSTEIN

Playwright Bernstein, 75, is easily the most durable figure of the modern French theater. In the past 50 years 29 of his plays have been produced, some of them coarse, some subtle, nearly all of them winding in and out of boudoirs. Now one of Europe's richest playwrights, Bernstein is also an incurable gallant who has survived 12 duels ("People are sensitive. They challenge me"). The picture above shows him in a damask-and-velvet box at his baroque theater in Paris. Karsh found him "very much the gentleman who has been, and still is, full of sex appeal."

JEAN SIBELIUS

Composer Sibelius (right), 84, is the venerated elder statesman of symphonic music. Now a virtual recluse at his home 30 miles from Helsinki, Finland, he is also the European whom Karsh wanted most to photograph. After an appointment was finally arranged through a friend of the family, he posed for two days, saying, "This is my last hope of having a good photograph." In this portrait, the great composer's proud face shows the same fierce dignity that he wrote into the thunderous tone poem Finlandia, which has thrilled three generations of Finnish patriots.

ADVERTISEMENT



1. AN AGREEMENT AND AN EARTHQUAKE launched Ford in the "Wild West." In 1903, Billy Hughson brought the first Fords to San Francisco. His agreement with the Ford Motor Company established him as the world's first Ford dealer. The San Francisco earthquake and fire of 1906 almost swallowed up Billy's new enterprise. But his few surviving cars did such impressive rescue work during the emergency that a flood of orders for Fords followed. Recently Hughson posed with Henry Ford II, President of the Ford Motor Company, in "Old 429," Billy's first sale. Its former owner traded the historic car to Hughson on a later model Ford.

1950 FORD
1950 FORD

2. FRIENDS TELL HUGHSON that he has enough satisfied customers to elect him mayor of the city. Like all Ford dealers, Hughson trains his men to be helpful, informative—never "high pressure." Over 300 Hughson "graduates" have opened friendly Ford dealerships of their own.

3. SERVICE is an important part of every Ford dealer's business. Knowing that trouble-free travel and economical operation make Ford owners anxious to "buy another one," Hughson checks daily with shop foremen to be sure jobs are handled promptly and efficiently. He has learned through experience that owners return to the place of business which serves them best.

- PHOTOGRAPH -
ORIGINAL STORED
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- PHOTOGRAPH -
ORIGINAL STORED
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

I am happy to be able to recommend the Helsinki University Chorus as one of our very best choruses. Its contribution to the development of Finnish choral music has been of basic significance. It gave me sincere pleasure to act as sponsor for the singers on their first, extremely successful American tour.

Jean Sibelius

Portrait Gallery

[Specially photographed for THE SUNDAY TIMES by DOUGLAS GLASS

Sibelius

SIBELIUS, celebrating his eighty-fifth birthday on Friday, is sure of the affectionate good wishes of the whole musical world. This country, thanks to Granville Bantock and Henry Wood and Rosa Newmarch, played a leading part in bringing it home to the world that Finland had produced a composer of the first order. Since then the British public has taken him warmly to its heart; when Vaughan Williams made that noble gesture of dedicating his own latest symphony to him " without permission " he spoke for all of us, and more eloquently than we could have spoken ourselves.

There is no more deeply respected figure in the musical world today than Sibelius. A certain physical remoteness and mental reserve in him have served only to bring him nearer to us. It is good to learn that he is still in excellent health, for which, some of his friends claim, he has to thank, in large measure, his sturdy indifference to the precepts of the medical profession. The Americans, with their usual happy blend of the ideal and the practical, are sending him with their birthday congratulations a handsome consignment of cigars. May they remind him, as their smoke enwreathes that grand old head of his, that the world is eagerly waiting for that eighth symphony that has been on the stocks so long!

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY L. HIGGINSON

FIFTY-SEVENTH
SEASON
1937-1938

[11]

Message sent — via RCA

December 27, 1937

BREITKOPFS
LEIPZIG

SIBELIUS UKKO URSPRUNG DES FEUERS PARCEL CONTAINING SCORE VIOLA CELLO AND BASS PARTS FAILED TO ARRIVE STOP BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH FINNISH UNIVERSITY CHORUS THIS THURSDAY DESPERATE SITUATION STOP SEND IMMEDIATELY GREATEST SPEED RADIO PHOTOS OF ALL PAGES MISSING PARTS NOT SCORE STOP PAGES TO BE REDUCED SO THAT FOUR WILL GO ON ONE 8 x 11 INCHES RADIO PHOTO STOP ALL EXPENSES BORNE THIS END STOP MUST HAVE RADIO PHOTOS TOMORROW TUESDAY NIGHT STOP CABLE IF ACCEPTED BY GERMAN CABLE OFFICE ALSO IF NOT STOP DO NOT SEND IF PRICE EXCEEDS DOLLARS TWO HUNDRED FIFTY

ASSOCIATED

Answer received - dated December 28

SIBELIUS RADIO PHOTOS UNDER WAY

BREITKOPF AND HARTEL

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY L. HIGGINSON

FIFTY-SEVENTH
SEASON
1937-1938
[11]

Message sent — via RCA

December 27, 1937

BREITKOPFS
LEIPZIG

SIBELIUS UKKO URSPRUNG DES FEUERS PARCEL CONTAINING SCORE VIOLA CELLO AND BASS PARTS FAILED TO ARRIVE STOP BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH FINNISH UNIVERSITY CHORUS THIS THURSDAY DESPERATE SITUATION STOP SEND IMMEDIATELY GREATEST SPEED RADIO PHOTOS OF ALL PAGES MISSING PARTS NOT SCORE STOP PAGES TO BE REDUCED SO THAT FOUR WILL GO ON ONE 8 x 11 INCHES RADIO PHOTO STOP ALL EXPENSES BORNE THIS END STOP MUST HAVE RADIO PHOTOS TOMORROW TUESDAY NIGHT STOP CABLE IF ACCEPTED BY GERMAN CABLE OFFICE ALSO IF NOT STOP DO NOT SEND IF PRICE EXCEEDS DOLLARS TWO HUNDRED FIFTY

ASSOCIATED

Answer received - dated December 28

SIBELIUS RADIO PHOTOS UNDER WAY

BREITKOPF AND HARTEL

Carl Nielsen Programs

Lent by Lily and Baird Hastings
Editord of Chrysalis Magazine

The American RECORD GUIDE

JUNE 1951 - VOL. 17, No. 10

Edited by Peter Hugh Reed
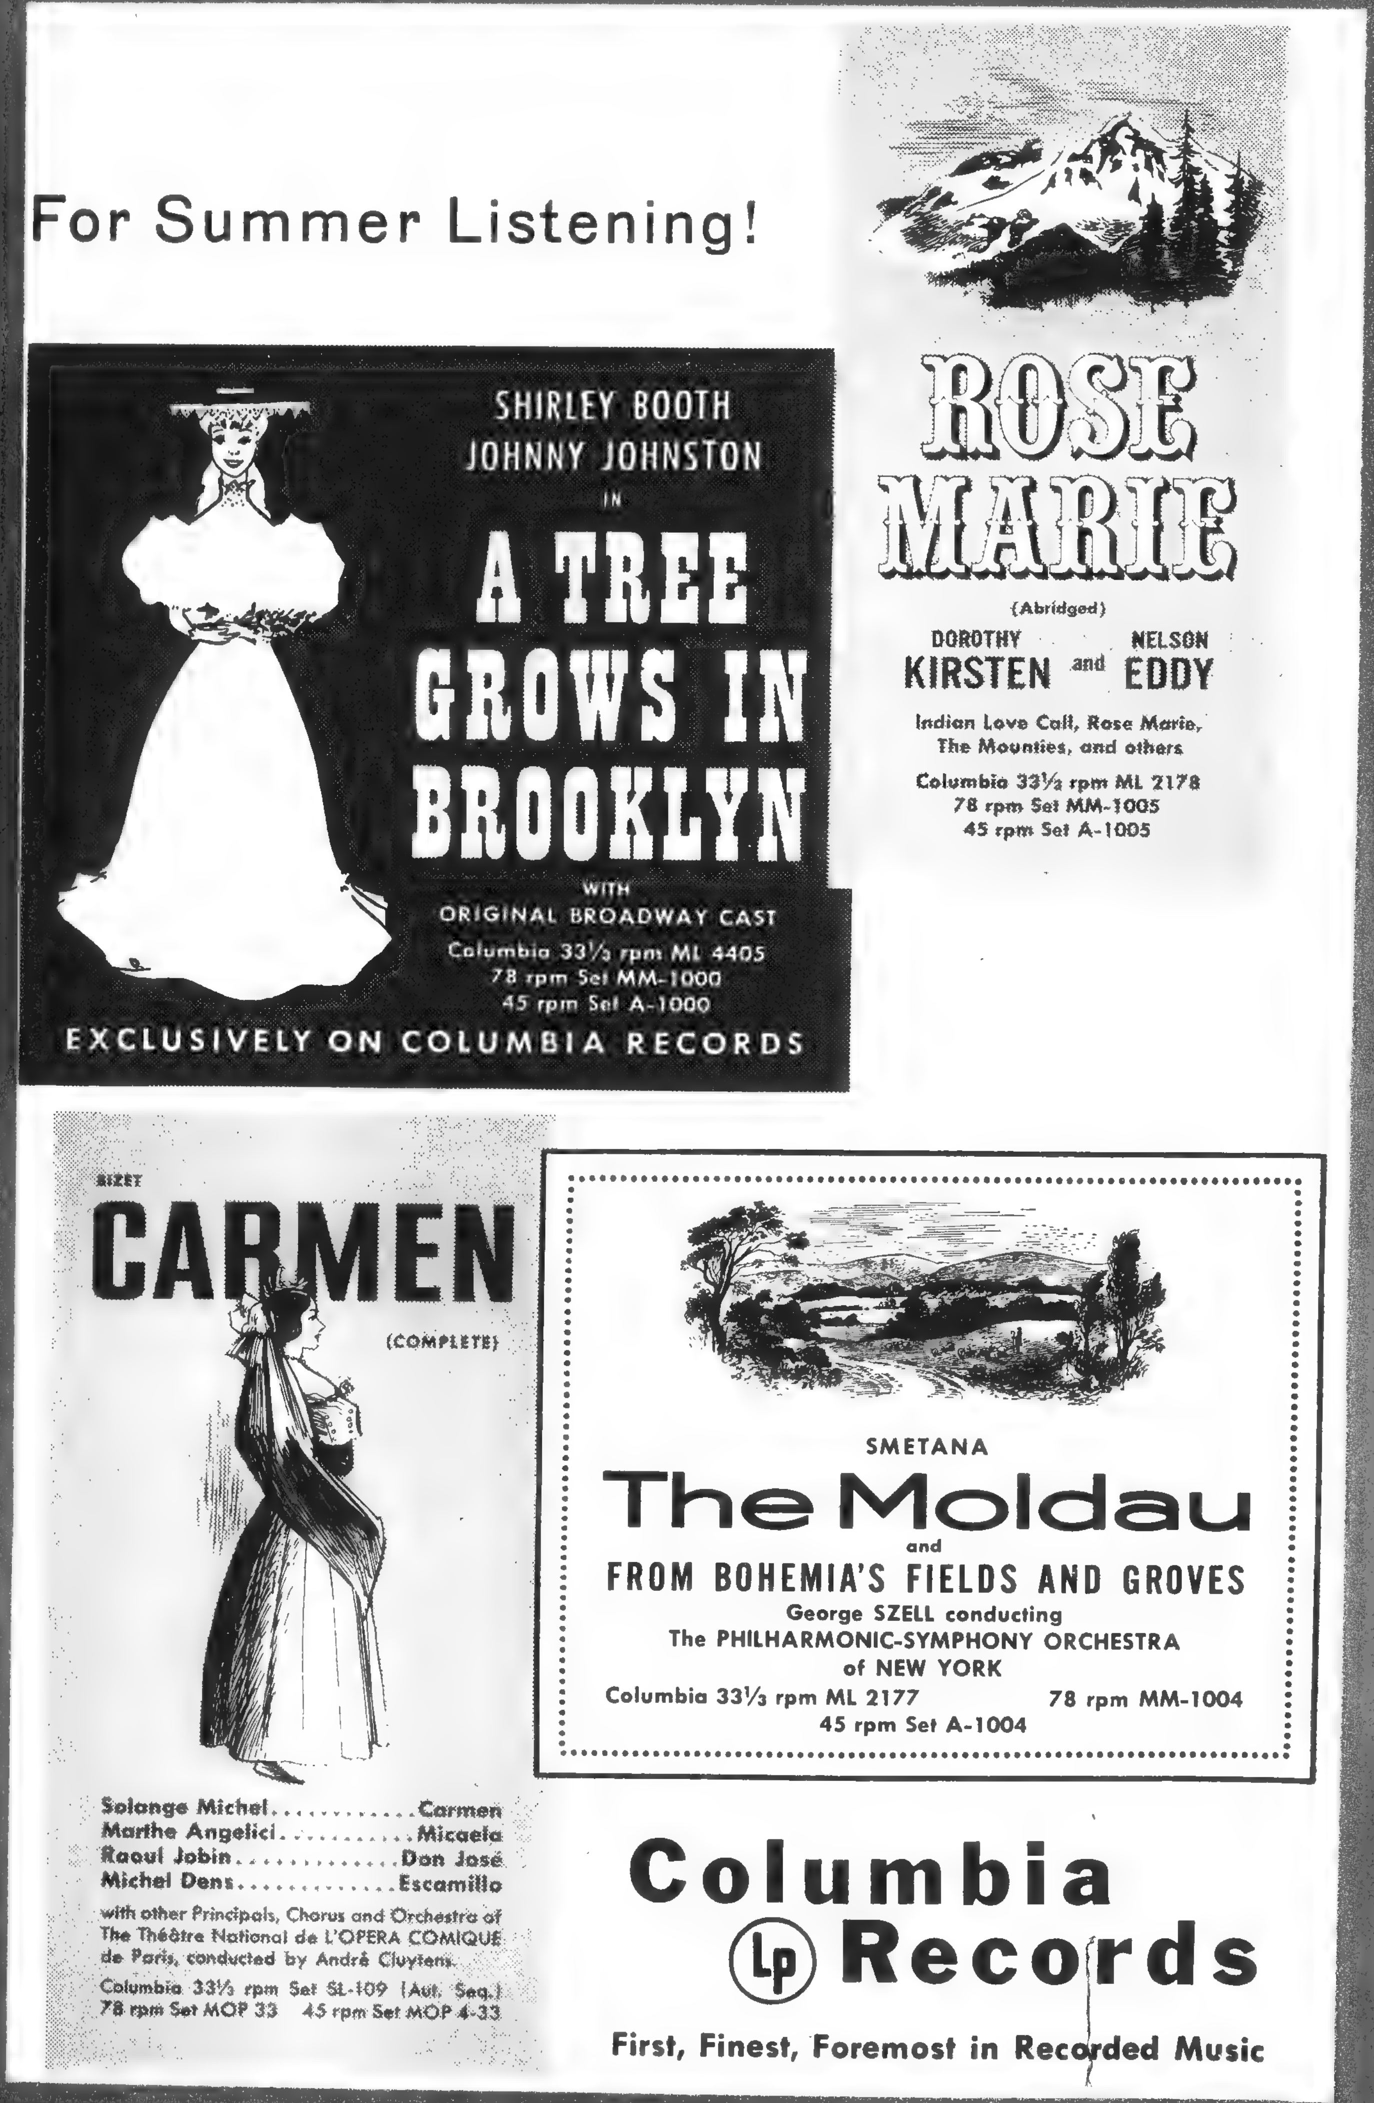
Thirty Cents

Boston University
College of Music
Library



For Summer Listening!

SHIRLEY BOOTH
JOHNNY JOHNSTON
IN A TREE GROWS IN BROOKLYN WITH ORIGINAL BROADWAY CAST
Columbia 33⅓ rpm ML 4405
78 rpm Set MM-1000
45 rpm Set A-1000
EXCLUSIVELY ON COLUMBIA RECORDS

ROSE MARIE
(Abridged)
DOROTHY KIRSTEN and NELSON EDDY
Indian Love Call, Rose Marie, The Mounties, and others
Columbia 33⅓ rpm ML 2178
78 rpm Set MM-1005
45 rpm Set A-1005

BIZET
CARMEN
(COMPLETE)

Solange Michel	Carmen
Marthe Angelici	Micaela
Raoul Jobin	Don José
Michel Dens	Escamillo

with other Principals, Chorus and Orchestra of The Théâtre National de L'OPERA COMIQUE de Paris, conducted by André Cluytens.
Columbia 33⅓ rpm Set SL-109 (Aut. Seq.)
78 rpm Set MOP 33 45 rpm Set MOP 4-33

SMETANA
The Moldau
and
FROM BOHEMIA'S FIELDS AND GROVES
George SZELL conducting
The PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA of NEW YORK
Columbia 33⅓ rpm ML 2177 78 rpm MM-1004
45 rpm Set A-1004

Columbia Lp Records
First, Finest, Foremost in Recorded Music

Boston University
College of Music
Library

The American RECORD GUIDE

JUNE 1951 • Vol. XVII, No. 10

formerly
The American Music Lover

CONTENTS

LP's Third Birthday 325
Carl Nielsen and his "Fifth Symphony" — Answon W. Peckham 327
The Music of Aaron Copland — Sidney Finkelstein, Part 2... 329
Beecham's "Tales of Hoffman"... 333
The Complete "Der Rosenkavalier" 334
Record Notes and Reviews...... 335

THE AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE, published at Pelham 65, N. Y. Editorial Office: 115 Reed Ave., Business Office: No. 11, Post Office Bldg.

- Peter Hugh Reed, Editor; C. J. Luten, James Norwood, Associates; Philip L. Miller, Anson W. Peckham, Harold C. Schonberg, Donald Richie, Contributors. Paul Girard, Advertising & Circulation, Julius S. Spector, Art Editor.
- Published monthly, The American Record Guide sells at 30c the copy. Annual subscription in the U.S.A. and Canada, $3.00; in all foreign countries, $3.25.
- The contents of The American Record Guide are protected by copyright and may not be reprinted without permission in writing. No responsibility assumed for unsolicited contributions.
- Change of address — this requires a month's notice No responsibility assumed for copies not received due to removal. A charge of 5 cents for reforwarding each copy returned by P.O. to us is made.
- Correspondence must be accompanied by return postage.
- Reentered as 2nd class matter Nov. 7, 1944 at the Post Office at New York, N.Y. under the act of March 3, 1879. Additional re-entry at Post Office, Easton, Pa., June 1950. (Contents copyright 1951 by Peter Hugh Reed.)

LP's Third Birthday

Editorial Notes

THREE YEARS ago this month, Columbia introduced its first long-playing records which, in a surprisingly short time, caught the interest and fancy of the record buying public. To a lagging industry, which had suffered setbacks from the war and two record-manufacturing bans, the new disc proved a Godsend. It reacted on the record-buying public very much like an injection of adrenalin on an apathetic patient. Since that June day, the LP record has not only snowballed its way to popularity, but has become the favored record in this country.

It took time to have the other companies fall in step, but eventually LP was adopted by all domestic record concerns. The increasing sales month after month soon prompted the formation of a group of smaller companies which concentrated solely on the issue of LP records. All this has had its stimulating effect on the music-minded public of this country, and it is quite possible that no other single musical force has promoted music appreciation to the extent that the LP disc has done. People, who had never previously bought symphonies, concertos and other long works began to take an interest in a record that would reproduce a work in an unbroken sequence as the composer had conceived it.

Despite the fact that the standard of performance and recording often varied, especially in the output of the smaller companies, the public responded. Eager to get into the swim, so to speak, the smaller companies assigned hitherto unrecorded works to second-rate artists and did not always give them the best reproduction. The piracy of second-rate performances from dubious sources were plentiful.

Columbia's willingness from the first, to cooperate with any record concern that desired to make LP discs, made it possible for anyone who had the wherewithal to enter the field. Had Columbia declined to cooperate, the growth of LP recording might have been another story. Whether or not, as some writers contend, the present exaggerated manufacture of LP discs is likely to be followed by a reaction, in which too little will come out, remains problematical. The proportion of firstrate LPs is perhaps no more or less than was the proportion of similar 78s. Many have forgotten the fluctuating quality of 78s in the days when LPs did not exist.

An Imposing Catalogue

It is only natural that the sponsors of LP should have the largest and most imposing catalogue to date. In the past three years Columbia has issued over 2,000 LP discs. This must be rated as a remarkable achievement in so short a time. To be sure, the better part of Columbia's LP releases have been re-recordings of original 78 issues, but this has served to promote a desired end. Had it been impossible to transfer satisfactorily outstanding and best-selling 78 rpm performances to LP, it is a foregone conclusion that the microgroove disc would have encountered opposition and setbacks. It might have taken years of promotion and new recording work to get the better part of the record-buying public to accept — much less convert to — LP. It was the fact that one could obtain on LP already valued 78 rpm performances as well as new ones, which definitely reawakened new interest in reproduced music — notably in the classical field — in this country.

The opposition to the new disc at first was owing to the inadequacy of playback machines in reproducing LPs. Looking back on those early days, we find that we, as well as others, were not immediately impressed. The first demonstration of the LP record was badly distorted in reproduction, for the correct compensation could not be effected on the low-frequency Philco machine employed. In our first writeup on LP, we said that unquestionably the quality of this new disc will depend on the quality of the equipment through which it is played. How right we were was proved in subsequent months. Not until we reconverted our own equipment to accommodate LP reproduction in the ideal manner with a firstrate, non-fluctuating motor and with proper equalization were we convinced of its overall merits.

Behind the Columbia microgroove disc went nine long years of research and manufacturing work to perfect the product. The guiding spirit was Ted Wallerstein, the recently retired president of the company. In 1939, the work on this record began. It is interesting to know that preparations for future re-recording of 78 rpm recordings was simultaneously taken into consideration. Columbia from 1939 made what engineers call "safety" recordings (actually duplicate master recordings). But, with an eye to the future, Columbia's "safeties" were duplicate cuts at 33-1/3 rpm of each recording sequence of 4 to 4½ minute master disc taken at 78 rpm. Through the years, these "safety" masters were carefully stored for potential use in making LP discs. When the microgroove record was perfected, Columbia was then able to make tape recordings from its "safety" discs thus assuring a uniformity in reproduction as good as and sometimes better than the original 78 rpm releases. The deterioration, often in evidence in the inner grooves of 78s, offered no problems in the transfer of earlier performances to LP, for the "safety" records has no loss of quality at any point. On the 16″ platters, made at the slower speed of 33 rpm, none of the duplicated 4 and 4½ minute musical sequences had been extended into the "danger" zone (i.e., shortened lengthened grooves toward the center of the disc).

Untrue Condemnation

All of this is of the greatest interest, as it refutes published assertions, made both in this country and in England, that the tonal quality of LP recording deteriorates at various points and toward the center of the record. LPs do not deteriorate toward the center as much as 78s when played by professional tone arms with corrected alignment. When reproduced by short tone arms, like those used on record players and changers, there is bound to be deterioration. Any record suffers under such circumstances.

In cases where Columbia's engineers have had to work from 78 rpm recordings for other concerns, they have been able to overcome somewhat the problems of inner grooves of older records. This is accomplished by equali-

(Continued on page 356)

CARL NIELSEN and his "Fifth Symphony"

By Anson W. Peckham

▲That Nielsen's Fifth Symphony has been recently recorded by the Danish State Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erik Tuxen (H.M.V. discs Z7022-26) should prove good news to those who, like myself, have found the music of this gifted Danish composer of considerable interest. A new miniature score, published in 1950 by Skandinavisk Musikvorlog of Copenhagen, is also available. This edition, based upon the composer's autographs, was revised by Emil Telmanyi and Erik Tuxen. The symphony, which was completed in January 1922, is scored for conventional full orchestra. Lasting slightly less than forty minutes, it is divided into two large sections each of which contains several alterations of tempo and mood.

Carl Nielsen, a composer more than once mentioned by me in the pages of this magazine, was born deep in the tranquil Danish countryside near Odense, not far from the birthplace of Hans Christian Anderson. Nielsen's father, a house painter by trade, was also a skilled amateur musician. It is said that his son's first interest in composing was fostered by his apprenticeship to a brass band when called for his military service. His efforts came to the attention of Niels Gade (not to be confused with Jacob Gade of Jalousie fame) who saw to it that the young man's talents were brought into focus by suitable training and encouragement.

Erik Tuxen, the distinguished conductor of the Danish State Radio Orchestra, says "it is very strange that the name of Carl Nielsen has never earned for itself a musical public outside of Denmark, while the name of Sibelius, who was born in the same year, is known the world over." I don't believe Mr. Tuxen is quite as baffled by this problem as he tries to make out, but, being the perfect gentleman, he prefers to overlook the crass, worldy factors involved and mull over some intangible musings about the differences between Finnish and Danish landscapes.

Sibelius had very strong roots in Germany, where he studied and worked for a considerable period. Many of his early works were published by the world-famous firm of Breitkopf and Härtel and received the widest possible distribution in the civilized musical world. Nielsen's music did not have this advantage. It was published by a Danish firm that apparently had little traffic with the outside world.

To the layman this matter of selecting a publisher may seem inconsequential; I can assure you that it is not. In the first place, how can a conductor, with the best intentions in the world, program a piece for which he can not obtain score and parts? Then too, the more influential publishing houses have agents (who are the big brothers of tinpan alley's song-pluggers) who act as salesmen for their firm's wares. The big companies, such as Boosey and Hawkes, Durand, Ricordi and (before the war) Breitkopf and Härtel, wielded a great deal of influence over performing musicians. They could make or break a struggling composer with a turn of the palm, just as today our all-powerful concert agents toy with the careers of their charges, pushing one ahead, holding another back, according to their whims, paying little heed to the degree of talent involved. As a concrete example, it can be quite accurately shown how Mascagni would be a far more powerful name in the world of music today if he had but made astute choice of publishers early in his career.

Stylistic Similarities

In an attempt to orient prospective listeners who would like to have a rough idea of Nielsen's style, I can only say that the composer whose music seems most similar is England's Vaughan Williams. Both men have based much of their foundation style on the linear concepts of Palestrina and his school. Both men have personalities that are fundamentally romantic (in the best sense of the word), yet are capable of violent outbursts of dissonant sound when aroused by the unsteady step of history passing them by. Nielsen's scores contain traces of a sardonic, wry humor that are reminiscent of Gustav Mahler, though the Danish master's personality is tempered by a placidity and satisfied tranquility that the ever-impatient Mahler could never attain.

During a period when the searing breath of atonality had already cauterized the festering sores of inbred impressionism and asepticized malignancies of post-Wagnerina bombast, the somnolent strength of Nielsen's deeply felt and artfully calculated scores were scorned by the chi-chi members of music's avant-garde as old-fashioned. Two years before the Fifth Symphony was played at the International Society of Contemporary Music festival at Frankfort (in 1927), Berg's Wozzeck had received its first performance by the State Opera at Berlin and the futurist experimentations of Russolo and Marinetti had already become a thing of the past.

This Fifth Symphony is not easy to play. It abounds with difficult woodwind and string passages that try the ability of first-line players. The very structure of the work requires the utmost care on the part of the conductor to integrate its various sections into a cohesive whole. This is "big" music. It is formal, dignified, even a bit pompous at times, but molded by the sure hand of an articulate master who had complete control of his medium. Nielsen had something to say; he knew how to say it, too.

The Conductor's Background

Erik Tuxen, after conducting for six years at the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen, was named conductor of the Danish State Radio Orchestra in 1936, when he was but thirty-four. He has held that post ever since, except for a period during World War II, when he served in the Free Danish Army. He is active with the ISCM and has conducted extensively all over Europe. Last summer the outstanding event of the Edinburgh Festival was Tuxen's performance of Nielsen's Fifth Symphony with the Danish Orchestra. So said the British press, who are notably chary of committing themselves to any praise that might possibly be construed as anti-chauvinistic.

The New York premiere of Nielsen's Fifth Symphony was given in the last concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra series at Carnegie Hall on April 17, 1951. Erik Tuxen, who is in this country on a six-months leave of absence, conducted the work. It was evident that the audience was greatly impressed with both the quality of the music and the ability of its interpreter.

Concerning the performance on records I have nothing but praise. The Danish State Radio Orchestra is a fine organization. If you acquire the records, listen well for this is not music that may impress upon a first hearing. There are sections, bars, phrases that Tuxen has chosen to underplay. He counts rather upon the cumulative effect — an approach that might well be overlooked by a less sincere musician looking for a quick splash of glory, but which, in the long run, must be the most satisfying, inasmuch as it is truer to the composer's modest, tranquil spirit.

THE MUSIC OF AARON COPLAND

By Sidney Finkelstein

Part II

▲The Piano Variations were used by Martha Graham for a dance composition, Dithyramb. About this Copland drily remarks, "Surely only an artist with a close affinity for my work could have visualized dance material in so rhythmically complex and aesthetically abstruse a composition. I might add, as further testimony, that Miss Graham's Dithyramb was considered by public and critics to be just as complex and abstruse as my music."

The hint of self-deprecation in these remarks about "abstruseness" and "complexity" disclose the presence of an unsolved problem at the heart of American music, and one that was agitating Copland deeply. He knew the quality of the Variations, and the creative labor he had poured into them. Yet the music was undeniably abstruse. With works like this, and others such as were coming from the pens of composers like Roy Harris, Walter Piston, Roger Sessions, Wallingford Riegger, and many more, American music could be said to have "arrived." Yet the excitement was almost wholly confined to the ranks of the composers themselves. Was American music fated to reach an audience made up only of other composers, together with a few sensitive artists from other fields such as Martha Graham, a few crusading critics such as Paul Rosenfeld, and a few performers specializing in "new music?"

The results of such inner questioning were seen in such works as El Salon Mexico and Billy the Kid, which came from Copland's pen in the middle 'thirties. Some of his friends and followers saw in them a "volte-face,' and, as the pianist John Kirkpatrick describes the reactions, "more concession than conviction." The trouble however was with these critics, who had begun to accept the ingrown state of American music as normal, and had conditioned themselves to regard anything enjoyable to the public as offensive to themselves. The fact was that the pose of regarding "advanced art" as a kind of defiance flung in the face of the public had long worn thin, and lost whatever usefulness it might once have had. In stepping out of the realm of the "pure" and abstract, Copland was again exercising real leadership in American music. As he describes his own thinking, "I began to feel an increasing dissatisfaction with the relations of the music loving public and the living composers. . . .It seemed to me that composers were in danger of working in a vacuum."

The new quality of these works, which made them so highly enjoyable, was the presence of exuberant popular-style melody, most of it drawn from North American folk and popular music. It is a mistake to believe that he injected these tunes in his work only to catch the ear of the listener, or as a kind of satire, (such as in the jazz composition of Kurt Weill and Ernst Krenek of the 1920's). Copland really loved the tunes he used, thought they were good music, and wanted to discover a musical idiom that could be followed by the great mass of listeners. His artistry is fully apparent in these works. It may be found even in one that is comparatively slighter than the others, El Salon Mexico, which is a lusty evocation of the sound and spirit of a Mexico City cabaret. The cleancut way in which the melodies emerge from the musical context, the dissonant touches that sharpen their impact on the ear, the fine working out of the rhythms, all give the music a distinction far above that of an "arrangement" of folk songs. The theme like a fanfare that opens the work, reappears in the middle, and comes back at the close, may be called a Copland signature. It is found again in Billy the Kid, the Outdoor Overture, Appalachian Spring, and the scherzo of the Piano Sonata. El Salon Mexico was excellently recorded by Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra (3 sides, Victor set M 546). It should be mentioned here that there has always been a close tie between Koussevitzky and Copland's music. Koussevitzky gave the first American performances of the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra (later revised as the First Symphony for Orchestra), the Piano Concerto, Music for the Theatre and the splendid Third Symphony. In addition to El Salon Mexico he has recorded A Lincoln Portrait and Appalachian Spring.

"Billy the Kid"

Billy the Kid was written in 1936 for the American Ballet Caravan at the suggestion of its director, Lincoln Kirstein, to a story by Eugene Loring. It was later recast as an orchestral suite. It begins and ends with soft, dreamy music, a fine example of what may be called Copland's "intervallic" musical thinking. It is not directly melodic music, but built on the intervals of a major and minor third which move up and down the register, building up harmonic tensions rich in evocative mood. The effect of this beginning and ending is that of a "curtain of memory" opening and closing upon the childhood memory of the glamorous "cowboy West." This "curtain" opening and closing upon the past has also become a familiar part of Copland's style, found in A Lincoln Portrait and Appalachian Spring. In between the Prologue and Epilogure are a Street Scene, Card Game, Fight and Celebration. The Street Scene is a brilliant kaleidoscope of popular melodies, even more subtle and intricate in its rhythms than El Salon Mexico. The Card Game is a quiet, evocative piece built on triads, with perhaps a reminiscence of the tone of Stravinsky's Apollon Musagates. The Gunfight is a powerful percussive and dissonant episode. The Celebration is a masterpiece of brash, dissonant instrumentation and polyrhythm. achieving the feeling of folk tunes without any actual quotations. The recording by Leonard Bernstein and the RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra is excellent in sound and spirit (Victor, 1 LP side, LM 1031, with Gershwin's An American in Paris, also on 78 rpm, with Jingo No. 5, from Copland's Statements for orchestra, Victor Set DM 1333).

A Truer Feeling for Jazz

It is interesting that in these folk-style works, which have nothing of the actual melodic shape of jazz, there may be found more of the good qualities of jazz than in Copland's "jazz" works of the twenties. Some of these characteristics are the sensitive polyrhythms, the manner in which the melodies enter on an off-beat, the cleancut timbres of the score with woodwind and brass solos piled against the percussion, the sensitive "harmonized" percussion itself, and the genuine "dance" character of the rhythms. Similar qualities appear in the later more abstract works, such as the Piano Sonata and Violin Sonata.

Additional works in the folk vein were Rodeo, A Lincoln Portrait and Appalachian Spring. Rodeo was written for the 1942-3 season of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo and choreographed by Agnes De Mille. The Orchestral suite arranged from this work, unlike the continuous music of Billy the Kid, is made up of four separate "dance episodes." The first, "Buckaroo Holiday," is one of Copland's most intricate constructions, using folk tunes and original march-like themes in brilliant permutations and combinations. It may almost be analyzed as an example of sonata form, with an exposition, a development employing intricate polyphonic episodes, and a recapitulation. Corral Nocturne is a short and touching example of Copland's harmonic writing, on the verge of breaking into melody, exploiting seconds and thirds and making a fine use of off-beat accents. Saturday Night Waltz is perhaps the most ingratiating piece of music in all of Copland's output, skillfully manipulating, with a masterful application of "stretched meters," one of the loveliest of cowboy tunes. Finally Hoedown is the apotheosis of the "square-dance," a dazzling piece of writing built on ostinatos but never monotonous. The performance by Dorati and the Dallas Symphony is a good one (Victor 10" LP LM (x) 32, also on 78 rpm with Waltz from Billy the Kid, Set 1214).

A Lincoln Portrait, commissioned by Andre Kostalanetz, was written in 1942. It consists of an effective funereal opening, an ingratiating scherzo using popular songs of Lincoln's time, and adroitly written background music to spoken excerpts from Lincoln's letters and speeches. At the end the funereal opening returns and is built up to a majestic apotheosis. It is a minor work in that Copland deliberately limited the problems he set himself. I feel regretful that Copland did not try to dig deeper into the spirit of the times and into the character of Lincoln. Some day I think this will be the subject of a great American opera, when a composer rises who is willing to tackle it in the spirit of Mussorgsky's Boris Godounov. Of the two recordings, I have slight preference for that by Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra (Victor set 1088). Rodzinski and the N. Y. Philharmonic's is brilliantly recorded but overdramatized (Columbia set MX-266, also 10" LP ML 2042 with Gould, Spirituals).

"Appalachian Spring"

Appalachian Spring was commissioned by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation as a ballet for Martha Graham. First performed in 1944, it has been one of Copland's greatest successes both as a ballet and as an orchestral suite, and won him the Pulitzer Prize for music. The nostalgic mood predominates heavily in this music, and the folk-dance themes are treated with an aloof objectivity. The variations on an old Shaker tune, for example, which make up one of the most delightful episodes in the score, are written with the utmost skill in rhythm and timbre, but make almost no emotional commentary on the tune whatsoever. In none of the works on American themes so much as in this one is the combination so marked of tender feeling with aloofness, as if the composer felt the scenes to be of another world and time. The performance by Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra is first-rate (Victor Set 1046).

During the later 1930's and the 1940's Copland tried other avenues through which he could make his music part of the normal current of life. Such as writing music for children and music for films. In the first category belong two delightful works, the play-opera The Second Hurricane, and the Outdoor Overture for high school orchestra. His film scores include the documentary The City and the Hollywood productions, Of Mice and Men, Our Town, The Red Pony, North Star and The Heiress. Some of the music for The City was made into one of Copland's loveliest musical nocturnes, Quiet City, for English horn, trumpet and strings. It is recorded by the Jannsen Symphony Orchestra (Artist LP disc, with music by Gilbert, Ives and Cowell). Copland also arranged the music for Our Town into a Suite for piano. It was a dangerous procedure from the standpoint of success as a concert piece for Copland to cast Our Town into three slow movements, as well as to use the bare textures he does. Yet each movement carries out its single mood perfectly, Story of Our Town being like a gentle opening to a narrative, Concervation at the Soda Fountain adding a touch of gayety, and Resting Place on the Hill ending with a hint of tolling bells. The entire work has a haunting beauty which grows upon each hearing. It is recorded in its entirety by Leo Smit, along with Three Blues for piano, and the Danzon Cubana for two pianos, in which Smit is joined by Copland (10" LP Concert Hall, CHC 51). Story of Our Town was also recorded by Andor Foldes (1 side, in Album of American Piano Music, Vox 174).

With the approach of the 1940's, Copland's art took a direction which seems to have been characteristic of a number of other composers of his generation at this time, the attempt to capture the great qualities of the classic sonata form and sonata structures. He produced three important works, each worked out with the finest artistry and summing up years of intense thought. They were the Piano Sonata, the Sonata for Violin and Piano, and the Third Symphony.

The "Piano Sonato"

The Piano Sonata (1939-41) starts and ends with a movement that may be analyzed as sonata form. There are two distinct groups of themes in each, a recognizable change in tonality in moving from one to the other, and a development section. The middle movement is a scherzo. As in the Variations, the writing for piano is bare and percussive, and the thematic development takes the form of antiphonal counterpoint with the addition of ornamental figures. Also, as in the Variations, there is the failure to attain the kind of inner movement, springing from the clash and contrast of themes, tonalities, rhythms, and treble against bass, that is fundamental to the classic sonata form. The music here is essentially passive, reflective, recitative-like. At the same time it is more mellow, listenable and richer in mood than the Variations. In the final movement Copland gives himself over almost entirely to inner reflection, using quiet ostinatos and a repeated single tone like an organpoint, reminiscent of the last movement, Thoreau, of Ives' Concord Sonata. The movement belongs with the most haunting and beautiful in all of Copland's output, and all of American music. The Sonata was recorded by Leo Smit for the Concert Hall limited subscription series, in an album which included the Our Town music. It has also been recorded by Leonard Bernstein, one of which is addressed To Aaron Copland and recreates the mood of the last movement of the sonata. Bernstein's performance is splendid, and the recording is excellent (Victor Set 1278, 3 discs).

An Individual Style

Just as in the big piano works Copland had achieved a kind of sound, a combination of timbre, harmony and rhythm, that was peculiarly his own, so in the Sonata for Violin and Piano (1942-3) Copland achieved a sound-texture wholly successful and wholly his own. As in the piano works the music proceeds antiphonally, with almost each phrase of the piano answered by one on the violin, and the violin phrases entering on off-beats, creating a tight unity between the two instruments. The first movement is largely the melodic expansion of an opening group of themes, the music reaching an exciting climax near the close when the violin embarks upon a cadenza-like section in the best spirit of the cadenza, namely a meditative rather than showy commentary upon the main themes. The slow movement has a hint of passacaglia structure, built on a theme moving in whole and half note steps, which is repeated twice at the beginning, is taken up later by the violin, and reappears at the end on the piano, always in the same tonality. The last movement has the fiery spirit of a rondo and the contrasting themes of sonata-form, and is at the same time one of the best examples of Copland's contrapuntal writing.

The sonata as a whole is one of the most successful violin-piano works of our time, ranking with the sonatas by Debussy, Ravel, Bartok and Prokofiev. It has already caught on with violinists, if the fact that there are three recordings is any proof. The best is that in which Copland himself takes part, with Louis Kaufman playing the violin, made for the Concert Hall limited subscription series. However the performances publicly available are also very good, and in fact there is little to choose among all three, for all were done as a labor of love, by artists who understand and admire Copland's music. That by Fredell Lack and Leonid Hambro suffers from low level recording and noisy surfaces, but is combined with one excellent Hindemith Sonata in D, Op. 11, No. 2 (Allegro LP 33). That by Joseph Fuchs and Leo Smit is well recorded and has clean surfaces, but suffers, at least to my taste, by being combined with Stravinsky's boring Duo Concertante (Decca LP 8503).

The Third Symphony is Copland's major post-World War II work and demands recording. A good choice to my mind would be George Szell, who gave a splendid performance of it in New York with the N. Y. Philharmonic Symphony. Such a recording by Columbia would go far towards making amends for the fact that this company at present has only one Copland work, A Lincoln Portrait, in its catalogue.

A Final Survey

Surveying Copland's music as a whole, it has the kind of originality without trickiness and strength without bombast that is found in the master composers. It suffers from distinct limitations. His harmonic system, abandoning contrasts of consonance and dissonance, treating all intervals as simply differing degrees of harmonic tensions, does not to my mind have the effect of a liberation, but rather restricts the emotional range possible to the music. The character of the music becomes predominantly an inner reflection, almost passive, alternating with fierce and harsh outbursts which never are emotionally resolved. A telling weakness is his inability to create a rich body of lyrical themes. His melodic line is generally restricted to a declamatory or recitative style. These limitations have kept him from being a great composer. It is a title, which, one hastens to add, he has never claimed for himself. Yet his accomplishments in American music loom up very great, by comparison with the mass of music written by the younger generation who (thanks in large measure to the work of such men as Copland, have a technique at their fingertips that he struggled half a lifetime to attain) suffer from a pervading glibness that makes their work almost characterless. Their work is produced according to the best neo-classic models almost as a shoemaker produces shoes, and one work resembles another as one pair of shoes does another. There seems to be no struggle involved in their work, both for something to say and for a technique adapted to what they feel they must say.

Each of Copland's major works represents such a struggle. Each emerges as a unique creation, involving his emotional life, his conscious thought, and his craft all together. Each is as deep an experience as he is able to make it, without a wasted note, a formalism for form's sake, a glib expression. Music has not yet struck permanent roots in the United States in the deepest sense, as an art of profound importance to the lives of the people. It must inevitably strike such roots, and when the history of this achievement is written, Copland's name will belong among the great pioneers. —Sidney Finkelstein

BEECHAM'S "Tales of Hoffman"

OFFENBACH: The Tales of Hoffman; Robert Rounseville (Hoffman), Dorothy Bond (Olympia), Margherita Grandi (Giulietta), Ann Ayars (Antonia), Bruce Dargavel (Lindorf, Coppelius, Dapertutto and Dr. Miracle), Monica Sinclair (Nicklaus), Grahame Clifford (Spalanzani and Franz), Murray Dickie (Cochenille and Pitichinaccio), Owen Brannigan (Hermann and Schlemil), Fisher Morgan (Luther), René Soames (Nathaniel), Joan Alexander (Mother's Voice), Sadler's Wells Chorus and Royal Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham. London LP set LLPa 4, three discs, $17.85.

▲LONDON'S Tales of Hoffmann is taken from the London Films sound-track (recorded by Western Electric) of the now celebrated motion picture-fantasy showing on American screens.

Those of us who have not seen the film should be immediately informed that here is a complete performance of Offenbach's chef d'oeuvre, if one admits the few cuts that, as often as not, occur in actual performances of the opera.

Despite the fact that a sound-track has been processed onto discs by London Recordings, the set turns out to be one of the most brilliant and lifelike this reviewer has heard. No excuse need be offered for what adds up to superior reproduction, vastly superior to Columbia's complete version of this music.

Added to this is the inestimable presence of Sir Thomas Beecham. If there is a better conductor for certain operas than the redoubtable Sir Thomas, we don't know him. His Faust and Magic Flute albums are cases in point. His care for detail, his healthy vigor and enthusiasm radiate throughout these records; his is the ideal temperament for this eerie fantasmagoria, for his is the temperament of the uncannily imaginative virtuoso.

Wonderful Orchestral Playing

Thus the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, which is so magnificently reproduced, gives a performance of the utmost finish and refinement, and the entr'actes are not the least part of this new Tales of Hoffman. Typical Beecham touches are to be observed as the guests file out to supper near the close of the first act, and the limpid last bars of the Venetian scene. Incidentally, if you have had to stifle a yarn during the Barcarolle in recent years, you will find the music recreated here.

The cast sings in English. Every word is enunciated with meticulous care, and few, if any, words will be missed by the attentive listener. However, do not delude yourself into thinking (as most enthusiasts about opera in English think), that you will know all about these episodic sketches in Hoffman's life by understanding the text. Familiarity with the story and its subtle implications is just as important.

It would be useless to maintain that something of elegance and Gallic grace is not lost in the English translation. Les Contes d' Hoffman was a flowering of Paris' Second Empire, and the music evokes that plushy era, just as succinctly as the composer's Gaîté Parisienne does. The cast (with two exceptions) is British, and the very clipped accents of some of these performers sound rather odd investing the French sensuousness and piquancy of much of this music. It is Sir Thomas, ultimately, who manages to bridge and nullify this gap with his unerring instinct for Offenbach's score.

The two singers with the most to do are Robert Rounseville in the arduous title-role, and Bruce Dargavel in the quadruple assignment of Lindorf-Coppelius-Dapertutto-Miracle. The former, a well-known young tenor of New York's City Center Opera Company, gives a consistently fine performance, even though there are nasal moments in his vocal emission. Mr. Rounseville successfully suggests the amorous poet, and his lyric voice is used with artistry. Mr. Dargavel gives an impressive account of himself in his four-role deal. His is a voice of great richness and bulk, a real bass-baritone whose range, on these records, extends from a low E-flat up to a couple of sonorous top G's. Some of the sardonic malevolence of these four-characters-in-one escapes the singer. His finest moment is the suave Mirror Aria, which, because of the weight of his voice, he sings transposed half a tone downward.

The Three Ladies

The three women in Hoffman's life are competently taken by Dorothy Bond, Margherita Grandi, and Ann Ayars. These three sopranos are successful, but none of them approach true brilliance. The most convincing is Miss Grandi, who is cast as the Venetian courtesan, Giulietta. She is properly operatic; and an occasional wiry, undiciplined high note doesn't seem to detract from a convincing performance, as she dominates the big ensembles.

Dorothy Bond's Olympia could have been more staccato and metallic to suggest the mechanical doll. Her voice is pure and flexible; not contented with the usual high notes of the role, she twice vaults to a G in alt with apparent ease.

Ann Ayars, also a member of the City Center Opera in New York, is quite charming as Antonia, though more tonal steadiness and definition would have been desirable. The high tessitura of the role makes it somewhat difficult for her to sustain appropriate tension.

Minor parts are well handled, with Monica Sinclair as Nicklausse, and Owen Brannigan and Grahame Clifford in several roles, giving effective performances.

Much of Lindorf's music has been eliminated from the Prologue (as it always is in America), and spoken passage during the duel between Hoffman and Schlemil, along with Giulietta's derisive laughter, has been eliminated from the second act finale. A curious cut is the avoidance of Antonia's actual death, and the Epilogue is wisely much curtailed, as it is in American performances. Here Beecham is contented with Hoffman's murmuring the three names of the women he has loved.

Surfaces are models of glassy smoothness, which adds to the pleasure of this admirable recording. —Max de Schanensee

THE COMPLETE "ROSENKAVALIER"

STRAUSS, Richard: Der Rosenkavalier (complete opera); Margarete Bäumer (Die Feldmarschallin), Kurt Böhme (Baron Ochs), Tiana Lemnitz (Octavian), Ursula Richter (Sophie), Hans Löbel (Herr von Faninal), Angela Kolniak (Marianne), Franz Sautter (Valzacchi), Emilie Walther-Sacks (Annina), Werner Liebling (Italian Singer), Erich Handel (Notary), other soloists and Chorus of the Dresden State Opera, the Saxonian State Orchestra conducted by Rudolf Kempe. Urania set 201. 4 LP discs, $23.85.

▲STRAUSS'S Der Rosenkavalier has established itself so firmly in the operatic repertoire that many have probably forgotten the criticism that attended its first performance in 1911. Its often over-burdened orchestration seems no longer to offend the majority; for after all it often represents Strauss at his best, and it does fill the eardrums with sounds that no other composer could possibly have devised.

Still, there is truth in the assertion that his sense of proportion was wanting, and one can hardly deny Aldrich's statement — made after the Metropolitan premiere in 1913 — that "there are places enough in Der Rosen-

(Continued on page 355)

Record Notes and Reviews

THERE IS IN SOULS a sympathy with sounds, and as the mind is pitched the ear is pleased with melting airs or martial, brisk or grave; some chord in unison with what we hear is touched within us, and the heart replies.

—William Cowper

Orchestra

BACH-STOKOWSKI: Chaconne; Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor; Bourree; Siciliano from Sonata for Violin and Cembalo in C Minor; Mein Jesu was für Seelenweh befällt Dich in Gethsemane. Leopold Stokowski and his Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor LP disc LM-1133, $5.72.

▲TWO GENERATIONS AGO one of the chief musical sports was the transcribing of operatic arias for instrumental execution. In this generation orchestral arrangements of Sebastian Bach's music have been the fashion. Among the many musicians that have contributed to the general jollity of the past two decades, only two have won a name for themselves in this field of endeavor. They are Arnold Schönberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Stokowski's contributions are much the best known. His vigorous recording activities have seen to that. Here, for example, is the fourth time he has presented his transcription of Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor on records.

At this late date, it would be hard to imagine any mature listener bothering himself with how much Stokowski's work reflects Bach's. It simply seems to be a matter of "here's Bach" and "there's Stokowski using Bach's melodic and harmonic material when it suits him"; take your choice or, if you like, take both, with the realization, of course, that each is different.

Having set a point of view, I can state that for me the Chaconne (a new transcription not to be confused with the one Stokowski presented around 1935 in a Victor set entitled Bach: 250th Anniversary Album) is quite effective and handsomely scored, the Bourree and Siciliano too heavy in tonal weight to let the melodic line move with freedom, and Mein Jesu and the Passacaglia imaginatively orchestrated in a way that makes harmonic and melodic details as clear as spring water.

Achievements such as these, particularly in the Passacaglia, should not be lightly taken. I recall with amusement more than one educator who has damned Bach transcriptions in general but who has used recordings of Stokowski's Passacaglia to allow his students to follow more easily the various voice parts. And this has occurred where there was a fairly respectable organ on the premises.

Though I find Stokowski's conducting of the Passacaglia and Mein Jesu better in his first recorded performances with the Philadelphia Orchestra, I must say that I have never heard him conduct anything with the disciplined fervor and tonal beauty that can be found in his new performance of the Chaconne. Stokowski is aided here and elsewhere by some incredibly beautiful playing by "his orchestra." Perhaps only the Philadelphia Orchestra today can match Stokowski's orchestra first-desk man for first-desk man.

RCA Victor's engineers have made an important contribution to this release. The sound is ever clean and resonant. The tape editors, however have (I suspect) been a bit remiss in providing each of the parts with the same amount of volume. —C.J.L.

BACH: Italian Concerto; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Hans Schmidt-Issersedt, and Canon perpetuus; Canon a 2-Per augmentation contrario motu; Canon a 2-Per tonos; Six-part Ricercar from The Musical Offering; Wiesbaden Collegium Musicum conducted by Edmund Weyns. Capitol 10″ LP disc L-8128, $3.98.

▲THIS transcription of Bach's familiar keyboard concerto seems to make sense and the ever reliable Schmidt-Isserstedt gives a telling performance. I am surprised that Stokowski didn't think of an arrangement of the Italian Concerto though I doubt if he could have done a better job. One would like to know who made the present arrangement — perhaps the conductor?

The excerpts from Bach's Musical Offering are also well played by a well trained chamber ensemble under Weyns, not von Benda as the record label states. The Canons may impose at first some listening problems to the layman, but the annotator has given the requisite clues to their forms. The Six-part Ricercar is one of Bach's most imposing fugal works which will be enjoyed more with each subsequent hearing. The reproduction of both record sides is quite satisfactory. —J.N.

DOHNANYI: Suite in F sharp minor for Orchestra, Op. 19; London Symphony Orchestra conducted by Sir Malcolm Sargent. Columbia LP disc ML 2172, $4.00.

▲THIS PLEASANT little suite with its overtones of folk-tunes and 19th-century "nationalism" was written in 1909 when the composer — Hungary's main academician — was on the faculty of the Hochschule in Berlin. The four movements display a most competent construction and remain smilingly tuneful from start to finish. One might argue about the consequences of the work but one can't argue about its obvious charm.

An older recording with the Los Angeles Philharmonic under Alfred Wallenstein has recently appeared on LP (Decca DL 6006); but Sir Malcolm, though no better than Wallenstein, has a finer orchestra to work with. I have always preferred the very old Stock recording (Victor Set 47 — withdrawn) because the conductor of the Chicago Symphony seemed, in this recording, just as genial as the music. Sargent is apt to be a bit abrupt and, at times, implies a serious mood in the music which isn't there. So, despite occasional lapses of taste, this interpretation is the best available. —D.R.

DUKAS: The Sorcerer's Apprentice; GRETRY: Suite from Cephale et Procris; INR Symphony Orchestra of Brussels conducted by Franz Andre. Capitol 10″ LP disc L-8135, $3.98.

▲I'M AFRAID that the talented Belgian conductor, André, has too keen competition for both these works, notably in matters of reproduction. While his is a neatly turned performance of Dukas orchestral scherzo, it lacks the excitement of the Toscanini version and the beautiful sound of the Jorda. The Ballet Suite from Gretry's forgotten opera was so brilliantly recorded by Defauw and the Chicago Symphony (Victor disc 11-8825) that it is possible not many would care to part with that disc. André's performance is not so weighty in tone. While he substantiates better the melodic charm of this music, it cannot be said that the recording serves his performance advantageously. —P.H.R.

GERSHWIN: An American in Paris; NEWMAN: Music from the Movies; Alfred Newman conducting the Hollywood Symphony Orchestra. Mercury LP disc MG 20037, $4.85.

▲THIS IS NOT the first disc Newman has put out under Mercury. Apparently Mercury has a sort of deal with Hollywood, one of the results being that Alfred Newman gets a lot of publicity. I don't know what Mercury gets out of it for this new performance of the Gershwin certainly isn't going to take the customers away from the excellent recording by Bernstein (Victor LM 1031). Even if Newman's decided eccentricities of performance didn't keep them away, the reverse side certainly would. It contains music from: Wuthering Heights, All About Eve, The Song of Bernadette, The Razor's Edge, Pinky and A Letter to Three Wives — all of which sound decidedly alike. It must be good movie music, though. I saw all the mentioned films and didn't remember a note of the music. —D.R.

GLUCK: Alceste — Overture; BEETHOVEN: Cavatina from Quartet in B flat, Op. 130; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Wilhelm Furtwüngler. Capitol 10″ LP disc No. H-130, $2.95.

MOZART: Symphony No. 32 in G major, K.218; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Hans von Benda. WOLF: Italian Serenade; German Philharmonic of Prague conducted by Joseph Kleiberth. Capitol 10″ LP disc H-8121, $2.98.

▲WITH THESE TWO DISCS, Capitol inaugurates a new series of cheaper priced records containing short pieces of around 12 minutes duration, such as the Gluck overture, the Mozart symphony-overture, and the Wolf Serenade — all of which were previously issued on 78 rpm shellac or 45 rpm discs. All of these recordings have been previously praised, and it only remains to say that the transfer to LP has been well done. That Capitol has at long last issued the Telefunken recording of Furtwängler's beautifully phrased performance of the Beethoven Cavatina is something to rejoice over. For, despite what anyone may say about this song of songs having been conceived by the composer for the intimacy of the string quartet, it does not lose anything but gains in richness and nobility by being played by the string section of a fine orchestra.—P.H.R.

HINDEMITH: Symphony in E Flat (1940); Janssen Symphony Orchestra of Los Angeles conducted by Werner Janssen. Columbia LP disc ML-4387, $5.45.

▲THOUGH THIS WORK does not bear all the hallmarks of one destined for standard repertory, it has musical health and no little vigor. Its characteristics are terseness, economy, shipshapeness, and a certain rowdy majesty. The Symphony in E Flat is scored for large orchestra — woodwinds in threes, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones and tuba, snare drum, bass drum, cymbals, Glockenspiel, triangle, tympani, and strings. It had its first hearing in 1941, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

The work is in four movements. Horns boldly announce the principal theme of the first movement in quick time. After it is expanded, an inversion of the theme introduces a second of a more lyrical character. This, after some manipulation, leads to a development, ending in a climactic announcement of the main theme. The second subject reappears against a string pizzicato. In the next sequence — a sort of coda — the second theme is prominent, for it is presented vigorously in the English horn, bassoons, tuba, and basses against a solid string counterpoint.

The English horn, clarinet, and trumpet give out the theme of the slow second movement. As it is continued, the tympani beat a series of quarternotes, creating an insistent pattern of rhythm against it. The expressive climate is cool, the mood mysterious. The oboe introduces the second subject to an accompaniment of violin chords. The whole orchestra takes up the idea, while the rhythmic pattern becomes much more insistent. There follows a passage for solo winds against pizzicato basses that lasts until the prominent rhythmic pattern returns to bring the movement to a close on a somewhat martial tone.

The third movement appears to be patterned after a mature Bruckner scherzo; except that, after the Trio, the first section is slightly altered and only half of it presented.

The finale follows without pause. The principal theme of this movement in quick time is similar to that of the first movement. There is a strong rhythmic figure that produces a driving, swinging motion of irresistable continuity. Further on, a notable passage for violas is followed by a powerful brass episode. After a moment of woodwind repose, a fugue on the principal theme begins; the trombones take up the theme in augmentation; the trumpets reply, and the Symphony ends with an intense peroration.

In its Columbia debut, the Janssen Symphony Orchestra of Los Angeles plays with notable precision and energy, and Werner Janssen conducts with fervor and understanding.

The recording is up to the very best standards we have known. —C.J.L.

LISZT: "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne"; Symphonic Poem No. 1; Joseph Strobl conducting the Munich Tonkünstler Orchestra. Mercury LP disc MG 10006. $4.85.

▲COMMONLY KNOWN as the Bergsymphonie, this early work is based on a poem by Victor Hugo. In the preface to the 1858 score Liszt has summarized both poem and music: "The poet hears two voices, one infinite, magnificent, ineffable, singing the beauty and harmony of creation, the other swollen with sighs, with groans, with sobs, with rebellious cries, and with blasphemous oaths. The one is saying 'Nature,' the other, 'Humanity'." Liszt, with all the fervent realism of his period, therefore employs two themes and a very extended leit-motif system: practically everything has an other than musical meaning.

The end result is that when one withdraws from the field of life it is only from the height of a mountain that one sees the truth: this is "what one hears on a mountain." Besides this, one also hears one of Liszt's dullest works. The feeble yet bombastic rhetoric of the Hugo poem finds amplification and incessant repetition in the music. Tasso and other works of the same genre are masterpieces of subtlety by comparison. This overwritten, overblown and completely pretentious opus is admirably played by the Munich orchestra and ably conducted by Stroble. Mercury's recording is one of their better efforts — alas! —D.R.

IBERT: Suite Elizabethaine; Emmy Loose (soprano), Women's Choir of the Vienna Akademie Kammerchor, Vienna Symphony Orchestra; Divertissement; Capriccio; Winterthur Symphony Orchestra conducted by Henry Swoboda. Westminster LP disc WL 5061, $5.95.

▲OF THESE THREE Ibert works, the Suite Elizabethaine is the weakest. Contrived from the 1942 incidental music for A Midsummer Night's Dream, its nine movements make use of some Elizabethan melodies — hence the title. In the first and last sections the tunes are played straight and are delightful. The middle sections, with "supernatural" effects from the female voices, are rather corny. All the ladies do very well and Swoboda gets some bright playing from the orchestra.

The best known work in this collection is the tremendously funny Divertissement from the 1930 musical-comedy, Le Chapeau de Paille d'Italie. The six movements contain some of the most exquisitely vulgar music ever written. The work has already received a razor-sharp performance by Fiedler (in Victor set M324) whose interpretation is, on the whole, racier. Here, I miss the "wa-wa's" of the muted trumpets — marked oua, oua in the killing parody on Mendelssohn's wedding march — and the big build-up, in the Fiedler version, which beautifully emphasizes the quite brainless but ostentatiously banal waltz which follows. One great factor in favor of the Swoboda recording is that he uses only a chamber orchestra; Fiedler uses the whole Boston Pops. For my money, however, the very best performance of this wonderful music ever recorded was that made by the composer with an unnamed chamber group (HMV K7573-4) which is tawdry as well as banal, and curiously moving as well as hilarious.

The 1938 Capriccio for chamber orchestra is also top-notch Ibert. Rhapsodic in character and quite without pretentions, the music is gay and sad by turns and its essence is the essential capriciousness suggested by the title. Swoboda conducts the score in a more than usually imaginative fashion. The recording of all three works is quite good. —D.R.

MENDELSSOHN: A Midsummer Night's Dream; Vienna Symphony Orchestra and Chorus of the Vienna State Opera conducted by Clemens Krauss with Dagmar Hermann and Ilona Steingruber (sopranos). Vox Pantheon disc PL-6830, $5.95.

▲JUST TWO MONTHS AGO Decca gave us a very good performance of almost all of Mendelssohn's incidental music for A Midsummer Night's Dream. Save for the fine recording and the work of the soloists, the Vox release (which contains the same music except for the March of the Elves) is in no way up to the Decca disc.

Clemens Krauss conducts with an unusually heavy hand and makes this ever delightful music actually sound ponderous rather than winged and weightless. Slow tempi, a few ill-chosen retardations (such as the one which occurs just before the final appearance of principal theme of the overture in fortissimo), and occasionally graceless phraseology are factors contributing to the general impression of sluggishness. To be sure, one finds unusually excellent playing by the members of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra and some capable work from the chorus; but the playing of the Berlin Philharmonic under Fricsay and the singing of the Rias Chamber Choir on the Decca disc are still better in matters of tonal beauty and animation. —C.J.L.

MENDELSSOHN: Symphony No. 9 in C Major (for String Orchestra); MANFREDINI: Christmas Concerto; American Arts Orchestra conducted by Karl Krueger. New Records LP disc 102. $5.75.

▲THE MENDELSSOHN is an early work, originally written in the composer's fourteenth year as a string quartet and later rescored as a string symphony at the instigation of his friends. The grace and polish and the beauty of form, characteristic of Mendelssohn, is evidenced in this score. The work has a delicate sentiment though its expressive range is limited. The piece by Manfredini, also for string orchestra, is an early 18th-century opus by an Italian composer of which little is known. His concerto recalls the lovely Christmas Symphony of Schiassi, which Fiedler once recorded for Victor, and of course the more familiar Corelli Christmas Concerto. Manfredini opens his work with a Pastorale, follows with a Largo, and ends with an Allegro. This is ingratiating music of considerable poetic fancy and expression.

While both these works are welcome on records, I do not feel that Mr. Krueger's interpretative approach is completely valid. He tends to sentimentalize the Italian opus, and his rather lush string tone is not best suited to either work. Moreover, his use of rubati is a bit too free-handed, resulting in some lagging rhythms. The recording is quite satisfactory though lacking in resonant depth. The bass turn-over is a high one, and without sufficient bass response the reproduction may be sharp and lacking in tonal warmth.

—P.H.R.

MOZART: Serenade No. 1 in D Major, K.100 and Cassation No. 1 in G Major, K.63; The Zimbler Sinfonietta. Decca LP disc DL-8520, $4.85.

▲NO APOLOGIES need be made for these two fine works written when Mozart was but thirteen. They are not curiosity pieces, but music that indicates mastery of style and material.

Of the two works, I prefer the Cassation No. 1, an outdoor serenade in seven movements for strings, two horns, and two oboes. Among the memories that this piece leaves are the astonishing invention and noble passion of its two slow movements. Here Mozart already wears his scholarship ever so lightly and works with a boldness and freedom that seem to me unsurpassed in his first 100 compositions.

The Serenade No. 1 is a delightful, aristocratic product notable for its brilliance of tonal color and of spirit. Written around 1770, it is cast into eight sections and utilizes pairs of trumpets, horns, and oboes with strings. A pair of flutes is also used in the second andante, the only slow movement that seems to contain any uncommon excellences. The quick movements with their flashing coruscations predominate here.

The Zimbler Sinfonietta plays with extraordinary beauty of tone and impeccable style. Indeed, this chamber organization, whose members are mostly recruited from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has no peer on this side of the Atlantic, as far as I know.

Mechanically viewed, this record is up to the very best standards. On all counts, it is one not to be missed. —C.J.L.

MOZART: Symphony in G minor, K.183; Kurt Eichhorn conducting the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra; Symphony in C major, K.200; Rudolf Albert conducting the Bavarian Radio Orchestra. Mercury LP disc MG 10032, $4.85.

▲MOZART wrote both of these symphonies in 1773 when he was only seventeen years old. They are so different from each other that one might guess them years apart. The "little G minor" symphony — Mozart's first in a minor key — is very serious and only its relatively short length keeps it from appearing tragic in its implications. The C major, on the contrary, is one of Mozart's sunniest works with an elegiac andante and a spirited presto in the galante manner expected from the composer's youth. Long unavailable, the earlier symphony was recently recorded by Klemperer (Vox PL 6280) but he unfortunately seemed hampered by his orchestra. So, while his interpretation had every intention of being a fine one, Eichhorn's turns out better, thanks to the excellent Munich Philharmonic.

The C major Symphony was performed splendidly by Fritz Stein and the Berlin Collegium Musicum (Victor M502) but the set has long been withdrawn. Albert conducts with assurance and an easy geniality. The recording he receives is somewhat better than that given Eichhorn, but both recordings are above Mercury's usual standard. —D.R.

RAVEL: Valses Nobles et Sentimentales; DEBUSSY: Iberia; Franz André conducting the I.N.R. Symphony Orchestra of Brussels. Capitol LP disc P 8132. $4.98.

▲THIS IS JUST about the perfect interpretation of Ravel's magnificent waltz-cycle, written for the piano in 1911 and orchestrated a year later. Coppola's reading (Victor 11727/8 withdrawn) suffered from aenemia and Monteux's (Victor M 1143) was altogether too racey. The title speaks for itself: these apparently inconsequential dances — which contain some of Ravel's most consequential work—alternate the noble and the sentimentale. Were it not expressly dedicated to the spirit of Schubert, thus using the title of the latter's piano waltzes, one might be tempted to retitle the work Valses galantes et sensibles. André conducts the more athletic sections with restraint and extreme precision, as though for the dance itself, and in the wonderfully sensual slow waltzes he reveals every beauty they contain. The key to the whole performance, and to the work itself, is the apotheosis, usually speeded up or glossed over entirely. (Coppola and Monteux each take but a single 12-inch 78 side; André takes a third of the entire 12-inch LP.) The echoes of the seven waltzes which precede it here make their final appearance in a section which is a remembrance of things past. André gives it a delicate moulding and a sensitive assurance altogether uncommon. Despite a dead recording, several faulty woodwind entries and a meddling engineer who turns down the volume several times, this is a performance to be heard.

The less said of this Iberia the better: it doesn't sound like the same conductor. This is not the first time he has vivified Ravel and evidenced less feeling for Debussy: compare his luminous Rhapsodie Espagnole with his La Mer (Capitol LP disc P 8082), which is neatly handled but hardly unforgettable. He races the middle section and drags the outside two, at the same time hacking away at every nuance of orchestration. Technically the recording, done last November at Brussels' Palais des Beaux Arts, is better than most that André has received; but the orchestra still sounds as though it were playing in Studio 8H. —D.R.

RIMSKI-KORSAKOFF: Capriccio Espagnol, Op. 34; Le Coq d'Or — Introduction and March; MOUSSORGSKY: Khovantchina — Prelude; Winterthur Symphony Orchestra conducted by Victor Desarzens. Concert Hall LP disc CHS-1106, $5.95.

▲RIMSKY'S Capriccio is still one of the engineering marvels of the musical world. The brilliance of its construction, so carefully studied the world over by generations of orchestration students, is the model for more than one major effort that has been accepted into the orchestral repertoire. Copland's El Salon Mexico owes much to Rimsky's piece.

The choice of this modest Swiss orchestra for so vivid a showpiece is way off base. This is the sort of music best left to the Boston Pops, the Berlin and New York Philharmonics — orchestras specializing in large-scale virtuoso scores. Actually, the Winterthur players perform creditably and at times brilliantly. The solo clarinet is particularly good, but strings and brass are not up to par for this difficult, much-traveled course.

Conductor and engineer share the blame for poor balance in this and the other works listed. I am afraid, however, that it is Mr. Desarzens alone who must answer for the stolid, unimaginative readings in which a strong Teutonic influence cools beyond recall the vibrant pulse of hot Slavic blood in these scores. The orchestral sound varies from harshly coarse to woodenly lifeless. Intermittent tape waver causes pitch fluctuations that do not add to the disc's merits. At least one of these comes at a crucial point in the proceedings. —A.W.P.

SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 6 in C major; The Bavarian Radio Orchestra conducted by Alfons Dressel. Mercury LP disc MG 15003, $4.85.

▲ROBERT SCHUMANN once wrote about this symphony: Schubert "does not try to imitate the more unusual forms, like the forms in the later Beethoven; he acknowledges his modest powers and gives us a work, expressed with the utmost charm, yet never straying too far into unknown regions." This just about sums up the symphony, written between October, 1817, and February, 1818. Schubert himself had originally titled it a "Grand Symphony" but upon the first performance ten years later, dropped the soubriquet. The very slightness of this "little C major" may account for the fact that it is not better known, but its great charm makes its acquaintance highly rewarding.

Beecham's recording (Victor set 1014) was almost too fastidious for the music, the delight of which, after all, lies in its lyricism and not in its somewhat unfortunate pretensions. The Krips reading (London LP disc LLP 21) underlined the rhythm throughout making the finale sound too much like Rossini. Moreover, he turned the very lovely andante — one of Schubert's most inspired symphonic movements — into a rather faltering slow movement. Thus, the Dressel, despite an inadequate recording, is the best reading on discs. He admirably proportions the work through various interpretations of the all too numerous repeats and is careful not to bounce the finale. Too, the Bavarian Radio Orchestra sounds better than it has on previous discs.

Some admirer of the "Tragic" is going to take this disc home all unawares, for Mercury, with a sloppiness unbelievable in a grown-up record company, has, on the cover, seen fit to call this work a Symphony in C minor. —D.R.

SCHUBERT: Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished"); Rosamunde — Incidental Music; Bamberg Symphony Orchestra conducted by Robert Heger. Mercury LP disc MG10034, $4.85.

▲THE QUALITY of recording varies in these two works. The symphony suggests a more recent job, better range but with some high-fidelity distortion. The Rosamunde music, which sounds like pre-war reproduction, proves more agreeable to the ears.

Heger's reading of the "Unfinished" is on the slow side and too sentimental for my taste. If the listener does not admire the more intensified interpretation of Toscanini, which I find both a healthy and sane approach to this music, I recommend the Bruno Walter version in which sentiment is more judiciously

Relax and enjoy listening that's

TRUE TO LIFE!
BELL

Custom HIGH FIDELITY AMPLIFIER with Remote Control

● Expressly designed for all music lovers . . . for custom installations

Masterful music deserves the master touch of this Bell 2145 Amplifier. Its advanced engineering assures clear, full, rich reception at all sound levels. Add to components of your home music system or phono, radio, or TV set. Amplifier can be tucked away out of sight anywhere, far from remote controls, without impairing results. Its attractive remote unit, for table or console mounting, has amazingly selective signal-type controls. Lets you switch to and from AM, FM radio (or TV); or phono, for all domestic and foreign records, 78, 45, and 33-1/3 rpm; also control volume, bass, and treble from your favorite armchair or other convenient point. Modestly priced. Send for full details.

BELL Sound Systems, Inc.

BELL SOUND SYSTEMS

Specialists in custom components for home music systems

556 Marion Road, Columbus 7, Ohio

handled. Heger's playing of the lovely Rosamunde music is far more appreciable and, until a better recording and performance comes along, recommendable. —P.H.R.

SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 1 in E minor; Leopold Stokowski and his Orchestra. Victor LP disc LM 1125, $5.72.

▲THIS SYMPHONY, though a showpiece of sorts, has long waited for a really fine recording. Tor Mann's interpretation (Capital LP P8020) was enormously vital but the Stockholm Symphony — in my estimation — seems to have found some of the passages a bit beyond them. Stokowski's reading is just as lively and, beyond that, "his orchestra" is a splendidly schooled group, which makes this recording the best that the work has had. Particularly fine are the noticeable restraint in the elegiac opening movement and the controlled frenzy of the scherzo. Stokowski positively illuminates the score. And the recording — one of Victor's best — illuminates Stokowski. —D.R.

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Op. 38; Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; German Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague conducted by Joseph Kleiberth. Capitol LP disc P-8129, $4.85.

▲BACK IN SEPTEMBER 1949, Mercury issued this same performance of Schumann's Fourth Symphony, but the recording was not as good as this — there was flutuation in the sound intensity here and there and the surfaces of the record were not as smooth as these. Mercury broke the symphony in half on two sides; Capitol has it all on one side.

Kleiberth is a man who grows on one with closer acquaintance. True, he tends to sentimentalize the slow movements of these works a bit, but Schumann would have approved of this, I feel certain. In the more spirited movements, his readings are smooth and rhythmically alive. Mr. Peckham, comparing the Szell version of the Fourth Symphony with this one said: "one finds Szell is impersonal, almost brusque" while Kleiberth achieves "a warmer, richer tone quality," and "gives more dramatic impact to the valiant utterances of the finale, producing the sounds powerfully, but without sense of strain." Comparing Kleiberth's performance of the First Symphony with those of Leinsdorf and Koussevitzky one finds there is much to be said in favor of the former. It is warmer in tonal quality and more refined than Leinsdorf's, and more meaningful in its drama than Koussevitzky's, though the latter's has a sheen which only the Boston Symphony can produce. Kleiberth seems to be most successful in German romantic music and one would like to hear more from him. If he recorded the Second and Third Symphonies, by all means let's have them, even if the orchestra is the German Prague Philharmonic, which sounds like a war-time change of the Czech Philharmonic. —P.H.R.

Concerto

BACH, J. S.: Concerto for Three Harpsichords and Strings in C major; Concerto for Four Harpsichords and Strings in A minor; Erna Heiller, Christa Fuhrmann, Bruno Seidelhofer and Kurt Rapf, (harpsichords) and the Vienna Chamber Orchestra conducted by Anton Heiller. Haydn Society LP disc HSLP 1024, $5.95.

BACH: Concerto for Two Harpsichords and Strings in C major; Hans Andrae, Theodor Sack (harpsichords) and the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra conducted by Clemens Dahinden; HAYDN: Concerto in F major for Violin and Harpsichord; Hans Andrae (harpsichord), Peter Rybar (violin) and the Concert Hall Chamber Orchestra conducted by Henry Swoboda. Concert Hall LP disc CHS 1081, $5.95.

▲BACH WROTE seven solo concertos for harpsichord and orchestra and six multiple concertos for two to four harpsichords and orchestra. Of these, eleven are now thought to be transcriptions of either his own or other's works. Legend has it that Bach wrote many concertos because he needed works to play with his sons and pupils. This, if true, would put the composition of the entire series in the 1730's. It seems generally agreed that Bach himself wrote the concerto for three harpsichords, as here recorded, and that he conceived it for this combination of instruments. Only when played in this manner can one agree with Schweitzer that: "The tonal and rhythmical effects that Bach has achieved with three claviers are indescribable." The work was recently recorded by Vox (LP PLP6650) but pianos were used instead of harpsichords and, though that performance was quite good this one is preferred as more revealing of the close-knit structure of the work with its incredible "power and combination." The concerto for four harpsichords is actually a transcription of Vivaldi's Concerto in B minor for Four Violins and Orchestra, Op. 3, No. 10. The work was recorded years ago in Germany (Telefunken SK1317-8) with the single distinction that the odd side of that issue was devoted to a movement from the original Vivaldi work, in which Vivaldi sounded primitive by comparison.

The soloists in the performances are part of an Austrian music club, founded after the last war, whose interest in music before 1800 has resulted in many fine performances. Haydn Society's recordings are still some of the best being made.

Of the concertos for two harpsichords and orchestra, the one here recorded is by far the best known, besides being the only one thought to be originally conceived in its present form. The slow movement is one of Bach's most famous, in which "the two unaccompanied soloists. . . discourse in intimate and subdued tones." The work has been often recorded, usually with pianos. The only two using harpsichords (L'Anthologie Sonore 41-2 and Musicraft 52) are inferior performances. Andrae and Sack play with skill and moving simplicity. The recording is excellent.

The Haydn coupling originally appeared several years ago (CHS C-12) as one of Concert Hall's subscription series. The work is completely charming. The soloists are good and Swoboda moves things along at a brisk clip. The dubbing is firstrate. —D.R.

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 3 in C minor, Op. 37; Clara Haskil (piano) with the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra conducted by Henry Swoboda. Westminster LP disc WL 5057, $5.95.

▲ADMIRERS of Miss Haskil are in for something of a disappointment in this disc. Considering her admirable performance of the Mozart D minor Concerto (Westminster WL 5054, see March 1951) with its delicately romantic overtones, one would have thought the Beethoven third concerto an admirable vehicle for her talents. This recording is of a most uneven performance. An excessive rubato is employed which does not clarify the exquisite proportions of the score and the molding of lead line is often so choppy that one becomes uncomfortably aware of each measure.

Much of this is, to be sure, Swoboda's fault. It would be very nice to hear a Haskil recording in which another conductor officiates. Sometimes Swoboda and Haskil agree perfectly and then the performance becomes a very good one — as in parts of the Largo. At other times they apparently disagree completely — as in the rondo — and then only a ragged and perfunctory performance emerges. By far the best performance recorded is that by Solomon (HMV DB3306-10) and it, if any, should be issued on an LP disc. The Westminster recording is very life-like, though there is a reverberation which adds to the general impression of heaviness. —D.R.

MOZART: Concerto No. 12 in A major, K. 414; Margaret Knittel with the Bavarian Radio Orchestra under Rudolf Albert. Concerto in E flat for Two Pianos, K.365; Heinz Schröter, Haus Altman and Bavarian Radio Orchestra. Mercury LP disc MG 10007. $4.85.

▲SOMEONE — besides reviewers, a customer for example — ought to complain to Mercury. They have one of the most interesting catalogues and the poorest reproduction of any recording company. This disc is like so many other Mercury items: good music well performed on execrable surfaces, badly reproduced.

The single piano concerto comes off best and this is fortunate because Margaret Knittel does it very well. The Louis Kentner recording (Columbia LX 894/6) is, perhaps, preferable because of the amazing rapport between him and Beecham which turns the jolly rondo into one of those beautifully realized, expertly synchronized Mozart performances which are all too rare. Albert, however, is competent enough and lets Miss Knittel have her own way most of the time, which is all to the good.

The two-piano concerto is quite badly recorded and my copy was full of distortion, clicks, catches and very harsh highs. The performance, too, is none too good. The Schnabels play it with all the pompousness they might accord a two-piano reduction of the King Stephan Overture (Victor M-484), and the Iturbis (Victor M-732) seem under the constant misapprehension that they are in the latest Jane Powell movie. This version does have Heinz Schörter, who is a good pianist, (I've never heard Hans Altmann before); but, in duo at any rate, he misses notes, fakes, and is as messy as his partner. Even the pedestrian but accurate Vronsky-Babin and Mitropoulos performance (Col. LP ML 54098) is preferable. —D.R.

MOZART: Concerto in D for Flute and Orchestra, K.314; Andante in C for Flute and Orchestra, K.315; Aurele Nicolet (flute) and the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra conducted by Henry Swoboda. Concert Hall 10″ LP CHS-1073, $4.67.

▲A NEATLY TURNED, thoroughly satisfactory performance of the less familiar of Mozart's two flute concertos. This is the same work that Mozart transposed into C major to fulfill a rush order for an oboe concerto. The oboe version has recently been recorded by Evelyn Rothwell (HMV C-3954/5), but there is no other modern flute recording. The old Moyse set, with its truncated finale, (Victor set M-589, withdrawn) was never satisfactory, even in its day.

M. Nicolet, a well-known French instrumentalist, is a stylish performer. His phrasing and general comportment are beyond reproach, though his tone is somewhat more open and raw than we have been taught to accept as ideal. The orchestral forces, led by the ubiquitous Swoboda, are competent if uninspired. This is one of the best flute concertos to be found on LP, a medium which has as yet neglected the major items of that instrument's repertoire. —A.W.P.

PERGOLESI: Concerto in F for Flute and Orchestra; Raymond Meylan (flute) and the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Clemens Dahinden. HAYDN: Sonata in G for Flute and Piano; Rene Le Roy (flute) and Paul Loyonnet (piano). Concert Hall LP disc CHS-1082, $5.95.

▲THE PERGOLESI CONCERTO is considerably more attractive than many of the early solo instrumental works that have been appearing on LP in recent months. It is music composed to a formula, of course, but in this case the tunes are more agreeable, the accompanying figures a bit less hackneyed than usual. The anonymous program annotator hits the nail on the head when he says: "In listening to music of this century [the 18th] one shoud bear in mind the fact that many composers were inspired to write by what may be termed a prolific spirit of the times, rather than by a specific desire on their part to express some concrete emotional idea." In other words, composing was a serious business in those days. One didn't sit around waiting for inspiration to come.

Meylan is an excellent instrumentalist. The all-Swiss combination of soloist and orchestra perform their assignment tastefully and with spirit. The recording is unusually clear and well-balanced, ranking with the best of the bigger companies' current efforts.

There is little to be said for the Haydn sonata. Flutists may find it pleasant for their own purposes, but the average listener will find it a bit tedious. Le Roy is not in the best of form here. His tone is often thin and edgy in melodic passages, breathy in rapid sections. —A.W.P.

STRAVINSKY: Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra; Monique Haas (piano) with the RIAS Symphony Orchestra conducted by Ferenc Fricsay; RAVEL: Piano Concerto in G major; Monique Haas (piano) with the Hamburg NWDR Symphony conducted by Hans Schmidt-Issertedt. Decca LP disc DL 9515, $5.85.

▲STRAVINSKY wrote the 1929 Capriccio because, "I had so often been asked to play my Concerto. . . that I thought it was time to write another work for piano and orchestra. That is why I wrote another concerto, which I called Capriccio, that name seeming best to indicate the character of the music." In three movements, the work moves from an introspective opening movement to a remarkable final allegro in which jazz and circus-music contribute to a bang-up piano-tympani conclusion. This performance is superior both to the old Stravinsky-Ansermet recording (Columbia M152 — withdrawn) and the somewhat newer Sanroma-Koussevitzky (Victor M685); first, because Haas and Fricsay are in complete accord as to what the music is about (it is called Capriccio and they play it as such) and second, because it is a life-like recording.

The Ravel is a completely successful dubbing of the original 78's from Deutsche Grammophon. Miss Haas' main competition is the marvelous Bernstein recording (Victor M1209) where piano and orchestra are in such perfect accord and so beautifully recorded that a better performance seems impossible. Miss Haas' interpretation is different from Bernstein's — she plays a bit more slowly and accents the fast passages with even more percussive intent — but it is equally as good. It is the orchestra that spoils the recording: the wonderful trombone glissandi are missing as well as the athletic articulation required of the woodwind. In addition, I suspect microphone placement a bit too near the piano. Some of the lines in the orchestra are obscured and very often pianistic figurations cover up the orchestral development — which one simply cannot have in so economical and tightly realized a work as this concerto. Other than this lack of balance, however, the recording is just as fine as that given the Stravinsky. —D.R.

Chamber Music

BARTOK: Sonata No. 1 for Violin and Piano; Isaac Stern (violin) and Alexander Zakin (piano). Columbia LP disc ML-4376, $5.45.

▲LAST FALL Sidney Finkelstein contributed an article on Bela Bartok's music on records to these pages. What he had to say about the Violin Sonata No. 1 and Menuhin's performance of it (the only other previous recording of the work), I should like to repeat in case any of our readers missed it.

"The 1920s inaugurate a new period for Bartok. The emotional content of his music becomes lighter. . . the musical textures, however, become more original and fantastic. Any resemblance to the classical past of music seems to be abandoned, though classical forms still serve as architectural girder-work. The surface sound suggests a folk artist improvising freely, using a wide variety of strumming and percussive effects, glissandos, and tone clusters.

"The First Sonata for Violin and Piano (1921) is constructed on grand lines in all three movements. There is an opening of dramatic contrasts, followed by a meditative slow movement, and lastly a brilliantly contrapuntal rondo. Regarding Menuhin's playing, I find it technically secure, full of en-

AGAIN AVAILABLE for Immediate Delivery

Sun Radio's Famed
CR-10 AMPLIFIERS *

For the first time in over two years, we've managed to step up production of the CR-10, the music lover's favorite amplifier, to where we can meet demand and guarantee immediate delivery.

MODEL CR-10, standard model. Kit $54.00
Lab wired, tested, ready to use $84.50

MODEL CR-10-P, uses Peerless transformers throughout. Kit $54.00
Lab wired, tested, ready to use. . . . $84.50

MODEL CR-10-Q using Peerless transformers throughout, features famous Peerless S-240-Q output transformer for real presence effect. Frequency Response ±1 db, 20-20,000 cps. Less than 2% harmonic distortion at 10W output. Kit. $64.00
Lab wired, tested, ready to use. . . . $94.50

SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY SUN RADIO, N. Y. Mail orders filled promptly and carefully. Write for complete literature on these amplifiers and other high fidelity equipment.

All kits less wire and solder.

* Adapted from design published by CONSUMERS' RESEARCH, INC., WASHINGTON, N. J. (Special Bulletin #31). Present tube shortages have made it advisable for Sun Radio to substitute a type 6A3 output tube for the 6B4G in the original design. These 2 tubes are identical except that the 6B4G has an octal base, and the 6A3 has a four-prong base. This change in no way impairs the amplifier's performance.

Sun Radio
& ELECTRONICS CO. INC.
122 Duane St. • New York 7, N. Y. • BArclay 7-1840

2 Blocks North of Chambers Street
Hours: Daily 9-6, Saturday 9-4:30

thusiasm, but embodying too many of the performer's own emotionalisms. These are expressed in heavy vibrato, an occasionally strident attack, and the inability to relax."

Isaac Stern's playing of this sometimes powerful work seems to me just right. His execution of the recitative-like slow movement, for example, is poised and just relaxed enough to convey the presence of meditation without exaggerated feverishness. Alexander Zakin handles the difficult piano part with sympathy and assurance. The recording is quite good. —C.J.L.

BEETHOVEN: Serenade in D Major, Op. 8; Joseph Fuchs (violin), Lillian Fuchs (viola), and Leonard Rose (cello). Decca 10″ LP disc DL-7506, $3.85.

▲THE FUCHSES AND LEONARD ROSE offer here some of the most expert and winning ensemble playing to be presented on records this year. All three are solo players of distinction; all three are among the finest chamber music players of our day. In addition to their appearances in recital and as soloists with orchestras, they are regularly heard in the chamber music concerts of the Musicians Guild, one of New York's most dependable musical delights for the past three or four seasons.

Only such close association could produce, even in the work of three such admirable artists, the homogeneous style, the exquisite blending and balancing of tone, the precise attacks, and above all the joy of playing together that this performance imparts. This is the first LP we have had of Beethoven's delightful Serenade in D. Excellently recorded, it should not encounter any serious competition for some time. —C.J.L.

BEETHOVEN: Sonata in C minor, Op. 30, No. 2; Jascha Heifetz (violin) and Emanuel Bay (piano). RCA Victor 10″ LP disc LM-60, $4.67.

▲GRADUALLY, Heifetz is completing his performances of the Beethoven sonatas. Since Kreisler is no longer active in the recording studio, it is logical that someone else would take over the role he once held with honors. One cannot but wish that Victor would see fit to release the Kreisler performances of all the Beethoven sonatas, as they were exceptional musicianly and hardly surpassed by later-day players. There is much to admire in Heifetz's rendition of this work. His playing is stylistically acceptable, and tonally beautiful in sound. What it lacks is the personalized inflection and nuance of a Kreisler in his prime. Of the several versions of this sonata on LP discs, Isaac Stern has a youthful fervor that recommends it and Szigetti's performance has some exciting phraseology though little of Heifetz's beauty of tone. —J.N.

BERG: Sonata for Piano, Op. 1; Four Pieces for Clarinet and Piano, Op. 5; Four Songs, Op. 2; Seven Early Songs; Benjamin Tupas (piano), Sidney Forrest (clarinet) and Catherine Rowe (soprano). Lyrichord LP disc LL13, $5.95.

▲THE PLUMS in this record are to be found in the vocal section. Miss Rowe is a better than average vocalist, with pleasing tone quality and what is even more rare, a well developed sense of style. These early songs of Berg stem from the purest of romantic antecedents. Echoes of Raff, Wolf, Mahler, Reger and other Wagnerian disciples color their pages, but the basic structure of an individual musical personality is already present.

The piano and clarinet pieces have less to offer. They seem to be little more than student efforts, the sort of thing that every discerning composer should get around to burning before he dies, lest some over-zealous well-wisher malign his reputation by their dissemination. At best this music serves to satisfy a historical curiosity. One can probe and dissect these early gropings, but it is doubtful if the ungerminated seeds of a Wozzeck or a Lulu can be turned up in this long-dead material. —A.W.P.

FRANCK: Sonata in A major; Lola Bobesco (violin) and Jacques Genty (piano). London 10″ LP disc LPS 326, $4.95.

▲HISTORY repeats itself in various ways. Years ago Victor issued a wonderful performance of this work by Jacques Thibaud and Alfred Cortot. Not long afterwards, Columbia released a performance by Alfred Dubois and Marcel Maas. The latter two musicians were praiseworthy but their performance had little of the nuance and tonal modulation of the former. What recommended the latter's version to some was the quality of the recording, which was at a higher level than the Victor and tonally fuller. The pres-

New RCA VICTOR records

RCA Victor this month brings you Ezio Pinza's brand-new album of songs from his forthcoming debut film "Mr. Imperium"! . . . Albanese's sensational account of "Bachianas Brasileiras". . . The Boston Pops in "Sousa Marches," "Donna Diana Overture". . . The "Moonlight Sonata" played by the First Piano Quartet . . . and many others of outstanding musical interest.

Licia ALBANESE—
Leopold STOKOWSKI

Bachianas Brasileiras, No. 5 for Soprano and 8 'cellos. (Villa-Lobos). Leopold Stokowski, Conductor. 'Cello Solo by Frank Miller. 12-3277, $1.31. 49-3277 (45), $1.16.

Giuseppe DI STEFANO

Muttetti di lu paliu and Abballati. RCA Victor Orchestra, Renato Cellini, Conductor. 10-3268, $1.16. 49-3268 (45), $1.16.

Cantu a timuni and A la vallelunghisa. RCA Victor Orchestra, Renato Cellini, Conductor. 10-3269, $1.16. 49-3269 (45), $1.16.

Arthur FIEDLER
BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA

Hungarian Dances (Brahms). 6 selections. DM 1518, $4.50. WDM 1518 (45), $3.99. LM-67, $4.67.

Strauss Waltzes (Johann Strauss, Jr.) 3 selections. DM 1519, $4.97. WDM 1519 (45), $3.99. LM-68, $4.67.

Sousa Marches. 6 selections. DM 1521, $4.50. WDM 1521 (45), $3.99. LM-69, $4.67.

Donna Diana Overture (Reznicek) and Abu Hassan Overture (Weber). 12-3266, $1.31. 49-3266 (45), $1.16.

Robespierre Overture (Litolff). 12-3267, $1.31. 49-3267 (45), $1.16.

Rose Mousse-Entr'acte (Bosc) and Loin du Bal—waltz movement (Gillet). 10-3270, $1.16. 49-3270 (45), $1.16.

Radetzky March (Johann Strauss) and Wien bleibt Wien (Schramml). 10-3271, $1.16. 49-3271 (45), $1.16.

La Comparsita (Rodriguez) and Triana (Albeniz). 12-3275, $1.31. 49-3275 (45), $1.16.

First Piano Quartet

Sonata in C-Sharp Minor, Op. 27, No. 2 "Moonlight" (Beethoven). 12-3276, $1.31. 49-3276 (45), $1.16.

HEIFETZ

Hora Staccato (Dinicu) and La Fille Aux Cheveux De Lin (Debussy). Emanuel Bay, pianist. 10-3312, $1.16. 49-3312 (45), $1.16.

Sonata in G Minor (Debussy). Also, La plus que lente-Valse. Emanuel Bay, pianist. DM 1515, $3.66. WDM 1515 (45), $2.83.

HEIFETZ-KAPELL

Sonata No. 3, in D Minor, Op. 108 (Brahms). DM 1523, $4.97. WDM 1523 (45), $3.99. LM-71, $4.67.

Amparo ITURBI

Malagueña from "Andalusia Suite" (Lecuona) and The White Peacock (Griffes). 12-3273, $1.31. 49-3273 (45), $1.16.

José and Amparo ITURBI

Sonata in D, K. 448 (Mozart). DM 1516, $4.97. WDM 1516, $3.99. LM-1135 (with Trois Valses Romantiques: Chabrier), $5.72.

Allan JONES

Sympathy and The Donkey Serenade from "The Firefly" (Friml). With Elaine Malbin, Soprano. Al Goodman and his Orchestra. 10-3272, $1.16. 49-3272 (45), $1.16.

Wanda LANDOWSKA

The Well Tempered Clavier, Book I (J. S. Bach). Preludes and Fugues Nos. 17 thru 24. DM 1517, $8.89. WDM 1517 (45), $7.44. LM-1136, $5.72.

Jan PEERCE

A Jan Peerce Serenade. 6 selections. The Philharmonia Orchestra, Fistoulari, Cond. DM 1514, $4.50. WDM 1514 (45), $3.99.

Ezio PINZA—Fran WARREN

Songs from "Mr. Imperium." 6 selections. With Guadalajara Trio. Johnny Green, Conductor. DM 1502, $4.50. WDM 1502 (45), $3.99. LM-61, $4.67.

Ferruccio TAGLIAVINI

Neapolitan Folk Songs. 6 selections. RCA Victor Orchestra, Renato Cellini, Conductor. DM 1525, $4.50. WDM 1525 (45), $3.99. LM-72, $4.67.

Prices shown are suggested list, including Federal Excise tax. Add local tax.

ent performance relates itself in much the same way to the wonderful one — issued recently by Columbia — by Francescatti and Casadesus; though the margin of recording differences is narrowed down. Miss Bobesco and Mr. Gentry are assured musicians but lacking in the nuance and tonal modulation of their predecessors. I would rate Francescatti and Casadesus as the foremost duo players since Thibaud and Cortot. —P.H.R.

FRANCK: Sonata in A major; DEBUSSY: Sonata for Cello and Piano; Marcel Hubert (cello) and Harold Dart (piano). Allegro LP disc AL 110, $5.45.

▲THE FRANCK SONATA is none other than the famous one for violin, played in a lower tessitura on the cello. According to two French artists, quoted in the notes, Franck conceived the sonata originally for cello. If this be true, then Franck deceived Ysaye and the famous pianist, Mme. Bordes-Pène, for whom he is said to have written the violin version.

Perhaps we are too familiar with the violin version to appreciate fully on first acquaintance its performance on the cello. To me, the music loses much of its lyric graciousness. It does not flow as naturally and easily from the cello strings, and the piano seems to submerge the stringed instrument on occasion. It should be noted that Hubert plays with real beauty of tone and his partner does justice to his part. In the Debussy work the cellist is rightfully in his true domain and here his performance of a none too grateful work is most praiseworthy. The recording is one of Allegro's best. —P.H.R.

STRAUSS, Richard: Piano Quartet in C minor, Op. 13; Bernardo Segall (piano), Jose Figueroa (violin), Frank Brieff (viola), George Ricci (cello). New Records LP disc, NRLP 201, $5.95.

▲STRAUSS, the archbishop of the tone poem, began as a composer using classical forms. Much conjecture has been advanced as to where Strauss would have ended had he continued working in the abstract classical forms instead of the modern poetic ones. Long years ago, Ernest Newman pointed out that when we look impartially at works like his Symphony and Piano Quartet, "we recognize in them the possibility of a first-rate symphonist." "Not only does the mood of the Piano Quartet," continues Newman, "often forecast that of Aus Italien, but the thematic phrases begin to show one marked characteristic of the style of the later Strauss — a superabundant energy that sends the melodies sweeping far up and down the scale, and a length of breadth that enables them to run an exceptionally long course." I must confess that the present work — written in the composer's twenty-second year — astonished me for its assured handling of the form, its concentration and technical proficiency. It is true that it owes an indebtedness to Brahms especially in its piano technique, but the ingenuity of the ideas and the melodic invention suggest an aspiring young composer who had individuality and strength of purpose.

The opening movement is compact, full of dramatic energy and assurance in the working-out of its material. The scherzo has spirit and wit, the slow movement while not profound has emotional warmth, and the finale has a lyrical capriciousness and bustling activity which builds to a brilliant ending.

It is evident that the performing musicians have given some time and study to this score which has its technical difficulties. Theirs is a forthright performance, spirited though not without some rough moments.

But one cannot but admire their conscientious efforts to keep the music vital and rhythmically alive. Better a rugged, full-blooded performance than a polished, anaemic one. The tonal balance of the recording is on the whole satisfactory. Using a high bass turnover, the reproduction should sound very natural. —P.H.R.

Keyboard

CHOPIN: Scherzos; Artur Rubinstein (piano), RCA Victor LP disc LM-1132, $5.45.

▲BACK IN 1934, Artur Rubinstein was heard in a recording of the four Chopin scherzos. Since then there has not been — in America, at any rate — an integral recording; and it is fitting, after all these years, that Rubinstein be the one to re-record them.

The scherzos are among Chopin's finest works. Each of the four has its distinctive profile, and there are a few things in common, too. All, even the fanciful No. 4 in E (which Saint-Saëns remembered so well when he came to write the second movement of his G minor Concerto), are strong, bold, turbulent, and all contain an alternation of masculine and feminine musical elements. There was a time when the B flat minor Scherzo was the most popular concert piece that Chopin ever composed; a critic just couldn't escape it. Today it has dropped down a little, though it still finds a good annual representation in the concert halls.

They demand a big interpretive sweep, and that is what Rubinstein gives them. Sometimes he is careless about detail, and in a few places the only word to describe a passage is "sloppy." And yet the fact remains that very few living pianists could come near duplicating his work — the combination of power, lyricism and stylistic instinct that Rubinstein can bring to his Chopin. The rhythm, too: a rhythm that is flexible enough to allow the music to breathe, that is never rigid, that is in itself an expressive vehicle. Rubinstein never really lets us forget that he is a virtuoso, but at the same time he maintains his standing as a pianist of culture and sentiment — a combination of virtues hard to beat. —H.C.S.

DEBUSSY: The Children's Corner — Jimbo's lullaby, The Little Shepherd, Golliwog's Cakewalk; William Kapell (piano). Victor 45 rpm disc 49-3212, $1.10 (also 78 rpm).

▲AMONG the younger pianists Kapell has developed considerably in the past year. Here, he plays with delicacy and gentle care. He pedals discreetly and shades his tones with subdued coloring, but for some reason his playing does not fully satisfy. It may be the recording, which is rather subdued, or it may be that Kapell is exercising too much discretion in his approach to this music. Perhaps long familiarity with Gieseking's playing, in which Debussy's Golliwog has a stronger profile, retards immediate appreciation. Kapell should have made the whole suite which is badly needed in a modern recording. —J.N.

MOZART: Sonata in D, K.448; CHABRIER: Three Romantic Waltzes; Amparo and José Iturbi (duo-pianists). RCA Victor LP disc LM-1135, $5.45.

▲THIS IS the first LP appearance of Mozart's only two-piano sonata, and it receives an adequate performance, bolstered by more

LONDON
ffrr
long-playing records,
including new releases,
immediately available from the country's largest stock of
LONDON
LONG-PLAYING RECORDS
at Grinnell's
"first in music since 1879"
SEND FOR UP-TO-DATE CATALOGUE LISTING THESE FAMOUS HI-FIDELITY RECORDINGS. MAILED FREE ANYWHERE IN THE UNITED STATES
Prompt attention given mail orders.
Records mailed post-paid.
Grinnell's
1515 Woodward Avenue
DETROIT 26, MICHIGAN

than adequate recording. Neither of the Iturbis is, after all, an amateur, and there was a day when José's Mozart playing was among the best anywhere to be heard. Since then, of course, what with one thing and another, the refinement and fluent technique of his pianism has considerably receded. It has not altogether disappeared, however; and a careful survey of this record does not reveal anything at which one can point an accusing finger and say "here" in a triumphant tone of voice. At the same time, it must sadly be admitted, there is nothing that makes one conscious of anything but a good, routine, dependable performance, lacking somewhat in imagination and nuance.

In Chabrier's delicious Trois Valses Romantiques the Iturbis are up against a recorded version by Robert and Gaby Casadesus. Although the latter is not as brilliant in sound, it is altogether superior as an interpretation, with a quality of suppleness and finesse that the Iturbis cannot duplicate. —H.C.S.

RACHMANINOFF: Suites Nos. 1 and 2; Vronsky and Babin (duo-pianists). Columbia LP disc ML-4379, $5.45.

▲THE AFFECTION of Vronsky and Babin toward these suites must be something above and beyond the call of duty. They recorded Suite No. 2 twice previously, and were heard in a Victor pressing of No. 1 about ten years ago. They played them well then, they play them well now; and, in addition, Columbia, which is having good luck with its piano recording these days, has presented the pianists with resonant, shatterproof sound.

This should be the last word on the suites for some time to come. Vronsky and Babin play them to perfection. As Rachmaninoff intended, the emphasis here is as much upon the pianistics as upon the music proper. Few two-piano works have comparable pianistic interest; and while the intellectual-emotional content will not take too close an investigation, there are many pleasant moments. You may get tired of these pieces, but you can't sneer at them. Rachmaninoff was too good a craftsman. And in at least one case — the finale of the first suite — he composed a rather wonderful latter-day version of the Coronation Scene from Boris: bells going away like mad, and some curious, enigmatic harmonies dotting the musical landscape. —H.C.S.

SCHUMANN: Papillons, Op. 2; Prophet Bird, Op. 82; No. 7; Toccata, Op. 7; BRAHMS: Intermezzi in E flat, B flat minor and C sharp minor, Op. 117; Intermezzo in A major, Op. 118; Intermezzo in B minor, Op. 119; Gyorgy Sandor (piano). Columbia LP disc ML-4375, $5.45.

▲BY NOW the characteristics of Gyorgy Sandor are well known. They include a formidable pair of hands, a good tone, and an objective way of planning his interpretations. They do not, especially, include color, warmth or poetry. And thus one did not look forward with any great confidence to a pulsating reading of the Papillons or Brahms works. Nor was one disappointed.

Sandor plays with competence and almost a complete lack of identification with the romantic messages of the music. At times he apparently feels that there is something missing, so he adds some touches of rubato, or jockeys the rhythmic patterns and tempos around. To these ears it all sounds calculated; desperate, even. On the credit side is the general evenness of the playing, the excellent recording, and the easy nonchalance with which Sandor whips through some really difficult writing like the Schumann Toccata. The late Barere used to play this like nobody's business. They still talk, down at Victor, about the time he recorded it for them. Seems that Lhevinne had previously used a side and a half for his recording, and the Victor people asked Barere what he intended for a filler "What filler," Barere indignantly asked; and then broke all speed records by playing the Toccata on one side. Hit all the notes, too. —H.C.S.

Voice

CORNELL MUSIC: The Cornell Glee Club, Concert Band and Chimes. Published by the Cornell Alumni Association, Ithaca, New York, $5.95.

▲THIS WILL BRING a lump into many an alumnus throat as well as all those others — whether they went to Cornell or not — who feel nostalgia creeping over them whenever college is mentioned. The collection is all-Cornell and includes their Alma Mater as well as favorite songs and marches. The chimes are recorded striking the various stations of the day and, if you listen carefully, "you may hear the voices of crickets on Library Slope and the good-night chirping of birds on the Quadrangle." —D.R.

COUPERIN: First Tenebrae Service for the Wednesday of Holy Week; Air Sèrieux; La pastorelle; Les solitaires; Audite omnes; Hugues Cuenod (tenor), Robert Brink (violin), William Waterhouse (viola da gamba) and Daniel Pinkham (harpsichord and director). Allegro LP disc ALG 91, $5.95.

RAMEAU: Diane et Actéon; L'impatience; Hugues Cuenod (tenor), Robert Brink (violin), William Waterhouse (violin), Alfred Zighera (viola da gamba) and Daniel Pinkham (harpsichord). Allegro LP disc ALG 3010, $5.95.

ITALIAN SONGS OF THE 16TH & 17TH CENTURY: Valli profonde (Gagliano); Fantasia for lute (Fiorentino); Se l'aura spira (Frescobaldi); Fuggi, fuggi, cuar mio (Verdelot-Willaert); Con lagrime e sospir (Verdelot-Willaert); Veneziana for lute (Anonymous); Cara e dolce (Scarlatti). SPANISH SONGS—16TH CENTURY: Perdida; Sospiro; Durandarte; Three Bavanes (Milan); Si me llaman; Triste estaba; Pavana (lute); Israel (Mudarra); Hugues Cuenod (tenor) and Hermann Leeb (lute). Westminster LP disc WL 5059, $5.95.

▲COUPERIN composed nine tenebrae services, only three of which have come down to us. It is a pleasure to report that with this release all three have now been recorded; though the most famous of the three, the third, whose inspired recording aroused the first general interest in these works before the war (Victor discs 12325-26), is probably difficult to attain nowadays. Victor could do a real service by issuing it under the new historical label.

The texts of the services are taken from Jeremiah, but they are interspersed with vocalises on phrases from the Hebrew liturgy. In the opinion of Wilfrid Mellers, recent biographer of Couperin; "While always preserving a civilized decorum, they attain to an intensity of passion which Couperin attempted but seldom." The main difficulty in performing the music, says Mellers, "is to find singers with the requisite flexibility, and the appropriate timbre — anything approaching an Italianate luxuriance is unsuitable." Added to this is Couperin's use of the countertenor, an all but extinct voice, which combines power and virility with flexibility and a tessitura about a third higher than that of an ordinary tenor. Mr. Cuenod is the unusual (one is tempted to say unique) present-day artist able to cope with the problems set in this first service which he sings with feeling as well as easy mastery. The same may be said of the three secular airs and the solo motet on the reverse side of the record.

In interesting contrast, and no less impressive in their own right, are the two cantatas of Rameau. Best remembered by his operas, this composer did not enter the world of the theatre until he was fifty. The secular cantatas dating from his thirties are therefore forerunners of the operas. Each is a series of contrasting and often very lovely airs and recitatives. This is Mr. Cuenod's second recording of L'impatience, the first having formed part of a prewar set of Early cantatas and songs made with Isobel French (Technichord T-2), and it so happens that the same engineer, H. Vose Greenough, Jr., was responsible for both versions. In the ten or more years which have intervened, Mr. Cuenod's voice has taken on a deeper color, but happily has lost none of its facility. His always convincing singing of florid music is if anything more solid today, and he performs as ever with fine understanding. An improvement in the new version is the use of the viola da gamba instead of the cello.

The Italian and French songs with lute offer one more facet of the tenor's versatility. Several of them will be remembered from Max Meili's Music of the Renaissance (Victor M-495), but that set is no longer available. The new record may very well take its place. It is the kind of unified song recital (interspersed with lute solos) to which, thanks to LP, one can relax and assimilate the style and spirit of the composers. There is little to choose between Cuenod and Meili, though today Cuenod's voice seems to have more body than Meili's, and his singing is every bit as musicianly. Mr. Leeb's lute playing makes one regret that this kind of music is so seldom played. Once again it is a pleasure to note outstandingly fine reproduction. —P.L.M.

GERSHWIN: Porgy and Bess — Highlights; Rise Stevens (mezzo-soprano) and Robert Merrill (baritone) with Robert Shaw Chorale and RCA Victor Orchestra conducted by Robert Russell Bennett. RCA Victor LP disc LM 1124, $5.72.

▲NOW that Porgy and Bess is an accepted American classic, I suppose it is fair game for all sorts of interpretations; yet there are two approaches most likely to succeed with the public. The one is in the spirit of the original production, which featured such outstanding Negro artists as Todd Duncan and Anne Brown; the other in the tradition of the de luxe radio show, with Metropolitan stars backed by the lushest of accompanying orchestras and choruses. Those who want the first type of performance were given it some years ago by members of the original cast (Decca A 145 and A 283) but so far this historic set has not reached LP. The standard for the second type of production was the longtime best selling album of excerpts by Lawrence Tibbett and Helen Jepson (Victor C-25).

I hardly need add that Merrill and Stevens are in this same line; they sing with care and polish, and the whole thing is sweepingly recorded. For those who valued the old Decca recording, it will be good news to know that Columbia is now recording Porgy and Bess in its entirety with an all-Negro cast, including members of the original 1935 cast. —P.L.M.

HAYDN: Missa Solemnis, 1799, in B-flat (Theresienmesse); Anny Felbermayer (soprano), Dagmar Hermann (contralto), Julius Patzak (tenor), Alfred Poell (basso), Josef Mertin (organ), Vienna State Opera Chorus and Vienna Symphony Orchestra conducted by Clemens Krauss. Vox LP disc PL 6740, $5.95.

▲THAT THE THERESIENMESSE has been by courtesy perhaps the best known of the Haydn masses may be to some extent due to the musicality of its title. On the other hand, studded as it is with so many jewels of melody, one wonders why our choral societies and choirs have been content to let its reputation rest so long on its name. The work has an expressive and devotional grandeur of its own, while it points the way to the masses of such composers as Beethoven and Schubert. Haydn, however, was more especially concerned with the ecclesiastical function of the mass, and his works in the form are not concert pieces in the sense that those of his successors frequently are. Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, like so many of his greater works, bursts its bounds; and the heart-warmingly Viennese melodiousness of Schubert's religious music is a far cry from Haydn's serious concern with the spiritual meaning of the liturgical text.

However it may have been that this recording escaped the protective eye of the Haydn Society, it has been made in the spirit and by approved performers of that organization. As has been the case with many Viennese recordings, one has the impression that a little more rehearsal would have made the finished product just so much finer: there is the usual quota of ragged attacks and not quite perfect phrases. The soprano soloist has a way of dragging the beat, but the quartet is generally good. I am sorry the division of the mass into two parts seems to necessitate a break in the Credo between Crucifixus and Et resurrexit, but I strongly prefer this to changing the order of the service as was recently done in a Byrd mass. The balance between chorus and orchestra seems to me uncommonly good. —P.L.M.

MASSENET: Manon — Adieu, notre petite table; MOZART: Le Nozze di Figaro — Porgi amor; Victoria de los Angeles (soprano) with Philharmonia Orchestra conducted by Walter Susskind. RCA Victor 45 rpm disc 49-3227, $1.10 (also 78 rpm).

WAGNER: Tannhauser — Dich teure Halle; Lohengrin — Elsas Traum; Victoria de los Angeles, with Philharmonia Orchestra conducted by Anatole Fistoulari. RCA Victor 45 rpm disc 49-3213, $1.10 (also 78 rpm).

▲VICTORIA DE LOS ANGELES has shown in her performances at the Metropolitan and in her three New York recitals that she is an exceptionally gifted artist. Hers is a sumptuous voice, tonally beautiful and often emotionally exciting. In the opera house, however, her upper voice often lacks bite and she does not always realize needed climaxes. Her mezza-voce, on the other hand, is exquisite. In her soft singing she recalls Tiana Lemnitz.

Her Manon aria has a genuine emotion not always associated with the role; it is a more richly colored and warmer performance than Suzanne Danco's recent effort, but unfortunately this recorded version omits the agitated opening part of the recitative, Allon! Il le faut! and begins instead with the reproachful phrase, Je ne suis que faiblesse. The use of part of the orchestration as an introduction, which accompanies Manon's climactic outburst, without the voice of the singer may prove disconcerting to some. Miss de los Angeles' Mozart singing is stylistically disappointing, though it is lovely in sound.

The soprano is less at home in the German language than in her native Spanish and her Italian and French offerings. In the Tannhauser aria she is more convincing than in the Lohengrin. She conveys Elisabeth's joyful excitement, but she makes her vocal points more telling in the body of the aria than at the end. A tendency to clip the end of some of her phrases is disturbing. But this is for the most part beautiful singing. So too, is her Elsa's Dream despite her suggestion of a far more objective Elsa than Wagner intended.

The soprano has excellent orchestral support in all these selections and most satisfactory recording from knowing British engineers. —J.N.

KODALY: Missa brevis in tempora belli; BRITTEN: Rejoice in the Lamb; The Chancel Choir of the National Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C. conducted by Theodore Schaefer. WCFM LP disc LP-4, $5.95.

▲THE KODALY MASS, a product of the terrible days of World War II, had its première in a bombed-out church in Budapest. It was introduced to America by the present choir under the composer's direction during his visit to this country on January 26, 1947. The recording, we are told, was made on the fourth anniversary of that occasion. It is not hard to understand how the church and its choir might be proud of having had such an honor, for this is thrilling music. Not too detached for the layman to grasp, its interest is heightened by both the composer's mastery of sonorities and colors and its extra-musical associations. There are several striking things about the mass: first, the use of the organ, which introduces the Kyrie with a big and solemn introit; then the special effect of three high sopranos in the Gloria and again in the Agnus Dei. Too, the repetition of the Qui tollis music of the Gloria later in the Agnus Dei, and perhaps most significant, the musical setting of the final words of the mass, Ite, missa est. The last section may be omitted, and undoubtedly would be in a service, but the fervent supplication it expresses is one of the most moving moments in a strongly affecting work. The mass occupies the first side of the LP disc and a short band of the second.

Mr. Britten's piece is in the strongest contrast, but in its way equally absorbing. The text is taken from Jubilate agno by Christopher Smart, an eccentric poet of Dr. Johnson's day and a deeply and sincerely religious man whose unorthodox piety led to periodic confinement. One feels for him, admires him, and loves him as he expounds, aided by Britten's reverently good humored music, the religion of his cat Jeoffry, or of the hospitable mouse, and the language of the flowers — "For flowers are peculiarly the poetry of Christ." Britten, with great concealing art, has let Smart speak to us through his music.

Both selections are superbly performed by the choir and the organist, with good soloists. The recording, too, is fine, if a bit clouded in some of the softest passages. —P.L.M.

PALESTRINA: Missa Papae Marcelli. Roger Wagner Chorale conducted by Roger Wagner. Capitol LP disc P-8126, $4.98.

▲THIS IS THE MASS for which Palestrina has been most famous through the ages, and all because of an apocryphal story concerning its composition. So famous indeed is the story that Pfitzner based on it an opera in which the great polyphonist even made his way into the theatre!

The legend tells that the Council of Trent, reacting against the length and complexity of the masses then in vogue, would have banished from the chancel all music save Gregorian chants had not Palestrina, at the instance of Cardinal Baromeo, proved by this com-

CUSTOM RADIO-PHONOGRAPH INSTALLATIONS
Complete systems, conversions of existing equipment, etc. by an experienced and cooperative audio engineer.
For information write or call. Demonstrations gladly given.
GEORGE W. SIOLES
38 Wakefield Ave. Port Washington, L. I., N. Y
Phone: Port Washington 7-3210

position that harmonized music (that is, music in parts) could be not only straightforward but meaningful.

For all the recent revivals of music of the past, there has been dishearteningly little agreement among the authorities as to how the works of Palestrina and his contemporaries should be performed. Two current schools of thought seem as definite as black and white — either the music, being otherworldly, must avoid all expression of human feelings, or else it should be sung for every possible heartbeat there is in it. Happily, ever so often a choir will strike somewhere in between, attempting perhaps a human approach to the celestial verities. That, it seems to me, must be Roger Wagner's intention in this sensitive yet unromanticized performance. To my mind it is preferable by far to the hard-driven proclamations of the Saint Eustache Choir of Paris (Pathé PDT 94-99, now available on Vox PL 6790).

The Capitol recording is less powerful than the Pathé, but though the choir sounds at a more proper distance, the balance (definitely bottom-heavy on Pathé) could stand just a little more bass. On the whole the intonation of the Wagner group is good if not quite perfect, the tone very pleasing. The record surfaces could be quieter, but this shortcoming is bothersome only in soft passages.—P.L.M.

VERDI: DonCarlo—Highlights; Blanche Thebom (mezzo-soprano), Jussi Bjoerling (tenor), Robert Merrill (baritone) and Italo Tajo (basso) with London Symphony Orchestra conducted by Warwick Braithwaite and RCA Victor Orchestra conducted by Renato Cellini and Jean Paul Morel. RCA Victor LP disc LM 1128, $5.72.

▲THIS IS the most imposing memento we seem likely to get of last season's successful Metropolitan opening. Included are Don Carlo's aria and duet with Rodrigo from the first act, the two arias for Eboli, King Philip's famous monologue and the death of Rodrigo (part of which was omitted at the Metropolitan). One must take issue with Jerome Pastene, writer of the notes, in his remark that all the "moments of great lyric beauty" are represented in these excerpts. Where, to mention one, is Elisabeth's lovely aria? Where, indeed, is Elisabeth in this cast? Coming from RCA Victor, this is not an "official" recording (Miss Thebom was Barbieri's alternate, joining the cast in later performances, and Tajo was not with the company at all last season). Furthermore, three conductors and two orchestras (one English) are represented. Obviously Miss Thebom is the star of Victor's cast, and she sings her first florid air with incomparable ease and grace. She was a lovely figure on the stage, and this was one of her memorable moments. Her recorded O don fatale is the best of recent years, so far as I know, and she is able to sustain the tessitura and hold the final high note as it is not given to deeper mezzos to do. In fairness I ought to say that in the performances I heard she was less exciting here than was Barbieri, though she sang more evenly. Certainly Thebom's recording is the more successful of the two.

Tajo's monologue has been with us before: reviewing its single issue last December I remarked that the basso delivered it "in the voice of an old and broken man, stressing this dramatic concept to something of an extreme at the expense of Verdi's melodic line." If Bjoerling's voice has inclined toward steeliness with the passing years, he is always an estimable and musical artist, and Merrill's rich tones are put to their best use in Rodrigo's music. The various recordings are all good.
—P.L.M.

FRIENDLY: The Quick and the Dead — The Biography of the Atom; Bob Hope, William L. Laurence (narrators) and others. 2 RCA Victor LP discs LM1129/30, $10.90.

▲NBC AND VICTOR, undoubtedly noting the sales of Columbia's I Can Hear It Now series, have put forward this collective effort in a bid for some of the lucrative "pseudo-documentary" record business. Fred Friendly, a collaborator in the I Can Hear It Now discs, was hired to prepare a dramatization of the development of the atom and hydrogen bombs to be aired in four weekly half-hour broadcasts. The reaction to his efforts was so favorable that Victor felt justified in making the scripts available on records.

To attract the sluggish mind of the average layman, who is apt to find the talents of a Durante or a Dagmar more palatable than a discussion of nuclear fission after a hard day at the office, Bob Hope was employed as bait. The versatile comedian acts as straight man for William Laurence, The New York Times science reporter and the principal narrator of the presentation, who attempts to describe the fundamentals of nuclear physics in words of one syllable. To leaven this solid fare there are many flashbacks employing either the actual voices of personalities involved in the development of atomic energy or of actors substituting for them (Paul Lukas plays Einstein, for instance).

While the instructions are not so clear that one could immediately go down into the cellar and set off one's own chain reaction, Mr. Laurence does manage to quote a number of interesting facts, anecdotes and other pertinent data that are in themselves quite fascinating — for a single listening. One might bring this set out again for the edification of television-trained guests, who have lost the art of conversation, but otherwise, I fear, it would gather dust, for the presentation, while absorbing enough the first time, can hardly be said to fulfill any timeless quality either as drama, literature or public-speaking. Public libraries and possibly schools might find a use for this set, though I have serious doubts as to whether so long a narrative would hold the attention of the average child. —A.W.P.

"DER ROSENKAVALIER"

(Continued from page 334)

kavalier where he [Strauss] uses all the batteries of his orchestra to pile up the fracas of a comic situation till it might be the announcement of the Judgment Day." Yet, as the same critic pointed out, "On the other hand, he has written passages of the most exquisite and most delicate orchestration, new in timbres and suggestive of the emotional situation."

I thing the English critic Eric Blom has summed up the situation in his statement that "this 18th-century Viennese tragicomedy, with its fine period feeling and its attractive blend of artificiality and humanity, must be one of the six best operatic libretti in the world, and although Strauss's setting is too heavy and highly wrought, his music has a glamour and pointed allusiveness and mastery that makes Der Rosenkavalier one of the most fascinating operas, the best by far he ever wrote, and unfortunately his last consistently great work."

As lengthy as Der Rosenkavalier is — and it is one of the longest operas — there are listeners who would not have a note dropped from the score. If the Wagner fans demand no cuts, then why Strauss's adherents? Here at long last, is the complete opera to satisfy such demands. This performance, like Der Rosenkavalier itself, is uneven. Perhaps the main fault is the visual loss, for Der Rosenkavalier has been rightfully called an acting opera; its varied situations, some of which teem with life while others are more sustained and sedate, require consistent characterization both in action and in song. Gestures play a strong part in the success of characterization, not only in the comic situations but in the serious ones too. The famous Victor set of 1935 may not be eclipsed, but it is challenged by unbroken sequence and LP reproduction.

The best member of this cast is Tiana Lemnitz, whose warm-hued voice is used with style and distinction. There is elegance and warmth in her portrayal of the Rose-Cavalier. Margarite Bäumer, the Marschallin, is in better voice than she was in Fidelio. There is still some tonal unsteadiness in her singing, but it is far less disturbing. Her artistic assurance and telling conveyance of the text is greatly in her favor. There are, howver, nuance of the Princess's character, of which Lotte Lehmann in her day made the most, that Miss Bäumer does not always fulfill. In the Monologue in the first act, for example, she does not convey its full tragic import. But in the scene at the end of the act, where the Princess dismisses Octavian — unfortunately not included complete in the Victor set — she rises to great dramatic heights and proves herself a distinguished lady of the theater.

READERS RECORD EXCHANGE & MART

Rates to subscribers 10c per word. Non-subscriber dealers and all auction sales 15c a word.

LONDON ANTIQUE ORIGINALS collector (Abendroth, Lossira, Gravina, Melchissedec, Petru, Scheidermantel, etc.) wishes to correspond and meet with American counterparts. Carton, Royal Automobile Club, Pall Mall, London S.W. 1, England.

WANTED: Victor albums M-325 and M-597; Columbia albums M-278 and X-68; Victor singles 11138/39, 11429, 11548, 17478. T. L. Clear, 64 Kensington Rd., Bronxville, N. Y.

Ursula Richter, a girlish Sophie with a pleasing voice that adheres well to pitch, is not the seasoned artist that Elisabeth Schumann was, though hers can be rated a satisfactory Sophie. Kurt Böhme, as Baron Ochs, is obviously the seasoned singer — his use of parlando in the role is a liberty that no bass could permit himself until he had sung the Baron a goodly number of times. He is competent but rough, a bit vulgar for even a bold bad Baron. Hans Löbel is a rich voiced von Faninal, and most of the balance of the cast are vocally satisfactory. The only offending member is Werner Liebling, whose rendition of the Italian Singer's aria in the first act can best be compared to the wailing of a troubled bull. The orchestra direction of Rudolf Kempe is efficient, generally rhythmically flexible but not always as incisive as it might be. He manages, however, to keep the sound from becoming too thick and obscuring the voices of the singers, which is no mean feat. The recording is quite clear with excellent bass definition, but there is some distortion on the high end which can be cleared up to some advantage by control manipulation.

A German correspondent for the English magazine Opera writes recently that the "Staatsoper's Rosenkavalier has been resuscitated with some notable changes in cast; Tiana Lemnitz is now the outstanding, hauntingly lovely Marschallin." This is good news, perhaps the soprano will favor us with some recordings of her new role. —P.H.R.

BACK COPIES

The American Record Guide

1950 — 12 issues $5.00
(while they last — five issues very short)
1949 — 12 issues $3.60
1948 — 12 issues $3.60
1947 — 11 issues $3.30
(Feb. 1947 — out of print)
1946 — 12 issues $3.60
1945 — 11 issues $5.00
(short on 4 issues)
(Feb. 1945 — out of print)
1944 — 11 issues $5.00
(Oct. 1944 — out of print)

LP's Third Birthday

(Continued from page 326)

zation and compensation. Often, Columbia's engineers work several days on one symphony to restore uniformity of quality. Having heard some of the different stages of this rerecording process, we are in a position to say the finished product remains an amazing example of engineering skill. The finished LP no longer reveals all of the shortcomings previously noticeable on the older recording. Hence, the so-called deterioration at various points in LP records is a fallacy.

Development of LP

The general public has no idea of the extent of research and development that was expended on Columbia's microgroove disc. The number of playable, initial efforts which were discarded, before the record as we know it today was achieved, probably extended into the hundreds. Columbia was out to perfect a record that would serve the record-buying public better than any before it. As Columbia's capable president had full knowledge of the inequalities of RCA Victor's earlier LP product, no duplication or improvement of that record was contemplated. One of the staunchest friends of recorded music in this country and always a diligent searcher for finer reproduction, Ted Wallerstein urged and encouraged the work on the new LP record. The research was entrusted to Dr. Peter C. Goldmark, director of Engineering Research and Development for the Columbia Broadcasting System, in conjunction with René Snepranger. The practical application was under the supervision of Jim Hunter, head of the manufacturing section of Columbia Records, who was ably assisted by the company's leading engineers, Vincent Liebler and William S. Bachman. (The latter, incidently, developed the G.E. pick-up cartridge.)

Hunter, Liebler, and Bachman have worked consistently and conscientiously to perfect Columbia's microgroove record. That their efforts have been rewarded is borne out by the quality of today's LP issues, for there is a marked improvement over the first ones. We can well believe, as time goes on, that further improvements will take place.

So — on the third anniversary of the LP disc — we say, Happy Birthday Columbia — and congratulations.

RECORD BUYER'S GUIDE

Some Leading Dealers Across the Country

New York City
HARRY BERLINER MUSIC SHOP
154 - 4th Ave. at 14th St.

ELAINE MUSIC SHOP,
9 East 44 St.

MORTIMER H. FOGEL
92 Liberty Street

HAYNES - GRIFFIN
391 Madison Ave. at 47th St.

LIBERTY MUSIC SHOPS
450 Madison Ave., at 50th St.

N. Y. BAND INSTRUMENT CO.
1166 Sixth Avenue
Brooklyn 25 Flatbush Ave.

RABSON'S RECORD SHOP
111 West 52nd Street

G. SCHIRMER, INC.
3 East 43rd Street

Tucson, Arizona
GRABE ELECTRIC CO.
26 East Congress

Berkeley, Calif.
ART MUSIC COMPANY
2400 Telegraph Ave.

Los Angeles, California
BIRKEL-RICHARDSON CO.
730 West 7th Street

GATEWAY TO MUSIC
3089 Wilshire Boulevard

San Francisco, California
THE RECORD SHOP
14 Tillman Place

CALIFORNIA MUSIC HOUSE
1560 California Street

SHERMAN, CLAY & CO.
Kearney and Suter Street

New Haven, Conn.
DAVID DEAN SMITH
Elm Street at Broadway

Washington, D. C.
THE RECORD LOFT
814 - 17th St., N.W.

Chicago, Illinois
LYON & HEALY
Wabash and Jackson

Baltimore, Maryland
THE G. FRED KRANZ MUSIC CO.
327 North Charles Street

Boston, Massachusetts
MOSHER MUSIC CO., Inc.
181 Tremont Street

Minneapolis, Minnesota
SCHMITT MUSIC CENTER
86-88 South 10th Street

St. Louis, Missouri
AEOLIAN COMPANY OF MISSOURI
1004 Olive Street

Rochester, New York
THE RECORD SHOP
McCurdy & Co., Inc.
Main at Elm

Cincinnati, Ohio
THE WILLIS MUSIC CO.
124 East 4th Street

Cleveland, Ohio
G. SCHIRMER MUSIC CO.
43-45 The Arcade

Philadelphia, Pa.
WALNUT MUSIC SHOP
1118 Walnut Street

H. ROYER SMITH CO.
10th and Walnut Streets

Milwaukee 2, Wisconsin
HELEN GUNNIS MUSIC SHOP
630 North Broadway

Charleston, W. Va.
GALPERIN MUSIC CO.
17 Capitol Street

INDICES

The American Record Guide

INDEX — Vol. 16, 35c
INDEX — Vol. 15, 25c
INDEX — Vol. 14, 25c
INDEX — Vol. 13, 20c
INDEX — Vol. 12, 20c
INDEX — Vol. 11, 15c
INDEX — Vol. 10, 15c
INDEX — Vol. 9, 15c
INDEX — Vol. 8, 20c
INDEX — Vol. 7, 20c

Send stamps or money order
Write for prices of back copies still in print.
Index to Vol. 16, ready in March.

ENRICO
CARUSO

A LIMITED EDITION

OF

HIS RARE
ORIGINAL
RECORDINGS
1902 to 1920

AVAILABLE EXCLUSIVELY FROM

ADDISON FOSTER

1226 Montgomery Avenue
Narberth, Pennsylvania

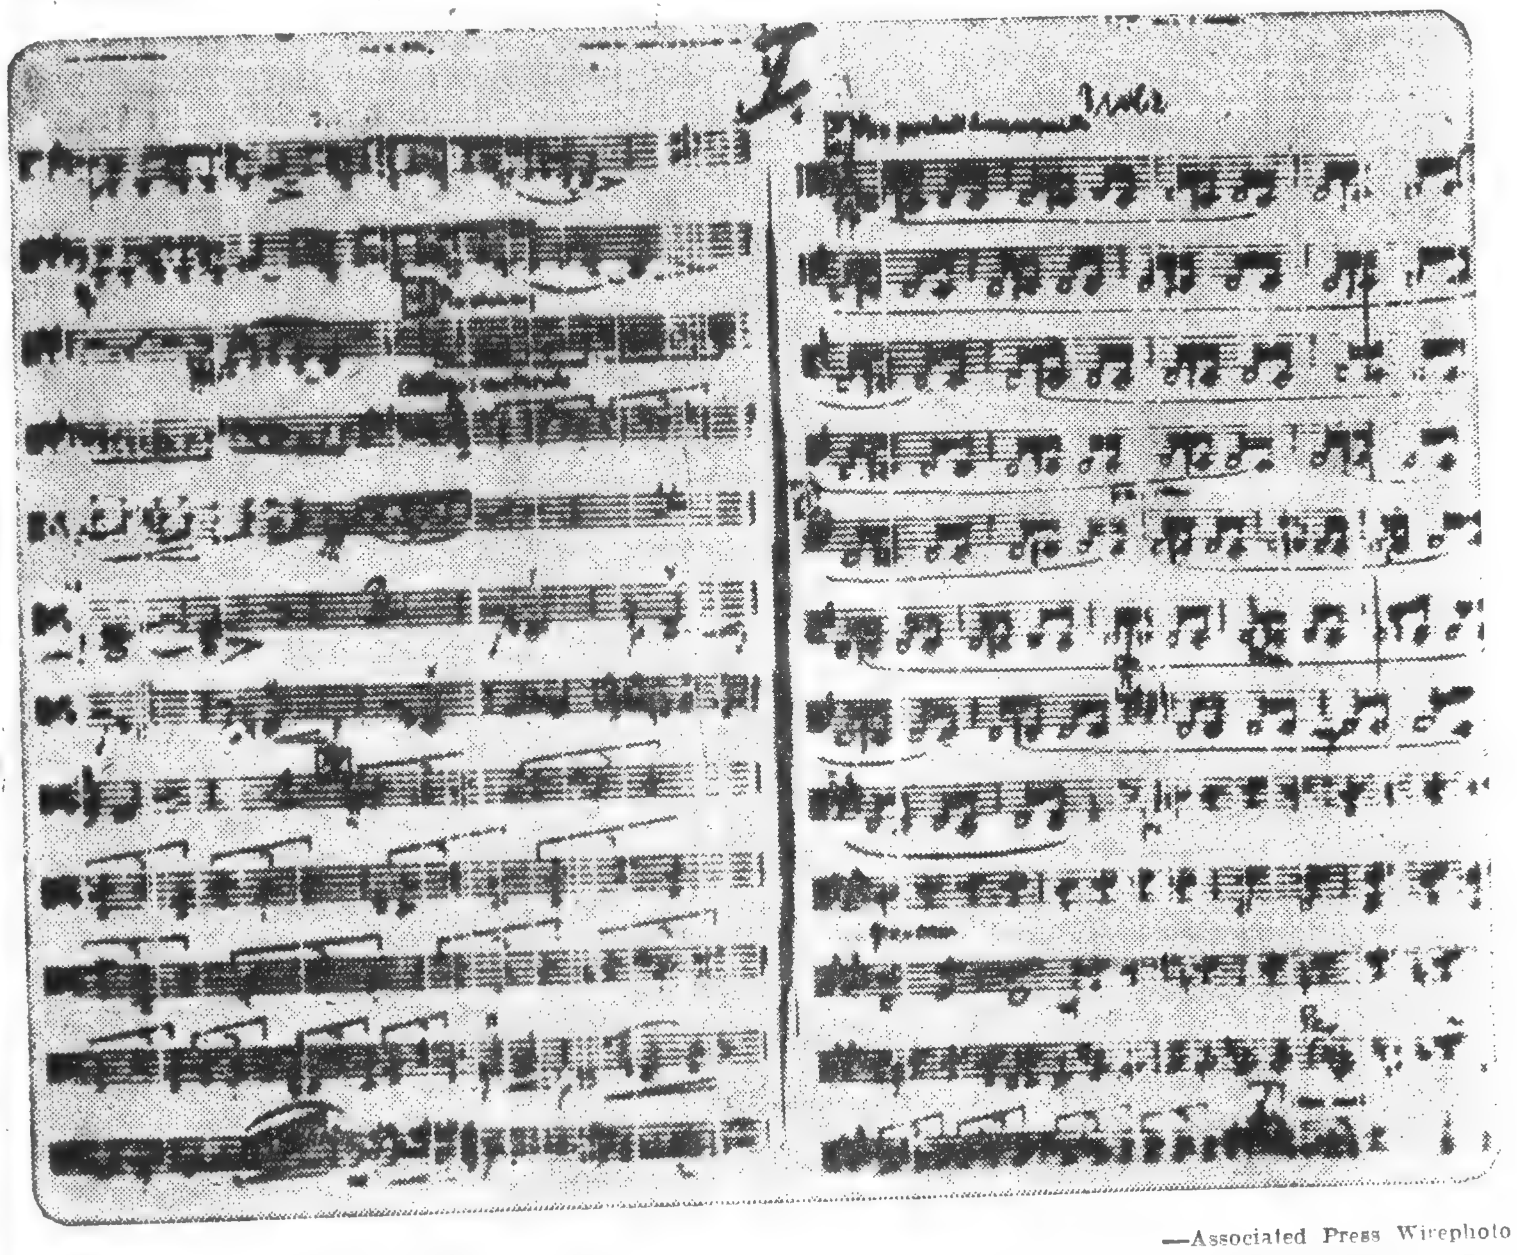
DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 29 1937

98

Transatlantic Radio Saves Symphony Concert



—Associated Press Wirephoto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was scheduled to play the American premiere of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire" Friday night. Conductor Serge Koussevitsky learned that parts of the score had been lost in shipment from Germany. The missing parts were sent by radio from London to New York Tuesday, in time for rehearsal for Friday's concert. Here are shown sheets of the radioed viola part.

* * *

Radio Rushes to Rescue as Symphony Goes Astray

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—(AP)—Radio was called upon Tuesday to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, received the score by radio transmission.

Breitkoph & Haertel, Leipsig music publishers sent the score to New York, where it was picked up and rushed to Boston.

Two packages were mailed from Leipsig Nov. 18, but only one was received. This contained only separate orchestral parts. Failure to receive the complete score already had caused Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, to rearrange the Friday program.

Symphony officials had expressed the fear that the only copy of the unpublished manuscript had been shipped, but when advised of the radio transmission, they realized this was not the fact. Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Sibelius, regarded as Finland's national composer, recently observed his seventy-second birthday. His "Origin of Fire" never has been heard in America.

Four sheets of the score were transmitted at a time. In all, 14 pages of the original were transmitted.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 2

Pictures of Lost Musical Score to Be Sent Across Atlantic by Radio Photo

Transmission of "Origin of Fire" to Begin Immediately Between Germany and New York — Score to Be Heard in Boston Friday

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
DEC 28 1937

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Package Goes Astray

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Two packages were mailed from Leipsig Nov. 18, but only one was received. This contained only separate orchestral parts. Failure to receive the complete score already had caused Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, to rearrange the Friday program.

"Desperate Emergency"

Symphony officials had expressed the fear that the only copy of the unpublished manuscript had been shipped, but when advised of the radio transmission they realized this was not the fact. Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Sibelius, regarded as Finland's na-

Score by Jan Sibelius Vanishes on Sea Trip

Boston, Dec. 27 (AP).—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE
DEC 28 1937

Manuscript Lost

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston symphony orchestra official disclosed Monday.

MOSCOW, IDAHO
STAR - MIRROR
DEC 2

RADIO PICTURES WHEN MAIL FAILS

BOSTON (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
DEC 28 1937

Original Sibelius Score Lost From Ship En Route To U. S.

Manuscript Of "Origin Of Fire," Written In 1902, May Be Only Copy Existing

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Dec. 27—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18 in time to catch the liner Europa. John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator, said.

"It is unlikely the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

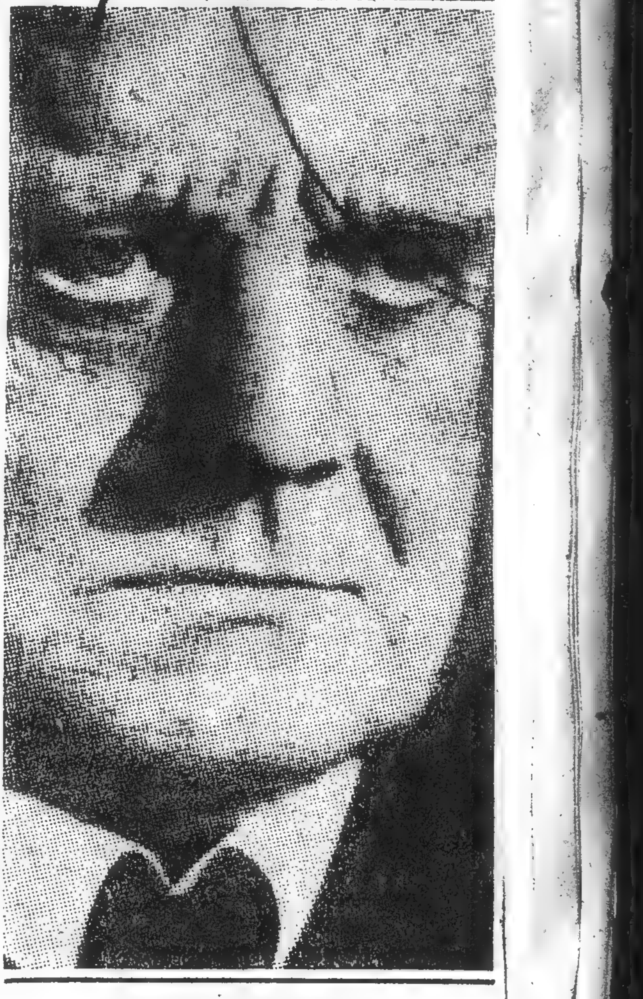
Sibelius has left several of his great works unpublished, Burk said, among them the Kullervo Symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a comparatively short piece, requiring only ten minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic. the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha." Burk said he doubted that Breitkopf & Haertel, the Leipzig publishers, made a copy.

REICH RADIOPHOTO SENDS LOST SIBELIUS TO BOSTON

Trans. Dec. 28/37

Symphony May Get Missing Score in Time for Friday Concert



JEAN SIBELIUS

With the help of transatlantic radio - photo transmission, the Boston Symphony Orchestra hopes to be able to procure the missing parts of the Sibelius manuscript score in time for the Friday afternoon concert, at which the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus of fifty-five members will sing.

Breitkopf and Haertel, Sibelius's Leipzig music publishers have notified Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, that photographic radio transmission of the score would begin immediately. Radio pictures of the unpublished manuscript score of "The Birth of Fire," are being flashed to the Associated Music Publishers, New York agents of the Leipzig firm.

As soon as the last of the pictures arrive in New York, they will be rushed here by train, it being impossible to use a plane because of bad weather conditions.

Once the radio pictures of the full score of the choral-symphonic composition and the string parts come to Symphony Hall, they will be enlarged and copies made for the various members of the orchestra. It will be necessary to employ extra people in order to have the complete score arranged in time for rehearsal before the week-end concert.

It would be impossible to re-

Continued on Page 2—Column 3

Radiophoto Sends Lost Sibelius Here

Continued from Page One

construct a satisfactory arrangement of the missing manuscript score, Leslie Rogers, librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today.

The manuscript was one of two packages mailed to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony, by Sibelius's publishers in Leipzig. One package, containing fragments of the voice and orchestral parts, arrived safely and on time, two weeks ago.

Contained Full Score

The lost package contained most of the string parts and the full score. The one that arrived contained wind and first violin parts. Some sort of reconstruction could be made from the parts that arrived plus piano arrangement, which Martti Turenen, the visiting Finnish conductor, possesses.

The resultant arrangement would be only a guess, so far as Sibelius's own writing for the strings is concerned. Sibelius, Mr. Rogers reminds, has his own individual way of treating the strings. A first class orchestra like the Boston Symphony would not consider venturing such a reconstruction in public concert, even though it might sound well.

Both the score and parts of the missing composition are in manuscript and not duplicated, as far as Mr. Rogers knows. The unpublished work was written in 1902 and although received with success in Europe has never been played in America.

The Helsinki chorus and its conductor were welcomed here by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. W. Woodworth of the Harvard Glee Club. The members will be guests of the Harvard Glee Club during their stay in Boston, and are making their headquarters at Lowell House, Harvard, occupying rooms vacated by glee club members on vacation this week.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
DEC 2 1937

SIBELIUS SCORE LOST

Work of Famous Composer Vanishes While in Mails.

Special to the BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

BOSTON, Dec. 28. — Postal authorities were called on today to aid in the search for the manuscript of a choral symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, after Boston Symphony orchestra authorities revealed the work had disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," was written in 1902 and was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Helsingfors university chorus.

Two packages, one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts, were mailed from Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18. The package containing the parts arrived about two weeks ago, but the complete score is still missing.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
DEC 28 1937

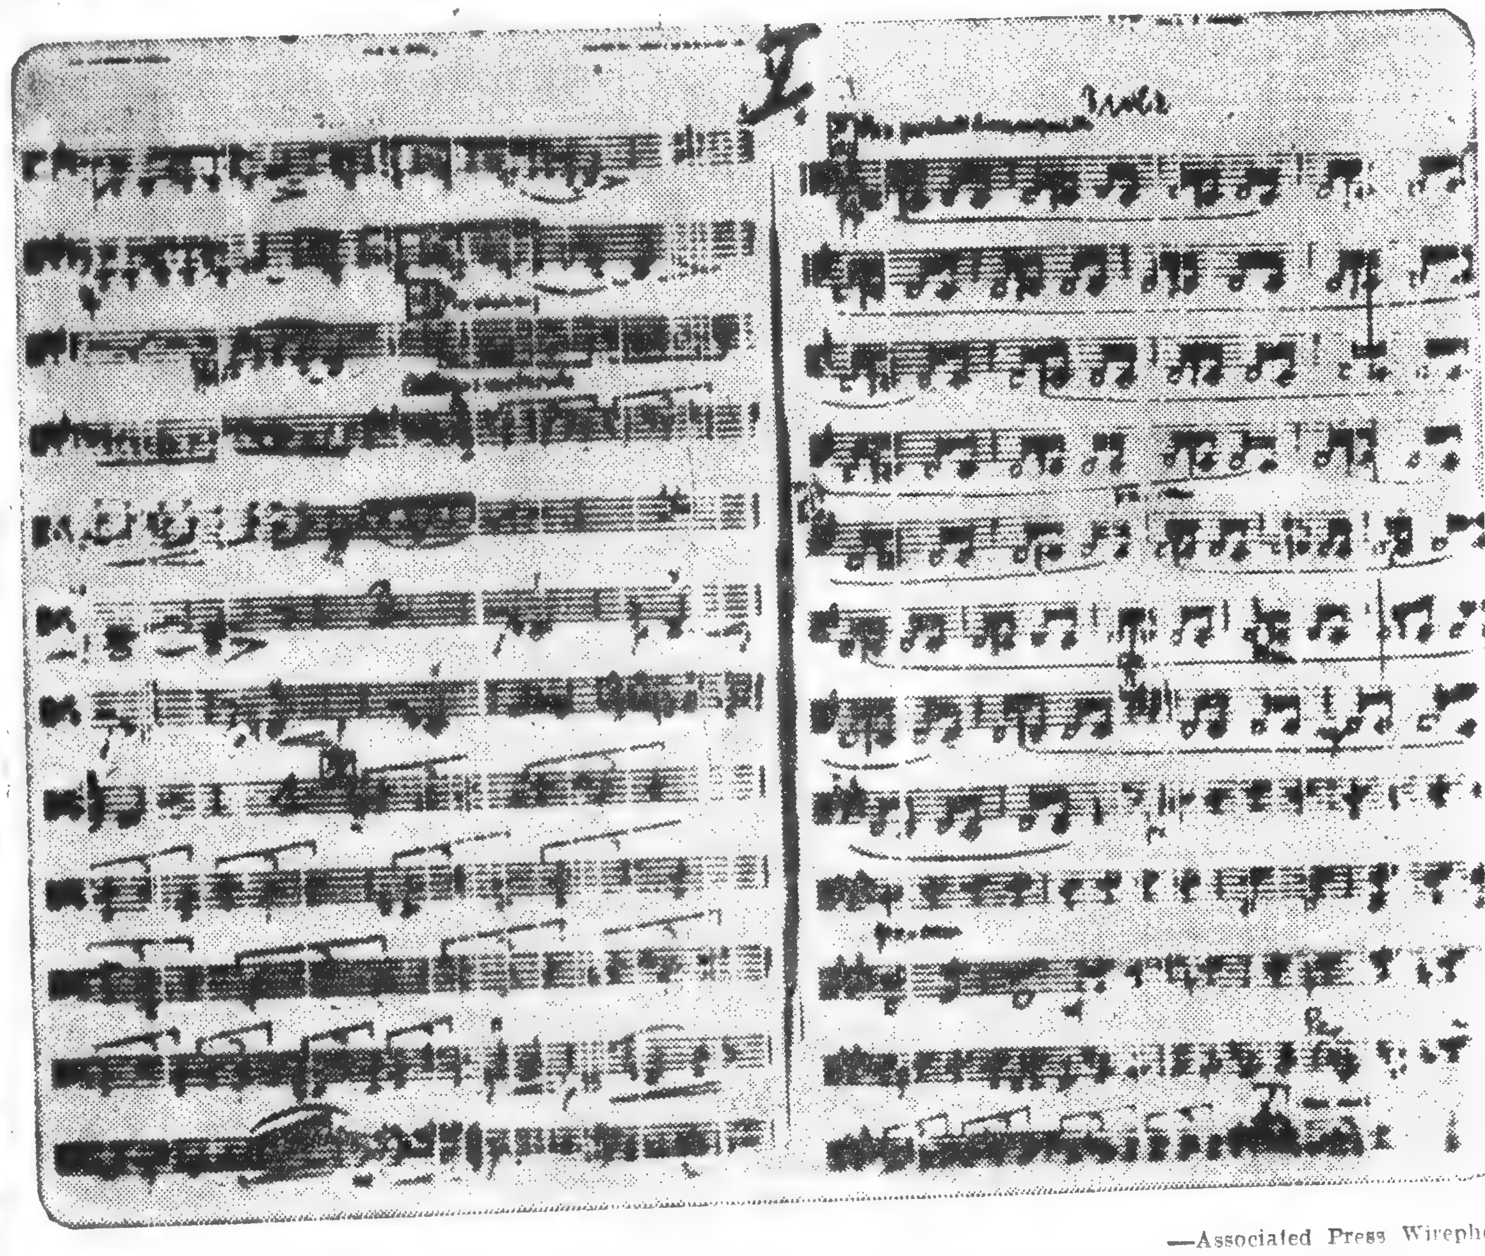
POSTAL inspectors sought in Boston today to solve the mysterious disappearance of the original manuscript of "The Origin of Fire," an early unpublished work of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius. Mailed at Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa to America, the manuscript vanished enroute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which with the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus was to give the work its first American performance Friday. Another package mailed at the same time and containing some of the choral and instrumental parts, was received nearly two weeks ago.

98

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 29 1937

Transatlantic Radio Saves Symphony Concert



—Associated Press Wirephoto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was scheduled to play the American premiere of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire" Friday night. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky learned that parts of the score had been lost in shipment from Germany. The missing parts were sent by radio from London to New York Tuesday, in time for rehearsal for Friday's concert. Here are shown sheets of the radioed viola part.

* * *

Radio Rushes to Rescue as Symphony Goes Astray

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—(AP)—Radio was called upon Tuesday to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, received the score by radio transmission.

Breitkoph & Haertel, Leipsig music publishers sent the score to New York, where it was picked up and rushed to Boston.

Two packages were mailed from Leipsig Nov. 18, but only one was received. This contained only separate orchestral parts. Failure to receive the complete score already had caused Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, to rearrange the Friday program.

Symphony officials had expressed the fear that the only copy of the unpublished manuscript had been shipped, but when advised of the radio transmission, they realized this was not the fact. Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Sibelius, regarded as Finland's national composer, recently observed his seventy-second birthday. His "Origin of Fire" never has been heard in America.

Four sheets of the score were transmitted at a time. In all, 14 pages of the original were transmitted.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

DEC 2

Pictures of Lost Musical Score to Be Sent Across Atlantic by Radio Photo

Transmission of "Origin of Fire" to Begin Immediately Between Germany and New York — Score to Be Heard in Boston Friday

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 28 1937

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Package Goes Astray

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Two packages were mailed from Leipsig Nov. 18, but only one was received. This contained only separate orchestral parts. Failure to receive the complete score already had caused Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, to rearrange the Friday program.

"Desperate Emergency"

Symphony officials had expressed the fear that the only copy of the unpublished manuscript had been shipped, but when advised of the radio transmission they realized this was not the fact. Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Sibelius, regarded as Finland's national composer, recently observed his 72d birthday. His "Origin of Fire" never has been heard in America.

Orchestra officials said four sheets of the score, reduced to a page 8½ by 11 inches, would be transmitted at a time. In all, 14 pages of the original must be transmitted, they said. Upon receipt, they explained, the miniatures must be enlarged to conventional size and sufficient copies made to accommodate the orchestra.

Score by Jan Sibelius Vanishes on Sea Trip

Boston, Dec. 27 (AP).—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

DEC 28 1937

Manuscript Lost

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston symphony orchestra official disclosed Monday.

MOSCOW, IDAHO
STAR - MIRROR

DEC 2

RADIO PICTURES WHEN MAIL FAILS

BOSTON (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

DEC 28 1937

Original Sibelius Score Lost From Ship En Route To U. S.

Manuscript Of "Origin Of Fire," Written In 1902, May Be Only Copy Existing

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Dec. 27—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator, said.

"It is unlikely the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

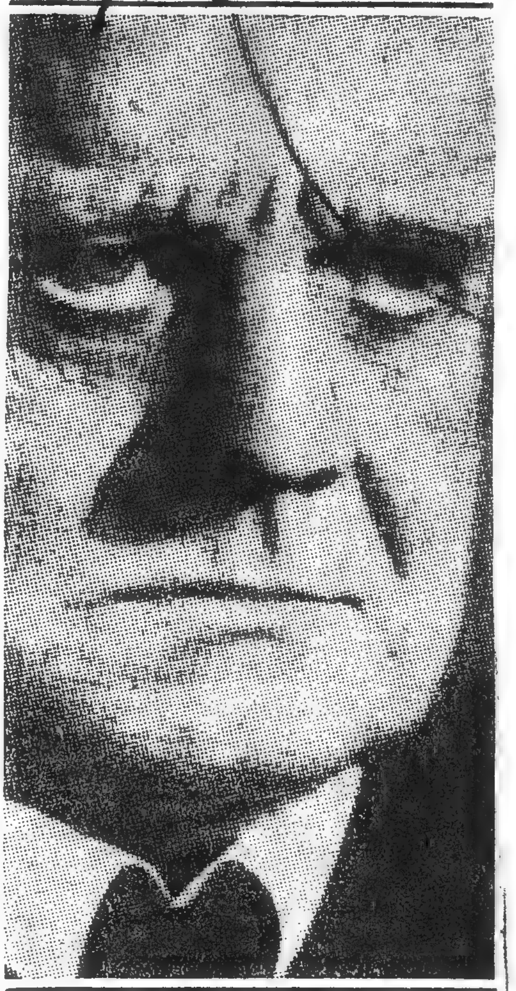
Sibelius has left several of his great works unpublished, Burk said, among them the Kullervo Symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a comparatively short piece, requiring only ten minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic, the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha." Burk said he doubted that Breitkopf & Haertel, the Leipzig publishers, made a copy.

REICH RADIOPHOTO SENDS LOST SIBELIUS TO BOSTON

Tran. Dec. 28/37

Symphony May Get Missing Score in Time for Friday Concert



JEAN SIBELIUS

With the help of transatlantic radio-photo transmission, the Boston Symphony Orchestra hopes to be able to procure the missing parts of the Sibelius manuscript score in time for the Friday afternoon concert, at which the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus of fifty-five members will sing.

Breitkopf and Haertel, Sibelius's Leipzig music publishers have notified Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, that photographic radio transmission of the score would begin immediately. Radio pictures of the unpublished manuscript score of "The Birth of Fire," are being flashed to the Associated Music Publishers, New York agents of the Leipzig firm.

As soon as the last of the pictures arrive in New York, they will be rushed here by train, it being impossible to use a plane because of bad weather conditions.

Once the radio pictures of the full score of the choral-symphonic composition and the string parts come to Symphony Hall, they will be enlarged and copies made for the various members of the orchestra. It will be necessary to employ extra people in order to have the complete score arranged in time for rehearsal before the week-end concert.

It would be impossible to re-

Continued on Page 2—Column 3

Radiophoto Sends Lost Sibelius Here

Continued from Page One

construct a satisfactory arrangement of the missing manuscript score, Leslie Rogers, librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today.

The manuscript was one of two packages mailed to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony, by Sibelius's publishers in Leipzig. One package, containing fragments of the voice and orchestral parts, arrived safely and on time, two weeks ago.

Contained Full Score

The lost package contained most of the string parts and the full score. The one that arrived contained wind and first violin parts. Some sort of reconstruction could be made from the parts that arrived plus piano arrangement, which Martti Turenen, the visiting Finnish conductor, possesses.

The resultant arrangement would be only a guess, so far as Sibelius's own writing for the strings is concerned. Sibelius, Mr. Rogers reminds, has his own individual way of treating the strings. A first class orchestra like the Boston Symphony would not consider venturing such a reconstruction in public concert, even though it might sound well.

Both the score and parts of the missing composition are in manuscript and not duplicated, as far as Mr. Rogers knows. The unpublished work was written in 1902 and although received with success in Europe has never been played in America.

The Helsinki chorus and its conductor were welcomed here by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. W. Woodworth of the Harvard Glee Club. The members will be guests of the Harvard Glee Club during their stay in Boston, and are making their headquarters at Lowell House, Harvard, occupying rooms vacated by glee club members on vacation this week.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

DEC 28 1937

POSTAL inspectors sought in Boston today to solve the mysterious disappearance of the original manuscript of "The Origin of Fire," an early unpublished work of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius. Mailed at Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa to America, the manuscript vanished enroute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which with the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus was to give the work its first American performance Friday. Another package mailed at the same time and containing some of the choral and instrumental parts, was received nearly two weeks ago.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 2 [illegible] 1937

SIBELIUS SCORE LOST

Work of Famous Composer Vanishes While in Mails.

Special to the BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

BOSTON, Dec. 28. — Postal authorities were called on today to aid in the search for the manuscript of a choral symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, after Boston Symphony orchestra authorities revealed the work had disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," was written in 1902 and was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Helsingfors university chorus.

Two packages, one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts, were mailed from Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18. The package containing the parts arrived about two weeks ago, but the complete score is still missing.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
DEC 29 1937

Radio Composition Across Atlantic

Boston, Mass., Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston Symphony Orchestra official said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on Nov. 18 by the musical publishers.

Other Parts Arrive Safely.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained.

The pictures were received in New York early tonight and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER
DEC 29 1937

Musical Score—

Spans Ocean

By Radio-Photo

BOSTON, MASS. (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-

WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
DEC 29 1937

Missing Parts, Choral Symphony Are Radioed

Arrive In Time For Use In Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 28—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS
DEC 29 1937

Radio Missing Symphony Parts Across Atlantic

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish com-

---

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER - PRESS
DEC 29 1937

Sibelius Score Goes By Radio Over Ocean

Boston, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD - TIMES
DEC 29 1937

SYMPHONIC SCORE IS SENT BY RADIO

Picture of Composition Then Sped to Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (AP)—In what was believed the first case of its kind, missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer, were radioed to New York from Berlin and sped here today aboard an early train.

The composition, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, was lost after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18 by the musical publishers.

A second package, containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived in Boston two weeks ago. The missing parts—for cello, viola and bass viol, vanished with what was believed to be the original manuscript of "Origin of Fire."

MARQUETTE, MICH.
MINING JOURNAL
DEC [illegible] 1937

Musical Score Sent by Radio

Parts of Sibelius' "Origin Of Fire" Transmitted Across Atlantic.

BOSTON, Dec. 28—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

Music Score Lost In Mail Duplicated With Oceanic Radio

Boston, Dec. 28 (UP)—Lost in the mails enroute from Germany to the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, a music score was duplicated by transoceanic radio photography today for the first time in history.

"Origin of Fire," unpublished and little-known score written by Finnish Composer Jan Sibelius in 1902, will arrive here tomorrow for its American premier Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

At New York the radioed transcription was completed late today. It was transmitted four pages at a time on 8 by 11 inch paper from Germany to the Associated Music Publishers. On arrival here the 14-page score will be enlarged and distributed to the orchestra.

MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD
DEC 28 1937

SCORE OF SYMPHONY SENT OVER RADIO

Orchestration Lost In Mail; Original Photographed In Germany, Sent To N. Y.

Boston, Dec. 28—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for

---

FRANKFORT, KY.
STATE JOURNAL
DEC 29 1937

RADIO MISSING PARTS

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
DEC 28 1937

Fear Valuable Symphonic Score Has Been Lost

Work of Finnish Composer Disappears En Route From Europe

BOSTON, Dec. 27—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany on Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator said.

The package containing the parts arrived "about two weeks ago," but the complete score hasn't turned up yet, and postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

"It is unlikely the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

He deprecated the theory the score may have been delayed in the Christmas mailing rush by pointing to the fact that the other package had arrived on time. It would be impossible to estimate its financial value, he said.

The strange disappearance forced Conductor Serge Koussevitzky to substitute another Sibelius Choral work for Friday's concert, which will open the Helsinki Chorus' American tour. Koussevitzky has been described by the composer as one of his outstanding interpreters, along with Werner Janssen, of the Baltimore symphony, and Sir Thomas Beecham, English conductor.

Sibelius has left several of his great works unpublished, Burk said, among them the Kullervo symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a comparatively short piece, requiring only ten minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic, the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha." Burk said he doubted that Breitkopf and Haertel, the Leipzig publishers, made a copy.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 28 1937

SIBELIUS WORK HAS DISAPPEARED

Original Manuscript of Composer Lost Between Europe and Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
DEC 28 1937

SIBELIUS SCORE COMING BY RADIO

Boston Symphony to Get Lost Script by Airphotos.

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (A. P.).—Radio was called upon today to rescue the

---

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot
DEC 28 1937

Radio Used To Get Lost Music

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 28 1937

Orchestra To Get Sibelius Score by Radio

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue

LYNCHBURG, VA.
NEWS
DEC 28 1937

Fear Sibelius Score Is Los

Original And Possibly Onl Manuscript Of Early Choral-Symphonic Work

Package With Parts Arrives From Leipzig

But Complete Compositio Has Not Yet Turned Up; Investigation Asked

Boston, Dec. 27 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscrip

---

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 28 1937

Radio Will Rescue Lost Music Score

Original Went Astray in Mails—Photographic Transmission Across the Atlantic

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—AP—Radio was called upon today to rescue

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
DEC 28 1937

Symphonic Score Lost in Mail to Come by Radio

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for

---

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
DEC 29 193

Sibelius Score Rescued

Boston, Dec. 29 (A. P.).—Radio was called upon Monday to rescue

---

MISSOULA, MONT.
SENTINEL
DEC 28 1937

A LOST SCORE MEANS LITTLE IN YEAR 1937

Boston, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL
DEC 28 1937

WILL RADIO LOST SCORE OF MUSIC

Boston, Dec. 28 — (AP) — Radio was called upon today to rescue

---

RATON, N. M.
RANGE-GAZETTE
DEC 28 19

Use Radio to Get Orchestra Score Over Sea

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

BIDDLEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL
DEC 28 1937

RADIO RESCUES MUSICAL SCORE

Transmission Made by Wireless from Germany

Boston, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue

OTTAWA, ILL.
REPUBLICAN - TIMES
DEC 29 19

RADIO TO PROVIDE SCORE FOR CONCERT

BOSTON, Dec. 29—(AP)—Radio was called upon to rescue for the CORNING, N. Y.

LEADER
DEC 29 1937

Score Of New Symphony Radioed To U. S. After Copy Is Lost In Mail

BOSTON —(AP)— Radio was called upon today to rescue for

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
DEC 29 1937

Lost Symphony Score Radioed Across Ocean

BY UNITED PRESS

BOSTON, Dec. 29—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius Symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train today.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitsky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, today and tomorrow, since the Helsinki university chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians later today.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A., took a total of more than 12 hours. Radio transmission alone required eight hours and cost about $800.

When Koussevitzky showed the first two enlarged sheets of the radioed music to the orchestra at its morning rehearsal, players said they could read every note, though with some difficulty. Koussevitzky was assured that clarifying processes would make the music perfectly legible for tomorrow morning's rehearsal.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
DEC 29 1937

Sibeliu's Score In Boston After Mail Loss Is Discovered

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (U.P.). — The lost score of a Jan Sibelius sym-

---

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 29 1937

SYMPHONY SCORE IN NOVEL PROCESS

By United Press

BOSTON, Dec. 29 — The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 2[illegible] 1937

Lost Symphony Crosses Atlantic By Radio Waves

Boston—(UP)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by

---

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 2[illegible] 1937

LOST MUSICAL SCORE TO COME BY RADIO

Boston Symphony Orchestra Sends Out SOS

BOSTON (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston

---

ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL
DEC 28 1937

RADIO RESCUES LOST SCORE

Symphonic Script Will Be Radioed and Photographed to Replace That Lost in Mails.

Boston, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while enroute from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Two packages were mailed from Leipsig Nov. 18, but only one was received. This contained only separate orchestra parts. Failure to receive the complete score already had caused Serge Koussevitsky, director of the orchestra, to rearrange the Friday program.

Symphony officials had expressed the fear that the only copy of the unpublished manuscript had been shipped, but when advised of the radio transmission they realized this was not the fact. Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Sibelius, regarded as Finland's national composer, recently observed his 72d birthday. His "Origin of Fire" never has been heard in America.

Orchestra officials said four sheets of the score, reduced to a page 8½ by 11 inches, would be transmitted at a time. In all, 14 pages of the original must be transmitted, they said. Upon receipt, they explained, the miniatures must be enlarged to conventional size and sufficient copies made to accommodate the orchestra.

LOCKHAVEN, PA.
EXPRESS
DEC 28 1937

Radio Saves Musical Crisis

BOSTON (AP)—Radio was called upon to rescue for the Boston

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS
[illegible]

Boston Symphony to Get Music Score Over Radio

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon to day to rescue for

---

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
DEC 28 1937

Choral-Symphonic Score Lost In Mail

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
DEC 28 1937

To Radio Picture Of Lost Score

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW
DEC 29 1937

LOST SYMPHONY COMES BY RADIO

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
DEC 2[illegible]

Copy of Lost Score Hurried by Radio From German City

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP).—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

BLOOMINGTON, IND.
EVENING WORLD
DEC 28 1937

Radio Called On To Rescue Music Lost In The Mails

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP) — Radio was called upon today to rescue

---

WASHINGTON, IND.
HERALD
DEC 28 1937

Send Music Score by Photographic Radio

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 28 1937

RADIO TO AID SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for

---

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 28 [illegible]

"Origin of Fire"

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP) Radio was

ELLWOOD CITY, PA.,
LEDGER
DEC 28 193[illegible]

Radio to Rescue Missing Symphony

BOSTON. (AP) — Radio was called upon today to rescue for

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
[illegible] 28 1937

Radio to Bring Score of Music Lost in Mails

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—Radio was called on today to rescue for the Bos-

---

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER
DEC 28 1937

RADIO TO PROVIDE SYMPHONY'S SCORE

Pictures of Sheets Lost in Mail to Be Flashed From Germany

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
DEC 29 1937

SYMPHONY PARTS RADIOED TO U. S.

Feat Will Allow Sibelius Work to Be Presented As Planned.

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston Symphony orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola, and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers.

The second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provided the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
[illegible]

Lost Symphony Parts Radioed Across Ocean

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
[illegible]

PARTS SENT BY RADIO

Jan Sibelius Choral to Be Presented on Friday Afternoon.

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (AP).—Missing parts of an early choral-sym-

UTICA, N. Y.
PRESS
[illegible]

Sibelius Score Sent Over Ocean by Radio

Boston —(AP)— Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by

---

LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD
[illegible]

Symphony's Missing Parts Radioed Across Atlantic

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

MONMOUTH, ILL.
REVIEW ATLAS
DEC 28 1937

Musical Score From Leipsig to Boston by Photographic Radio

Boston, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
DEC 28 1937

Sibelius Manuscript Disappears in Mail

Boston, Dec. 28 (UP)—Postal inspectors sought today to solve

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 28 1937

100

SIBELIUS SCORE LOST ON ATLANTIC VOYAGE

Manuscript of 'Origin of Fire' Vanishes on Way to Boston for Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP).—The original manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and well received in Europe, was to have been given on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus.

Two packages, one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts, were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig on Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator said.

The package containing the parts arrived "about two weeks ago," but the complete score has not turned up yet, and postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

"It is unlikely that the package fell into the ocean," Mr. Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility that the score may be lost forever."

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a comparatively short piece, requiring only ten minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic, the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha."

The loss of the original manuscript of Sibelius would be a sad one, but there is nothing to prevent a new copy of the score of this short work being made from the instrumental parts for the Boston and New York performances of the orchestra.

ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION
DEC 28 193[illegible]

Sibelius' Score Vanishes on Way To United States

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Composer's Manuscript Disappears in Mail

Boston, Dec. 27.—(AP.)—The original and possibly the only man-

---

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER
DEC 28 1937

Original Manuscript of Symphonic Score Missing

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript

---

QUINCY, ILL.
HERALD - WHIG
DEC 28 1937

FINN COMPOSER'S WORK DISAPPEARS

Boston, Dec. 28—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of

---

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE - DEMOCRAT
[illegible] 1937

Missing Music Parts Radioed Across Sea

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, MASS., December 28.—Missing parts of the early choral

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

DEC 28 1937

Unpublished Work by Sibelius Is Lost

Original Vanishes En Route from Europe to U.S.

BOSTON, Dec. 27—(A. P.)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's annotator said.

The package containing the parts arrived about two weeks ago, but the complete score hasn't turned up yet, and postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

"It is unlikely that the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

ELKART, IND.
TRUTH

DEC 28 1937

W. Dunworth, in Elkhart.

SIBELIUS MANUSCRIPT DISAPPEARS ON LINER

BOSTON: (UP) An original manuscript of a musical com-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

DEC 28 1937

SIBELIUS WORK VANISHES IN MAII

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (UP).—The original manuscript of "The Origi of Fire," an early unpublished worl

---

PORT JERVIS, N. Y.
UNION GAZETTE

DEC 29 1937

ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT OF SYMPHONY VANISHES

Boston, (AP).—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 28 1937

Sibelius Manuscript Disappears in Mails

Boston, Dec. 28 (U.P.)—The original manuscript of "The Origin of

---

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

DEC 28 1937

Valuable Music Works Lost

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (INS)—Postal officials today were on the trail of a

---

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

DEC 28 1937

FINNISH COMPOSER'S SCORE LOST IN MAIL

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manu-

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 28 1937

Composer's Valuable Manuscript Lost Between Europe and Boston

Boston, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston. a Boston symphony orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work. "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator said.

The package containing the parts arrived "about two weeks ago," but the complete score hasn't turned up yet, and postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

"It is unlikely the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

He deprecated the theory the score may have been delayed in the Christmas mailing rush by pointing to the fact that the other package had arrived on time. It would be impossible to estimate its financial value, he said.

The strange disappearance forced Conductor. Serge Koussevitzky to substitute another Sibelious choral work for Friday's concert, which will open the Helsinki chorus's American tour. Koussevitzky has been described by the composer as one of his outstanding interpreters, along with Werner Janssen, of the Baltimore symphony, and Sir Thomas Beecham, English conductor.

Sibelius has left several of his great works unpublished, Burk said, among them the Kullervo symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a compartively short piece, requiring only 10 minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic, the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha." Burk said he doubted that Breitkope and Haertel, the Leipzig publishers, made a copy.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

DEC 28 1937

Original Choral-Symphonic Score Disappears En Route To America from Publisher

Work of Jan Sibelius, Finnish Composer, Mysteriously Missing from German Liner Europa — Was to Have Received First American Performance Friday

Boston, Dec. 27—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of

---

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 28 1937

ORIGINAL SCORE OF SIBELIUS CHORAL-SYMPHONY MISSING

Work By Celebrated Finnish Composer Was Sent From Europe For Presentation By Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manu-

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 28 1937

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

New 'Cellist Makes Successful Debut in Town Hall Recital — Sibelius Score Disappears En Route From Europe.

Score Missing

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of

---

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

Dec. 28/37

Symphony Score Vanishes Whi[illegible] On Way To America

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manu-

---

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

DEC 28 1937

Original Sibelius Score Lost Enroute to Boston

Symphonic Manuscript, Mailed in Germany, Fails to Arrive

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manu-

---

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

[illegible]

Music and The Drama

ORIGINAL AND PERHAPS ONLY SCRIPT OF SIBELIUS SYMPHONY FEARED LOST

Boston, Dec. 27-AP-The original and possibly the only manuscript

---

GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 28 1937

ORIGINAL SIBELIUS SCRIPT MAILED IN EUROPE, LOST

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral symphonic

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 28 1937

Original Sibelius Manuscript Disappears On Way to Boston

'Origin of Fire' Was to Have Been Given First U. S. Performance by Symphony

Boston, Dec. 27—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of

---

FINDLAY, O.
Republican Courier

DEC 28 1937

Missing Parts of Sibelius Music Radioed Across Atlantic to Permit Friday Performance in Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 28—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston symphony orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola and bass viol—of "origin of fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on Nov. 18, by the music publishers.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

[illegible]

ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT OF EARLY SIBELIUS SCORE LOST ON VOYAGE

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early 102

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 29 1937

Sibelius's Missing Symphony Parts Are Radioed Across Atlantic Ocean For First American Performance

Boston. Dec. 28.—(AP.) — Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic Ocean tonight, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts, for cello, viola and bass viol, of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

Four sheets, reduced to a page 8½ by 11 inches, were transmitted at one time, and will be reproduced and enlarged here for the musicians.

Joseph Mann, an orchestra player, and an expert copyist, will inspect and fill in any notes that may be blurred.

In New York, RCA Communications, Inc., described the procedure as "routine."

Symphony officials said arrival of the pictures tomorrow morning would leave "plenty of time" for rehearsal with the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus, which opens its American tour Friday, featuring the music of the Finnish master.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER - JOURNAL

1937

Lost Parts of Music Score Are Radioed Across Ocean

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphon-

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

DEC 29 1937

Missing Music of Sibelius Radioed Across Atlantic

Boston—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

DEC 29 1937

Lost Parts Of Sibelius Score Radioed To Boston Symphony

Photographic Transmission From Germany To Enable Orchestra To Present Work On Friday

[By the Ass

Boston, Dec. 28—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

DEC 29 1937

German Radiophoto Sends Lost Composition to U. S.

Pictures of Libelous Score Arrive in Time For Friday Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

DEC 29 1937

Music Score Radioed to U.S.

Boston, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of a Choral-symphonic

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 29 1937

Parts of Lost Sibelius Music Radioed From Europe To N. Y.

Copies of Missing Score From 'Origin of Fire' Will Arrive in Boston Tonight in Time For Symphony Rehearsal

Boston, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan

PORTLAND, ME.
NEWS

DEC 29 1937

Copy of Lost Sibelius Score Radiophotoed From Berlin

BOSTON, (UP)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius Symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrivede here by train today.

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

DEC 28 1937

Getting Lost Music Score By Radiophoto Across Sea

Boston Orchestra Thus Obtaining Copy Of Sibelius' "Origin Of Fire," Scheduled For Concert Friday But Missing In Ocean Mail

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 28 1937

Sibelius Scores Radioed Across Ocean Arrive for Use of Boston Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD - TIMES
DEC 28 1937

Finnish Composition Is Lost Enroute to Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (UP)—Postal inspectors sought today to solve the mysterious disappearance of

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

DEC 29 1937

Radio 'Carries the Mail'

Transmission of Sibelius Score Across Atlantic Rescues Symphony at Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Radio was called upon Tuesday to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra

---

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

DEC 1937

Orchestra To Get Lost Score From Germany Via Wireless

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (AP).—Wireless has been called upon to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sib-

---

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

DEC

Original Sibelius Score Is Lost on Way to Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 28, (UP)—Postal inspectors sought today to solve

---

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 28 1937

Koussevitzky Mourns Ravel

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today declared the "passing of Maurice Ravel is the passing of one of the most brilliant and colorful periods of orchestral composition."

"His loss is irremediable," said Koussevitzky. "I am too greatly shocked to express my feelings objectively for I have lost today a great and personal friend."

Ravel, visiting the United States about 10 years ago, was a guest conductor for Koussevitzky, directing some of his own compositions. Koussevitzky recently said Revel's greatest work was his "Daphnis and Chloe," an orchestral suite, which he declared established itself within Ravel's lifetime as a classic.

(103)

Sibelius Composition 'Saved' In Symphony Hall Melodrama

Monitor Dec. 29/37

The climax of an old-fashioned melodrama—the hero's arrival with the mortgage money just as the villain was foreclosing on the old homestead—was never more exciting than the atmosphere in Symphony Hall this morning as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky showed his players the first telephoto parts of a Sibelius composition which had been flashed to America just in the nick of time for Friday's concert.

Indeed, the whole chain of events since 11:30 yesterday morning when the words "pictures on the way" were radioed over the Atlantic have been in the very best Nick Carter tradition.

Necessity to use radio in this manner occurred when certain parts of an unpublished choral-orchestral work by Jan Sibelius, mailed from Germany on Nov. 18, failed to arrive. Their disappearance became doubly alarming when it was thought that no other copies existed. The work, "The Origin of Fire," will be given its American première on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki University Male Chorus of Finland, which opens its American concert tour in Boston.

The cable which told that the telephoto transmission was under way was sent by Breitkopf and Hartel, Sibelius' publishers, to their American representative, the Associated Music Publishers in New York. It has been learned since that the 14 pages of manuscript were sent over telephone wires to Berlin before they began their invisible transatlantic crossing.

At 3:30 yesterday afternoon, the photo division of RCA in New York received the message, "coming in." Slowly the rows of staves began to imprint themselves onto the photo printing machine. The original pages had been reduced so that four of them went on one page, 8½ by 11, for reasons of economy.

The transmission was completed at 11:25 p. m. last night, just seven hours and 55 minutes after it had been started. Karl Bauer, representative of the Associated Music Publishers, who had superintended the entire transmission, rushed for the midnight train to Boston. Mr. Bauer was met at Back Bay Station this morning by George E. Judd, Symphony manager, and together they roused a photostatic operator from bed and set him to planning the task of enlarging 14 pages of manuscript from their small 2½ x 3½ inch size by about four times. To eliminate all smudges and assure clear copies for the 32 musicians who will use the enlargements, Joseph Mann, member of the Boston Symphony trumpet section and an expert music copyist, will be in charge of retouching the pages.

It was thought at first that the music would be ready for this morning's 10 o'clock rehearsal, but Mr. Mann and the photoengraver did not begin work until almost noon. Everything will be in readiness for tomorrow's rehearsal.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
DEC 30 1937

Sibelius Score

Due to the inventive genius of modern scientists Boston music lovers will not be disappointed at the concert to be given Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Helsinki University male chorus. Plans to give the first American performance of Jan Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire" were tentatively postponed when it was learned that parts of the score had disappeared in mailing from Germany.

But George E. Judd, manager of the Boston orchestra, wrote the publishers in Leipzig asking that the missing parts be sent by radio photo. And the 14 pages were duly dispatched across the air waves.

These pages will be enlarged and sufficient copies made to supply the orchestra. The show will go on. If the loss of the manuscripts is permanent the cost will be great enough since they were originals and cannot be duplicated. But the music has not been lost and there will not even be any delay for the audience Friday.

The world is treated to one more drama of modern science.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 1 - 1938

MUSIC OF SIBELIUS PLAYED AT BOSTON

2 Choral Symphonic Works by Finnish Composer Heard for First Time in U. S.

BIG AUDIENCE APPLAUDS

Helsinki Chorus Open Its Tour With the Program—Serge Koussevitzky Directs

BOSTON, Dec. 31 (AP).—An American audience today heard for the first time two early choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete, "The Origin of Fire," for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra—was written in 1920 soon after his second symphony. The second Sibelius work, new to this country, was "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, which was warmly received by the capacity audience.

"The Origin of Fire" was sung by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance. An early baritone solo sung by Helge Virkkunen tells of the disappearance of light and how Ukko, lord of the gods, traversed heaven and earth in search of it.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, 'cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed Nov. 18. Fourteen pages of manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin and the facsimiles enlarged here in time for today's performance.

Serge Koussevitzky, who directed, used the choral score which provided the instrumental cues.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
JAN 2 - 1938

SYMPHONY SLATES 2 CHORAL WORKS

Two choral works by Jan Sibelius will have first New York hearings at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan 6. The Helsinski University Chorus of Finland will sing on this program. The program also lists Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter" and "Finlandia," Bach's third "Brandenburg" concerto and Brahms' third symphony. Emma Boynet, French pianist, will play the Mozart concerto in C (Koechel 467) with the orchestra on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 3.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD - TIMES
DEC 30 1937

MUSIC SENT BY AIR IS FOUND PERFECT

Sibelius' Symphony Is Ready for Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 30 (U.P.) Not an error was found today in the transoceanic radio duplication of the lost score of the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius' unpublished symphony "Origin of Fire."

"We are completely astonished," remarked Conductor Serge Koussevitsky after his Boston Symphony Orchestra had rehearsed the recreated work.

Thirty-two musicians, about one-third of the orchestra, used for music that which had been sent by radio photography from Berlin to New York after the original became lost in the mails. An expert copyist had labored throughout the night to put the duplicated score in order.

PLATTSBURG, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 30 1937

BOSTON, Dec. 29 — The score of a composition by Jan Sibelius is being made ready for rehearsal after a top-speed trip from Germany. The music was transmitted by radio photography. It will have its American premiere Friday night in a joint performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the chorus of Helsinki University of Finland.

The orchestra music of the unpublished work, which is called "Origin of Fire," was lost in the mails on the way from Germany. A copy was transmitted by telephone from Leipsig to Berlin and by radio to New York, and then to Boston by train.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 30 1937

Ravel—Artist

WE HAVE HAD great musicians in our own time, some possibly as great as any that have gone before, for who need mourn the lost past when he has been privileged to hear Paderewski or Kreisler, Gadski or Ponselle or any of the other [illegible] so familiar to millions? And we have had composers of vast merit even if they did not rank with the greatest masters of [illegible] days. We have had Maurice Ravel who [illegible] passed on, and for the beauty [illegible] he gave to the world the [illegible] ful.

Many [illegible] have been told of this Frenchman, his personality, his satirical outlook as at times expressed through his music, his approach to the life work which in his youth he adopted as his own. But none of these stories and comments are more convincing or revealing than a simple utterance from his own lips: "Of course, if I ever did a perfect piece of work I would stop composing immediately. One just tries, and when I have finished a composition I have tried all I can. It is no use attempting anything more in the same direction. One must seek new ideas."

He sought and found them and made those ideas speak. Perhaps "The Bolero" was not his greatest work but to millions of hearers it was the most alluring, attractive, conspicuous. In these days of Hollywood extravagance in written words we are surfeited with "glamour," and "thrill." But here is a work which could not properly be described without using those very words. It abounded in glamour and pulsated wth thrills.

No music lover who listened to its first performance in Providence by the Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky a few years ago will ever wholly forget it. It was new to almost everybody present; there was a curiosity concerning it, a suspense which was heightened as the composition proceeded in terms at first seemingly monotonous, the drums in the background throbbing, throbbing insistently and compelling attention. For the want of a better term the effect might be described as the excitement of monotony, producing a tenseness which was best revealed as the orchestra reached the end and the audience broke into a torrent of relieving applause.

We cannot have a Beethoven in every generation! there has been only one Shakespeare in all the generations. But we can appreciate what we have and that which we have lost. Ravel's death is a loss to the world of music. He has said: "I do not particularly care about this 'sincerity.' I try to make art." He did make art, because he was an artist.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
JAN 2 - 1938

ctures by Radio

Boston Symphony orchestra would deign to contrive publicity stunts—which presumably it would not—it could have been no better served in an impact on public attention than it has been served by the accidents of preparation for the latest pair of concerts. The orchestra was to perform a new work by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, and a chorus from Finland was to assist. This in itself was enough to arouse curiosity. But when rehearsals were begun it was found that certain parts of the orchestral score had been lost in the course of transportation from Germany. So it was arranged to have photographs of the missing parts transmitted across the ocean by radio. The parts were received on Wednesday, and, despite some difficulty in deciphering, were made ready by strenuous copying work in time for rehearsal the next day.

The world moves forward in the sphere of applied science, if not in some other respects, and getting pictures across the continent or across the ocean by air is now taken for granted. More, not less, imagination is needed than formerly to appreciate marvels of mechanism and communication that only one or two decades ago would have been incredible.

When Boston architects were preparing plans for the restoration of Williamsburg, Va., after a remarkable program of research and study, some fortunate searcher in the Bodleian library at Oxford university found an 18th-century copperplate engraving of the three most important Williamsburg buildings—the capitol, the royal governor's palace and the main building of William and Mary college. A picture was struck off at once, and, by means of radio, was received in a reproduction in a Boston drafting room a few hours later. William G. Perry, member of the architectural firm in charge of the Williamsburg project, has said that it would be interesting to know what the 18th-century engraver would have thought if he had been told that a picture from his plate could be reproduced on the other side of the Atlantic within a few hours. Incidentally it may be noted that the Bodleian library, with fine courtesy and in gracious recognition of the Williamsburg restoration, has presented this all-important plate to John D. Rockefeller, Jr., financial sponsor of the project, and he has placed it on exhibition at Williamsburg.

Yet the unknown 18th-century engraver would have had one advantage over people today. He would have employed his full imagination to grasp the wonder of the radio achievement as we no longer try to do because such things are everyday utilities.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
POST
DEC 29 1937

Duplicate Music Score by Radio

Boston, Dec. 29. (U.P.)—Lost in the mails en route from Germany to the Boston symphony orchestra here, a music score was duplicated by transoceanic radio photography for the first time in history.

"Origin of Fire", unpublished and little-known score written by Finnish composer Jan Sibelius in 1902, will arrive here today for its American premier Friday by the Boston symphony orchestra and Helsinki (Helsingfors) university chorus.

At New York the radioed transcription was completed late Tuesday. It was transmitted four pages at a time on 8 by 11-inch paper from Germany to the Associated Music Publishers. On arrival here the 14-page score will be enlarged and distributed to the orchestra.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER - JOURNAL
JAN 1 - 1938

Sibelius Pages Radioed Over Ocean to Boston

(Christian Science Monitor.)

Boston, Dec. 28.—When Dr. Serge Kousevitsky raises his baton for attention preparatory to conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Helsinki University Male Chorus through Jan Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire," Friday afternoon, few in the hushed Symphony Hall audience will realize that the performance of this number was made possible by the eleventh-hour dispatch of a radio-photo bearing some missing parts.

Today, while the chorus was rehearsing in the Common Room of Lowell House, Harvard, the radio-photo was being flashed from Leipzig, Germany, to New York. Thence it will be brought to Boston by train, rephotographed and enlarged and the parts copied. And, for what is believed the first time ever, parts of a musical score will have been transmitted by radio in this way.

Decision to use the radio, first suggested almost as a joke, was arrived at when a package of parts went astray in the mails, according to John N. Burk, symphony program annotator. Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from Sibelius' publishers, Breitkopf & Hartel, Leipzig, on November 18, in time to catch the Europa. One of the packages arrived, but the other did not. In fact, Dr. Koussevitsky had already planned to substitute another of Sibelius' choral-orchestral works for "The Origin of Fire" on his program.

As a last resort, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, yesterday telephoned Richard G. Appel of the Boston Public Library music department, asking if perchance the library had a copy of the work.

"No, we haven't," replied Mr. Appel, adding with a laugh, "I guess the only way you'll get it will be by radio-photo."

Mr. Judd didn't laugh. He sat right down and had the following wire sent to Breitkopf:

"Sibelius Ukko Ursprung Des Feuers parcel containing score viola cello and bass parts failed to arrive. Boston Symphony Concert with Finnish University Chorus this Thursday (the rehearsal) desperate situation. Send immediately greatest speed radio-photos of all pages missing parts not score. Pages to be reduced so that four will go on one 8x11 inches radio-photo."

Came the answer today:

"Sibelius radio-photos under way. Breitkopf & Hartel."

GREENWICH, CONN.
TIME

DEC 29 1937

Radio 'Rescues' Score Of Lost Sibelius Work

Original Manuscript of Symphony by Great Finnish Composer Vanishes In Mails Ennoute To Boston But Radio Photography Saves The Day

BOSTON, Dec. 29. (U.P.)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train today.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails enroute from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, today and tomorrow, since the Helsinki University Chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

Transmitted by Radio

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians later today.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A., took a total of more then 12 hours. Radio transmission alone required eight hours.

Enlarging, photo-copying and clarifying of the 14 pages of music will require an estimated five hours.

Special Representative Karl Bauer of the Associated Music Publishers, who witnessed the transmission in New York and brought the score here, estimated that a total of more than 3,000 notes in 1,000 measures were transmitted.

"Looked Like Chinese"

One operator handled the receipt simultaneously with transmission to Berlin of pictures of the Panay bombing and pictures on two other telephoto cylinders. The same man, he said, completed the entire processing, conversing through a sound track on one side of the cylinder with the Berlin operator, taking the cylinder into a dark room, developing the negatives and printing the positives.

The operator, Bauer said, thought the music "looked like Chinese."

So busy was the New York operator, Bauer said, that he had time to quote only the last sentence of his conversation with the Berlin operator:

"Happy New Year to you all."

MALDEN, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 30 1937

Lost Chords

KOUSSEVITZSKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra were all set to play the American premiere of "Origin of Fire" on Friday. The Helsinski University chorus, from the native Finland of the composer, Jean Sibelius, had arrived in Boston to sing to the accompaniment of the orchestra. But the music score was discovered to be lost in the Christmas mails. No copies being available in this country, "Origin of Fire" seemed to be outdoing Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Lost Chord" by losing all of its chords. The day was saved when some minor genius suggested that a copy of the music be wirelessed across the Atlantic from Finland, through the apparatus usually reserved for the transmission of radioed news photographs. It was reasonably argued that if this miraculous device could wireless pictures of news events, it could wireless a picture of a sheet of music as easily. Thus a novel use of the wonderful trans-Atlantic wireless has been discovered. But it would have been more fun, we feel, if the music had been sent across the water in its natural state; that is, if an orchestra in Finland had broadcast it to Boston. Then all the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with ears glued to the radio, could have written down the parts for their individual instruments as they were played. This would have been no simple matter, but it would have been interesting to see if our distinguished musicians could have untangled the Sibelius symphony, in which a score or two of instruments sometimes play in harmony at once, into neat little black notes on a sheet of music paper. We know that the Boston Symphony can translate written music into sound. But it is yet to be proved that they can translate sound into written music. At least the triangle player would have made the grade, in all probability. We have long remembered the old "Judge" cartoon in which this unassuming symphony player sat through an hour or two of concert with his triangle poised in mid-air, anxious to strike, finally getting in his single note for the afternoon just as the curtain fell.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR - TIMES

DEC 2 1937

Lost Score of Symphony Sent Across Sea by Radio Photography

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—(U. P.)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by trans-oceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train today.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitsky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, today and tomorrow, since the Helsinki University Chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipsig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½x11 inch paper to New York music publishers. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians later today.

Transmission from Leipsig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York took a total of more than twelve hours.

AUSTIN, MINN.
HERALD

DEC 28 1937

RADIO AIDS IN HUNT

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)—Radio was call-

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD - DISPATCH

DEC 28 1937

Original Sibelius Manuscript Believed Stolen From Mails

BOSTON, Dec. 27. (AP) — The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with acclaim in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus.

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on Nov. 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator said.

The package containing the parts arrived "about two weeks ago," but the complete score hasn't turned up yet, and postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

"It is unlikely the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

Sibelius has left several of his great works unpublished, Burk said, among them the Kullervo Symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a comparatively short piece, requiring only ten minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic, the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha." Burk said he doubted that Breitkopf and Haertel, the Leipzig publishers, made a copy.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
NEWS

DEC 29 1937

LOST MUSIC SCORE FOUND BY PHOTOS

By United Press

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by trans-oceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train today.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little known "Origin of Fire," was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston.

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time Transmission over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A., took a total of more than 12 hours.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Rare Sibelius Musical Score Feared Lost

Orchestra Piece Fails To Reach Boston From Leipzig Publishers.

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic

---

KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

A SIBELIUS WORK MISSING.

Manuscript Disappears While on the Way to Boston.

(By the Associated Press.)

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the

---

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

DEC 28 1937

SIBELIUS SCORE LOST

Original Copy Disappears in Mail

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-

---

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

Sibelius Symphonic Manuscript Disappears En Route to America

By the Asso

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—The original and possibly the only manuscript of

---

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

28 1937

Original Sibelius Score Disappears

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP)—The original and possibly the only manu-

---

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

DEC 28 1937

RADIO-PHOTO TO RESCUE OF OF SIBELIUS, MISSING IN

Pictures of Score To Be Sent Over Sea Via Ether.

BOSTON, December 28—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to res-

LARAMIE, WYO.
Republican & Boomerang

DEC 28 1937

Lost Music Score to Be Sent across Sea by Radiophoto

BOSTON, Dec. 28.— (AP) —Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
HERALD-EXPRESS

28 1937

Lost Music Score to Be Radioed

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

WALLACE IDAHO
PRESS-TIMES

DEC 28 193

RADIO SAVES DAY FOR ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

WATERTOWN, S. D .
PUBLIC OPINION

DEC 28 1937

Radio Called on to Aid Boston Symphony Group

Boston, Dec. 28—(AP)— Radio was called upon today to rescue for the

---

MANKATO, MINN.
FREE PRESS

DEC 2 193

RADIO USED TODAY TO RESCUE LOST ORCHESTRA MUSIC

Boston, December 29 (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for

---

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

To Radio Score

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony

---

OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES

DEC 28 1937

RADIO TO RESCUE SCORE FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orches-

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

DEC 29 1937

Missing Music Score Radioed Across Ocean

BOSTON, December 29 (A.P.)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean last night, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, November 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York and were taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

FULTON, KY.
LEADER

Lost Scores Of Symphony Are Radioed Across Ocean

Boston,—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelli-

---

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD - DISPATCH

DEC 28 1937

Lost Sibelius Choral Music Flashed To U. S. By Wireless

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-sym-

HENDERSON, KY.
EVENING JOURNAL

Lost Parts of Music Score Are Radioed Across Ocean

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphon-

---

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

DEC 29 1937

Missing Score Radioed From Publishers

String Arrangements Sent by Air from Germany

Boston, Dec. 28 — (AP) — Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

105

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

DEC 29 1937

SIBELIUS SCORE SENT BY RADIO

Missing Parts Flashed Across Ocean

(Special Correspondence)
BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

LINCOLN, NEB.
STATE JOURNAL

DEC 29 1937

SCORE RADIOED OVER OCEAN

Missing Parts of Sibelius Composition Transmitted.

BOSTON, (AP). Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sie-

---

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
GAZETTE

DEC 29 1937

Missing Parts of Music Score Radioed to U. S.

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish com-

---

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 29 1937

MISSING SCORE TO BE RADIOED TO U. S.

Parts of Finnish Composer's Work Sent to Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer Ja.

DENVER, COLO.
Rocky Mountain News

DEC 29 1937

Radio Saves Lost Chords

Missing Symphony Supplied Via Air

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish

---

JEFFERSON CITY, MO.
CAPITAL NEWS

DEC 29 1937

Missing Parts of Musical Piece Radioed Across Sea

BOSTON, Dec. 28—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish

---

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

1937

Lost Music Radioed

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

survivors.

KOUSSEVITZKY MOURNS PASSING OF M. RAVEL

BOSTON, Dec. 28-(AP)-Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today declared the "passing of Maurice Ravel is the passing of one of the most brilliant and colorful periods of orchestral composition."

"His loss is irremediable," said Koussevitzky. "I am too greatly shocked to express my feelings objectively for I have lost today a great and personal friend."

Ravel, visiting the United States about 10 years ago, was a guest conductor for Koussevitzky, directing some of his own compositions. Koussevitzky recently said Ravel's greatest work was his "Daphnis and Chloe," an orchestral suite, which he declared established itself within Ravel's lifetime as a classic.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Maurice Ravel

The great public that took "Bolero" to its heart, [illegible] that Maurice Ravel was a master of instrumentation. A smaller number, but still a large one, that had become familiar during the last thirty years with his other compositions, knew also that he was a poet of a rare kind.

No artist, whether he be musician or painter or novelist or architect, can wholly escape his national inheritance, no matter how objective, how absolute he attempts to be. Although Ravel never sought to do in music for France what Smetana did for Bohemia, what Moussorgsky did for Russia or what Sibelius does even now for Finland, was a Frenchman to the tips of his slender fingers, and he never sought to deny the qualities of his race. Wit was in his music, together with a shimmering, iridescent beauty. It had a grave dignity, as in the "Pavane for a Dead Infanta". It was touched with irony, as in "La Valse." It was rich in suggestive imagery, as in the "Rapsodie Espagnole". Finally, it had subtlety and finesse, combined with vividness of impact and splendor of color, best exemplified perhaps in "Daphnis and Chloe", which audiences in Hartford have been privileged to hear under the masterly hand of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The French have not given the world such titans of music as have their neighbors, the Germans. Yet they have produced some of the choicest artists of the musical world, men like Bizet, Chabrier, Franck and Debussy who, in their various ways, have demonstrated what refinements, what niceties, what richness and what eloquence the art of music can achieve. Certainly Maurice Ravel will not be counted least among them.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 29 1937

FESTIVAL PLAN STUDIED BY ENGINEER

Berkshire Music Pavilion Now Before Acoustics Specialist

The executive committee of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival was in Boston yesterday to secure approval of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for plans for the music pavilion at Tanglewood and today the plans are being studied by an acoustics engineer. If he gives his approval, contracts will be signed and ground broken next month for the construction.

Members of the Festival committee attending the conference yesterday were Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, the president; Norval H. Busey, vice president; Henry W. Dwight, treasurer; George W. Edman, clerk, and Joseph Franz, who will supervise the construction work for the Festival. The steel work, major item in the construction, will be handled by the Bethlehem Steel Company of which Quincy Bent, graduate of Williams College and a trustee of the college, is vice president. Bentley Wirt Warren, chairman of the orchestra board and senior trustee of Williams College, presided.

KENDALLVILLE, IND.
NEWS SUN

DEC 31 1937

STAR-SPANGLED JANGLE.

(Elkhart Truth)

A discordant controversy has again

Etc. as in below

ELKART, IND.
TRUTH

DEC 29 1937

Star-Spangled Jangle

A discordant controversy has again arisen about the suitability of the words and music of our national anthem, The Star-Spangled Banner.

Its sentiment doesn't please the extreme pacifists, and many feel that its music is in too high a key. But a "Key" wrote it—Francis Scott Key. When the British were making war on us, he was a prisoner on one of their ships which was bombarding Fort McHenry, near Baltimore. He rejoiced when he could see the Stars and Stripes still flying over the fort. They fly there still, and under them is a beautiful monument to Key.

Why shouldn't Key have rejoiced under such circumstances? He was happy that Americans were successfully defending themselves. But the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, of New York, a pronounced "liberal" and pacifist, thinks the anthem "celebrates war" and "breathes hatred." We can't see it.

Furthermore, Nino Martini, Metropolitan opera singer, says the song calls for an extraordinary range, even for an opera singer. Arthur Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony orchestra, proposes a "musical operation" on the anthem to make it less difficult for the average person to sing by changing it from a twelve note range to one of ten notes. But for himself, he feels that "The Star Spangled Banner is more heroic as it stands and is a real vocal challenge," for "if you have to fill your lungs to reach the high notes, why, so much the better."

The "drys" might also object when they learn that the music of the anthem was based on an old drinking song. In spite of all this jangle about it, it's a pretty good anthem.

While on the subject, it might not be amiss to suggest that much fault could be found with the Rev. Samuel Francis Smith's "America" which he wrote in 1832 to fit the air of the British national anthem, "God Save the King." The borrowed air is bad enough, but the words to it are worse. They are no proper description of America at all, and from the point of view of poetic merit, the less said about them the better.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

DEC 28 1937

AS TO THE NATIONAL ANTHEM

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra revives an old complaint, namely, the unsingableness, so to speak, of "The Star-Spangled Banner," for the average American. He wants to cut it down so as to bring it within the normal vocal range. But let us put his design on the national anthem in his own words: "The only thing you could do would be to change it from a twelve-note range to one of ten notes. As it is now, it runs through twelve notes from B flat to F. If it could be arranged from D to F, cutting off the two lower notes, you'd save the singer greater range. An octave and a third would make it much easier to sing."

Separating sentiment from reality, Mr. Fiedler speaks by the card. No man at least, save a gifted soloist, can go through "The Star-Spangled Banner" without a strain in the upper, or a hoarse mockery of vocalism in the lower, register. When big audiences are summoned to chant the anthem, they do well enough, since the deficiencies of one-half are made up by the choral reaches of the other. But no ordinary patriot has good luck when he tackles the national song alone. Another objection to "The Star-Spangled Banner" is that it is poorly adapted for marching purposes, however ambitious the brass band. Yet, with all its faults, we protest against any attempt to improve it by a musico-surgical operation.

We must note that with some people the anthem is unsatisfactory for other reasons than its difficult score. For example, the Rev. John Haynes Holmes of New York City criticized it last week "as exulting in bloodshed and the slaughter of our enemies." This is going back 123 years for an adverse argument. But no doubt the Rev. Mr. Holmes will be content with the music if somebody, let us say a Congressional committee, rewrites the words.

NEW YORK TIMES

12/29/37

16 L+

LOST CHORAL SCORE FACSIMILE RADIOED

Part of Sibelius Symphony Is Flashed From Berlin for Use on the Boston Program

SEVERAL HOURS ON WAY

Sheets Missing From Ocean Mail Reduced by Photography, Then Scanned by Beam

Part of the choral symphonic score of "Ukko, the Fire Maker," by Jean Sibelius, which was lost in the mails on the way from Germany, was flashed from Berlin by facsimile radio yesterday so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might present it in a concert on Friday night.

The transmission began about 5:27 P. M., Eastern standard time, and required several hours for the light beams actuated by radio to reconstruct the score at facsimile receiving headquarters of RCA Communications, 66 Broad Street.

It was explained by the Associated Music Publishers, Inc., of New York, that two packages were mailed from Leipzig on Nov. 18, but only one was received. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, said he would have to rearrange the program because the complete score had not arrived.

The Leipzig music publishers, Breitkopf & Haertel, were informed of what had happened, and in what was called "a desperate emergency" turned to radio for transmission from the sole remaining copy in Europe.

From Leipzig a wire facsimile system carried the lost music to Berlin, where a radio facsimile channel flashed the pages, reduced in size photographically, to New York. Delivered here to Ernest R. Voigt, sales manager of the Associated Music Publishers, the lost part of the composition was enlarged by photography to near the original dimensions, and arrangements were made late last night for a special messenger to carry the sheets to Boston.

Mr. Voigt explained that in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky planned to put men to work on the job of transcribing enough copies for the orchestra players to use at the concert.

For the purposes of wire and radio facsimile the manuscript pages were photographically reduced in size so that four music sheets placed close together measured less than 8½ by 11 inches, and were transmitted as one unit. Three such units carried the entire lost parts, which were for the violas, cellos and double bass instruments of the orchestra.

Each facsimile unit of 8½ by 11 inches requires seventy-two minutes in the sending-receiving process, when scanning the photographic film at intervals of 100ths of an inch. The film is then developed like any other film.

The men of the receiving depot at 66 Broad Street reported the Sibelius music the first ever transmitted over the transoceanic system in their memory.

Maurice Ravel

The tonal web unraveled, bright
Ravel,
And your Bolero danced unto the end!
Those sprightly beats, those measures that ascend,
Destiny-laden, with triumphant swell,
Would often sound like some deep,
warning bell,
Through dancing laughter darkly to portend
Sorrow, the end of all. Oh, sorrow's friend,
Have you been ringing your own parting-knell?

Ah, but your heart could also weave the airy
Gossamer tapestry of children's lore,
That glistens with the tales of elf
and fairy.

Now have you fled the world's discordant traffic,
Soul both rhapsodic and serene, to soar
With kindred spirits in the dance
seraphic?

MARGARET MUNSTERBERG

SYMPHONIC MUSIC AND CIVIC PRIDE

Jewish Advocate Dec. 31/37

By M. A. DeWOLFE HOWE

Written Especially for The Jewish Advocate

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor, Boston Symp

It was twenty-four years ago that, at the request of Henry Lee Higginson, I undertook to prepare a history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When the book was finished in the summer of 1914, soon after the World War began in Europe, I brought the manuscript to Major Higginson for his inspection. He was disposed at first not even to look at it. "There is no use of printing this book," he said; "there may not be any Orchestra in a few months." He felt at the moment that the great work to which he had devoted his enthusiasm and his fortune for thirty-three years was doomed. Dark days were indeed in store for the Orchestra, but it did not cease, and now, twenty-three years later, it is established more firmly than ever as an institution which Boston holds in a cumulative civic pride. The book, be it added, appeared in its first form, on Major Higginson's eightieth birthday, November 18, 1914, and, in an extended form appropriate to the fiftieth anniversary of the Orchestra, in the autumn of 1931.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1938

Ukko Spans the Ether

The Finns have an ancient national epic, Kalevala, handed down through centuries of folklore. One of the heroes of the poem is Ukko, a mighty god comparable to the Greek Zeus. Instead of thunderbolts, Ukko had an eagle which laid seven eggs. From the substance of these eggs the visible world and its elements were fashioned.

The adventures of Ukko were written down by nineteenth-century antiquarians, then translated in 1902 into a choral symphony by Jean Sibelius, Finland's greatest composer. The work, called "Ukko, the Firemaker," was well received in Europe, but never published.

Its first presentation in this country —scheduled for last Friday night in Boston by the Helsingfors University Chorus and the Boston Symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting—made necessary the sending over of the original score. En route by ship across the Atlantic, however, part of the manuscript vanished. There was no way to replace it quickly, and Mr. Koussevitzky prepared to change his program.

At that point some of the elements for which Ukko was presumably responsible—light and electricity under modern control—came to the rescue. The only copy of the original score, held by Sibelius's publishers in Leipzig, was photographed and the photograph transmitted by facsimile radio to Berlin and thence relayed over the ether to New York. Several hours were required for the transmisison, but Mr. Koussevitzky received the necessary music sheets in time for Friday's concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 2 - 1938

Finnish Chorus Sings Thursday With Bostonians

Will Sing Two Works of Sibelius; Emma Boynet To Be Saturday Soloist

The Helsinki University Chorus, which arrived here shortly before Christmas for its first American tour under Martti Turunen's direction, and was heard here in a radio program last Sunday, will make its New York concert debut in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert next Thursday night under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Carnegie Hall. The young men from Finland will sing two choruses by Sibelius, "Origin of Fire," or "Ukko the Fire Maker," and "The Captive Queen," which had their first American performances in the Boston Symphony's home concerts of last Friday and Saturday.

"Origin of Fire" is a setting of an episode from the Finnish folk epic "Kalevala." After the sun and moon have been seized by Luohi. Pohjola's mistress, and the whole earth plunged in darkness, Ukko, Lord of the Gods, strikes a spark from his sword blade which rends the heavens as it falls to earth. "The Captive Queen," who is released in the poem which Sibelius has set, symbolizes Finland, delivered from political subjection.

The Helsinki choristers will give a concert of their own at Carnegie Hall Monday night, January 10. Sibelius will be represented on Dr. Koussevitzky's instrumental program for next Thursday by "Ponjola's Daughter." Brahms's third symphony will precede the intermission.

On Saturday afternoon, January 8, Emma Boynet, Parisian pianist, will be the soloist in Mozart's concerto in C(K.467). Although she appeared with this orchestra in Boston on November 1, 1935, this will be her New York debut. She studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Isidor Philipp, and was graduated with first prizes in piano, harmony and composition. Dr. Koussevitzky planned to begin this program with a concerto for orchestra by a contemporary Russian, Michael Starokadomsky, but has substituted Maximilian Steinberg's orchestral arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D for strings. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony. The program for next Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music includes Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Prokofieff's suite from his music for the film "Lieutenant Kije" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

LOST CHORAL SCORE RADIOED FACSIMILE

N.Y. Times

Part of Sibelius Symphony Is Flashed From Berlin for Use on the Boston Program

Dec. 29/37

SEVERAL HOURS ON WAY

Sheets Missing From Ocean Mail Reduced by Photography, Then Scanned by Beam

Part of the choral symphonic score of "Ukko, the Fire Maker," by Jean Sibelius, which was lost in the mails on the way from Germany, was flashed from Berlin by facsimile radio yesterday so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might present it in a concert on Friday night.

The transmission began about 5:27 P. M., Eastern standard time, and required several hours for the light beams actuated by radio to reconstruct the score at facsimile receiving headquarters of RCA Communications, 66 Broad Street.

It was explained by the Associated Music Publishers, Inc., of New York, that two packages were mailed from Leipzig on Nov. 18, but only one was received. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, said he would have to rearrange the program because the complete score had not arrived.

The Leipzig music publishers, Breitkopf and Haertel, were informed of what had happened, and in what was called "a desperate emergency" turned to radio for transmission from the sole remaining copy in Europe.

From Leipzig a wire facsimile system carried the lost music to Berlin, where a radio facsimile channel flashed the pages, reduced in size photographically, to New York. Delivered here to Ernest R. Voigt, sales manager of the Associated Music Publishers, the lost part of the composition was enlarged by photography to near the original dimensions, and arrangements were made late last night for a special messenger to carry the sheets to Boston.

Mr. Voigt explained that in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky planned to put men to work on the job of transcribing enough copies for the orchestra players to use at the concert.

For the purposes of wire and radio facsimile the manuscript pages were photographically reduced in size so that four music sheets placed close together measured less than 8½ by 11 inches, and were transmitted as one unit. Three such units carried the entire lost parts, which were for the violas, cellos and double bass instruments of the orchestra.

Each facsimile unit of 8½ by 11 inches requires seventy-two minutes in the sending-receiving process, when scanning the photographic film at intervals of 100ths of an inch. The film is then developed like any other film.

The men of the receiving depot at 66 Broad Street reported the Sibelius music the first ever transmitted over the transoceanic system in their memory.

TO GIVE PROGRAM OF FINNISH MUSIC

Worcester Gazette Dec. 29/37

A program of all-Finnish music, including three selections by Sibelius and one by its conductor, Martti Turunen, will be presented by the Helsinki University Chorus at its first American concert in the Auditorium tomorrow night at 8.15. The appearance here is sponsored by the Finnish Lutheran Church.

Upon their arrival here at 1 p. m. tomorrow, the singers will be guests at a dinner at the church on Laurel street, and will be entertained during the afternoon by Rev. Viljo I. Heiman, pastor, and Mrs. Heiman at their home. A short reception at the Auditorium after the concert will be followed by a reception at the Finnish Temperance Hall, Laurel street.

The program is: "Terve, Suomeni Maa" (Hail, Suomi, My Native Land), Emil Genetz; "Niin Mina Neitonen" (I sing to You, Fair Maiden), Robert Kajanus, tenor solo by Alfons Almi; "Sirkka" (The Cricket), Armas Jarnefelt; "Paan" (Pan), Veino Haapalainen; "Prokko," "Loitsu" (Conjurations), Aksel Tornudd; "Saaristolaispolska" (Islanders' Jig), Vaino Pesola; "Kadonnus Venhe" (The Missing Boat), Martti Turunen, baritone solo by Helge Virkkunen; "Soita Somer, Helka Heikka" (The Shingle Crashes), Leevi Madetoja; "Tullallaa" (Chubby-Cheeked), Armas Maasalo, tenor solo by Alfons Almi; "Iltatunnelma" (In the Evening), "Kesakuva" (Summer), Toivo Kuula; intermission.

"Venematka" (The Boat Trip), "Sydameni Laulu" (My Heart's Song), Saarella Palaa" (The Fire on the Island), Jean Sibelius; "Kesailta" (Summer Evening), tenor solo by Viljo Lehtinen, "Paimenen Ilo" (The Shepherd's Joy), "Tuutulaulu" (Cradle Song), "Hiiden Orjien Laula" (The Slaves of Hiisi), Selim Palmgren.

Lost Sibelius Score Sent By Radio for Hub Concert

Brockton Enterprise Dec 29/37

106

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—(UP)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train to-day.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston symphony orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails enroute from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitsky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, to-day and to-morrow, since the Helsinki University chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8 1-2 by 11-inch paper to the Associated Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians later to-day.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A., took a total of more than 12 hours. Radio transmission alone required eight hours.

HELSINKI UNIVERSITY CHORUS

Lowell Telegram Jan 2/38

The Helsinki University Chorus, Martti Turunen, conductor, will give a concert of their own in Boston when they appear in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, January 9. The chorus from the University of the Finnish capital, now on their first visit to America, are making a limited tour of our eastern states, returning the beginning of February. Their programme will consist entirely of music by Finnish composers, with emphasis upon the works of Sibelius. This chorus which made their first tour outside of Finland in 1935 when they sang in numerous European cities, is an organization of long and high standing in their own country where they have existed for about half a century. Much of the finest choral music of Sibelius was composed for their use.

Holyoke Trans.

Lost Symphony Score Radioed Across Ocean

Dec. 29/37

BOSTON, Dec. 29—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius Symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train today.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, today and tomorrow, since the Helsinki university chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians later today.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A., took a total of more than 12 hours. Radio transmission alone required eight hours and cost about $800.

When Koussevitzky showed the first two enlarged sheets of the radioed music to the orchestra at its morning rehearsal, players said they could read every note, though with some difficulty. Koussevitzky was assured that clarifying processes would make the music perfectly legible for tomorrow morning's rehearsal.

107

Radio 'Rescues' Score Of Lost Sibelius Work

Greenwich Times - Dec. 29/37

Original Manuscript of Symphony by Great Finnish Composer Vanishes In Mails Enroute To Boston But Radio Photography Saves The Day

BOSTON, Dec. 29. (U.P.)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train today.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails enroute from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, today and tomorrow, since the Helsinki University Chorus, which opens its American tour

RADIO 'RESCUES' SIBELIUS WORK

(Continued from Page 1)

with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

Transmitted by Radio

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians later today.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A., took a total of more then 12 hours. Radio transmission alone required eight hours.

Enlarging, photo-copying and clarifying of the 14 pages of music will require an estimated five hours.

Special Representative Karl Bauer of the Associated Music Publishers, who witnessed the transmission in New York and brought the score here, estimated that a total of more than 3,000 notes in 1,000 measures were transmitted.

"Looked Like Chinese"

One operator handled the receipt simultaneously with transmission to Berlin of pictures of the Panay bombing and pictures on two other telephoto cylinders. The same man, he said, completed the entire processing, conversing through a sound track on one side of the cylinder with the Berlin operator, taking the cylinder into a dark room, developing the negatives and printing the positives.

The operator, Bauer said, thought the music "looked like Chinese."

So busy was the New York operator, Bauer said, that he had time to quote only the last sentence of his conversation with the Berlin operator:

"Happy New Year to you all."

DANIELE AMFITHEATROF TO BE GUEST CONDUCTOR

Lowell Telegram Jan 2/38

On the return of the Boston Symphony orchestra from its second visit to New York of the season, Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 14-15. The guest conductor will be Daniele Amfitheatrof, who is now making his first visit to America, and who opened the season in Minneapolis as associate conductor of the orchestra there. The programme for the first week of his Boston visit will consist of Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major; a Suite for Strings, by Boccherini; and his own "American Panorama." This piece was written in Europe, and consists of a musical characterization of the country as it existed in the imagination of a European who had never seen it.

The same programme will be presented at the Third pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, to be given on January 17 and 18.

THE MENUHINS IN RECITAL

Lowell Telegram Jan 2/38

Yehudi Menuhin and his sister, Hephzibah, will appear together in a recital in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, January 16. This will be one of the limited number of appearances which the young pianist is being allowed to make in her early growing years. Three sonatas for violin and piano will comprise the programme for the Boston concert. They will consist of Bach's Sonata in E major, the Sonata of Beethoven in G major, No. 10, and the Sonata of Guillaume Lekeu, the composer of César Franck's circle.

---

largely dictate the presentation of the plan.

N.Y. Times Jan 2/38

Ukko Spans the Ether

The Finns have an ancient national epic, Kalevala, handed down through centuries of folklore. One of the heroes of the poem is Ukko, a mighty god comparable to the Greek Zeus. Instead of thunderbolts, Ukko had an eagle which laid seven eggs. From the substance of these eggs the visible world and its elements were fashioned.

The adventures of Ukko were written down by nineteenth-century antiquarians, then translated in 1902 into a choral symphony by Jean Sibelius, Finland's greatest composer. The work, called "Ukko, the Firemaker," was well received in Europe, but never published.

Its first presentation in this country—scheduled for last Friday night in Boston by the Helsingfors University Chorus and the Boston Symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting—made necessary the sending over of the original score. En route by ship across the Atlantic, however, part of the man-

---

Dec 29—Irish Free State became Eire (Ireland) under a new constitution.

Dec 29—Automobile makers announced sweeping curtailment of employment.

Dec 29—All traction facilities in Paris, France, paralyzed by strike.

Dec 29—Full symphonic score of Sibelius' composition, "Origin of Fire," sent by radio photography from Germany to Boston.

Dec 30—Paris strike settled.

Outstanding Events of 1937
Globe - Jan. 1/38

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
DEC 31 1937

MUSIC NOTES

Uday Shan-Kar and his Hindu Ballet are concluding their present engagement at the St. James Theater with a matinee and an evening performance this Sunday. The troupe then begins an extended tour of Eastern cities.

* * *

Verdi's "Otello," revived at the Metropolitan early this month after an absence of twenty-four years, occupied that stage for the second time last night, the cast being the same. Giovanni Martinelli was the Othello, Lawrence Tibbett the Iago and Elisabeth Rethberg the Desdemona. Ettore Panizza again conducted.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, is devoting the second half of its program in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening to music by Jean Sibelius. In this group are "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Captive Queen" and "The Origin of Fire," the work which has been making transatlantic cables hum with lost and found messages. The Helsinki University chorus will assist in the last two numbers. The program opens with Brahms' third symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 2 - 1938

OUTSTANDING BROADCASTS OF 1937

News Events:

Franklin D. Roosevelt's second inaugural, Jan. 20.

Coronation of George VI and Queen Elizabeth, May 12.

Roosevelt's "fireside chats": reorganization of the judiciary, March 9; condition of nation as he observed it on Western tour, Oct. 12; unemployment census, Nov. 14.

Associate Justice Hugo L. Black's broadcast to the nation in defense of charges that he was or had been a member of the Ku Klux Klan, Oct. 1.

Mobilization of radio facilities and dramatic emergency broadcasts from Mississippi-Ohio flood area in January.

Vaudeville of the Air: Charlie McCarthy and Edgar Bergen, ventriloquist; Vallee Varieties; Bing Crosby show; Major Bowes's amateurs; Fred Allen's "Town Hall"; Kate Smith's variety hour; the Mardi Gras; the Magic Key.

Drama: Shakespearean plays in Summer series; Eugene O'Neill cycle; Shaw's "Back to Methuselah"; MacLeish's poetic drama, "Fall of the City"; and the "Radio Theatre," featuring screen stars on Monday nights.

Classical Music: The New York Philharmonic Symphony; Philadelphia Orchestra; Boston Symphony; Metropolitan Opera matinees; Sunday evening symphonic hours on WJZ and WABC networks; the NBC Symphony Orchestra, Arturo Toscanini directing; Opera Auditions of the Air; symphonic concerts, Alfred Wallenstein conducting; Andre Kostelanetz Orchestra.

Education: Dr. Walter Damrosch's music appreciation concerts; America's Town Meeting; American School of the Air.

Herald

N. Y. Hears Radioed Sibelius Music; Pickets Denounce Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, Jan. 6 (AP)—The famous music which arrived by radio from Germany the other day was played and sung here tonight for the oston Symphony's capacity audience.

This was Jan Sibelius' setting of part of Finland's national epic, the "Kalevala," the poem from which Longfellow took the meter he used in "Hiawatha." It was not the score of the work which Breitkopf & Haertel radioed the Boston orchestra, but merely the parts for three sections—the double bass, cello and viola.

Sibelius cals his short cautata "The Origin of Fire." It calls for a baritone soloist and a male chorus, both of which weref urnished tonight by the Helsinki University chorus. Helge Virkkunen was the baritone, magnificently equiped vocally. The chorus matched its soloist; no finer has ben heard in New York these many moons. Passages demanding great volume brought an almost incredible amount of sound, and it was invariably good tone.

The chorus sang also Sibelius' "The Captive Queen." Both the works were direct in style by no means subtle.

Before the concert there was a bit of excitement on Fifty-seventh street, where four plodding pickets paraded their denunciation of Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's Russian conductor. The placards said he was a communist because he belonged to the musicians' committee to aid Spanish democracy.

According to Manager George E. Judd, Koussevitzky doesn't know it if he is a member of the committee, and in any case is pretty sure of his Bourgeois rating, sincehe was driven from Russia in 1921 by communists and has never been allowed back since. The communists still have the Koussevitzky fortune, also.

After the music was ended Paavo Pitkanen, president of the Helsinki Student Corporation, presented Koussevitzky a handsome carved glass vase of Finnish manufacture from the chorus.

Sibelius Scores Radioed Across Ocean Arrive for Use of Boston Orchestra

Berkshire Eagle - Dec 29/37

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will not disappoint the eager audience Friday afternoon waiting to hear the Helsinki University Male Chorus in the first American performance of Jan Sibelius's "The Origin of Fire."

This will only be possible, however, because of the enterprise of George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra in arranging the 11th hour dispatch from Germany of a radiophoto bearing some missing parts. The missing parts arrived in Boston from New York this morning and the chorus, here on a tour from Finland was cheered at its rehearsal in the Common Room at Lowell House, Harvard University.

Suggested As Joke

Decision to use the radio, first suggested almost as a joke, was arrived at when a package of parts went astray in the mails, according to John N. Burk, Symphony program annotator. Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from Sibelius's publishers, Breitkopf and Hartel, Leipzig, on Nov. 18, in time to catch the Europa. One of the packages arrived, but the other did not. In fact, Dr. Koussevitzky had already planned to substitute another of Sibelius's choral-orchestral works for "The Origin of Fire" on his program.

As a last resort Mr. Judd, manager of the orchestra, telephoned to Richard G. Appel of the Boston Public Library music department, asking if perchance the library had a copy of the work.

"No, we haven't," replied Mr. Appel, adding with a laugh, "I guess the only way you'll get it will be by radio photo."

Mr. Judd didn't laugh. He sat right down and had the following wire sent to Breitkops:

"Sibelius Ukko Ursprung Des Feuers parcel containing score viola cello and bass parts failed to arrive. Boston Symphony Concert with Finnish University Chorus this Thursday (the rehearsal) desperate situation. Send immediately greatest speed radio photos of all pages missing parts not score. Pages to be reduced so that four will go on one 81x11 inches radio photo."

Came the answer:

"Sibelius radio photos under way Breitgopf and Hartel."

Thus, what will be realized as warm Sibelius fire music on Friday was nothing but a monotonous, high-pitched whirr as it sped across the cold Atlantic yesterday. In all, 14 pages of the original were transmitted, said Mr. Burk.

Upon receipt, the miniatures were enlarged so that within a few hours of arrival, sufficient copies were available to accommodate the orchestra.

Lacking a conductor's score, Dr. Koussevitz will conduct from a piano arrangement.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
DEC 31 1937

Boston Symphony

As the second in its annual series of concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give a program on Friday evening at 8:30, which will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" Suite and Strauss' "Eil Eulenspiegel." The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Brooklyn on Thursday, Feb. 10; Friday, Mar. 11, and Friday, Apr. 1, to conclude its series, its fifty-second in Brooklyn.

Ravel Remembered

When Serge Koussevitzky returns for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 28 and 29, after a fortnight's holiday, during which the guest conductor will be Daniele Amfitheatrov, he will present a program dedicated to the memory of Maurice Ravel.

Trans Jan 4/38

Finnish Visitors

The Helsinki University Chorus of Finland will give a free public concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, next Friday evening at 8.30. The concert, under the auspices of the Harvard Division of Music, is another instance of the largesse of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. The chorus will sing numbers by Sibelius, Genetz, Kajanus, Jarnfelt, Haapalainen, Tornudd, Pesola, Turunen, Madetoja, Maasalo, Kuula and Palmgren. Admission to the concert, though free, is only by ticket, which may be obtained during mornings of this week at the Harvard Music Building.

The Helsinki Chorus' Symphony Hall concert, incidentally, will be given next Sunday afternoon, not next Monday, as erroneously indicated in a review in the Transcript last night.

Finnish Chorus Sings Thursday With Bostonians

N.Y. Tribune

Will Sing Two Works of Sibelius; Emma Boynet To Be Saturday Soloist

Jan. 2/38

The Helsinki University Chorus, which arrived here shortly before Christmas for its first American tour under Martti Turunen's direction, and was heard here in a radio program last Sunday, will make its New York concert debut in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert next Thursday night under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Carnegie Hall. The young men from Finland will sing two choruses by Sibelius, "Origin of Fire," or "Ukko the Fire Maker," and "The Captive Queen," which had their first American performances in the Boston Symphony's home concerts of last Friday and Saturday.

"Origin of Fire" is a setting of an episode from the Finnish folk epic "Kalevala." After the sun and moon have been seized by [illegible] Pohjola's mistress, and the whole earth plunged in darkness, Ukko, Lord of the Gods, strikes a spark from his sword blade which [illegible] the heavens as it falls to earth. "The Captive Queen," who is released in the poem which Sibelius has set, symbolizes Finland, delivered from political subjection.

The Helsinki choristers will give a concert of their own at Carnegie Hall Monday night, January [illegible]. Sibelius will be represented on Koussevitzky's instrumental program for next Thursday by "Pohjola's Daughter." Brahms's third symphony will precede the intermission.

On Saturday afternoon, January 8, Emma Boynet, Parisian pianist, will be the soloist in Mozart's concerto in C (K.467). Although [illegible] appeared with this orchestra in Boston on November 1, 1935, [illegible] will be her New York debut. [illegible] studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Isidor Philipp, and was graduated with first prizes in piano, harmony and composition. Dr. Koussevitzky planned to begin the program with a concerto for orchestra by a contemporary Russian, Michael Starokadomsky, but [illegible] substituted Maximilian Steinberg's orchestral arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D for strings. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony. The program for next Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music includes Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Prokofieff's suite from his music to the film "Lieutenant Kije" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 30 1937

Radio Parts Missing Sibelius Score to Boston

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 29 (AP).—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed

INFORMATION OBSCURED

108

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 2, 1938

Boston Symphony's Missing Music Last Week, Like Schubert's "Unfinished" Masterpiece, Lost for 43 Years

BY ROBERT HUME

The recent loss of music by Sibelius while on its way from a German publisher to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is just one more reminder that pages of music have an uncanny way of disappearing. And of reappearing, it should be added hastily. As for whether the missing Sibelius pages have or have not a chance of reappearing, the reader may judge the probability for either from the following instances in musical history.

That enchanting favorite, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream Overture," figured in a very strange disappearance. After its first performance in London, in 1829, with the composer present, Mendelssohn gave the complete orchestral score to an English friend for safekeeping. Next day the friend stammered out the confession that he had absent-mindedly left the score in a public coach. It turned up 10 years or so ago—almost a century after its loss. Somehow or other, it was found in the Royal Academy of Music in London, of which the apologetic man who lost the score had been a director. But the disappearance of the manuscript had not occasioned any mental anguish to Mendelssohn. Possessing a phenomenal memory, which he had some fondness for placing on show, he wrote out a new score as easily as if copying pages of music before his eyes.

Why Chase an Overture?

Rossini's way of rising to an emergency of missing manuscript was to adopt the view that it was easier to stay where he was. In one famous case the place where he stayed was his bed. While Rossini was composing his comic opera, "The Barber of Seville," so a legend runs, a breeze whisked the overture out the window. Rossini was feeling too comfortable to get out of bed, so he remained and continued writing the opera. After completing it he could not be bothered by doing the overture again.

Now, the reader may be positive of having heard a rollicking overture to "The Barber of Seville," while listening to the radio or attending a pop concert. But if the reader could look at the title printed on the musicians' music he would see the words, "Overture to 'Queen Elizabeth.'" To make up for the overture which blew out the window Rossini used the one belonging to an opera of his which had not been a complete success.

Sometimes music supposedly lost its simply suffering from the wrong label. Such a case has appeared in the papers very recently. A news despatch from the West announced that Paul Whiteman had discovered a new manuscript of the late George Gershwin. The title was "Rhapsody in Rivets." When the news reached Boston it brought a smile to many in a group of 5000 concert-goers. They had heard the piece played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Koussevitzky—with Gershwin himself as piano soloist, in two concerts. However, it had been listed on the programme as "Second Rhapsody," with a note explaining that it once had borne the other title.

A supposedly lost Organ Prelude in C Major by the great John Sebastian Bach, who died in Leipzig in 1750, turned up in Westminster Abbey years later. Although it was a precious manuscript in the composer's own handwriting, the English cathedral organist had thought it was a composition of his predecessor, John Robinson! To offset that perhaps an interesting composition of the great English composer, Henry Purcell, who was born before Bach, was published in 1894 as a lost work of the great German.

(Continued on Page A)

Boston Symphony's Missing Music of Last Week Recalls Other Unfinished Masterpieces

(Continued From Page A-1)

Two Lost Schubert Works

By a careful process of deduction the famous English musicologist, Sir George Grove, arrived at the conclusion that Schubert wrote a "Gastein Symphony," which has disappeared.

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, which today is the most beloved of all symphonic masterpieces, narrowly escaped remaining unplayed, as well as unfinished. Instead, it was lost to knowledge of the concert world for 43 years after it was written.

This miracle of poignant beauty was composed in 1822. Six years later, Schubert was dead. Usually a symphony has four main divisions, or "movements." This has only two, a fact which brought it the name "unfinished." But to many listeners no addition seems necessary for complete artistic satisfaction. That offers a possible solution to the riddle of Schubert's failure to develop two other movements. Manuscripts have been found which show that he began a third movement. But he stopped after writing nine measures of instrumental parts, and sketching three pages in piano form.

Did his artistic instincts persuade him that he should not attempt to impose the set rule of four movements upon a creation which attained such full expression of beauty in two? Whatever the true solution of the riddle, Schubert discontinued work on this "Symphony in B Minor," and turned to other compositions. At the end of the remaining six years of his tragically short span of 31 years, the now world famous two-movement symphony was not among the manuscripts in his dwelling. What had become of it? A Viennese orchestra leader learned the answer in 1860. Yet he paid no heed to it for five years.

Clew Taken Up Slowly

The conductor was Johann Herbeck. He received a letter in 1860 from an old man, Joseph Huettenbrenner, who, with his brother Anselm, had known Schubert. Joseph wrote that "he (Anselm) has a treasure in Schubert's B Minor Symphony, which we put on a level with the great Symphony in C, his instrumental swan-song, and any one of the symphonies by Beethoven."

Unbelievably, Herbeck did not attempt to investigate that tempting statement for five years, even though he travelled to the vicinity of Anselm's town several times. At last he entered the town while on another errand. From the landlord of a tavern, he learned that Anselm Huettenbrenner, prolific composer of unpublished works, had a habit of breakfasting there. While they still were chatting, the old man entered. Herbeck said to him:

"I am here to ask permission to produce one of your works in Vienna."

Crafty Conductor

Anselm became cordial, inviting the conductor to visit his little one-story cottage in an out-of-the-way location. In a work-room stuffed with a confused array of dust-laden and yellowed papers, Anselm showed him some of his own manuscripts. Herbeck, glancing over no less than 10 unpublished overtures of Anselm, selected one, and remarked very craftily:

"It is my purpose to bring forward three contemporaries—Schubert, Huettenbrenner, and Lachner, in one concert before the Viennese public. It would naturally be very appropriate to represent Schubert by a new work."

"Oh, I have still a lot of things by Schubert," was what to Herbeck must have been a startling reply.

The aged friend of Schubert then pulled a batch of papers from an old-fashioned chest. Herbeck recognized the writing of Schubert on one manuscript, in the title "Symphony in B Minor."

Herbeck feigned looking it over casually—he did not want to be so eager that the old man would decide it was too valuable to allow to pass from his possession. There was no doubt in the conductor's mind that this actually was an unknown symphony of Schubert.

"This would do," the conductor said, attempting to keep his voice steady. "Will you let me have it copied immediately, at my expense?"

"There is no hurry," Anselm said. "Take it with you."

And that is how Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony ceased to be unheard. Herbeck gave it to the world for the first time in Vienna, 72 years ago Dec. 17, after a silence of 43 years from the time of its composition. Schubert had made a gift of the manuscript to Anselm Huettenbrenner, out of friendship.

Schubert heard no orchestra play that loveliest of symphonies. Yet in his mind he heard it perhaps as clearly. Huettenbrenner himself a good musician, although not a genius, could hear the beauty of the music by reading the manuscript. And it was a cherished treasure from the hand of his friend.

How, one asks, could a friend of a genius like Schubert cause the world to lose one of his finest creations? During the lifetime of Schubert the world really did not know him. He was a local celebrity in Vienna—a likable fellow, who wrote charming music in quantities and without effort. Publishers were not too eager to print his works—or, at any rate, to pay well for them. The publishers knew he was hardly a genius! He wouldn't sell outside Vienna!

Copy of Lost Sibelius Score Radiophotoed From Berlin

Portland Express - Dec. 29/37

BOSTON, (UP)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius Symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrivede here by train today.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music published for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, today and tomorrow, since the Helsinki University Chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians later today.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A., took a total of more than 12 hours. Radio taransmission alone required eight hours.

Enlarging, photo-copying and clarifying of the 14 pages of music will require an estimated five hours.

pecial Representative Karl Bauer of the Associated Music Publishers, who witnessed the transmission in New York and brought the score here, estimated that a total of more than 3,000 notes in 1,000 measures were transmithted.

Brahms and Sibelius Works Are Hailed by Symphony Audience

Trans. Jan. 3/38

Male Chorus from Finland Makes Deep Impression in Works by Jan Sibelius

By Redfern Mason

The lost Symphonic Fantasia of Sibelius was replaced by a sort of electrical miracle; Serge Koussevitzky pronounced the work true Sibelius and the audience at Friday's concert ratified his opinion.

Lest the popular judgment should be warped, perhaps by hearing too much of the Finnish master at one sitting, the director opened the concert with Brahms Third Symphony, a work concerning which the public at large has not made up its mind so decisively as it has concerning the immortal C minor. The reason is probably to be found in the fact that, in the years intervening between the two works, Brahms had grown more subtle and therefore less obvious. But the oftener the symphony is heard, the greater it looms.

Brahms is still a romanticist here; but his romanticism is so perfectly expressed that the composition is a true classic. The fact is, indeed, that the two words romantic and classic are misleading. Your "classicus," in Roman days, was a man who paid a large income tax; he was a man of substance. The adjective is quantitative rather than qualitative. For Brahms classicism meant perfection. "Music need not necessarily be beautiful," he said; "but it must be perfect." This Brahms work is romantic in the sense of Euripides and of Shakespeare; it is classical by its greatness; but the content is that of a dreamer of dreams. The great opening theme is trenchant at the outset; but it veers off into something meditative and the tone of the whole work recalls the words of Milton, where he speaks of Such dreams as youthful poets dream,

On Summer eve by haunted stream.

Fritz Kreisler told the writer that he judged of a man's musicianship by his attitude towards Brahms. People have sneered at what they called the composer's "scrap basket themes," but, when one watches the growth of that opening Allegro a great wonder possesses him. In this first movement, by the way, as [redacted] found something that reminded him of Iago. But Clara Schumann, who was the composer's dear friend, probably came much nearer to the truth when she described it as a "forest idyll." But music is to be felt rather than understood by the intellect.

The Andante is beautiful and the composer has left us nothing lovelier than the Poco allegretto. As for the Finale it is pure triumph. The audience enjoyed it and inwardly thanked Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra for a glorious performance.

After the intermission, all the works performed were by Jan Sibelius. The great Finlander has done more to draw the attention of the world to his native Finland than has anything save the national folk-epos, the "Kalevala," which gave to Longfellow the rhythm of his "Hiawatha." Yet many of us ought to know that descendants of the old Finnish colony in what is now Delaware were signers of the American Declaration of Independence.

The lost Symphonic Fantasia is a charming work in the accepted Sibelius manner, landscape music with a note of Nordic "Weltschmerz." Like the "The Captive Queen," which followed, it is inspired by the mythology of the race, and the audience probably took the two compositions and "The Origin of Fire," the last number on the program, in that sense.

But the final pair of Sibelian compositions had a special interest, for they introduced to Boston the Helsinski University Chorus of Finland, a cohort of fifty male singers in whom seems to be expressed the poetry and the manhood of a race. Theirs is singing of a rugged masculinity. There is no suggestion of femininity about those tenors. The attack of the whole suggests the virility of a Spartan phalanx. You felt that these fellows—they are all young — would have marched against their Russian oppressors courageous as the heroes of Thermopylae.

But the chorus will be heard in a concert of their own on Monday of next week. The audience admired them, not only for [redacted] their manli-

---

Globe

MUSIC AND

Ravel, the Last Picturesque French Composer

The last picturesque figure in modern French music is gone. During the final years of Maurice Ravel, there were other distinguished composers in France, but only one—Albert Roussel—occupied a comparable rank as creative artist. Roussel passed away in August. Last Tuesday death brought to Ravel, in a Paris hospital, the end of several years of suffering and impaired capacity for work.

There was no one like the mature Ravel, whose creative path led away from the Debussyan impressionism that had influenced him in early years. With the music of Roussel and D'Indy, that by Ravel had no points of similarity save the clarity of texture, the esthetic refinement and the logical thought that are a common heritage of the French mind. Ravel had more than this, a sense of diablerie that may have been given him by his Basque ancestry.

Although preoccupation with form possessed him from his student days with Gabriel Faure, the unconventionality of his harmonies and a bizarre flavor to be found generally in his music soon won him cordial dislike from conservative musicians who thought such nonsense could come only from an enfant terrible.

As most strong creative personalities usually do, Ravel went calmly his own way. He left behind him the excessive refinement of Debussy, and found his own path somewhat by the help of such Russians as Borodin, whose music interested Ravel in his early years just as it interested Debussy. Yet he was French to the core. His own music is absolutely original and carefully wrought. His fertile melodic invention was attracted to a sort of expression at once cool, sparkling, ironic and witty, in which sentiment—but not sensuousness—was conspicuously absent.

The beauty of Ravel's music lies, too, in the bright facets of his harmony, and the shapeliness of his tonal patterns, as those things have come to be recognized in the past 30 years. All these qualities are to be found in the "Daphnis and Chloe" suites, "Mother Goose," "La Valse," the songs to Tristram Klingsor's words, "Scheherazade," his chamber and piano pieces; and these are but a few of his finest compositions.

Ravel was not a nature painter on the order of "La Mer," nor was he a tonal philosopher or dramatist. He dealt most successfully in music on a small formal scale. His "Tombeau de Couperin," for example, is a masterpiece of its kind, with, moreover, a captivating antique charm. The work by which he may continue to be best known to the general public was one of his least important; an amazingly clever technical stunt, but nevertheless unimportant work that goes by the name of "Bolero."

The greater part of Ravel's fame, despite his melodic gifts, may rest on his orchestration. As he turned from Debussy, so in the treatment of the orchestra he advanced from the point where Rimsky-Korsakoff had stopped. Ravel's orchestration was never so lush as that of Rimsky; it was more piquant and enriched by a wider range of subtle colorings.

Perhaps Ravel was amused by the irony of his own career, since he lived to see himself transformed in the public eye from a suspect modernist, to a somewhat old-fashioned codger in the regard of the young musical lions who came upon the scene just after the war. Now that he is no longer among us, it will probably be easier to see the actual place which he occupies in the history of music.

Globe Jan. 1/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Unaccountable are the ways of man! Thirty-five years ago Jean Sibelius completed a noble, imaginative and original choral score based upon an episode of the Finnish epic "Kalevala" and called "Ukko the Firemaker." Yesterday afternoon this legendary account of how fire was brought upon the earth was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Helsinki University Chorus for the first time in the United States.

The spectacular circumstances of parts and score lost in transit, the subsequent triumph of radio-photo over time and distance, and the valiant labors of Dr Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra in quickly preparing a thrilling performance have been much in the news this week. After the concert more than one subscriber was heard to say: "Indeed it was worth the effort!"

Much of the success of "Ukko the Firemaker" (or "The Origin of Fire" as it is also titled) was due yesterday to the phenomenal Helsinki University Chorus, whose richness, sonority and strength of tone were a revelation. The voices move clearly, with the result that Sibelius' texture is beautifully transparent. American choruses may learn from their enunciation: one listener with no knowledge of the Finnish tongue had merely to follow the printed English text to recognize nearly every syllable.

While the tonal stream has brought a torrent of indifferent music to Boston during the generation past, this score was neglected. The hypothesis that it is too indigenously Finnish to appeal to American listeners will not do. "Ukko the Firemaker" possesses the musical universality of the "Eroica" or the "Nibelungen Ring."

Sibelius has, on his own word, made a sharp distinction in his own mind between his "absolute" music and that with a literary basis. As he intended, "Ukko the Firemaker" is rugged, vivid and delineative music, a fitting counterpart for the verses. So much may one say who has acquaintance with the deed of Ukko only as it exists in English translation.

The orchestral style resembles the First Symphony of Sibelius, romantic and rich of texture. And yet there is a primal quality about the choral work which is absent from the Symphony. "Ukko the Firemaker" is, in a word, rooted deeply in race and myth. Unless we are somehow blessed with future performances by Finns singing in their own togue, the experience of this week cannot, probably, be duplicated. It would be effective if accurately played and sung by any, since music knows no boundaries. But the indigenous character would be missing.

The baritone solo was taken with logical gusto by Helge Virkkunen. The Friday audience received the work enthusiastically, as they did "The Captive Queen," also new to this country. Here Sibelius set an allegorical patriotic text of Cajander. Though powerful, this score does not equal "Ukko the Firemaker" in any detail save its ardor.

Conductor and orchestra were thoroughly in the vein throughout the afternoon, although Brahms' Third Symphony was given more of a dramatic than an impeccable reading. To Dr Koussevitzky must go the highest commendation for his skillful preparation of "Ukko the Firemaker" with only a vocal score to guide his interpretation. Martti Turunen, leader of the chorus, shared applause with the conductor at the concert's end.

"Finlandia" was finally omitted from the program. "Pohjola's Daughter," another masterpiece among Sibelius' descriptive music, was again enjoyable, both for itself and the manner in which it was played.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour. At the Boston concerts of Jan 14 and 15, Daniele Amfitheatrof will be guest conductor. The program for Jan 28 and 29 will be dedicated to the memory of Maurice Ravel.

C. W. D.

SANTA MONICA, CAL.
OUTLOOK

RADIOPHOTO TO BRING MUSIC FOR BOSTON CONCERT

BOSTON (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany.

The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

---

(109)

B. Herald Jan. 1/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 11th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussvitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The Helsinki University Chorus from Finland, Martti Turunen, conductor, made their first appearance in America on this occasion. The program was as follows

Symphony No. 3 in F major, Opus 90 ....Brahms
"Pohjola's Daughter," Symphonic Fantasia. Opus 49..............Sibelius
"The Captive Queen," Ballad for chorus and orchestra, Opus 48........Sibelius
"The Origin of Fire," for baritone, male chorus and orchestra, Opus 32..Sibelius

One of the dangers of successful publicity, whether the end is legitimate or not, is that it sometimes arouses a keener anticipation than the actual event can satisfy. Fortunately the Helsinki Chorus proved to be an exceptionally fine group and Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire," an unusual work, well worth the trouble of transmitting some of the parts by radio photography at the last minute. The publicity accorded this ingenious scheme to have the music on hand in time was rather staggering, but if it succeeds in giving the Helsinki Chorus a boost it will have served a useful turn.

Had the services of science and invention been invoked for the other Sibelius choral work, also heard yesterday for the first time in America, we should have been in two minds as to whether the scheme had been worth while. "The Captive Queen" is a patriotic allegory and was consequently designed to excite the fervor of the crowd. A stirring performance still has that effect, as it should, since Sibelius had proved with "Finlandia" and other works that he knew his business in this respect, but patriotic music is not the greatest art. "The Captive Queen," in spite of some illuminating pages in the first half of it, is only secondary Sibelius.

"The Origin of Fire" on the other hand, is something else again. Here is music of great beauty and imagination. The effects whereby the words are illustrated are subtly contrived. On a first hearing we are inclined to rate this work among Sibelius' finest creations. At any rate it is a work of greater power and scope than either "Pohjola's Daughter" or "The Captive Queen."

Obviously the Kalevala, the Finnish national epic, must be very much more wonderful in its own language than it manages to be in English translation. At least Sibelius was inspired by it to some of his most poetic music, whereas a few passages of its monotonous sing-song are enough for most readers of the translation. The description of the origin of fire, as a matter of fact, is one of the most successful in English, as this writer can testify from having once tried to read all the Kalevala.

Everyone must have been struck by the similarity of the poem to "Hiawatha." Moreover the translator in the preface to the Everyman edition went so far as to accuse Longfellow practically of cribbing from the Kalevala not only ideas about meter and arrangement of his poem, but also specific incidents and descriptions. Longfellow could presumably have read a German translation, for it had not yet been done into English.

"Pohjola's Daughter," another Kalevala episode, was not the best choice at the last moment after the several rearrangements of the program. It is program music which really requires some explanation. Possibly, though, the audience knows it well enough by now not to need this assistance.

These works of Sibelius were all performed with great spirit. The late arrival of the parts to "The Original of Fire" did not appear seriously to hamper the interpretation. The Helsinki chorus is excellent. Its precision and body of tone are just what one likes to hear and seldom does. The quality of tone might be described as virile rather than mellow, and it certainly suited this music. The baritone soloist, Mr. Helge Virkkunen, acquitted himself well. There will be an opportunity to judge more particularly of this chorus when it returns Jan. 9 for a concert all its own.

HELSINKI CHORUS AT SYMPHONY

B. — Post

Sing Sibelius Numbers With Vigor and Big Tone

Jan. 1/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is some telescoping of the ages when the orchestral parts of a choral composition describing the mythical origin of fire are transmitted by radio photograph from Leipsig, in order that the programme of a symphony concert in Boston can follow its intended course. The concert in question was that of yesterday afternoon, and the 11th hour repairing of the damage occasioned by the loss of a package in the Christmas mails is, in fact, no longer news. This concert broke into print before it happened.

WITH HELSINKI CHORUS

The above remarkable circumstances would alone serve to set this week's Symphony Concerts apart from any others; and so would the participation in them of a European male chorus, the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus from Finland. It is also no longer news that "The Origin of Fire" is from the pen of Jan Sibelius who contributed the chorus' other number, "The Captive Queen," as well as the orchestral piece which shared with them the second half of the programme, the tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter." The choral pieces, by the way, were written for this Helsinki chorus, long famous in its native land.

It may as well be mentioned now as any time that yesterday's concert began with the Third Symphony of Brahms. This pleasing, if no longer particularly stirring work, which tends with the years to fall below its three companions, was accorded an eloquent performance yesterday and was received with considerable enthusiasm. In the excitements which followed, Brahms was easily forgotten.

Bigness of Tone

To come to the visitors, who during the remainder of the afternoon were massed in a solid gray phalanx at the rear of the stage, not only were these young men husky in appearance, they also sang with a lustiness and vigor which would make any similar American group seem decidedly anaemic by comparison. Nor was this lustiness mere shouting; it was the bigness of tone which might be expected to go with powerful physiques. A week from tomorrow these young men will offer, at Symphony Hall, a concert of their own. It will then be possible to describe their singing in less general terms. Yesterday there were other preoccupations, namely, two by no means brief choral pieces, the words of which had to be followed in parallel columns of Finnish and English. Some of us yesterday heard more of the former language than ever before in our lives.

The 'Captive Queen," which foretells in allegory the freeing of Finland from the yoke of Russia, was composed in 1906; the "Origin of Fire," in 1902. Both works belong, roughly, to the period of the Second Symphony, and both make a similar steady progress from subdued beginning to triumphant and resplendent close.

If there was power in the singing, there was a kindred power in Sibelius' music, so belatedly heard here, and in Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting of it.

"Pohjola's Daughter"

"Pohjola's Daughter," which was on the programme, off, and on again, made an excellent prelude to the choral numbers. Here too were contrasts of dark and light; between the gloomy kingdom of Pohjola and the rainbow whereon his disdainful daughter sits and spins.

Published in 1906, this tone poem is also of the earlier Sibelius who was not afraid to speak out. Dr. Koussevitzky read the score with evident sympathy and the orchestra responded in kind.

SO. STATION FEATURE REEL

In conjunction with the showing of the news reel edition of the Panay bombing incident, the South Station Theatre announces that starting today it has booked a companion reel on the Yangtze River. This film entitled, "Yangtze Patrol," gives a graphic description of the United States naval activities in that section, and gives one a better geographical understanding of the country.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO OFFER 'EROICA'

Concert at Brooklyn Academy Friday to Include Strauss and Prokofieff Suite

HINDU BALLET WEDNESDAY

Neighborhood Musicale to Be Held at Erasmus Hall—Museum Program Listed

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in its second Brooklyn concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday night.

The program will also include Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," orchestral suite, Op. 60, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

The sponsors are the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, headed by R. Huntington Woodman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin will be hostess in the committee box. Box holders will include Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. James Maclay, Miss Mary E. Mills and the Adelphi Alumnae Association of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president.

Uday Shan-Kar and his Hindu ballet will present on Wednesday night the sixth program in the series, "Music and the Dance," at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute.

Mlle. Lucette Meillard, violinist, will give a lecture-recital on "Impressionism in French Music" on Wednesday at 4 P. M. in the Brooklyn Academy. Afterward she will be guest of honor at a tea to be given by the French department of the Brooklyn Institute. Her program will include selections from Fauré, Debussy and Boulanger.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 2 - 1938

Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin Will Be Hostess at Symphony Concert Friday Evening

Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin will be the hostess in the committee box on Friday evening at the second of the series of five concerts comprising the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn. The series is presented at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which is the permanent home of the Department of Education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, an organization endowed to further the cultural life of the borough.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman, sponsor the appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, 'Eroica," op. 55; Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, op. 60, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner," in Rondo Form, op. 28, for this second visit of the season to Brooklyn.

Boxholders for the evening will be Col. Fay W. Brabson and Mrs. Brabson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. James Maclay of Manhattan, Miss Mary E. Mills and the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president.

Officers of the Brooklyn committee for the 1937-38 season, in addition to Mr. Van Sinderen and Mrs. Davenport, are Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League committee. Members of the Junior League committee include Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis K. Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

The third concert of the season will be held Thursday evening, Feb. 10, and the two following concerts will be held Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1.

Monitor Jan. 4/38

Musicien Français

CLAUDE DEBUSSY was proud to call himself Musicien francais. Maurice Ravel was heir to the title. His music embodied, probably more than that of any other French composer since Debussy, the artistic qualities which are regarded as essentially Gallic: logic, clarity, wit, restraint, all the Apollonian as opposed to the Dionysian characteristics, the classic against the romantic; most of all, the French as against the German.

For modern French music has been called to some extent a negative art, since it appears to represent in a considerable degree a determination not to write like Wagner. For this reason, it has never attained to the popularity of Wagner's music. It is an aristocratic art expression, appealing to the taste of the educated, the refined, the classically-minded. Of this art, Ravel was the chief exponent after Debussy passed from the scene in 1918.

Nevertheless, Ravel was not too cloistered a scholar, nor too uncompromising an enemy of popular success, as he proved when he wrote "Bolero," which immediately made him known to more people than "Daphnis et Chloé," the "Pavane," and all the other works for piano, orchestra, or chamber ensembles that had preceded it. Possibly the "Bolero" will prove in the end to have been a bridge to carry the public to the more important compositions.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 26, 1937

Here Is A "Star Spangled Banner" You Can Sing!

The Sunday Post Arranged to Have Boston's Popular "Pops" Conductor Suggest Possible Changes in Recently Criticised Passages of National Anthem

BY LEO RABBETTE

The "Red Glare" of criticism is again shot upon the old "Star Spangled Banner!" And the verbal bombs are "bursting in air." But the Hymn is "still there," and will probably ring in the hearts of and be chanted from the throats of the people as long as the banner itself waves o'er the "Land of the Free."

Two New Yorkers, Nino Martini and the Rev. John H. Holmes, were severe the other day in their strictures on it. Mrs. Edith Key Haines, great-granddaughter of the author of the lyric, came to its defence, and Boston leaders in musical life say a lot of fine words for it.

"It's too tough for the average man to sing," declared Martini, the Metropolitan Opera tenor. "It really calls for an extraordinary range, even in a professional singer."

"The Star Spangled Banner," declared Dr. Holmes to his congregation, "is probably one of the most vulgar and profane of all the world's patriotic songs, exulting in bloodshed and the slaughter of our enemies . . . it celebrates war and breathes hatred."

"It certainly is not vulgar, boastful or blasphemous," replies the great-granddaughter of Francis Scott Key, "to thank God for the preservation of your country against an attacking nation."

Holmes Sticks to His Guns

"I've received a lot of letters since I made that statement," comments Dr. Holmes, "and the great majority agree with me."

What do leaders in Boston's musical life think about the anthem and these "attacks" upon it? I set out to discover their musical and vocal reactions.

Could something be done about the dear old battered but still triumphant song, to keep it within the range of most patriotic voices and thus answer the musical criticism?

I armed myself with a sheet of blank music paper and wandered up by Symphony Hall, where the air is always full of excellent vibrations, and my searching eye rested on the gracious and erudite person of Arthur Fiedler, popular conductor of the famous "Pops" and Esplanade concerts.

He was having a cup of coffee in the drug store near by, between rehearsals. He has conducted our national anthem at the end of every single concert for the past nine summers in the big silver shell by the Charles, said I, and perhaps he can help me.

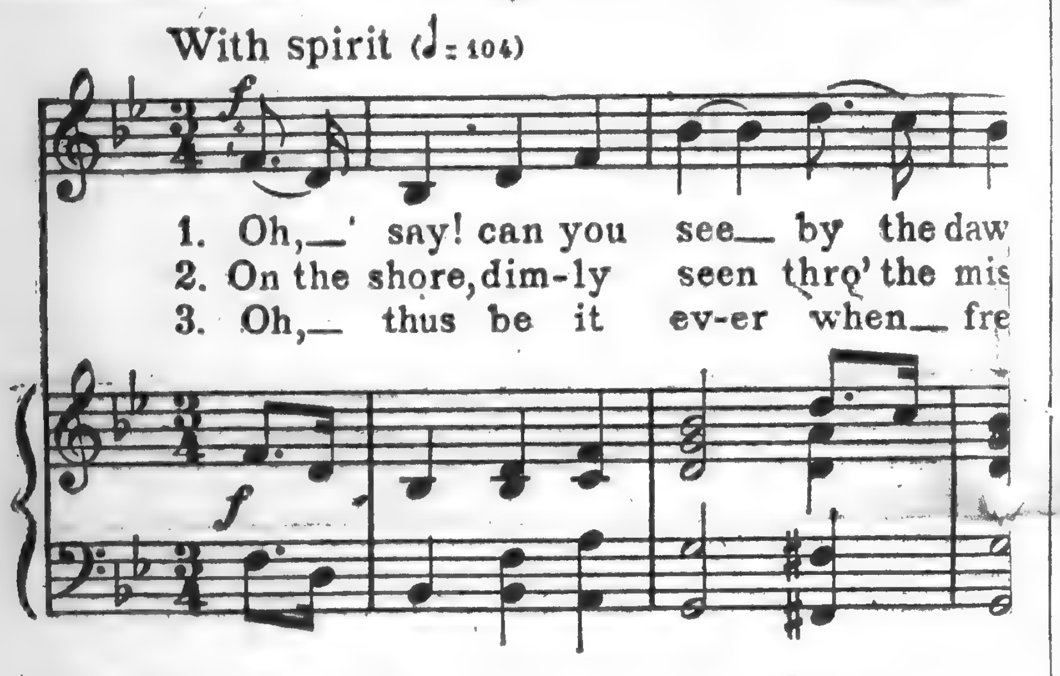
Arthur Fiedler Operates

So I hailed him. "Is there any way we can operate on this famous anthem," I asked, "so that it will not be so difficult for the average person to sing?" We had a little chat about it.

"The only thing you could do," smiled Fiedler, "would be to change the range, say from a 12-note to a 10-note range. As it is now, it runs through 12 notes, from B-flat to F. If it could be arranged from D to F, cutting off the two lower notes, you'd save the singer the greater range. An octave and a third would make it easier to sing."

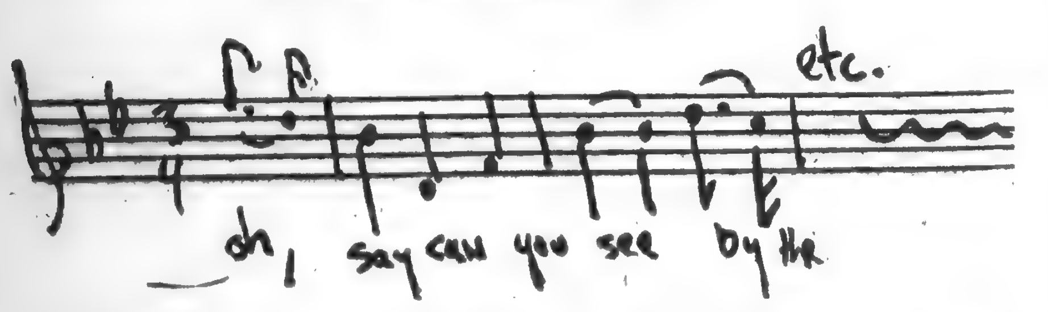
And he suited the action to the word, and wrote out two variants for each of two difficult passages.

"Vocally," said Arthur Fiedler, "it is difficult as it stands for the ordinary voice to sing. With these changes, which one might make, it would not be changed harmonically. The words sung on notes within that range would sound all right, with a band, an orchestra or any instrumentalists.

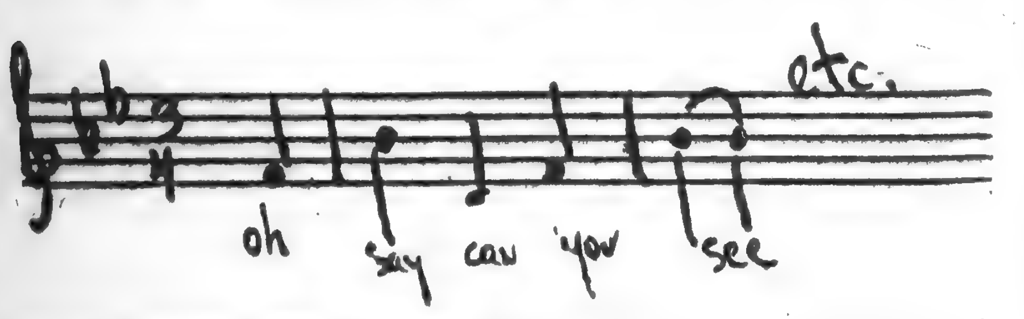


With spirit (♩= 104)
1. Oh, say! can you see by the daw
2. On the shore, dim-ly seen thro' the mis
3. Oh, thus be it ev-er when fre

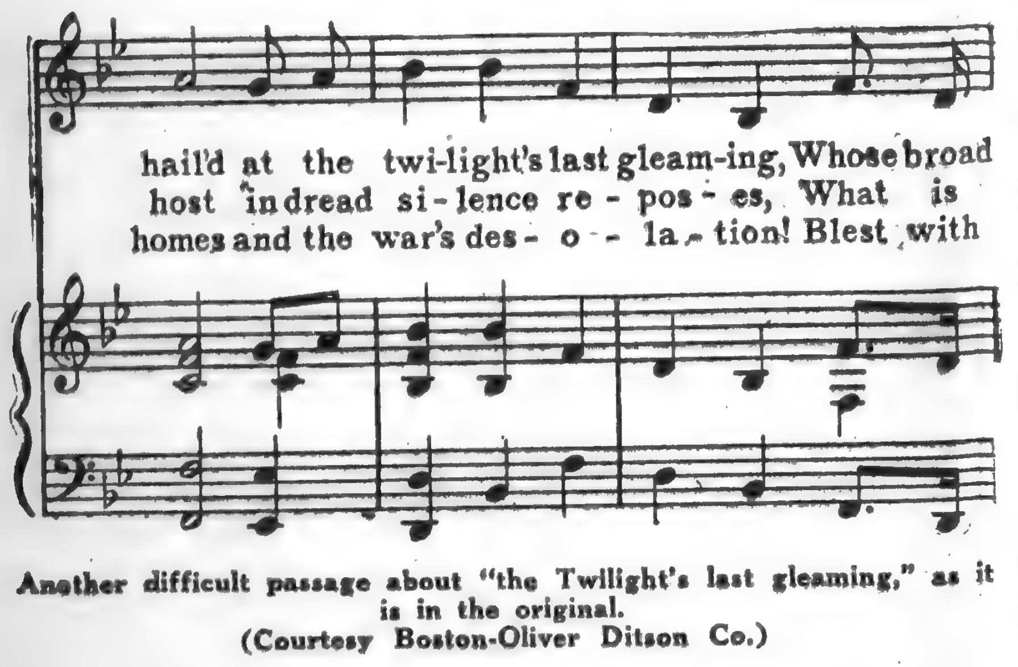
As "The Star Spangled Banner" is now sung. This phrase is a bit difficult as it stands.
(Courtesy Boston-Oliver Ditson Co.)



A possible variant and easier to sing version of the well-known phrase, "Oh, say, can you see . . ."



Another possible variant of the phrase "Oh, say, can you see . . ." easier on the ordinary voice.



hail'd at the twi-light's last gleam-ing, Whose broad host in dread si-lence re-pos-es, What is homes and the war's des-o-la-tion! Blest with Another difficult passage about "the Twilight's last gleaming," as it is in the original.

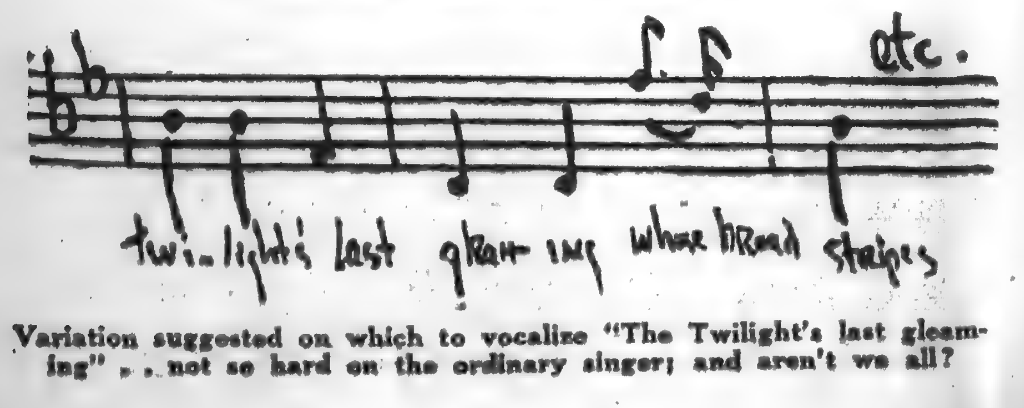
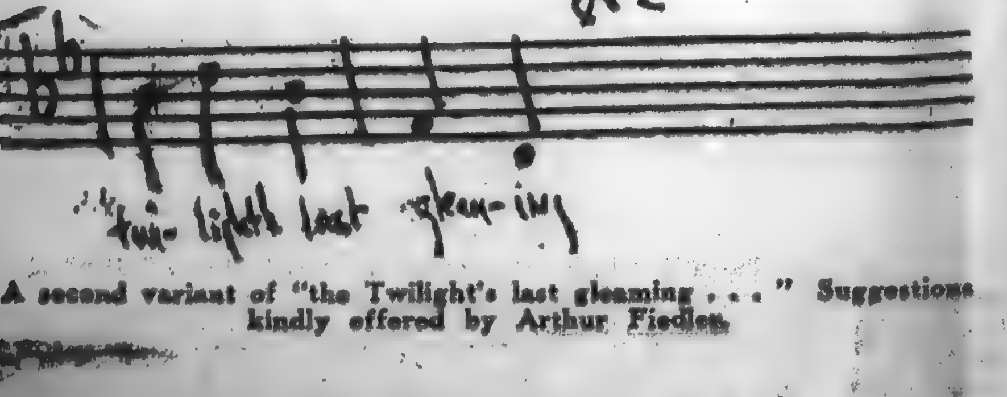
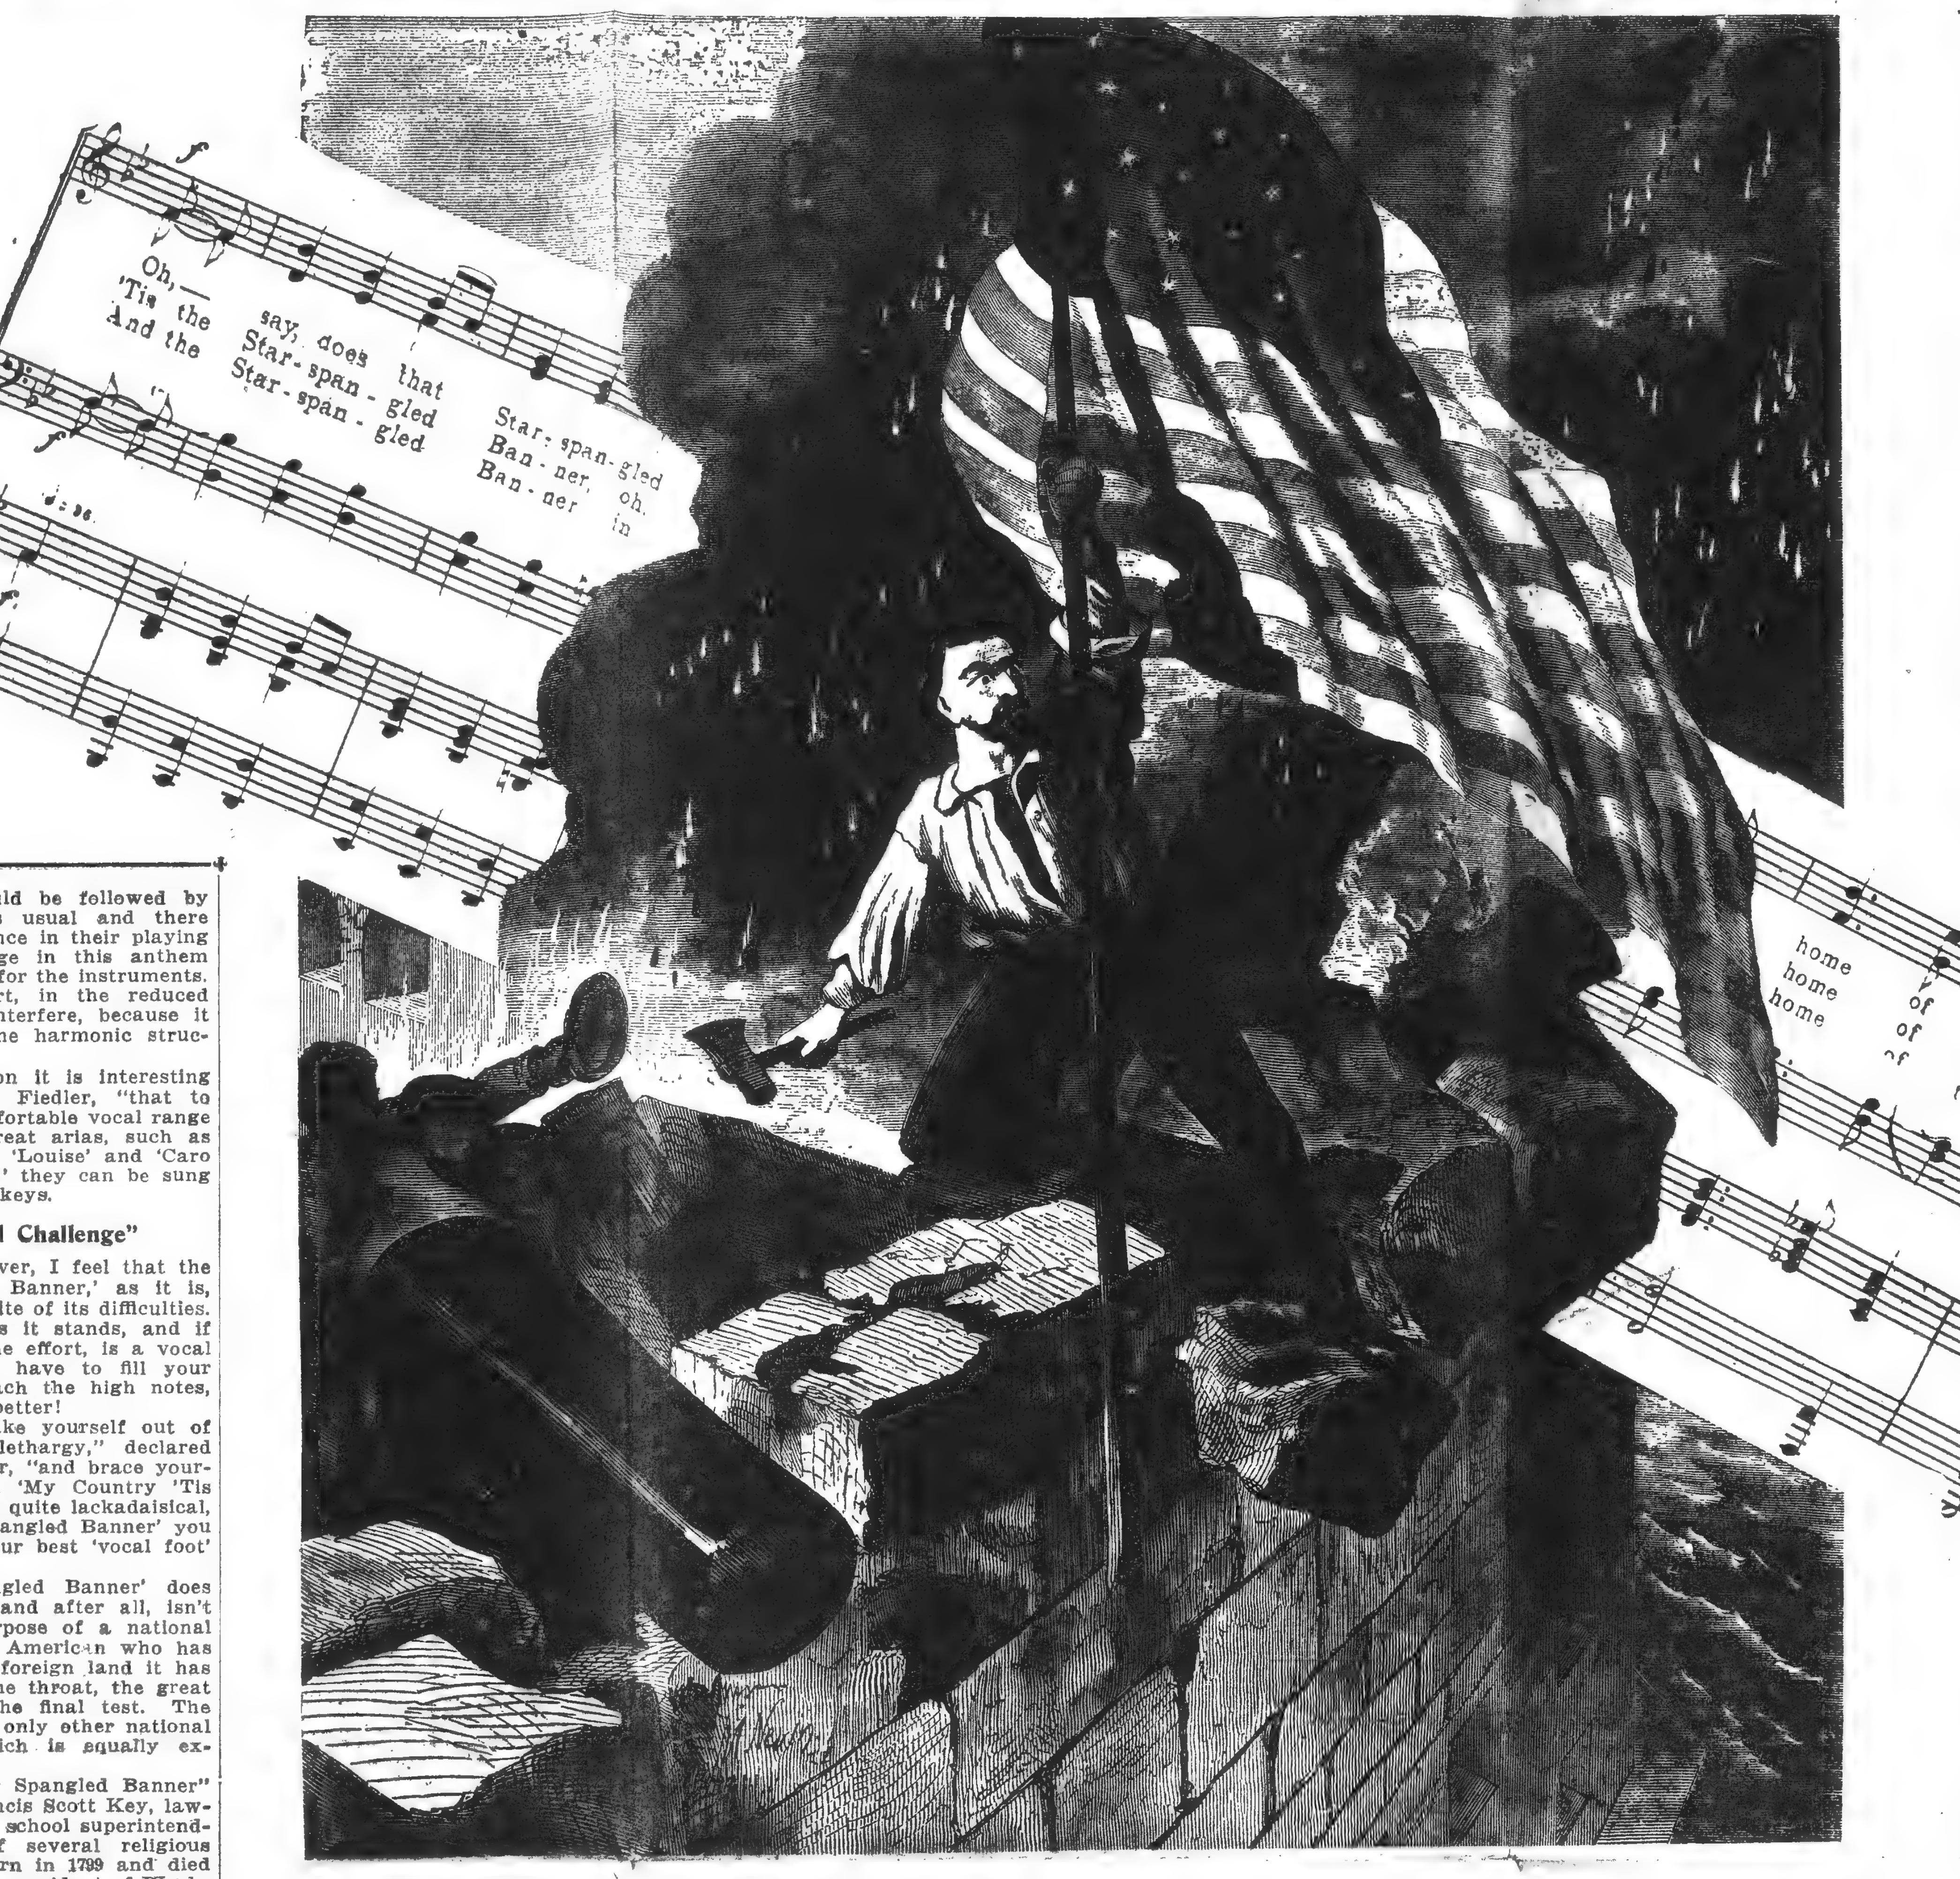
(Courtesy Boston-Oliver Ditson Co.)



Variation suggested on which to vocalize "The Twilight's last gleaming" . . . not so hard on the ordinary singer; and aren't we all?



A second variant of "the Twilight's last gleaming . . ." Suggestions kindly offered by Arthur Fiedler.



Oh, say, does that Star-spangled
'Tis the Star-span-gled Ban-ner, oh,
And the Star-span-gled Ban-ner in home of the brave?
home of the brave!
home of the brave

"The Flag was still there!" Fine old wood-cut from a contemporary magazine, illustrating how Police Sergeant Hart nailed the Star Spangled Banner to the temporary flag-staff on the ramparts of Fort McHenry. The flag had fallen a moment before this and that had been taken as a sign of surrender. But now it was up again, to be the symbol of victory and to inspire one of the most exciting patriotic songs, from the pen of Francis Scott Key, "The Star Spangled Banner."—"And the rockets red glare, the bombs bursting in air, gave proof through the night that the Flag was still there!"

"The melody would be followed by the instruments as usual and there would be no difference in their playing parts, for the range in this anthem holds no difficulties for the instruments. And the vocal part, in the reduced range, would not interfere, because it is built on the same harmonic structure.

"In this connection it is interesting to note," went on Fiedler, "that to achieve a more comfortable vocal range for some of the great arias, such as 'Depuis Le Jour' in 'Louise' and 'Caro Nome' in 'Rigoletto,' they can be sung in a choice of two keys.

"It's a Vocal Challenge"

"Personally, however, I feel that the old 'Star Spangled Banner,' as it is, has 'real guts' in spite of its difficulties. It's more heroic, as it stands, and if it requires a genuine effort, is a vocal challenge, and you have to fill your lungs deeply to reach the high notes, why, so much the better!

"You have to wake yourself out of your usual vocal lethargy," declared the dynamic director, "and brace yourself to sing it. In 'My Country 'Tis of Thee' you can be quite lackadaisical, but in 'The Star Spangled Banner' you simply must put your best 'vocal foot' forward.

" 'The Star Spangled Banner' does something to you, and after all, isn't that the whole purpose of a national anthem? To every American who has ever heard it in a foreign land it has given the grip at the throat, the great thrill, and that's the final test. The 'Marseillaise' is the only other national hymn I know which is equally exciting."

The famous "Star Spangled Banner" was written by Francis Scott Key, lawyer, soldier, Sunday school superintendent and author of several religious hymns. He was born in 1799 and died in 1843, was a lifelong resident of Washington—his mansion there now becomes a national monument.

He wrote it on the back of an envelope, as he was held prisoner in a little boat in the early morning after the night of 1814 which saw the terrific bombardment of Fort McHenry, commanding Baltimore Harbor. He is also said to have specified the music of "Anacreon in Heaven," often sung at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand, London.

There were many songs written to the word-pattern of the "Anacreontic Song," for when a tune was popular, lyric writers would make words to fit it. So with this anthem. Key wrote the words to the word-pattern of this popular air, and as a matter of fact, had no idea at the time that it would get beyond a probable printing in the Baltimore paper.

Poured From His Heart

What is important is that the fervent words poured forth from Key's heart under the most exciting patriotic conditions. If it has in it somewhat of the fury of war, well, it came out of the fury of war. He had in memory on that stirring morning the many songsters he had read, among them, undoubtedly "The Robin Song Book," "Clio and Euterpe, a Collection of Songs and Cantatas," and very likely, "The Columbian Songster, or Jovial Companion," subtitled, "Mirth, Love and Sentiment, Here Happily Blended, The Chastest Ear Unoffended."

Another song of that period, written in the "Anacreontic" measure for example, was called "The Fate of Columbus," and the first line ran, "On the cliffs of the Andes, where Virtue once Reigned." One of the first references to this as a National Anthem is found in an article written by Mrs. Anna Dorsey, in 1861, the first year of the Civil war.

In the Washington Sunday Morning Chronicle, she several times referred to "Our National Anthem, the 'Star Spangled Banner'." Since then, it has been so considered. Yet the War Department Regulations and General Orders do not state it as such. It is ordered to be played, mentioned in connection with other National Anthems, to be rendered with dignity, while its playing as part of a medley is prohibited.

Music of a Drinking Song

John Stafford Smith, an English organist, wrote the music for the song "To Anacreon in Heaven," about 1775, a convivial piece, which became very popular and was brought over to this country to become the basis for several texts. One of the most widely sung was called "Adams and Liberty," Robert Treat Paine of Boston being the author of that lyric, which ran, in part: It was first sung here on June 1, 1798:

> "Ye Sons of Columbia, who bravely have fought,
> For the rights which unstained from your sires has descended,
> May you long taste the blessings your valor has bought,
> And your sons reap the soil, which your fathers defended."

The service version of "The Star Spangled Banner," prepared for the Army and Navy song and hand books and for school and community singing, at the time of our entrance in the World war, was devised and decided upon right here in Boston.

The committee of 12 consisted of John Alden Carpenter, Frederick Converse, Wallace Goodrich and Walter R. Spaulding, representing the War Department commission on training camp activities; Peter W. Dykema, Hollis Dann and Osbourne McConathy, representing the music supervisors' national conference; C. C. Birchard, Carl Engel, William Arms Fisher, Arthur Edward Johnstone and E. W. Newton, representing the music publishers.

That committee met in the editorial rooms of the Oliver Ditson Company on Tremont street, and the story of that epocal conference is very interesting. It was told me by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory of Music, who served on the committee.

Hub Created Service Version

"How was the definitive Service Version evolved?" I asked Mr. Goodrich.

"Well," he replied, "you know the War Department Commission on Training Camp Activities had charge of just that, and it was a big job, recreational activities for all that chain of camps throughout the country; it included entertainment, boxing, band concerts, and of course mass singing.

"This committee was appointed to supervise the singing, and the Committee of Twelve had to consider 'The Star Spangled Banner,' which would naturally be sung everywhere. It was found that in different places in the country it was sung differently.

"It was decided to get out a song book for all these 50 or 60 camps, with uniform music. The problem was to decide on that music. So questionnaires were prepared for each song leader in each camp, which would furnish data on which to work.

"Each song-leader had his thousands of young soldiers sing it in chorus, noting down, carefully, measure by measure, the way it was naturally sung in each section of the country, North and South, East and West, to serve toward a standardized version. Within the last 50 years, you know, the government of France formed a standardized version of the 'Marseillaise.'

"When all these answered questionnaires had been sent in," went on Wallace Goodrich, "we sat down one morning and went over it measure by measure, to get the melody fixed. Then we went on to the accompaniment. Finally we all agreed on a version, though we spent as much as three hours on some passage which showed variation.

"It really was a solemn and striking moment, when, finally, we all stood up, somebody played it on the piano and we all sang it for the first time, as it was to be.

Out of the Hearts of the People

"That was in the summer of 1917, and from three to four million copies of that song-book, with the service version of 'The Star Spangled Banner' were printed and distributed throughout the army camps and other service camps, too."

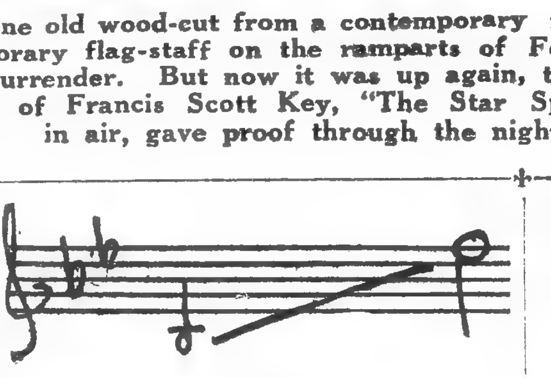
The head of the New England Conservatory, Mr. Goodrich, made a full military band arrangement of the anthem, for use in every regimental band in the service, and another band version was made by Stanislas Gallo.

"We didn't want to say arbitrarily how the anthem should be sung, but to standardize it with the least possible necessary disturbance of popular tradition. So that version you might say came out of the hearts of the American people, the country over, even as they had been brought up to sing it.

"Frederick S. Converse, dean of the faculty of the Conservatory of Music, made the orchestral arrangement of 'The Star Spangled Banner,' which was used at the beginning of each Boston Symphony Concert from November, 1917, to the end of the war."

"Did John Philip Sousa help in making this version?" I asked.

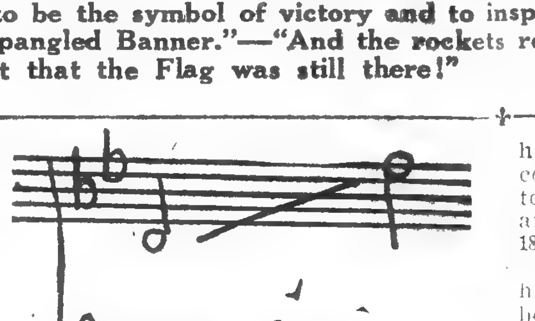
"He was not on the committee, but he was very much interested and I believe he was consulted at that time," said Mr. Converse.



The present vocal range of "The Star Spangled Banner," a little too extended for the average Americano's voice.

Victor Herbert, composer of light operas and many popular songs therein, also made an excellent orchestral version which is played in Symphony Hall now and at the Esplanade concerts.

" 'The Star Spangled Banner'! Is it vulgar and boastful and all those things which Dr. John H. Holmes says of it?" I put the question to H. Augustine Smith, the genial director of church and community music at Boston University, noted producer of pageants, whose hymnals are distributed by the million throughout the world.



Possible range on which "The Star Spangled Banner" might be sung, still keeping the song harmonically the same, but making it a bit easier to sing.

His eyes twinkled. "I know Dr. Holmes, an old Malden boy, a poet; who wrote a splendid hymn, 'America Triumphant,' which is in my 'American Student Hymnal,' published by D. Appleton-Century.

Has Fine Lyric Quality

"He is qualified to speak. I don't think I agree with him on this point, but then, there are many who wouldn't agree with me.

"I used to think 'The Star-Spangled Banner' was inane, boastful; all those things Dr. Holmes calls it, but having heard it sung so often, all over the country, for years, I've softened a bit toward it. It has all the fire and fury and the hope of that far-off War of 1812; it's a very stirring and vivid song.

"Anyway, I'm sure Francis Scott Key hadn't the least idea it would ever get beyond the Baltimore paper; any more than Samuel F. Smith thought that 'My Country, 'Tis of Thee,' would ever be heard beyond the walls of the Park Street Church, let alone sound among the Rocky Mountains and be played by bands in France.

"As I look over the words of this seemingly immortal lyric," went on the genial H. Augustine Smith, "I find it has halting rhythms, and the words are not always perfect. But there is a lyric quality about it, a vividly descriptive force which is very challenging. I don't see why it is boastful. 'The land of the free and the home of the brave'; everybody says it, perhaps in different words! Here's hoping we'll always be that," he laughed.

"It does begin with a colloquialism, just like a radio broadcast: 'Oh, say!' And one of the verses is pretty bloody and filled with vengeance—but what was it Sherman said about war? And this was written in the midst of an attack. That verse is pretty hard on England and I would not want to throw it in their faces.

"That's the verse, I suppose, which Dr. Holmes particularly abhors. The three regular verses, usually sung, are pretty good, I'd say. And the objectionable one, I've never used in my own song books. I don't believe one American in a thousand has ever heard of it, as it is very rarely printed anywhere.

"That stanza, which has always been the cause of argument, runs:

> "And where is that band who so vauntingly swore,
> That the havoc of war and the battle's confusion,
> A home and a country should leave us no more?
> Their blood has washed out their foul footsteps' pollution.
>
> No refuge could save the hireling and slave
> From the terror of flight and the gloom of the grave,
> And the Star Spangled Banner in triumph doth wave
> O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

"Nobody has to sing that verse. In fact you'll look a long time, before you find it in any song-book. So, why not forget it?

"The music is awfully good," said Mr. Smith, 'and a great thing to play in bands or in an orchestra, exhilarating. Some people complain they can't sing all the notes. Well, the American people are lazy, vocally, anyway.

Thrilling Moment

"I've often heard Sousa play it, and with massed bands it's great. When a fine singer goes up to the last high note, I think it is one of the most thrilling things in song. The parts are varied, too. It starts unison, goes into duet and closes with a very solid and moving chorus.

"Nobody can ever be completely satisfied with a hymn, anyway. They are all lacking in one point or another. As to writing another verse to take the place of the bloodthirsty one, well, there was the poet, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. He decided that 'My Country 'Tis of Thee' didn't have enough reference to peace, and the whole world at peace, so he added a stanza along those lineas. It was a good verse, and particularly appropriate it would be now, with all the undeclared but real war in the world. But nobdy ever bothered with Longfellow's verse."

As to the music of the "Star Spangled Banner," Francis Scott Key may have not been especially familiar with it. The chances are he followed the word pattern of it, as did so many other song writers of that day.

Good Crowd Song, Anyway

In fact, there was a legend about Key, with the implication that he was tone deaf. This was the story. He was seranaded one time by a group of friends who wished to honor him, and they played a tune very loudly and vigorously. When it was over, Francis Scott Key asked what the tune was, anyway. They replied: "Why, that's your famous anthem, 'The Star Spangled Banner!' "

According to an investigation, made by the late Oscar Sonneck, head of the music division of the Library of Congress, there was considerable evidence for the basis of that legend.

William Schwenk Gilbert, who wrote the librettos for Sullivan's comic operas, was possessed of the same ability to write elaborate verses, though he did not know any music. He is quoted as saying, "I know only two tunes. One is 'God Save the Queen,' and the other isn't."

Well, anyway, "The Star Spangled Banner" is a good crowd song. And, after all, isn't it a crowd song? If a few miss a note here and there, the crowd manages to hit all the notes.

The Star Spangled Banner, long may it wave!

KURYER CODZIENNY CZWARTEK, 9-GO GRUDNIA, 1937.

Koncert Hofmanna w Bostonie

HOFMANN

W przyszłą niedzielę, 12-go grudnia, odbędzie się w Symphony Hall w Bostonie, niezwykły koncert. U fortepianu zasiądzie wielki polski muzyk, Józef Hofmann, w pięćdziesiątą rocznicę sensacyjnego swojego debiutu w naszym mieście.

Ogłoszenie wyjątkowej tury artystycznej p. Hofmanna, bo taką ona jest przez wzgląd na złoty jubileusz muzyka, przywodzi na pamięć czasy pierwszych jego w tym kraju występów, kiedy jako dziesięcio - letni chłopiec wziął szturmem świat koncertowy tak, jak go brał zawsze dotychczas.

Pięćdziesiąt lat temu "Harper's Young People" tak o naszym muzyku pisał: "Przez blisko cztery lata pokazywał się on przed publicznością jako pianoforte virtuoso, a ostatnio występował bardzo często, wywołując sensację. Nigdy nie pisano tyle o młodym chłopcu, co wtedy o młodym Hofmannie".

"Kiedy liczył sześć lat wystąpił po raz pierwszy z koncertem dobroczynności, następstwem czego było, że jego ojciec został zasypany ponętnymi ofertami o zaangażowanie małego synka. Ale stale je odrzucał, pozwalając dziecku tylko okazyjnie występować na cele dobroczynne. Mając siedm lat, grał Hofmann pierwszą część koncertu Beethovena i w tym to czasie po raz pierwszy słyszał jego grę Anton Rubinstein w Warszawie i na ten fenomen muzyczny zwrócił uwagę niemieckiego impresario Hermanna Wolffa. Kiedy Rubinstein dawał swój wielki historyczny koncert w Londynie, powiedziano mu o nowo wykrytym dziecku - dziwie, ale wstrząsnął głową i powiedział, że nie wierzy w takie dziwne dzieci, lecz dodał, że słyszał o jednym takim chłopcu, jakiego jeszcze dotąd historja muzyki nie wydała i uderzając nerwowo w fotepian, który stał przy nim, mistrz ten zawołał, że nazywa się ten chłopiec Józef Hofmann".

Dopiero, kiedy Józio liczył dziewięć lat życia, ustąpił jego ojciec namowom ze strony Wolffa o przedstawienie chłopca publiczności.

Debiut Hofmanna miał miejsce w hali koncertowej w Berlinie — przy akompanjamencie filharmonicznej orkiestry. Nastąpiły potem koncerty w Danji, Szwecji, Norwegji pod patronatem królowej duńskiej, następnie w Paryżu i innych europejskich miastach. Słuchali Hofmanna znani kompozytorzy, a Saint - Seans wyraził się, że młody Hofmann nie ma już nic do uczenia się w muzyce, ponieważ wszystko w nim jest muzyką.

Koncert Hofmanna odbędzie się, jak powtarzamy, w Symphony Hall w niedzielę popołudniu. Będzie to koncert jego złotego jubileuszu — koncert, jakiego nie zna historja muzyki świata, bo nie notuje dotąd wypadku, żeby artysta dożył do czasu 50-tej rocznicy swojego debiutu.

Recent Phonograph Records

B. Trans — Jan. 4/38

Brilliant Orchestral Recordings from Philadelphia and Symphony Hall; Music for Strings

By Moses Smith

Leopold Stokowski is not one of your purists for whom the last recorded note of a composer is sacred. In the course of his years of direction of the Philadelphia Orchestra he has laid hold on any number of Bach's work and subjected them to the transcriber's tools. The exceptional quality of these transcriptions, enhanced by magnificent orchestral playing, has not prevented the cry of "Sacrilege!" from coming out of the mouths of critics. But against this is to be set the undeniable fact that the works in question have found a much larger audience than would otherwise have been the case, and thus brought pleasure to thousands.

There was not, perhaps, the same justification for Stokowski's pastiche of "Tristan," but the recent telescopic version of "Boris Godounov" will find supporters, because "Boris," masterpiece though it is, remains relatively little known. The Philadelphians have now reduced their version to phonograph records, of which it consumes six twelve-inch sides (Victor album M-391). The selection by Stokowski seems good, inevitably including, of course, the magnificent Coronation scene, but also finding place for the music when the starving crowd asks Boris for bread—music that certainly justifies Lawrence Gilman's remark, "The immense pitifulness, the sorrowing tenderness, the fathomless compassion of Moussorgsky's music are among the precious heritages of our time."

The performance is remarkable for brilliance, sonority and expressiveness. It is difficult to write too enthusiastically about the recording, which brings this performance to the listener with a fidelity and sharpness such as has probably never before been done in phonography.

A close second, in the matter of recording, is the two-pocket Victor album (M-392), devoted to the Liszt "Dance of Death," as played by Jesus Maria Sanroma and the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler. What has just been said with regard to the orchestra and phonography may be repeated here with respect to the piano, which emerges, for once from an electrical reproducer, as less like an oversized harpsichord than a modern grand piano. The performance, too, is very good. Mr. Sanroma tosses off the Lisztian fire-works with exceptional brilliance, and Mr. Fiedler and his Bostonian colleagues accompany him with more than customary fire and intensity. And here again the recording is excellent.

Under the title, "Program No. 1," Victor has released an album (M-390; seven twelve-inch records) of works played by the NBC String Symphony Orchestra under Frank Black. It contains the engaging Second Sinfonietta of Miaskovsky, the Third Symphony in C major by C. P. E. Bach, Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky and Sibelius's Canzonetta for strings. Whether the four works, which are not sufficiently dissimilar in content, make a good "program" is one thing. But each composition was worth recording in itself, and is here ably and sympathetically performed by a first-class string ensemble. The Miaskovsky Sinfonietta reaches at times a considerable intensity. It is music of our time without being uncomfortably dissonant. As to the Bach, the best of it is, as expected, in the slow movement. The first movement ends so abruptly that I suspect there has been something wrong in the recording or the assembling of the several sides.

Somewhat belatedly I have got around to a Columbia album (Set No. 295; five twelve-inch sides), which is devoted to a Concerto in B minor for viola and orchestra, reputedly by Handel, discovered and arranged by Henri Casadesus. The Columbia leaflet which accompanies the records and conveys this information does not quiet, in the reader, the suspicion of lack of authenticity. But the music itself, whether actually by Handel, or simply something that Casadesus cooked up in Handel's style, is very much worth playing, especially when the solo violist is so admirable a player as William Primrose. He is capably joined by a chamber orchestra under Walter Goehr.

"Tulen synnyn" partituuri saapunut Bostoniin

Lähetettiin Berliinistä New Yorkiin radiovalokuvana.

(Sähkösanoma)

Boston, jouluk. 29 p. — Jean Sibeliuksen sävellyksen "Tulen Synty" partituurin se osa, mikä kuljetuksessa yli Atlantin joutui hukkaan, mutta lähetettiin tänne radiovalokuvauksen välityksellä, tuo lähetys ollen ensimmäinen laatuaan historiassa, saapui tänään tänne junalla.

Bostonin Sinfoniaorkesterin johtaja, Sergei Koussevitzky sanoi, että "Tulen Synty" voidaan esittää kahden harjoituksen jälkeen, tänään ja huomenna, sillä Y. L:le tämä musiikki on tunnettu.

Partituurin lähetys tapahtui Leipzigistä Berliiniin puhelinjohtoa myöten ja Berliinistä New Yorkiin radiolla. Lähetys otti aikaa vähän päälle 12 tuntia.

R. C. A:n virkailijat arvelivat, että lähetys Berlinistä tänne tuli maksamaan lähes $800.

SIDELIGHTS OF THE WEEK

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1938

REVISION: For 123 years "The Star-Spangled Banner" has been the bane of singers because of its wide range of twelve notes. Last week Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and Esplanade concerts of the Boston Symphony suggested that singers would be happier if the range were reduced to ten notes. With such revision, he declared, "the words would sound all right with a band, orchestra or instrumentalists." He added: "Personally, I feel that 'The Star-Spangled Banner' is more heroic as it stands and is a real vocal challenge."

Mr. Fiedler, son of the famous Max Fiedler, one-time conductor of the Boston Symphony, literally grew up with the orchestra and is sometimes called its "son." In his years as baton-wielder at the Pops and the Esplanade concerts he has brought out many thousands of Bostonians to hear his successful blend of the classical and popular. The result has been frequent use of the sign "Standing Room Only."

B. Globe — Jan. 1/38

Berkshire Festival

With a minimum of fuss ground has been broken for what is sure to be an important addition to the attractiveness of New England as a cultural recreational center. The projected "music shed" that is to shelter 5000 auditors at the August concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been begun at Tanglewood, the beautiful estate given as the permanent home for this festival.

The structure between Lenox and Stockbridge will add to the distinction already gained by the Berkshires as a wonderful Summer resort. Already the festival has made a name for itself among music lovers far and wide. As the years pass a steadily increasing patronage may be expected. It may be that an even larger building will be required in the not too distant future, but those responsible for the beginning deserve congratulations now for what they are accomplishing both for music in America and for New England.

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

DEC 25 1937

Leo Reisman, begins his series of broadcasts for "Your Hit Parade" today at 10 p. m. over CBS—WQAM. Reisman began his musical career when he was a song plugger at $1 an afternoon when he was only 10 years old. He was offered a scholarship at the New England Conservatory of Music by an official who heard him. At the end of his education in that institution he became a concert violinist and at the age of 18 was first violinist with the Boston symphony orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1938

CONCERT AN

The memory of the rainstorm that almost succeeded in washing out last Summer's Berkshire Festival in Stockbridge, Mass., may have spurred things along in the attainment of a permanent protective shed. At any rate, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their faithful Summer following need no longer fear the raging elements. For the shed is now an assured thing.

The necessary $80,000 for its construction has been raised, and matters have reached the stage of contracts. The structure will cover an acre and a half, and will be built of a framework of steel not more than forty feet in height. In accordance with original plans, it will be fan-shaped and open on all sides.

RAIVAAJA

(THE PIONEER)
THE LEADING FINNISH DAILY IN THE UNITED STATES.—ESTABLISHED 1905

29

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

MUSIC AND DANCE AT THE INSTITUTE

A Stirring Concert. It was the performance of a Beethoven symphony that first introduced Koussevitzky, indirectly, to a large American public. The place, London, where Serge Koussevitzky acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra; the occasion, an almost simultaneous performance of the same score by a famous German conductor. Ernest Newman writing on the pros and cons of the two interpretations in the American Mercury said, "The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober, elderly German gentleman shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitzky makes of him is only Koussevitzky himself. . . . Koussevitzky, by playing the Ninth Symphony as if it had been written by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man, gives us, I contend, a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. Koussevitzky's reading, therefore, is the genuinely classic one: it reproduces for us the vigor and the tension the work must have had for its creator and for the men of his day, not this vigor and tension watered and slackened down through a century of false idealization."

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening, January 7, Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica" will be performed. Legend says that it was inspired by General Bernadotte, at that time Ambassador of the French Republic to Vienna, and although history does not bear out this genesis, there is no doubt that the story, apocryphal as it is, unfolds the secret of its composition: a magnificent faith in the Republican Bonaparte. Koussevitzky's rendering brings out the passion of dead events and makes the hearing of this symphony an exciting and ever living experience. A new score, introduced during the present season, Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," will also be played. This orchestral suite, which Prokofieff has arranged from the incidental music to the Soviet film, is light and satirical in character. The Lieutenant was an imaginary figure, springing from a misunderstood remark that a military aid made to the Czar and perpetuated through fear of pointing out that the Czar could make a mistake. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" rounds out an unusual evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SAN JOSE, CAL.
MERCURY - HERALD

DEC 29 1937

Lost Symphony Radioed Across Atlantic Ocean

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Dec. 28. — Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston Symphony orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for 'cello, viola and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score,after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18 by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Condutor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

[illegible]

France Has Fresh Group of Composers

JUST as Germany must always have her great Richard—the Second is still active, and the Third must be just around the corner—the sunny and turbulent land of the French cannot be without a Young France. The dominant set of innovators and pathbreakers grows old and dies out; a new gallant Jeune France takes the helm.

Of the old post-Debussyan guard only the valiant and ardent, the amazingly youthful Florent Schmitt remains, and he is now the highly revered leader of the living French composers' phalanx, observes Lazare Saminsky in the New York Herald-Tribune.

Activities of Two Groups

During the last decade or so we have witnessed the activities of two groups of Young France, one that seemed active and important, "les six," and another that proved to be "a modest cough in the Hall of Fame," the "Ecole d'Arceuil." The "six" included such highly gifted and important composers as Artur Honegger, author of "King David," and Darius Milhaud, composer of "Christopher Columbus," a very unusual operatic venture. But being a heterogenous group of dissimilar gifts and mentalities drawn together by musical politics, the "six" as such quickly disintegrated and faded out.

The "Ecole d'Arceuil" lasted only a short time, for its chief patron and glorifier was the velvet gentleman from Arceuil; Eric Satie, whose fame rested mainly on the absurd titles invented by him for his scant and dry fruit. Satie was supposed to have given Debussy his ideas of art and points for tonal innovation. We have a suspicion that Debussy would have appeared in any case and carried on exactly as he did—without a prompter.

New Group Rises

Now a fresh group of Young France springs up, and its claim on public attention and influence in the musical affars of France seems well founded. This excellent and gifted quartet, Olivier Messaien, Daniel Lesur, Andre Jolivet and Yves Baudrier, each of them about 30, are neither wonderboys nor composers by propaganda. They are valuable well equipped and hard-working young musicians, all of them eminently conscious of their artistic aims and sure of their technique.

They are frank and direct. They are not afraid of being themselves, not afraid of a straightforward romantic turn in their emotional speech nor of a fastidious and complex swing coming from our day's tonal striving.

Talent and Strength

But what is particularly noticeable in this group is that a decidedly neo-Catholic tendency permeates their creation. This current is especially marked in the music of Olivier Messaien and Daniel Lesur, both composers of outstanding talent and astonishing technical strength.

In the last two seasons Messaien's work has often been heard in Europe, and in our country Serge Koussevitsky has given an admirable reading of a Messaien piece in New York and Boston. Messaien is the best known of the group and the most successful in blending the firm neo-Catholic, musical thought with the tonal means of our day. One should expect something of this kind from a young ardent musician who was born in Avignon, city of the popes, and has grown to be a leader of the youngest Parisians.

His remarkable song cycle Pomes pour Mi, a set of luminous and delicate litanies, is a clear issue of the ancient Catholic melos. When Messaien sings them himself he looks like an intent, almost possessed monk, like a twelfth-century chorister, member of the great Ekkehard chorus from medieval Mainz, or a presbyter celebrating the Nativity before a Hohenstaufen emperor on the shores of Lake Constanz.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dec. 19/37

By IRWIN FLUHARTY

Koussevitzky's Righteous Indignation

Last Sunday afternoon, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra in its only appearance of the season in Pittsburgh. Twice, during the first number, the Mozart A Major symphony, which is a composition written largely for strings, the conductor was interrupted by people walking down the aisle and hunting their seats when it was plainly printed on the programs that no one was to be seated until the end of the opening number. The conductor walked from the stage, remarking, in righteous indignation: "The fools, better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

After a few minutes, he did walk back, and proceed to give Pittsburgh music lovers something to talk about the rest of their lives, for his orchestra gave one of the finest performances the Smoky City ever heard.

His program, incidentally, included Jan Sibelius' Symphony in D Major, and at the conclusion of the program, he was so moved that he wrote Sibelius in his native Finland, telling him how he enjoyed playing this symphony, and, incidentally, how he felt about people who came to a concert late. Here is what he wrote:

My Dear Friend:

"I write to tell you what I think of audiences that do not behave. We have played nine concerts in 10 days. It is a great strain. This afternoon in Pittsburgh some people walk in when I am conducting Mozart, and it is too much. I leave the stage.

"What is it, my friend, that makes them act so? They buy good seats and then they come late. They should not do this. They must learn respect for the art, respect for the music and respect for the musicians.

"Later we played your second symphony. When I was in Helsingfors I told you you have never heard your music. Would you only come to America, I will show you what your music really is. You do not know, you can not know, because you have never heard it the way my boys played it this afternoon.

"The more I play your music, my friend, the more I adore it, the greater it becomes in my mind. You are beginning to be recognized after many years. It was so with Brahms, with Tschaikovsky, with Beethoven. It is so with you. The greatest happiness I could know would be to receive another composition from your hand.

Begs Him to Visit America

"Many times I have asked you to come to this country. You say the ocean is too much for you. You are old now, you say. I am no longer young either, but never before have I been so strong, and only now am I beginning a little to understand music. I shall conduct many years yet, and one day you will sit in my audience and listen to my orchestra play your music. Then you will know what I mean that you have never heard it.

Affectionately,
SERGE."

What greater tribute could anyone pay to a friend, or to an orchestra?

Not "Temperament"

Koussevitzky was not making a "temperamental" show. He is one of the greatest of the modern interpreters of the works of the masters, and an admitted peer when it comes to playing the works of Sibelius. He was simply a tired old man who felt his work was not appreciated.

The day of "temperamental" conductors is about gone, along with the hoop skirt. The time was when a conductor, simply because he was a conductor, elected to follow all sorts of foolish actions both on the stage and off. There was, for example, the conductor in Odessa, Russia, who would never play the "1812" overture, unless he was sitting astride a white horse right in the middle of the stage! And other such silly things were common.

It has been said of the great Toscanini that he is "temperamental" to the nth degree. But he does not "act up" during a program, however many batons he might break in rehearsal.

And, singularly enough, Toscanini, a great Beethoven interpreter, has never been able to get excited about the works of Sibelius. He explains that he cannot understand what Sibelius is trying to say in his music. And, naturally enough, if one must interpret, he must know what the composer wants interpreted.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

DEC [illegible]

AUDIENCE ETIQUETTE

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because late-comers were bustling in to their seats while music was being played.

This, probably, was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament; but it was also a richly-deserved rebuke for the tardy, and if more performers would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goer would be much pleasanter.

The starting-time of any concert is always announced in advance. If a patron can't get there in time, it's up to him to stand and wait until there is an intermission before hunting for his seat. By barging in while, the music is being played he makes an unmitigated nuisance of himself. Mr. Koussevitzky did a good job in dramatizing the annoyance that the tardy arrival causes.
—Salinas Index-Journal.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 28 1937

Symphony Manuscript Lost Crossing Ocean

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (INS)—Postal officials today were on the trail of a "lost symphony," original manuscript of "The Origin of Fire," unpublished masterpiece of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius.

The work has been A. W. O. L. since it was sent by mail from Leipzig, Germany. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was to have used the symphony at the opening of the American tour of the Helsinski University chorus next Friday and Saturday.

A companion package, containing some of the choral and instrumental parts arrived on schedule but the package containing the complete score was missing. Post office officials scouted a theory it may have been mislaid in the Christmas rush.

No copy of the work is known to exist. Doctor Koussevitzky was forced to substitute another Sibelius choral work for the Friday concert.

The Helsinski University Chorus will appear in a concert at the Memorial Auditorium Thursday evening.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR-TRIBUNE

DEC 20 1937

PROVIDENCE MUSICIAN IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

James B. Dolan, 21, Providence viola player, will appear in Boston tonight as a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Dolan was invited to play by the conductor, with whom he has been studying orchestra conducting.

The concert will feature the Boston premiere of "Rondo," a work of the Belgiam contemporary composer, Marcel Poot. After tonight's concert, Dolan will spend a brief vacation in Canada before leaving for Miami where he will rejoin the Miami Symphony orchestra conducted by Dr. Arnold Volpe.

Dolan is also a scholarship pupil of the University of Miami. He expects to return to Providence in the late spring.

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

MUSIC AND DANCE AT THE INSTITUTE

A Stirring Concert. It was the performance of a Beethoven symphony that first introduced Koussevitzky, indirectly, to a large American public. The place, London, where Serge Koussevitzky acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra; the occasion, an almost simultaneous performance of the same score by a famous German conductor. Ernest Newman writing on the pros and cons of the two interpretations in the American Mercury said, "The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober, elderly German gentleman shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitzky makes of him is only Koussevitzky himself. . . . Koussevitzky, by playing the Ninth Symphony as if it had been written by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man, gives us, I contend, a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. Koussevitzky's reading, therefore, is the genuinely classic one; it reproduces for us the vigor and the tension the work must have had for its creator and for the men of his day, not this vigor and tension watered and slackened down through a century of false idealization."

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening, January 7, Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica" will be performed. Legend says that it was inspired by General Bernadotte, at that time Ambassador of the French Republic to Vienna, and although history does not bear out this genesis, there is no doubt that the story, apocryphal as it is, unfolds the secret of its composition: a magnificent faith in the Republican Bonaparte. Koussevitzky's rendering brings out the passion of dead events and makes the hearing of this symphony an exciting and ever living experience. A new score, introduced during the present season, Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," will also be played. This orchestral suite, which Prokofieff has arranged from the incidental music to the Soviet film, is light and satirical in character. The Lieutenant was an imaginary figure, springing from a misunderstood remark that a military aid made to the Czar and perpetuated through fear of pointing out that the Czar could make a mistake. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" rounds out an unusual evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

111

SAN JOSE, CAL.
MERCURY - HERALD
DEC 29 1937

Lost Symphony Radioed Across Atlantic Ocean

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Dec. 28. — Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston Symphony orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for 'cello, viola and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18 by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Condutor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
DEC 19 1937

France Has Fresh Group of Composers

JUST as Germany must always have her great Richard—the Second is still active, and the Third must be just around the corner—the sunny and turbulent land of the French cannot be without a Young France. The dominant set of innovators and pathbreakers grows old and dies out; a new gallant Jeune France takes the helm.

Of the old post-Debussyan guard only the valiant and ardent, the amazingly youthful Florent Schmitt remains, and he is now the highly revered leader of the living French composers' phalanx, observes Lazare Saminsky in the New York Herald-Tribune.

Activities of Two Groups

During the last decade or so we have witnessed the activities of two groups of Young France, one that seemed active and important, "les six," and another that proved to be "a modest cough in the Hall of Fame," the "Ecole d'Arceuil." The "six" included such highly gifted and important composers as Artur Honegger, author of "King David," and Darius Milhaud, composer of "Christopher Columbus," a very unusual operatic venture. But being a heterogenous group of dissimilar gifts and mentalities drawn together by musical politics, the "six" as such quickly disintegrated and faded out.

The "Ecole d'Arceuil" lasted only a short time, for its chief patron and glorifier was the velvet gentleman from Arceuil; Eric Satie, whose fame rested mainly on the absurd titles invented by him for his scant and dry fruit. Satie was supposed to have given Debussy his ideas of art and points for tonal innovation. We have a suspicion that Debussy would have appeared in any case and carried on exactly as he did—without a prompter.

New Group Rises

Now a fresh group of Young France springs up, and its claim on public attention and influence in the musical affars of France seems well founded. This excellent and gifted quartet, Olivier Messaien, Daniel Lesur, Andre Jolivet and Yves Baudrier, each of them about 30, are neither wonderboys nor composers by propaganda. They are valuable, well equipped and hard-working young musicians, all of them eminently conscious of their artistic aims and sure of their technique.

They are frank and direct. They are not afraid of being themselves, not afraid of a straightforward romantic turn in their emotional speech nor of a fastidious and complex swing coming from our day's tonal striving.

Talent and Strength

But what is particularly noticeable in this group is that a decidedly neo-Catholic tendency permeates their creation. This current is especially marked in the music of Olivier Messaien and Daniel Lesur, both composers of outstanding talent and astonishing technical strength.

In the last two seasons Messaien's work has often been heard in Europe, and in our country Serge Koussevitsky has given an admirable reading of a Messaien piece in New York and Boston. Messaien is the best known of the group and the most successful in blending the firm neo-Catholic musical thought with the tonal means of our day. One should expect something of this kind from a young ardent musician who was born in Avignon, city of the popes, and has grown to be a leader of the youngest Parisians.

His remarkable song cycle Pomes pour Mi, a set of luminous and delicate litanies, is a clear issue of the ancient Catholic melos. When Messaien sings them himself he looks like an intent, almost possessed monk, like a twelfth-century chorister, member of the great Ekkehard chorus from medieval Mainz, or a presbyter celebrating the Nativity before a Hohenstaufen emperor on the shores of Lake Constanz.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

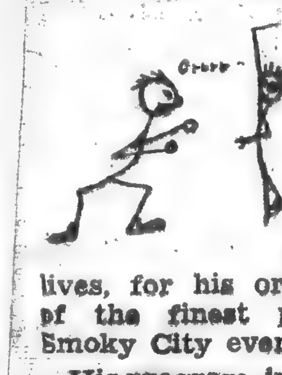
MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dec. 19/37

By IRWIN FLUHARTY

Koussevitzky's Righteous Indignation

Last Sunday afternoon, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra in its only appearance of the season in Pittsburgh. Twice, during the first number, the Mozart A Major symphony, which is a composition written largely for strings, the conductor was interrupted by people walking down the aisle and hunting their seats when it was plainly printed on the programs that no one was to be seated until the end of the opening number. The conductor walked from the stage, remarking, in righteous indignation: "The fools, better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."



After a few minutes, he did walk back, and proceed to give Pittsburgh music lovers something to talk about the rest of their lives, for his orchestra gave one of the finest performances the Smoky City ever heard.

His program, incidentally, included Jan Sibelius' Symphony in D Major, and at the conclusion of the program, he was so moved that he wrote Sibelius in his native Finland, telling him how he enjoyed playing this symphony, and, incidentally, how he felt about people who came to a concert late. Here is what he wrote:

My Dear Friend:

"I write to tell you what I think of audiences that do not behave. We have played nine concerts in 10 days. It is a great strain. This afternoon in Pittsburgh some people walk in when I am conducting Mozart, and it is too much. I leave the stage.

"What is it, my friend, that makes them act so? They buy good seats and then they come late. They should not do this. They must learn respect for the art, respect for the music and respect for the musicians.

"Later we played your second symphony. When I was in Helsingfors I told you you have never heard your music. Would you only come to America, I will show you what your music really is. You do not know, you can not know, because you have never heard it the way my boys played it this afternoon.

"The more I play your music, my friend, the more I adore it, the greater it becomes in my mind. You are beginning to be recognized after many years. It was so with Brahms, with Tschaikovsky, with Beethoven. It is so with you. The greatest happiness I could know would be to receive another composition from your hand.

Begs Him to Visit America

"Many times I have asked you to come to this country. You say the ocean is too much for you. You are old now, you say. I am no longer young either, but never before have I been so strong, and only now am I beginning a little to understand music. I shall conduct many years yet, and one day you will sit in my audience and listen to my orchestra play your music. Then you will know what I mean that you have never heard it.

Affectionately,
SERGE."

What greater tribute could anyone pay to a friend, or to an orchestra?

Not "Temperament"

Koussevitzky was not making a "temperamental" show. He is one of the greatest of the modern interpreters of the works of the masters, and an admitted peer when it comes to playing the works of Sibelius. He was simply a tired old man who felt his work was not appreciated.

The day of "temperamental" conductors is about gone, along with the hoop skirt. The time was when a conductor, simply because he was a conductor, elected to follow all sorts of foolish actions both on the stage and off. There was, for example, the conductor in Odessa, Russia, who would never play the "1812" overture, unless he was sitting astride a white horse right in the middle of the stage! And other such silly things were common.

It has been said of the great Toscanini that he is "temperamental" to the nth degree. But he does not "act up" during a program, however many batons he might break in rehearsal.

And, singularly enough, Toscanini, a great Beethoven interpreter, has never been able to get excited about the works of Sibelius. He explains that he cannot understand what Sibelius is trying to say in his music. And, naturally enough, if one must interpret, he must know what the composer wants interpreted.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 26 1937

AUDIENCE ETIQUETTE

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because late-comers were bustling in to their seats while music was being played.

This, probably, was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament; but it was also a richly-deserved rebuke for the tardy, and if more performers would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goer would be much pleasanter.

The starting-time of any concert is always announced in advance. If a patron can't get there in time, it's up to him to stand and wait until there is an intermission before hunting for his seat. By barging in while, the music is being played he makes an unmitigated nuisance of himself. Mr. Koussevitzky did a good job in dramatizing the annoyance that the tardy arrival causes. —Salinas Index-Journal.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 28 1937

Symphony Manuscript Lost Crossing Ocean

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (INS)—Postal officials today were on the trail of a "lost symphony," original manuscript of "The Origin of Fire," unpublished masterpiece of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius.

The work has been A. W. O. L. since it was sent by mail from Leipzig, Germany. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was to have used the symphony at the opening of the American tour of the Helsinski University chorus next Friday and Saturday.

A companion package, containing some of the choral and instrumental parts arrived on schedule but the package containing the complete score was missing. Post office officials scouted a theory it may have been mislaid in the Christmas rush.

No copy of the work is known to exist. Doctor Koussevitzky was forced to substitute another Sibelius choral work for the Friday concert.

The Helsinski University Chorus will appear in a concert at the Memorial Auditorium Thursday evening.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR-TRIBUNE
DEC 20 1937

PROVIDENCE MUSICIAN IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

James B. Dolan, 21, Providence viola player, will appear in Boston tonight as a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Dolan was invited to play by the conductor, with whom he has been studying orchestra conducting.

The concert will feature the Boston premiere of "Rondo," a work of the Belgiam contemporary composer, Marcel Poot. After tonight's concert, Dolan will spend a brief vacation in Canada before leaving for Miami where he will rejoin the Miami Symphony orchestra conducted by Dr. Arnold Volpe.

Dolan is also a scholarship pupil of the University of Miami. He expects to return to Providence in the late spring.

(112)

Harvard Club to Give Dinner to Symphony

The Harvard Club of Boston will give a dinner in honor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Jan. 28.

It seems only natural, but the fact is it's never been done before. There will be about 500 men in Harvard Hall on Commonwealth avenue that night, among them about 100 musicians, without instruments.

The cultural implications of the dinner for the hosts, the guests and the city will be spoken by Bentley Wirt Warren, Serge Koussevitzky and James Rowland Angell. Edward A. Taft will be toastmaster.

There is no end of reasons why the Harvard Club of Boston should have the Boston Symphony Orchestra in to break bread, but Charles H. Watkins, chairman of the entertainment committee for the Harvard Club, will tell you there is no particular reason for this particular dinner.

~~Higginson Was Founder~~

The late Henry Lee Higginson, first president of the Harvard Club of Boston, was founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony orchestra. To Serge Koussevitzky, who crosses the Charles River Thursday nights to bring music to Cambridge, Harvard gave its doctorate of laws in 1929. He is a member of the Harvard Club of Boston. So is G. E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

President-emeritus Angell of Yale University, who received a Harvard honorary doctorate of laws, too, is now educational adviser to the National Broadcasting Company. N. B. C. brought Dr. Koussevitzky's and Boston's music to the nation on a coast-to-coast hookup. Edward A. Taft is not only president of the Harvard Club but also head of the Friends of the Symphony Orchestra.

Bentley Wirt Warren, who happened to go to Williams College and get his honorary doctorate there, requires no identification among Bostonians. He speaks for the trustees of the orchsetra.

Dr. Koussevitzky, quite enthusiastically, it was learned, announced the invitation to the orchestra at the Monday morning rehearsal. One of the musicians is Miss Louise Came, a harpist. Women are admitted to the Harvard Club only on Sundays.

Last night, after the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky made no attempt to disguise his elation with the unusual invitation. "Significant," he called it.

"This invitation is something more than an honor to the orchestra itself. It is an indication of the cultured level of the community that a leading club should invite a symphony orchestra en masse to do it honor," he said.

"Such a close association between leaders in art and social life cannot but be of benefit to both factions and to the community at large. It makes me very happy."

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES

DEC 28 1937

Orchestra to Get Score Over Radio

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP).—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston symphony orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany.

The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Two packages were mailed from Leipsig Nov. 18, but only one was received. This contained only separate orchestral parts. Failure to receive the complete score already had caused Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, to rearrange the Friday program.

The Death of Maurice Ravel; A Question of Immortality

B. Her. Dec. /37

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The death on Dec. 28 of Joseph Maurice Ravel was a considerable shock to the musical world. It was a shock not so much because it cut off a career in its prime—regrets on that score could have been more properly expressed during these last years of his prolonged illness—but because it brought home to us the changing conditions of musical creation. These are chilly words with which to signalize the death of a great composer, and let us make haste to amend them.

Ravel was a composer who, certainly in our own time, enjoyed the favor of the public and yet has been cruelly misunderstood by many people who should know better. The man in the street recalls the Bolero at mention of his name, and the intellectual frowns upon it. Yet why a remarkable stunt of the moment and, incidentally, a demonstration lecture on instrumentation should any longer cause much comment does not make sense. Ravel's own aims may be more circumscribed than the aims of the greatest composers; but it can not be denied that his achievements within those limitations are respectable and that no one has excelled him in his own line.

He was never the violent revolutionary that early critics seemed to discern in his music; nor is his work saccharine or facile as some hostile listeners have not hesitated to remark at least in conversation. What he did accomplish was music of exquisite texture and perfection of workmanship. His designs are not vast or heroic; and it is ridiculous to object that "Daphnis and Chloe" is not a symphony and "L'Heure Espagnole" a Wagnerian music drama. That is looking for something that the artist never set out to do. He was a perfectionist in his own branch, and we have no right to complain that he was not a Titan in the main stream.

ATTEMPT AT PROPHECY

There is a theory, sometimes produced for our edification, that it is better to fail on a grand scale than succeed on a small. Thus Mahler, who often came croppers in his gigantic works, must be a greater composer than Ravel, who never wrote an awkward page. Even time does not sort out and unequivocally rank the protagonists. Put it in terms of another art. Would you say that Browning, who did some clumsy work, was greater than two other dissimilar poets, Swinburne and Arnold?2 The analogy is not at all exact, because Browning wrote beautiful short lyrics as well as poems in large design, and Swinburne had his Mary Stuart tragedies. Was Van Gogh greater than Degas? Another imperfect analogy, but it will serve to enlarge the view of the problem that we are undertaking to set up.

It will be pessimistically observed that many composers popular in their own day have been neglected by posterity. Look, it will be said, at the cases of Spohr, Meyerbeer, Raff and other composers; will not Ravel go the same way? But that easy comparison has a serious flaw in it, when more than superficially examined. Composers like Meyerbeer were renowned and popular for their most important works, whereas the popularity of Ravel is based on one minor stunt and a few of his orchestral scores. We shall be surprised to learn that every singer includes his songs on a program, that the opera public is familiar with "L'Heure Espagnole" and "L'Enfant et les Sartileges," that "Gaspard de la Nuit" is played at every other piano recital, that "Le Tombeau de Couperin" is as well known a short orchestral piece as the "Waldweben," the Academic Festival Overture and "L'Apprenti Sorcier." In short the legend of Ravel as a popular composer, in more than a little of his work, is not hard to dispel.

MUSICIANS' COMPOSER

Ravel is really a composer for more than the ordinarily musical listener. To some, it may be, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" is precious; but a musician can not help delighting in the subtle effects of tone, the sheen of the orchestration, the clever use of old themes in this as in other works of Ravel. As an orchestrator Ravel's music ought to have a long life, and his scores will be studied carefully to learn how he got his effects. Sometimes in his music there is more of manner than of matter, The songs and some of the chamber music should survive on their own merits. His polished style ought to preserve much of the orchestral music as well. We can always do in this world with masterpieces of style as well as of substance.

We have made no attempt in this article at an evaluation of Ravel's work in any detail. Such considerations can properly wait until the commemorative concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra later this month. We have merely tried to point out that there have been misconceptions of Ravel's art and that his claim to fame has a sound basis. There are some indications that Ravel may have outlived the cycle of taste which would have had none of him. When a young composer, like Daniel-Lesur, in France writes about Ravel in ecstatic terms, we may assume that his music will not fade from indifference and contempt.

SALEM, ORE.
STATESMAN

DEC 29 1937

Sibelius Musical Score Is Radioed Across Atlantic

BOSTON, Dec. 28—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston symphony orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory preformance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

It was believed to be the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

B. Globe 1937 Dec.

Ravel, the Last Picturesque French Composer

The last picturesque figure in modern French music is gone. During the final years of Maurice Ravel, there were other distinguished composers in France, but only one—Albert Roussel—occupied a comparable rank as creative artist. Roussel passed away in August. Last Tuesday death brought to Ravel, in a Paris hospital, the end of several years of suffering and impaired capacity for work.

There was no one like the mature Ravel, whose creative path led away from the Debussyan impressionism that had influenced him in early years. With the music of Roussel and D'Indy, that by Ravel had no points of similarity save the clarity of texture, the esthetic refinement and the logical thought that are a common heritage of the French mind. Ravel had more than this, a sense of diablerie that may have been given him by his Basque ancestry.

Although preoccupation with form possessed him from his student days with Gabriel Faure, the unconventionality of his harmonies and a bizarre flavor to be found generally in his music soon won him cordial dislike from conservative musicians who thought such nonsense could come only from an enfant terrible.

As most strong creative personalities usually do, Ravel went calmly his own way. He left behind him the excessive refinement of Debussy, and found his own path somewhat by the help of such Russians as Borodin, whose music interested Ravel in his early years just as it interested Debussy. Yet he was French to the core. His own music is absolutely original and carefully wrought. His fertile melodic invention was attracted to a sort of expression at once cool, sparkling, ironic and witty, in which sentiment —but not sensuousness—was conspicuously absent.

The beauty of Ravel's music lies, too, in the bright facets of his harmony, and the shapeliness of his tonal patterns, as those things have come to be recognized in the past 30 years. All these qualities are to be found in the "Daphnis and Chloe" suites, "Mother Goose," "La Valse," the songs to Tristram Klingsor's words, "Scheherazade," his chamber and piano pieces; and these are but a few of his finest compositions.

Ravel was not a nature painter on the order of "La Mer," nor was he a tonal philosopher or dramatist. He dealt most successfully in music on a small formal scale. His "Tombeau de Couperin," for example, is a masterpiece of its kind, with, moreover, a captivating antique charm. The work by which he may continue to be best known to the general public was one of his least important; an amazingly clever technical stunt, but nevertheless unimportant work that goes by the name of "Bolero."

The greater part of Ravel's fame, despite his melodic gifts, may rest on his orchestration. As he turned from Debussy, so in the treatment of the orchestra he advanced from the point where Rimsky-Korsakoff had stopped. Ravel's orchestration was never so lush as that of Rimsky; it was more piquant and enriched by a wider range of subtle colorings.

Perhaps Ravel was amused by the irony of his own career, since he lived to see himself transformed in the public eye from a suspect modernist, to a somewhat old-fashioned codger in the regard of the young musical lions who came upon the scene just after the war. Now that he is no longer among us, it will probably be easier to see the actual place which he occupies in the history of music.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

DEC 29 1937

Missing Parts of Sibelius Score Reach Boston Symphony by Radio

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP) Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston symphony orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola, and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on Nov. 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION - STAR

DEC 30 1937

Orchestra Gets Score via Radio

Sibelius' Music Rushed by Trans-ocean Photo To Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 30—(UP)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train yesterday.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 29 1937

Score To Be Played By Boston Orchestra

"Origin Of Fire" Flashed Over Ocean By Radio After Parts Vanish.

Boston, December 28—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic Ocean tonight, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

DEC 31 1937

Ground Broken For Music Shed

Pittsfield, Mass., Dec. 31—(AP) —Ground was broken today at Tanglewood for the Berkshire Symphonic festival's music shed. Work will be rushed on the steel framework of the structure as soon as plans for the building, to seat 5,000 persons, are approved by the state building inspector.

The building will be completed in time for six concerts to be given in August by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, is the estate given to the orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline as a permanent home for the festival. It is where Nathaniel Hawthorne, the novelist, lived when in the Berkshires 85 years ago. Joseph Franz, trustee of the festival, will supervise construction.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

DEC 29 1937

Lost Sibelius Score Is Radioed to Boston

Boston, December 28.—(AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipzig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work on Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipzig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Sibelius Works To Be Sung Here By Finnish Chorus

Composer Gives Views on Aspects of His Music and Its Performance

By Carleton Smith

The appearances of the Helsinki University Chorus should be auspicious occasions for all Sibelians. Its first broadcast this afternoon, its concerts around the country and its coming appearances in Boston and New York with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (with whom it will sing "Ukko, the Fire Maker," which is Sibelius's setting of a part of the forty-seventh runo of the "Kalevala" and his ballad for chorus and orchestra, "The Captive Queen") will enable innumerable music lovers to hear for the first time significant choral scores of the greatest living symphonist and, moreover, to hear them in the language in which they were conceived from the throats of young men who are themselves Finns and who have inherited a similar "ancestral memory" and have grown up in the same environment as Sibelius himself.

It should be a healthy and stimulating experience to make the acquaintance of the less familiar of Sibelius's compositions and, through them, to follow more closely the development of his genius. There is more to the work of any great master than his most popular pieces--in the instance of Sibelius, "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste" and the works of his maturity, the later symphonies. Yet, of his more than 100 opus numbers, we hear very few. The creations of his "Sturm and Drang" period—in fact, all his non-orchestral music, is seldom heard in our concert rooms. His representative songs, his chamber music, choral music, piano music, even his incidental music for plays, are practically unknown.

Views on Performance

The coming of the Helsinki Chorus affords us not only a long-missed opportunity, but a rare one, as it has had the unique privilege of being heard by Sibelius and of receiving definite instructions from him as to how he wishes his compositions sung. And no composer I have ever met has more certain notions about how his music should be performed than Sibelius.

He not only wants every instrument to be present, every note to be sounded, but he wants them sounded as he intended them to be. He left a Kajanus rehearsal in Helsinki one day when a third trumpet was missing because he could only hear "that trumpet which wasn't there and he couldn't stand it." Four years ago a world-famous violinist played his concerto with the Helsinki symphony and deleted a short passage in the opening movement. Sibelius listened over the radio and fumed. Last winter when another visiting fiddler sought permission to play the same concerto, he telephoned the conductor, Georg Schneevoigt, and said "No! No! I think it better not! She might not want to play it all!"

Sibelius has his own opinion, too, of conductors who, when recording his symphonies, wilfully disregard his tempi, make arbitrary modifications of his phrasing and even of his scoring. If you listen attentively to his casual remarks on this subject, it is easy to get oblique glimpses of his feelings. He is far too polite and politic, however, to condemn conductors publicly; he remembers his hurt during the years his music was neglected and now he isn't taking chances by offending any one. "I—I—uh! Mmmm! I cannot say—I like all!" he replied to a question about which of his symphonies he considered was the best recorded.

Sibelius will not make a criticism that might reflect on a famous conductor. I inquired what sort of bells he had in mind for the glocken figure in the last movement of his fourth symphony. "Wuh! Wuh! I—uh! wuh! I cannot say," he spluttered as he does when he becomes nervous. "Stokowski likes great sound. I—uh—not say for me. I, sphinx!"

During several conversations I gathered he was not entirely satisfied by any performance he had ever heard of his symphonies, even those of Kajanus, his close friend. In the late hours one night he divulged a few indications as to what he liked and disliked in various interpretations, but immediately he exacted a promise of absolute secrecy. "It is always a compromise," he concluded, "for a composer never hears exactly what he had in mind." In general, his objection was that conductors did not understand Sibelius, that they played him not in terms of himself, but in terms of their own personality; that they couldn't resist making an "effect" with his music.

Chose Works To Be Sung Here

Silbelius himself chose the compositions which the Helsinki University Chorus is to sing here. After hearing their performance of "Ukko the Fire Maker," he told me: "This, I think, very good for America—will be very understood there. Yo? No?"

But as yet he has not been persuaded to let us hear the remaining two of the four legends which complete his Op. 22, "Lemminkainen and the Maids of Saari" and "Lemminkainen in Tuonela." Lost for thirty years and brought to light only after the death of Kajanus, they have not been heard outside Finland and Scandinavia. Both are inspired by the Kalevala and are approximately twelve minutes each in length. The first, "Lemminkainen and the Maids of Saari," is intense and passionate and yet concentrated and reflective, in mood not unlike the "Liebestod" of "Tristan." The second is morbid, full of eerie sadness, of the same sepulchral timber as "The Swan," though more placid and without any suggestion of movement in the land of death.

Unknown Works of Value

A single playing by the Helsinki City Symphony under Georg Schneevoigt convinced me that these tone poems are worthy to rank alongside of their companion-pieces, and that of his best work in large watercolors, intimately portraying his sitters in their drawing rooms. They suggest the style of Raoul Dufy.

Theater Designs

A show of theater designs for Strindberg's "Bridal Crown" and other productions, by the Lithuanian artist Stasys Usinskis, is attracting attention in the lobby of the Roger Smith Restaurant, at Madison Avenue and Forty-first Street. Usinskis, who came to New York recently to do the sets and costumes for the Strindberg drama, knows his theater. Some of the designs, which include watercolor sheets for the stage settings, with the decor for Goldoni's "Love of Three Oranges" and a series of abstract designs for a modern version of "Oedipus Rex," are highly imaginative. His impressions of New Yorkers in "Mr. U. Views Times Square" are anything but complimentary, Mr. Usinskis having some of the vitriol of a George Grosz in his best German vein.

The Studio Guild

The three shows on at the Studio Guild, in the Heckscher Building, through the holidays include work by Gertrude G. Gardner, of New York; Virginia Adolph, also of New York, and Bertha Lyon Buchanan, California artist, who is represented by desert scenes and flowers. Mrs. Gardner exhibits flowers and landscapes, confidently painted, of which her large "Red Tulips" is richest in effect, and a view of sumac-covered

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 31 1937

MUSIC BRIEFS

The All-American Light Opera Company, directed by Roy de Valliere, will present Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl," at the Winter Garden Theatre, Tremont and Washington avenues, the Bronx, on Friday evening, January 7.

Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano, and Ezio Pinza, basso, will give a joint recital before the Columbia University Institute of Arts and Sciences on Saturday evening, January 8, in the McMillian Academic Theater, Broadway and 116th street.

Events at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next week include a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on Friday evening, January 7; and the appearance of Uday Shan-Kar and his Hindu ballet on Wednesday evening, January 5.

"Il Trovatore" will be presented by the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Masque Theater, in Newark, on the evening of January 18. The performance, sponsored by L. Bamberger & Co., is for the benefit of the Hospital and Home for Crippled Children.

Carrying out its policy of sponsoring young dancers, the American Dance Association will present Marie Marchowsky, Suzanne Remos, Marjory Hyder, Evelyn Jackson, Eva Desca, Ida Soyer, Ida Little, Dvo Seron and Fanya Chochem and her group in recital at the Y. M. H. A., Lexington avenue and Ninety-second street, on Saturday evening, January 8.

Carina Orasto, soprano, will give a recital devoted to works of Gluck and Weber at the Barbizon next Tuesday night.

The third and final recital of the series devoted to the violin and piano sonatas of Beethoven will be given at the Institute of Musical Art, 120 Claremont avenue, by Samuel Gardner, violinist, and Lee Pattison, pianist, on Saturday evening, January 8.

Erno Rapee will dedicate his "Music Hall on the Air" broadcast, beginning at 12:30 P. M. Sunday, to the memory of Maurice Ravel, noted composer who died earlier this week.

Quinto Maganini will conduct the Maganini Chamber Orchestra in the first of a series of Children's Concerts at the Pickwick Theater, Greenwich, Conn., on Saturday morning, January 8. The series is sponsored by the Junior League.

On Sunday evening, Bruno Eisner will give a recital at the Lexington avenue Y. M. H. A.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 31 1937

ORCHESTRA PROGRAMS

John Barbirolli conducts his last Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concert for a month on Sunday afternoon. Mischa Elman, violinist, again will be soloist with the orchestra on that occasion, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto. The Beethoven Second Symphony, Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs, Suite No. 3," and the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture complete the program.

At tomorrow night's concert the Beethoven symphony, the Berlioz overture and a group of Johann Strauss works will be played.

Next Wednesday Georges Enesco begins his engagement as guest-conductor of the orchestra. On his opening program, which will be repeated next Friday afternoon, he will feature the first American performance of the symphonic poem "Acteon," by his fellow Rumanian, Alfred Allesandresco. Other works on the program are Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," the Haydn Symphony in D major (B&H. 104), and the "Grand Fete at Capulet's House" from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

At the popular-priced concert on Saturday evening, January 8, the distinguished French violinist, Yvonne Astruc, will make her American debut, as soloist in the Bach Invention in B-flat major, and in Germaine Tailleferre's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. The latter work, written in 1936 and dedicated to Mme. Astruc, will have its first American performance on this occasion. The Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E flat ("Eroica"), and a symphonic piece from Franck's "The Redemption" complete the program.

* * *

Two choral scores of Sibelius will have their first performances in New York at next Thursday's concert by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. They are "The Origin of Fire," from "Kalevala," and "The Captive Queen." The Helsinki University Chorus from Finland will assist the orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at this concert. Sibelius's "Finlandia" and "Pohjola's Daughter," and Brahms's Third Symphony, in F major, complete the program.

At the concert on Saturday afternoon, January 8, Emma Boynet, French pianist, will appear as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in C major (K. 467). A Concerto for Orchestra by Karl Philip Emanuel Bach, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor, will complete the program.

* * *

Arturo Toscanini will conduct the NBC Symphony Orchestra in the following program at tomorrow night's broadcast concert: The Schubert Symphony in C major; two movements from Beethoven's String Quartet in F major, opus 135, and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The program for his third concert with the orchestra, to be broadcast on Saturday night, January 8, is: Overture to "La Cenerentola," by Rossini; Schumann's Symphony in E flat (The "Rhenish"); Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre" and Debussy's "La Mer."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 1 - 1938

Two Sibelius Works Heard in U. S. First Time

Choral-Symphonic Pieces by Finnish Composer Are Performed in Boston

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, Dec. 31.—An American audience today heard for the first time two choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete, "The Origin of Fire," for barytone solo, male chorus and orchestra, was written in 1920, soon after the composer's second symphony.

The second Sibelius work, new to the United States, was "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, which was warmly received by the capacity audience.

Rugged and at times exciting, "The Origin of Fire" was sung with brilliance by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance.

"The Origin of Fire" is a work of epic power and grandeur and, as one critic said, "masterly in its gradual emergence from the atmosphere of darkness and gloom into radiance and glow."

An early barytone solo, sung by Helge Virkkunen, tells of the disappearance of light and how Ukko, lord of the gods, traversed heaven and earth in search of it.

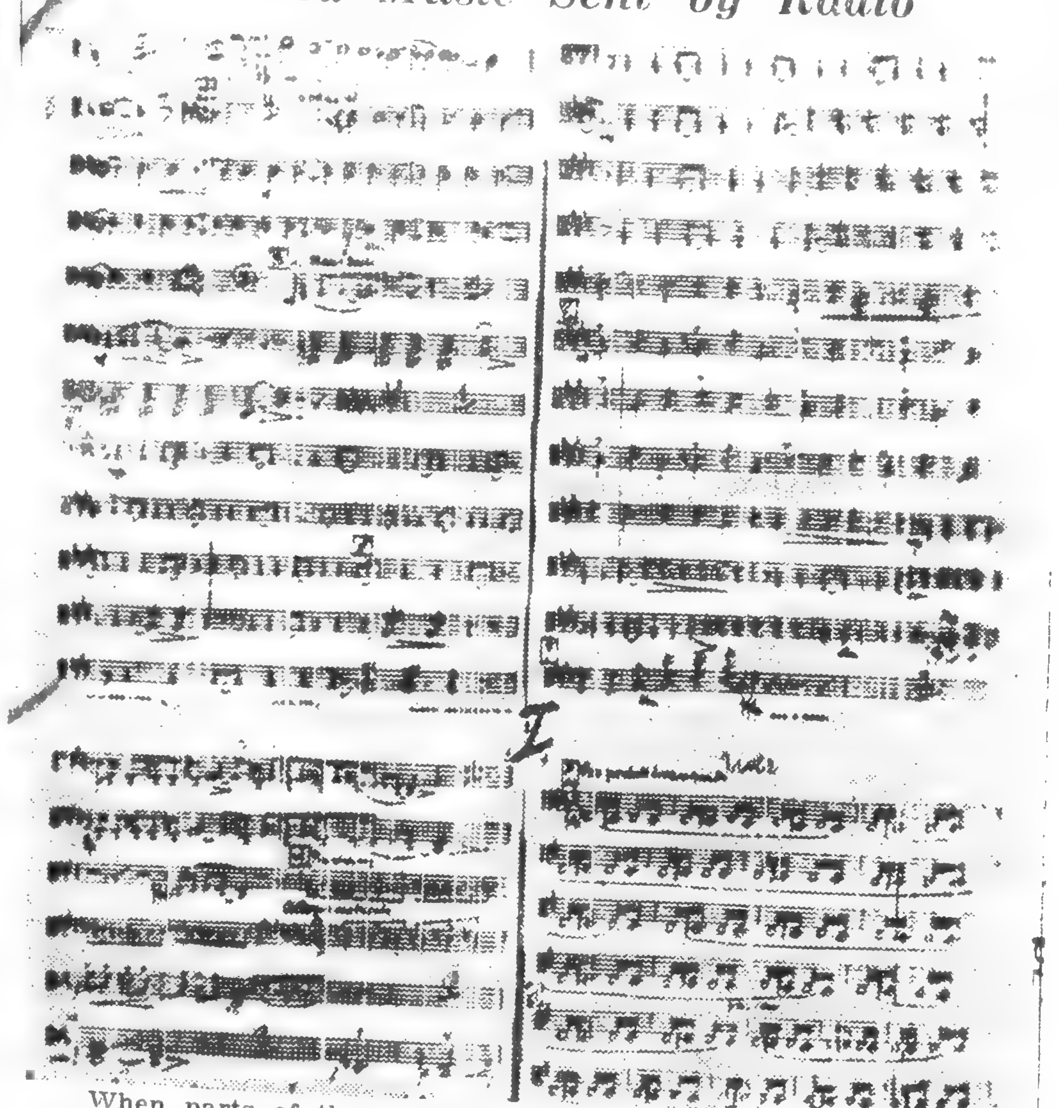
The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed November 18. Fourteen pages of copies of the manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin, and the facsimiles were enlarged here in time for today's performance.

Serge Koussevitzky, who directed, used the choral score, which provided the instrumental cues.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD-STAR

DEC 29 1937

Printed Music Sent by Radio



When parts of the score of "Origin of Fire," an early symphonic-choral work by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius, were lost in the mails enroute from Leipzig to Boston, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra nearly had his plans for a Dec. 31 performance spoiled. But science came to his aid and the above photo of the score was transmitted yesterday from Berlin to New York by radio.

—Associated Press Photo

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

JAN 1 - 1938

American Audience Hears Finnish Work

Boston, Dec. 31—(AP)—An American audience today heard for the first time two early choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete "The Origin of Fire," for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra—was written in 1920 soon after his second symphony.

The second Sibelius work, new to this country was "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, which as warmly received by the capacity audience.

Rugged, and at times exciting, "The Origin of Fire," was sung with brilliance by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed November 18. Fourteen pages of copies of the manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin and the fascimiles enlarged here in time for today's performance.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 1 - 1938

SIBELIUS' WORKS WARMLY RECEIVED

BOSTON, Dec. 31 (AP)—An American audience today heard for the first time two early choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete "The Origin of Fire", for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra was written in 1920 soon after his Second Symphony.

The second Sibelius work, new to this country was "The Captive Queen", a ballad for chorus and orchestra, was warmly received by the capacity audience.

Rugged, and at times exciting "The Origin of Fire", was sung with brilliance by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, 'cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed November 18. Fourteen pages of copies of manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin and the facsimiles enlarged here in time for today's performance.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION

JAN 4 - 1938

The Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season for the first time in its 57-year history. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have this honor.

Sibelius Works To Be Sung Here By Finnish Chorus

Composer Gives Views on Aspects of His Music and Its Performance

By Carleton Smith

The appearances of the Helsinki University Chorus should be auspicious occasions for all Sibelians. Its first broadcast this afternoon, its concerts around the country and its coming appearances in Boston and New York with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (with whom it will sing "Ukko, the Fire Maker," which is Sibelius's setting of a part of the forty-seventh runo of the "Kalevala" and his bailad for chorus and orchestra, "The Captive Queen") will enable innumerable music lovers to hear for the first time significant choral scores of the greatest living symphonist and, moreover, to hear them in the language in which they were conceived from the throats of young men who are themselves Finns and who have inherited a similar "ancestral memory" and have grown up in the same environment as Sibelius himself.

It should be a healthy and stimulating experience to make the acquaintance of the less familiar of Sibelius's compositions and, through them, to follow more closely the development of his genius. There is more to the work of any great master than his most popular pieces—in the instance of Sibelius, "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste" and the works of his maturity, the later symphonies. Yet, of his more than 100 opus numbers, we hear very few. The creations of his "Sturm and Drang" period—in fact, all his non-orchestral music, is seldom heard in our concert rooms. His representative songs, his chamber music, choral music, piano music, even his incidental music for plays, are practically unknown.

Views on Performance

The coming of the Helsinki Chorus affords us not only a long-missed opportunity, but a rare one, as it has had the unique privilege of being heard by Sibelius and of receiving definite instructions from him as to how he wishes his compositions sung. And no composer I have ever met has more certain notions about how his music should be performed than Sibelius.

He not only wants every instrument to be present, every note to be sounded, but he wants them sounded as he intended them to be. He left a Kajanus rehearsal in Helsinki one day when a third trumpet was missing because he could only hear "that trumpet which wasn't there and he couldn't stand it." Four years ago a world-famous violinist played his concerto with the Helsinki symphony and deleted a short passage in the opening movement. Sibelius listened over the radio and fumed. Last winter when another visiting fiddler sought permission to play the same concerto, he telephoned the conductor, Georg Schneevoigt, and said "No! No! I think it better not! She might not want to play it all!"

Sibelius has his own opinion, too, of conductors who, when recording his symphonies, wilfully disregard his tempi, make arbitrary modifications of his phrasing and even of his scoring. If you listen attentively to his casual remarks on this subject, it is easy to get oblique glimpses of his feelings. He is far too polite and politic, however, to condemn conductors publicly; he remembers his hurt during the years his music was neglected and now he isn't taking chances by offending any one. "I—I—uh! Mmmm! I cannot say—I like all!" he replied to a question about which of his symphonies he considered was the best recorded.

Sibelius will not make a criticism that might reflect on a famous conductor. I inquired what sort of bells he had in mind for the glocken figure in the last movement of his fourth symphony. "Wuh! Wuh! I—uh! wuh! I cannot say," he spluttered as he does when he becomes nervous. "Stokowski likes great sound. I—uh—not say for me. I, sphinx!"

During several conversations I gathered he was not entirely satisfied by any performance he had ever heard of his symphonies, even those of Kajanus, his close friend. In the late hours one night he divulged a few indications as to what he liked and disliked in various interpretations, but immediately he exacted a promise of absolute secrecy. "It is always a compromise," he concluded, "for a composer never hears exactly what he had in mind." In general, his objection was that conductors did not understand Sibelius, that they played him not in terms of himself, but in terms of their own personality; that they couldn't resist making an "effect" with his music.

Chose Works To Be Sung Here

Silbelius himself chose the compositions which the Helsinki University Chorus is to sing here. After hearing their performance of "Ukko the Fire Maker," he told me: "This, I think, very good for America—will be very understood there. Yo? No?"

But as yet he has not been persuaded to let us hear the remaining two of the four legends which complete his Op. 22, "Lemminkainen and the Maids of Saari" and "Lemmikainen in Tuonela." Lost for thirty years and brought to light only after the death of Kajanus, they have not been heard outside Finland and Scandinavia. Both are inspired by the Kalevala and are approximately twelve minutes each in length. The first, "Lemminkainen and the Maids of Saari," is intense and passionate and yet concentrated and reflective, in mood not unlike the "Liebestod" of "Tristan." The second is morbid, full of eerie sadness, of the same sepulchral timber as "The Swan," though more placid and without any suggestion of movement in the land of death.

Unknown Works of Value

A single playing by the Hel[illegible] City Symphony under Georg Sc[illegible] voigt convinced me that the[illegible] poems are worthy to rank a[illegible]side of their companion-pieces [illegible] that of his best work in large watercolors, intimately portraying his sitters in their drawing rooms. They suggest the style of Raoul Dufy.

Theater Designs

A show of theater designs for Strindberg's "Bridal Crown" and other productions, by the Lithuanian artist Stasys Usinskis, is attracting attention in the lobby of the Roger Smith Restaurant, at Madison Avenue and Forty-first Street. Usinskis, who came to New York recently to do the sets and costumes for the Strindberg drama, knows his theater. Some of the designs, which include watercolor sheets for the stage settings, with the decor for Goldoni's "Love of Three Oranges" and a series of abstract designs for a modern version of "Oedipus Rex," are highly imaginative. His impressions of New Yorkers in "Mr. U. Views Times Square" are anything but complimentary, Mr. Usinskis having some of the vitriol of a George Grosz in his best German vein.

The Studio Guild

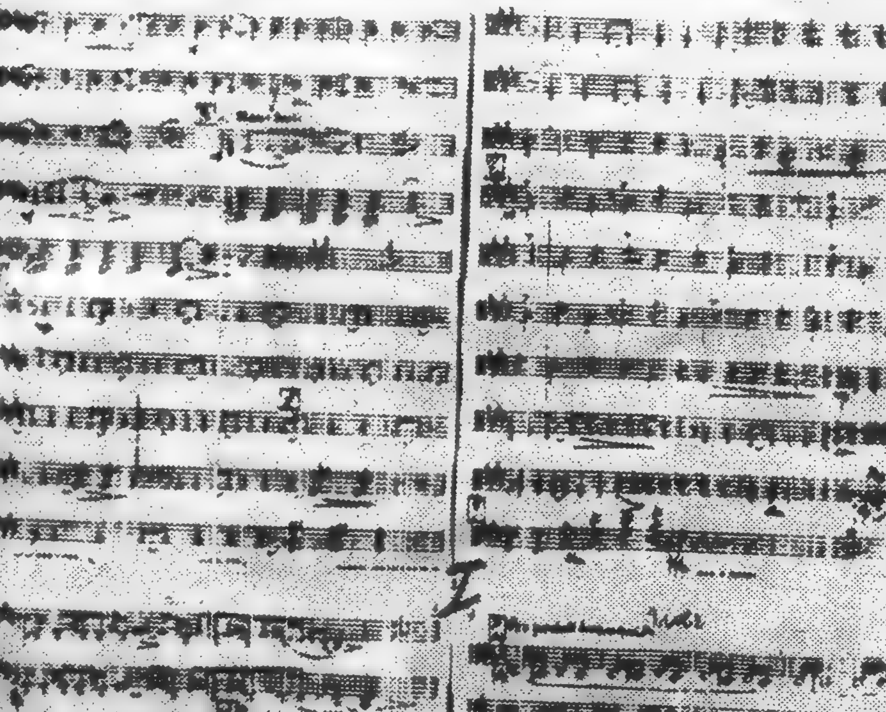
The three shows on at the Studio Guild, in the Heckscher Building, through the holidays include work by Gertrude G. Gardner, of New York; Virginia Adolph, also of New York, and Bertha Lyon Buchanan, California artist, who is represented by desert scenes and flowers. Mrs. Gardner exhibits flowers and landscapes, confidently painted, of which her large "Red Tulips" is richest in effect, and a view of sumac-covered

---

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD-STAR

DEC 29 1937

Printed Music Sent by Radio



When parts of the score of "Origin of Fire," an early symphonic-choral work by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius, were lost in the mails enroute from Leipzig to Boston, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra nearly had his plans for a Dec. 31 performance spoiled. But science came to his aid and the above photo of the score was transmitted yesterday from Berlin to New York by radio.

—Associated Press Photo

13

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 31 1937

MUSIC BRIEFS

The All-American Light Opera Company, directed by Roy de Valliere, will present Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl," at the Winter Garden Theatre, Tremont and Washington avenues, the Bronx, on Friday evening, January 7.

Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano, and Ezio Pinza, basso, will give a joint recital before the Columbia University Institute of Arts and Sciences on Saturday evening, January 8, in the McMillian Academic Theater, Broadway and 116th street.

Events at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next week include a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on Friday evening, January 7; and the appearance of Uday Shan-Kar and his Hindu ballet on Wednesday evening, January 5.

"Il Trovatore" will be presented by the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Masque Theater, in Newark, on the evening of January 18. The performance, sponsored by L. Bamberger & Co., is for the benefit of the Hospital and Home for Crippled Children.

Carrying out its policy of sponsoring young dancers, the American Dance Association will present Marie Marchowsky, Suzanne Remos, Marjory Hyder, Evelyn Jackson, Eva Desca, Ida Soyer, Ida Little, Dvo Seron and Fanya Chochem and her group in recital at the Y. M. H. A., Lexington avenue and Ninety-second street, on Saturday evening, January 8.

Carina Orasto, soprano, will give a recital devoted to works of Gluck and Weber at the Barbizon next Tuesday night.

The third and final recital of the series devoted to the violin and piano sonatas of Beethoven will be given at the Institute of Musical Art, 120 Claremont avenue, by Samuel Gardner, violinist, and Lee Pattison, pianist, on Saturday evening, January 8.

Erno Rapee will dedicate his "Music Hall on the Air" broadcast, beginning at 12:30 P. M. Sunday, to the memory of Maurice Ravel, noted composer who died earlier this week.

Quinto Maganini will conduct the Maganini Chamber Orchestra in the first of a series of Children's Concerts at the Pickwick Theater, Greenwich, Conn., on Saturday morning, January 8. The series is sponsored by the Junior League.

On Sunday evening, Bruno Eisner will give a recital at the Lexington avenue Y. M. H. A.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 31 1937

ORCHESTRA PROGRAMS

John Barbirolli conducts his last Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concert for a month on Sunday afternoon. Mischa Elman, violinist, again will be soloist with the orchestra on that occasion, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto. The Beethoven Second Symphony, Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs, Suite No. 3," and the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture complete the program.

At tomorrow night's concert the Beethoven symphony, the Berlioz overture and a group of Johann Strauss works will be played.

Next Wednesday Georges Enesco begins his engagement as guest-conductor of the orchestra. On his opening program, which will be repeated next Friday afternoon, he will feature the first American performance of the symphonic poem "Acteon," by his fellow Rumanian, Alfred Allesandresco. Other works on the program are Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," the Haydn Symphony in D major (B&H. 104), and the "Grand Fete at Capulet's House" from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

At the popular-priced concert on Saturday evening, January 8, the distinguished French violinist, Yvonne Astruc, will make her American debut, as soloist in the Bach Invention in B-flat major, and in Germaine Tailleferre's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. The latter work, written in 1936 and dedicated to Mme. Astruc, will have its first American performance on this occasion. The Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E flat ("Eroica"), and a symphonic piece from Franck's "The Redemption" complete the program.

* * *

Two choral scores of Sibelius will have their first performances in New York at next Thursday's concert by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. They are "The Origin of Fire," from "Kalevala," and "The Captive Queen." The Helsinki University Chorus from Finland will assist the orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at this concert. Sibelius's "Finlandia" and "Pohjola's Daughter," and Brahms's Third Symphony, in F major, complete the program.

At the concert on Saturday afternoon, January 8, Emma Boynet, French pianist, will appear as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in C major (K. 467). A Concerto for Orchestra by Karl Philip Emanuel Bach, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor, will complete the program.

* * *

Arturo Toscanini will conduct the NBC Symphony Orchestra in the following program at tomorrow night's broadcast concert: The Schubert Symphony in C major; two movements from Beethoven's String Quartet in F major, opus 135, and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The program for his third concert with the orchestra, to be broadcast on Saturday night, January 8, is: Overture to "La Cenerentola," by Rossini; Schumann's Symphony in E flat (The "Rhenish"); Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre" and Debussy's "La Mer."

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

JAN 1 - 1938

American Audience Hears Finnish Work

Boston, Dec. 31—(AP)—An American audience today heard for the first time two early choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete "The Origin of Fire," for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra—was written in 1920 soon after his second symphony.

The second Sibelius work, new to this country was "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, which as warmly received by the capacity audience.

Rugged, and at times exciting, "The Origin of Fire," was sung with brilliance by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed November 18. Fourteen pages of copies of the manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin and the fascimiles enlarged here in time for today's performance.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 1 - 1938

Two Sibelius Works Heard in U. S. First Time

Choral-Symphonic Pieces by Finnish Composer Are Performed in Boston

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, Dec. 31.—An American audience today heard for the first time two choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete. "The Origin of Fire," for barytone solo, male chorus and orchestra, was written in 1920, soon after the composer's second symphony.

The second Sibelius work, new to the United States, was "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, which was warmly received by the capacity audience.

Rugged and at times exciting, "The Origin of Fire" was sung with brilliance by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance.

"The Origin of Fire" is a work of epic power and grandeur and, as one critic said, "masterly in its gradual emergence from the atmosphere of darkness and gloom into radiance and glow."

An early barytone solo, sung by Helge Virkkunen, tells of the disappearance of light and how Ukko, lord of the gods, traversed heaven and earth in search of it.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed November 18. Fourteen pages of copies of the manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin, and the facsimiles were enlarged here in time for today's performance.

Serge Koussevitzky, who directed, used the choral score, which provided the instrumental cues.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 1 - 1938

SIBELIUS' WORKS WARMLY RECEIVED

BOSTON, Dec. 31 (AP)—An American audience today heard for the first time two early choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete "The Origin of Fire", for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra—was written in 1920 soon after his Second Symphony.

The second Sibelius work, new to this country was "The Captive Queen", a ballad for chorus and orchestra, was warmly received by the capacity audience.

Rugged, and at times exciting, "The Origin of Fire", was sung with brilliance by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, 'cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed November 18. Fourteen pages of copies manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin and the facsimiles enlarged here in time for today's performance.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION

JAN 4 - 1938

The Boston Symphony orchestra will have a woman guest conductor this season for the first time in its 57-year history. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have this honor.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 2 - 1938

WORDS and MUSIC

By SUSAN BREUL

Composers today are in the mood to write funny music. A goal of many a young writer is to compose music for a Mickey Mouse film.

Recently introduced to American audiences by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra was the Prokofiev's musical score to a Soviet motion picture comedy entitled "Lieutenant Kije" which in a series of gay incidents traces the story of a fictitious Russian naval officer who was created when the Czar—who is always right—mistakenly referred to him.

High time, it is, indeed, that symphonic music cast off its high-minded mood. Funny music today is extremely rare and one tends today to judge the value of a composer by the gravity of his utterance. But music is as grateful for a good laugh as the theater or the movies. More funny music should be played in opera and symphony concerts.

One-act operas of the 17th and 18th centuries will be featured on the daily bill of the London Intimate Opera company opening on Tuesday in New York. The first week's program includes "Thomas and Sally," by Dr. Thomas A. Arne, "The Brickdust Man" by Charles Dibdin, "True Blue or the Press Gang" by Henry Carey and "Don Quixote" by Henry Purcell.

Based on topical subjects with all the atmosphere of the London music hall, the operas are announced as "novelties" and make no pretense at uncovering eternal truths. Each was written by song-writer who turned out several hundred such "acts" in the course of a colorful career.

"True Blue" was produced during the war with Spain in 1739, revived in 1755 on the prospect of more war under the name of "The Press Gang, or Love in Low Life." It was produced frequently thereafter sometimes under the title, "Nancy, or the Parting Lovers."

Among other operas by Henry Carey are "Hanging and Marriage, or the Dead Man's Wedding," "A Wonder, or the Honest Yorkshireman" and "Margery, or a Worse Plague Than the Dragon."

Dr. Arne, who was an important figure in the development of the English opera, produced operas with such titles as "The Contest of Beauty and Virtue," "Achilles in Petticoats," "The Ladies Frolic."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 2 - 1938

SYMPHONY

Boston in Town

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its second Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening, Jan. 7, in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert will be presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Brooklyn on Thursday, Feb. 10; Friday, March 11, and Friday, April 1, to conclude its series, its 52d in Brooklyn.

Heinz and Robert Scholz, Austria's internationally known brother pianists, will play the entire "Art of the Fugue," by Johann Sebastian Bach, in the Schwebsch arrangement for two pianos, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 9. Their recital, presented by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, is the second in the institute's novel series, "From the Gothic to the Baroque," four recitals of unusual ensemble music illustrating the transition from the late medieval period to the great classic age. Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, will appear as commentator during the recital by the Scholz brothers.

The series will conclude with a program of sacred and profane choral music of the Renaissance by the Lehman Engel Madrigal Singers on Feb. 27 and a program of music of the late Middle Ages by the Fiedel Trio ("fiedels" are Gothic violins), with assisting artists, on April 3. Carleton Sprague Smith, director of the music division of the New York Public Library, will appear as commentator for the latter two programs.

The world's outstanding interpreter of the Hindu dance, Uday Shan-Kar, will appear with his Hindu ballet at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, Jan. 5. Shan-Kar's recital will be the sixth in the series of "Music and the Dance" presented by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

PENSACOLA, FLA.
JOURNAL

JAN 5 - 1938

Benno Rabinof Plays Glazounov Concerto For Boston Symphony

Leopold Auer, famous violin pedagogue, whose pupils number among them the greatest violinists playing today, used to become vexed to the point of corporal punishment at times, according to Benno Rabinof, who was one of them.

Rabinof, one of Auer's special favorites, will be heard here in concert January 13th, and well he remembers divers cuffings that came his way when the great teacher thought he wasn't up to his usual standard. Particularly he remembered one incident which had to do with the Glazounov concerto when he was about twelve years old and had been with Auer only a short time. Auer was extremely vexed that day with the way young Benno was performing and gave tangible evidence of it. So much so that the future virtuoso crumpled up after he got home and let the tears flow.

His mother comforted him as best she could. "Don't worry too much, Benno," she said. "Some day you will play it all right. Some day you may even play it well enough to have Glazounov himself conduct for you."

Benno dried his tears and went to work. But somehow his mother's words stuck in his mind. He conquered the Glazounov concerto, entertaining the hope that if Glazounov ever did come to the United States, perhaps he might play it for him. Twelve years later the hope was fulfilled. Glazounov did come here, at the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to conduct a program of his own work. The violinist he chose to play his violin concerto was Benno Rabinof.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 2 - 1938

Brooklyn Institute Program

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will present the following program this week at the Brooklyn Academy of Music:

Tomorrow—Lecture, "Women the World Over," by Paula Lecler, journalist and lecturer, 4 p.m.; instruction in ballroom dancing under the direction of Arthur Murray: beginners 7 p.m., intermediate 8 p.m., advanced 9 p.m.; illustrated lecture, "Rhythm in the Jungle," by Laura Boulton. Motion pictures, sound recordings and colored lantern slides, 8:15 p.m.

Tuesday, Jan. 4—Lecture, "Current Motion Pictures Worth Seeing," by Dr. S. M. Tucker, professor of English, Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn, 4 p.m.; lecture, "Current History," by Stanley High, author and publicist of New York, 8:15 p.m.

Wednesday, Jan. 5—French tea, lecture-recital, "Impressionism in French Music," by Mlle. Lucette Meillard, violinist, 4 p.m.; lecture, "The Future of Power," by Dr. C. C. Furnas, associate professor of chemical engineering, Yale University, author of "The Next Hundred Years," 8:15 p.m.; Shan-Kar and His Hindu Ballet, dances of Hindu lore, 8:30 p.m.

Thursday, Jan. 6—Lecture, "After the Undeclared War—What?," by Guy Hickok, foreign correspondent for News Week, 4 p.m.; lecture, "Heredity and Its Social Import," by Dr. Henry J. Fry, biologist, of Cornell University Medical Center, 8:15 p.m.; lecture, "Broadway in Review," by John Mason Brown, dramatic critic, the New York Post, 8:15 p.m.

Firday, Jan. 7—Illustrated lecture, "Art and the Lonely Way," by Edward Alden Jewell, art critic, the New York Times; illustrated lecture, "Double Stars," by Dr. George Van Biesbroeck, of the Yerkes Observatory, Williams Bay, Wis., professor of astronomy, University of Chicago, lantern slides, 8:15 p.m.; concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, 8:30 p.m.

Saturday, Jan. 8—Illustrated lecture, "America's Fighting Birds of the Air," by Alfred Cookman of Elizabeth, N. J., also motion picture comedies, 2:15 p.m.; illustrated lecture, "Inside the Studio," by Dr. Russell Potter, director of the Division of Film Study, Columbia University. Motion pictures from the archives of the film library of the Museum of Modern Art. 8:15 p.m.

Sunday, Jan. 9—Recital by Heinz and Robert Scholz, pianists, presenting Bach's "Art of the Fugue." Commentator, Olin Downes, music critic, the New York Times. 3 p.m.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS

Science Joins Art to Let Sibelius Score Be Played

By United Press

BOSTON, Jan. 3.—Science joined art last week when the lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived in Boston by train on Wednesday. The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher so it could make its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Friday night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Regular plans went on when Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, since the Helsinki University Chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians in the orchestra.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via R. C. A. took more than 12 hours.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRA

JAN 4 - 1938

The Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, which will play at Smith college the latter part of next month, will cover wide territory in its tours this season. In addition to the cities to be covered, the orchestra will take part in three major music festivals: at Ann Arbor, Mich., May 11-14; the spring festival at Toronto, Can., May 16-18, and the Westchester Festival, White Plains, N. Y., May 20-21. The orchestra will play at Smith on Feb. 23, preceded by visits to Boston, Feb. 11 and 12, and Hartford, Feb. 22.

The necessary $80,000 for the construction of a permanent shed for the Berkshire musical festival in Stockbridge has been raised and building preparations are already being made. The structure, which will house the Boston Symphony orchestra and its audiences, will cover an acre and a half and will be built of a framework of steel not more than 40 feet high, fan-shaped and open on all sides.

ORANGE, N. J.
COURIER

JAN 5 - 1938

While much has been hear about television, little attention i being paid the new art of facsimil broadcasting...broadcasting a sti picture...part of the score for concert to be presented by th Boston Symphonic Orchestra wa lost on the way from Germany.. thanks to radio facimile, the program was enabled to go on the ai as scheduled...from Leipzig, wire facimile carried the music t Berlin where a radio facsimil channel flashed the pages, reduce in size photographically, to Nev York... the score was then enlarged and a special messenge took the sheets to Boston.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 5 - 1938

Phonographs Still Gaining

But Record Business Is Tricky One

The phonograph business continues to grow and prosper, although off the record most men connected with it are willing to admit they are sitting on a stick of dynamite, maybe two or three.

For example, it is virtually impossible to get any commercial phonograph man to comment on the imminence, or otherwise, of new and improved systems of recording. When these come, everything the business has done may have to be done all over again.

This is serious, says the Baltimore Sun. Much music has been done repeatedly: Once in the old mechanical method; once when electrical recording came in; again recently, because electric recording has not stood still.

Similarly, a radical improvement in reproducing machines might bring either a boom or a slump—there is no telling how the public would feel about buying a new machine.

TELEVISION TRICKY

Television, may likewise do tricks. Wired radio may turn out a serious competitor. A satisfactory long-playing record may be produced. And so on.

Recording is different enough from the old days as matters stand now. Once a recording studio was as fixed as a mountain—artists were brought to it from all corners of the world.

Studios still are maintained in strategic locations, of course—New York, Chicago, and Hollywood being most important. Even though modern equipment lacks the horns of the old days, it is still heavy. But is can be taken places, and it is generally cheaper to do that than to move the artists.

It weighs several tons—nobody seems to have thought to weigh it exactly. Mostly it can go by express, the more delicate parts are carried by the recording crew as personal baggage.

As a matter of fact, each man has his favorite recorder, which he values as much as Heifetz values his two best violins. These recorders are adjusted to infinitestimal precision some recording experts prefer one adjustment, some another.

With the equipment go also many cases of blank records, each record being 13 inches in diameter and one and a half inches thick. With such a job as recording Bach's St. Matthew Passion to do, the number of records taken along may run into the hundreds.

This was one of the trickiest recording jobs of modern times, incidentally, and it provided some strange situations, according to Edward Wallerstein, manager of recording for a disc company, and Charles O'Connell, who does everything from conducting symphony orchestras to figuring record lengths on important jobs.

The performance was being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with a Boston chorus and, of course, the Boston Symphony. But there was only one performance, since it was all a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund, and it was necessary to record with the audience in the hall.

RECORDERS WORK IN PAIRS

Four recorders were set up, working in pairs. Mr. O'Connell did the delicate job of dividing the work into record-length sections, and found there would be 54 of these. He arranged for the records to end, as often as possible, on a tonic chord—or at least a chord not too tantalizing to the ear. It looked like a snap, on paper, once the job was done. The trouble was that of the 54 "sides," only two worked out exactly. Slight delays, changes of tempo, soloists a little slow in getting under way threw the whole thing out of gear.

The job was done in one sitting, however, and if it had been made the usual way, five recording sessions would have been needed. When the work is released around the end of the year, the most experienced listeners will not know that on one record the factory found exactly one-half of one-eighth note. This bit of sound was not only transferred to the next record, but in exact time.

The recorders do not use electric motors, these being subject to slight speed fluctuations. Gravity motors are used, and lugging the huge weights for these about the land is one reason why equipment is so heavy.

15

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER
JAN 4 - 1938

Wide World Photo

REHEARSAL OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky for its appearance with the Helsinki University chorus, which is opening its tour in Boston.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
[illegible]

MUSIC IN REVIEW

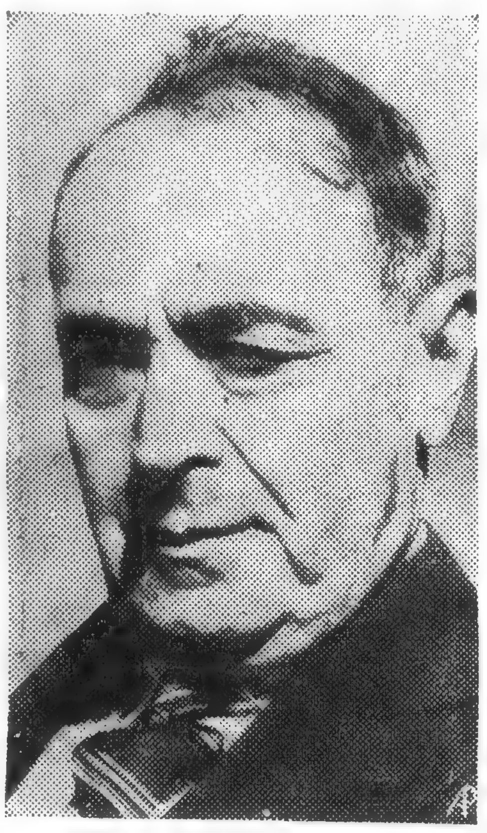
Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Introduce a Novelty by Prokofieff

BY HENRY PLEASANTS

SERGE Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made one of their all too infrequent visits to Philadelphia, last night, offering a program of Haydn, Prokofieff and Brahms for the members of the Forum at the Academy of Music. The novelty of the occasion, and an entertaining one it turned out to be, was the contemporary Russian's orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kije" which the Bostonians introduced to this country last October. The suite was assembled from incidental music written for the Soviet film of that name, and was ~~published in~~ 1934.

Lieutenant Kije sprang into a rather hilarious mythical existence in the reign of Czar Paul I. The story has it that the Czar once ordered one of his lieutenants to perform some military task or other, but in issuing the order mispronounced the name, which was not Kije. Nobody in the royal retinue dared to point out to the Czar his mistake, and consequently, so far as the Czar ever knew, Lieutenant Kije continued in the Imperial service for many years afterward. He probably became a kind of standing joke among the officers, serving them somewhat as the side-hill badger has served the backwoodsmen of this continent these many generations.

Prokofieff's treatment of the subject is appropriately comic, and it is in comedy that this composer excels.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

In the suite Lieutenant Kije is satirically born to the tune of an off-stage trumpet and the rolling of the military drums. He experiences a ribald romance, related in droll terms by a solo tenor saxophone and a solo bass fiddle. He is married. There is a wild ride in a troika, and finally poor Kije is buried to the strains of the merriest funeral music ever written. In the telling of the story Prokofieff has recourse to the style of the later Stravinsky, but there is much individual writing, and the comic effects are achieved in a thoroughly musical fashion.

The concert opened with the Haydn Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13), which prompted the best orchestral playing of the evening. Mr. Koussevitzy avoided the common tendency to over-emphasize the delicacy of the writing, and insisted on a solid tone and firm tempi. Particularly effective were the robust minuet and the brilliance and unity of the orchestra's strings in the spirited finale. The Brahms Symphony in C minor which closed the program was something else again. Mr. Koussevitzky's aim was apparently a dramatic reading, but the result was more nearly melodramatic. Certainly the performance was far from lyrical. The grander pages of the first and last movements were hard driven and rough, and throughout the work as a whole the conductor's interest in inner voices and secondary themes frequently obscured the dominant lines, accounting for muddled softer passages and for larger pages which were loud and hectic rather than genuinely dramatic. There was a very large audience on hand to extend a cordial welcome to Mr. Koussevitzky and his splendid organization.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
JAN 6 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD IN PHILA.

Kousservitzky Conducts Splendid Concert for Forum at Academy

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra came, saw and conquered Philadelphia last night. In pleasant contrast with the provincial partisanship of Philadelphia audiences of a few years back, that of the Philadelphia Forum warmly recognized the musical worth of the superb performance.

The nicely balanced program opened with Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88. Using a reduced orchestra, the conductor evoked in this the nostalgic serenity that we like to associate with the past.

Next was Prokofieff's suite, "Lieutenant Kije." In five sections, opening with the "Birth of Kije" and closing with the "Death of Kije," its joshing pomp, puckish imagry and ironical orchestration were markedly different from its predecessor. Unfortunately, no program notes were given for a piece that is obviously programmatic. But the composition conveyed its own obvious humor and whimsicality. And the audience was obviously pleased.

Closing, was Brahms' First Symphony. Its tremendous timelessness makes a fitting climax to any program. This was more apparant than usual because of the performance given it. Only recently, the nation ah-ed and oh-ed over an interpretation of it that would have made Brahms spill the oil from his can of sardines into his whiskers.

But Koussevitzky isn't a "maestro" built up by ballyhoo. He is merely an extraordinarly competent musician and top-notch drillmaster who works harder than his men in co-ordinating their high collective ability. Which means that he is an A-1 conductor. Last night the men responded so eloquently to his perceptive leadership that they roused the audience to an enthusiasm which must have compensated him for his thought and labor.

—A. J.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 6 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Koussevitzky Excels In Brahms, Haydn; Piquant Novelty

PROGRAM
Haydn ....Symphony in G major, No. 13
Prokofieff ...."Lieutenant Kije," Suite
Brahms ..Symphony No. 1, in C minor

By LINTON MARTIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Generalissimo Serge Koussevitzky, came to town last night with a regal repast, thus saving the city from symphonic starvation in a week that finds the Philadelphia Orchestra gadding about the country, dispensing its tonal delights elsewhere.

Came to town, in the current connotation of that phrase, is exactly what the brilliant Boston band did, in its special, annual concert in the Academy for the Forum. Perhaps never before has the organization played here with greater verve, virtuosity and vitality, presenting a program in which a fetching and refreshing bit of novelty, though of minor musical moment, was successfully sandwiched between two quite contrasting classic symphonies.

The entire program, and especially the Brahms First Symphony which climaxed an evening of memorable music-making, was played with a quality of breath-taking brilliance that elicited the utmost enthusiasm. The high point of perfection and impressiveness reached by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky was reflected in the prodigious applause with which the conductor was recalled at the conclusion of the concert.

NEW WORK AMUSING

While easily overshadowed in musical importance by the Brahms and Haydn symphonies, Prokofieff's eminently amusing orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," heard here for the first time on this occasion, proved to be a novelty of more than ordinary interest. It is light, bright, archly humorous, clever and original, and witty in its tonal treatment of a hero manufactured from myth all because of a Czar's mistake in spelling, or rather, his mistake in reading the spelling of a military report.

For, acording to the story, Czar Paul I linked the final syllable "ki" with the expression "je" and thus was born a new name, Kije. Thus was created, out of thin air, Lieutenant Kije, whom Prokofieff set to music for a Russian film several seasons since, ~~and that music~~ provided the source of the orchestral suite introduced to Philadelphia last night.

BRAHMS IS FEATURE

The titles of theseparate sections summarize the story—"Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika," "Burial of Kije." Kije is born to off-stage martial music of trumpet fanfare, sings his love song as a romantic saxophone, has a wedding of much merriment musically, and finally dies in decently muted manner and trumpet tones.

Familiar as is the Brahms First Symphony, it took on new life and lustre under Koussevitzky's commanding conducting — conducting that is individual, elastic, illuminating and inspired. There was concentrated emotion, electric and tense, throughout the performance of the work, as the orchestra played with superb transparency of tone, fine fullness and finish of texture, the utmost sensitiveness of response.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
JAN 6 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS PROKOFIEFF

'Lieutenant Kije' Suite Steals Show at Forum Concert.

By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid their annual visit to the Academy of Music last night, appearing under Philadelphia Forum auspices before a capacity audience.

As is usually the case in his concerts here, Dr. Koussevitzky's program was bi-symphonic. And last night the historic limits of the form were staked out with works representing the first and last composers in the great classic tradition—the Haydn G major No.. 88 and the Brahms No. 1 in C minor.

Both compositions are, of course, abundantly familiar here (though we don't as a rule suffer a surfeit of Haydn at Broad and Locust). But inserted between Papa Josef and the great Johannes last night was a refreshing novelty—the "Lieutenant Kije" Suite of Serge Prokofieff, in its first Philadelphia performance.

Witty and Amusing.

The new suite, miniature in its dimensions, was originally written for a Soviet film of the same name first shown in Leningrad five years ago. Its American premiere was played by the Bostonians on their home grounds last fall. It proved to be witty and amusing music, melodious, "chic" and as Russian as a samovar.

The suite, in five movements, tells the satiric life story of "Lieutenant Kije," a mythical warrior who came into being because the Czar Paul I mispronounced the name of a staff officer and no one dared correct him. In Prokofieff's score, the hypothetical "Kije" is born (as befits an officer conceived in the not too astute brain of a monarch) to toylike trumpet calls and the mock pomp of a grotesque little military march.

"Kije's" romance (second movement) is to amorous saxophone accompaniment. He is married to the hearty grunt of tubas and maudlin strains of merrymaking suggesting that the ceremony must have taken place in a country inn. Then he is off (on his honeymoon?) to the bells of a brisk "troika," and is finally buried to a burlesque funeral march worthy of Stravinsky.

"Petroushka's" Brother.

In fact, "Lieutenant Kije" is a blood brother of "Petroushka" and it sounded at times last night as if one of his feminine ancestors must have had at least a passing acquaintance with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

There is a faint aroma of the "Kapellmeister" composer about the new suite. But it is charming music—one of the most attractive novelties heard here in seasons. Last night's Haydn was crisp, cool and well molded as Haydn should be. And any "first violin symphony" is bound to sound beautifully in the bright color of the Boston's admirable strings. And the Brahms was impressive.

But though its musical importance ranks in a different hemisphere than the Haydn and Brahms masterpieces, "Lieutenant Kije" last night stole Dr. Koussevitzky's show — with the assistance, of course, of Dr. Koussevitzky, who gave it a delightful reading.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER
JAN 7 - 1938

News And Views Of Interest In World Of Music

LOST IN THE mails on the way from Germany were the viola, cello and double bass parts for the choral symphonic score of "Nk-ko, the Fire Maker," by Jean Sibelius. The music sent by Brietkoff and Haertel, Lepzig music publishers was in two packages, but only one was received. When informed of what had happened the music publishers turned to radio for transmission from the sole remaining copy in Europe, so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might ~~present it~~ as announced. It was said to be the first music ever transmitted over the trans-oceanic system.

116

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
JAN 6 - 1938

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

Serge Koussevitzky and the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra made their annual visit to Philadelphia last evening, giving a concert in the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum. An almost capacity audience heard the concert and accorded the conductor and the members of the orchestra a most enthusiastic reception at the beginning, at the close of each number, and especially at the close, Mr. Koussevitzky being recalled again and again.

The concert opened with the Haydn symphony in G major No. 88 (in the B. & H. edition No. 13). This is No. 7 of the eleven so-called "Paris" symphonies, composed for the Concerts Spirituels, and is just over 150 years old, dating from 1787. It is in Haydn's usual bright vein, being exceedingly melodic, and was interpreted and played in that style, Mr. Koussevitzky setting a very lively pace in the first and last movements especially. He reduced his orchestra slightly in the strings, using only six of his nine contrabasses, and maintained an excellent balance between the strings and the other instruments. There are some extremely modern-sounding harmonizations in the symphony, which was performed in the simple style of the music, and was very beautiful.

A novelty to Philadelphia was next on the program, being a suite entitled "Lieutenant Kije," by Prokofieff, the work being heard in this country for the first time in Boston last October. In the absence of program notes, the meaning of the music was largely guesswork last evening. However, the suite was derived from the incidental music which Prokofieff wrote for a Soviet film four years ago and is scored for a very large orchestra.

"Lieutenant Kije" came into existence through an error of Tsar Nicholas I, who misread the name of a ministry officer making a report to him. The other officers of the imperial suite, fearing to correct the Tsar, accordingly invented a lieutenant bearing the name, which the ruler misread, and all manner of humorous incidents developed.

The suite is in five short movements, beginning with "The Birth of Kije," who is ushered into the world with off-stage trumpet calls and with fife and drum. Next is his "Romance," in which the opening love song is played by a single contrabass, later by a tenor saxophone and other instruments not usually used for solo purposes. "Kije's Wedding" was the third movement and the military character of the music is maintained here as elsewhere in the suite. "Troika" (the Russian three-horse sleigh) is a diverting and humorous movement introducing sleighbells and other unique instruments of percussion, and the final movement, "The Burial of Kije," which shows what happened when his imaginary presence was no longer necessary to the conniving Russian officers, the movement being of a cheerfulness which manifestly was somewhat disconcerting to certain of last evening's audience who did not know the background of the music.

His career is summed up in the music by the introduction of themes from the earlier movements and the number ended with the muted trumpet call, beginning with the first phrase from "taps" and dying away in the distance. The suite was splendidly performed, the saxophonist, first horn, first trumpet, solo contrabass and others doing exceptionally fine work. The humor was apparent in the suite from beginning to end, both in the music and the orchestration, and it was very cordially received.

The closing number was Brahms' gigantic C minor symphony (No. 1), which naturally was the musical feature of the concert. Mr. Koussevitzky gave a splendid interpretation, without the least sensationalism or exaggeration, but paying great attention to all the details of development of theme and the orchestration. He kept beautiful balance between the solo parts and the accompanying ones, never sacrificing the latter for the former and thereby achieving a peculiarly beautiful orchestral color and receiving a tremendous reception at the end. The return of the "chorale" subject near the close was the most thrilling moment of the concert.

The Boston Orchestra has never played better in Philadelphia than it did last evening. The organization was under the complete control of Mr. Koussevitzky every moment, and though he is not prodigal of gesture, he secured exactly the result he wanted by the slightest movements of hands and eyes. The glory of the orchestra is in its strings, although the other sections are thoroughly competent and the chief characteristic of its playing last evening was its superb finish.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 8 - 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Plays at the Academy—Metropolitan Revives 'Elektra' With Rose Pauly in Debut

Transferring the scene of its activities from Carnegie Hall to the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave its second concert of the season last night in the same resplendant mood that made the concert of the preceding evening so memorable. From the greatness of Beethoven to the tragi-comedy of Strauss, it disclosed all the facets of the modern orchestra at the peak of development in an exciting exhibition of sonority, power and beauty.

The program was one to suit every demand of a large audience: The Symphony in E Flat Mapor, No. 3, best known as the "Eroica," for those whose tastes are more conservative; Prokofieff's orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kije," which Koussevitsky introduced in the United States at his Oct. 15 concert in Boston to placate those who wish to hear the moderns; and the famous tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Straus sto please everybody.

Emerging in the full stature of its greatness, the "Eroica" was superbly played. It is mighty music, with its fiery, challenging, heroic first movement, its sublime and solemn funeral march, its throbbing and impetuous scherzo and its conquering finale. It is stirring music, with its revelation of a great soul finding itself first with those wonderful discords of the development section of the allegro and finally in the evolution of the theme of the last movement. Al lthis and more came from the orchestra in this performance.

Probably the most interesting work on the program was Prokofieff's suite. Tongue-in-the-cheek music, it was clever, amusing and insinuatingly pleasant, modern in the sense that it was essentially rhythmic, short-phrased and abruptly modulated. Among other things it served to make prominent in the orchestra a tenor saxophone and some contrapuntal writing among the woodwinds. There were probably many woh did not particularly care for this music, while others were no doubt completely caught by its infectious rhythmic shiftings. Its chief value as a piece of music is entertainment. Things like this Koussevitsky does as well as any other conductor, and for some of us better.

Noted as he is for his interpretations of Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" had its customarily stunning performance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 8 - 193

RUSSIAN NOVELTY HEARD AT ACADEMY

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Second Appearance of Season

The brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Brooklyn last night for the second time this season and brought along a Russian novelty to enhance its program of two staples at the Academy of Music.

The newcomer was "Lieutenat Kije," an orchestral suite by Serge Prokofieff. Sandwiched between Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony (No. 3) and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel"—a tough spot for any piece of music—"Lieutenant Kije" sounded like an anemic fellow, indeed, and was given an anemic reception.

Prokofieff concocted the suite from incidental music he wrote for a Soviet firm of the same name, produced in 1933, but never shown in this country. Serge Koussevitzky and his Bostonians gave it its first American performance in October of last year.

Except for a few piquant turns, the music, to this listener, seemed to be surprisingly orthodox stuff for the composer of "Love of Three Oranges." Tracing the birth, romance, wedding and death of Kije, the suite, with its ingratiating themes and some novel instrumentation—fife and celesta solos, etc.—was singularly unimpressive.

It was an object lesson to hear "Till" right after that. Parallel in purpose—the fanciful treatment of the comical adventures of a herb—the Strauss masterpiece filled the auditorium with its overflowing exuberance and one forgot everything that preceded it.

Also, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men did their best playing of the evening in the witty rondo, with the famed strings, the brass, the balance and tone of the ensemble in superb form.

The third concert by the Boston at the Academy will be given on Feb. 10.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 6 - 1938

Whiting's B

A very remarkable, at least unusual, event is to take place in town on the 28th, when the entire Boston Symphony orchestra will be entertained as guests by the Harvard Club of Boston. The room capacity will allow about 300 diners besides the orchestra. Edward A. Taft will preside; there will be three speakers: Bentley Wirt Warren for the trustees, Serge Koussevitzky for the orchestra, and James Rowland Angell, speaking as the educational adviser to the National Broadcasting company.

This should be a very happy, as it certainly is a notable, occasion. It is a fine honor to the Symphony orchestra and, equally, to the Harvard club—whose first president was Maj Henry L. Higginson, without whom there would probably never have been a Boston Symphony orchestra.

By the way, there is an old story of Maj Higginson which we believe may be told without offense, now that the two eminent figures in the story have passed from the mortal scene. The story is that the major, years ago, wrote a letter of introduction to the elder J. P. Morgan, presenting to Mr Morgan an excellent young man just from Harvard and a year's training in the Higginson financial house, then on State street. The young man wished to start in the Wall street world, and armed with the letter from Maj Higginson his chances were good. The major's letter is alleged to have run along some such lines as these:—

"You will see by this young man's name that he is a member of the Cabot family, and allied to the Lawrences. I may further tell you that he is also connected with the Saltonstalls and the Lowells. I hope you can find a place for him in your organization."

To which Mr Morgan the elder is alleged to have replied:—

"The young man looks all right and we will give him a trial; but I want you to understand, Major, that we are taking him on as a clerk on our office, and not for breeding purposes."

The local theater season continues to prosper. Certainly a banner year for the stage! The Colonial, Plymouth, Shubert, Wilbur and Copley have all

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 8 - 1938

Emma Boynet, French pianist, is the soloist for this afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony. She will play the Mozart Concerto in C major (K. 467). A Concerto for Orchestra by K. P. E. Bach and the Tchaikowsky Fifth Symphony also are scheduled.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES - DISPATCH
9 - 1938

Lost Sibelius' Manuscript Recalls Famous Discoveries

By Bernard Freeman

BOSTON, (AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the unpublished manuscript of Jan Sibelius' early choral symphonic work "Origin of Fire," which vanished mysteriously while en route from Europe last month, will turn up in a half century or so in somebody's attic.

The composition, of which the cello, viola and bass viol parts were radioed across the Atlantic in time for a performance last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Helsinki Chorus, recalls tales of numerous original manuscripts that had an uncanny way of disappearing—and later reappearing.

The manuscripts of some of the world's greatest music—Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and his overture and ballet music to "Rosamunde," Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," and several of Muzio Clementi's symphonies have disappeared or lain in oblivion for long stretches, only to reappear and achieve widespread popularity.

After the first performance of "Midsummer Night's Dream" in London in 1829, Mendelssohn entrusted the score for safekeeping to a friend, who stammered out the next day that he left the manuscript of the overture in a public coach.

Found in Royal Academy

Approximately 10 years ago, after nearly a century's absence, it turned up in London in the Royal Academy of Music, of which the apologetic friend had been a director.

The work, of course, achieved great favor in the intervening years—but only because Mendelssohn, who possessed an amazing memory, wrote out a new score as easily as if he were copying scales.

Schubert's most beloved work, "The Unfinished Symphony," was laid aside in 1822, six years before his death, with only two of the customary four movements completed. Not until 1865 did musicologists finally uncover the masterpiece from an old-fashioned chest in the home of a friend.

The same composer's score for the beautiful "Rosamunde" music disappeared soon after its second performance in 1823 and wasn't heard from again until 1867. Then, Arthur Sullivan of the famed English comic opera team of Gilbert & Sullivan, found the unpublished score in a cupboard in the Vienna home of Schubert's nephew. Not a musician, the nephew had been unaware of its existence.

Unlike his successful sons, Johann Sebastian Bach was not appreciated until after he died; consequently few knew the "St. Matthew Passion," described by Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky as "the greatest composition in all musical literature."

After receiving its first performance on Good Friday, 1729, the score lay in a son's attic for nearly a century. Then, the elder Bach having come into his own, young Mendelssohn and a group of friends revived it exactly one century later—on Good Friday, 1829.

WORDS AND MUSIC

Finnish Chorus Is Heard With Boston Symphony

Mr. Koussevitzky Introduces Sibelius' "Captive Queen" and "Origin of Fire"

N.Y. World Dec. 9/37

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

The visit of the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night brought with it the first appearance of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland in some choral works of Sibelius never before heard in New York, and pickets who walked Fifty-seventh Street bearing placards which called attention to the non-union character of the famous orchestra. Inside, the hall was jammed with admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky and his band, and no doubt of the works of the Finnish Beethoven. The eminent conductor, sartorially perfect, was rapturously applauded throughout the evening, and the visiting male choristers from Finland came in for a good share of the pervading enthusiasm. Since Finland is our only debtor nation that comes across with regular payments the advent of the Helsinkis was doubly welcome.

which is even earlier Sibelius, tells the story of the legendary Louhi who seized both moon and sun and hid them away, thereby plunging the land in darkness, and of Ukko, the Lord of the Gods, who sought to restore the purloined light. Both compositions are tuneful and forceful, but not very distinguished, so that lovers of Sibelius will hardly claim them as additions to the known masterpieces of their idol. The new Finnish chorus sang in them lustily and with precision, and in "The Origin of Fire" Mr. Helge Virkkunen, a stalwart and stentorian baritone, sang away with a good deal of conviction.

The choral works were preceded by the more familiar "Pohjola's Daughter," a trite orchestral narrative, and this in turn was preceded by Brahm's Third Symphony. The orchestra played everything magnificently, but I found, much to my surprise, that Dr. Koussevitzky's Brahms failed to stir me as it did the rest of the huge assembly. The "Andante," in fact, taken "Adagio," was so gentle and lifeless that it induced a state between waking and dreaming, and for all one knows to the contrary that was Brahms' very intention.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 8 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Attracts Capacity Audience

A capacity audience attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, hostess in the box of the sponsoring committee, and former Federal Judge Garvin were hots at a dinner at their home, No. 1 Grace court, preceding the concert. A dinner was also given by Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson at their residence, No. 135 Eastern parkway, for their box guests ein advance of the concert.

The program, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, included the Prokofieff suite, "Lieutenant Kije," played for the first time in this city. The third in the series of five concerts will be given on Thursday evening, Feb. 10.

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD
JAN 9 - 1938

VANISHED SYMPHONY MAY APPEAR LATER

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 9 - 1938

MUSIC

Lost Symphony Recalls Disappearance Of Other Works

By BERNARD FREEMAN

Boston, Jan. 8. —(AP)— If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius' early choral symphonic work "Origin of Fire" which vanished mysteriously while en route from Europe last month, will turn up in a half-century or so in somebody's attic.

The composition, of which the 'cello, viola and bass viol parts were radioed across the Atlantic in time for a performance last week by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Helsinki chorus, recalls tales of numerous other original manuscripts that had an uncanny way of disappearing—and later reappearing.

Famous Scripts Vanished.

The manuscripts of some of the world's greatest music—Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and his overture and ballet music to "Rosamunde," Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," and several of Muzio Clementi's symphonies have disappeared or lain in oblivion for long stretches, only to reappear and achieve widespread popularity.

After the first performance of "Midsummer Night's Dream" in London in 1829, Mendelssohn entrusted the score for safekeeping to a friend, who stammered out the next day that he left the manuscript of the overture in a public coach.

Approximately 10 years ago, after nearly a century's absence, it turned up in London in the Royal Academy of Music, of which the apologetic friend had been a director.

The work, of course, achieved great favor in the intervening years—but only because Mendelssohn, who possessed an amazing memory, wrote out a new score as easily as if he were copying scales.

Symphony Gone 43 Years.

Schubert's most beloved work, 'The Unfinished Symphony," was laid aside in 1822, six years before his death, with only two of the customary four movements completed. Not until 1865 did musicologists finally uncover the masterpiece from an old-fashioned chest in the home of a friend.

The same composer's score for the beautiful "Rosamunde" music disappeared soon after its second performance in 1823 and wasn't heard from again until 1867. Then, Arthur Sullivan, of the famed English comic opera team of Gilbert and Sullivan, found the unpublished score in a cupboard in the Vienna home of Schubert's nephew. Not a musician, the nephew had been unaware of its existence.

Unlike his successful son, Johann Sebastian Bach was not appreciated until after he died; consequently few knew the "St. Matthew Passion," describel by Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky as "the greatest composition in all musical literature."

Century Old Gem.

After receiving its first performance on Good Friday, 1729, the score lay in a son's attic for nearly a century. Then, the elder Bach having come into his own, young Mendelssohn and a group of friends revived it exactly one century later—on Good Friday, 1829.

When the Italian pianist Clementi died in England in 1832, he was known to have written some 20 symphonies. Yet, although his estates and papers were in perfect order, the symphonic manuscripts were missing. Not until 1917, when a Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, were they found in a trunk in the attic.—And then they were incomplete and in utter disorder. How they reached there remains a mystery.

Alfredo Casella pieced them together with parts he found in the library of Congress in Washington, and thus they were given to the world.

Robert Schumann's violin concerto, which recently was played for the first time although written in 1853, has been called erroneously the "Lost Concerto."

Though unperformed, music lovers had known of its existence. They did not hear it, until 1937, however, because the manuscript's owner, Violinist Alfred Joachim had decreed in his will the concerto should not be played until a century after the composer's death, which would be 1956. The German government permitted the performance last year.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

JAN 9 - 1938

LOST SCORE MAY LAND IN ATTIC

Other Famous Musical Manuscripts Have Turned Up in Strange Places.

BOSTON, Jan. 8.—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent.

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

JAN 9 - 1938

MUSICAL HISTORY MAY BE REPEATED

"Origin of Fire," Lost Last Last Month, Will Probably Be Found in Next 100 Years

By BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Jan. 8.—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius' early choral

---

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

[illegible]

Jan Sibelius Manuscript Is The Latest 'Missing' Score

BOSTON, JAN. 8.—(AP) —If past musical history is any precedent,

---

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

[illegible] 1938

Manuscript Is Expected To Appear Again

By BERNARD FREEMAN

Boston—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the origi-

---

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

JAN 9 - 1938

Lost Musical Compositions Have Habit of Reappearing

Boston, Jan. 8.—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius'

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Morning Star - Telegram

JAN 9 - [illegible]

Jan Sibelius' Symphonic Work May Turn Up Yet—In Somebody's Attic

BOSTON, Jan. 8 (AP).—If past musical history is any precedent, the unpublished manuscript of Jan Sibe-

---

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

JAN 9 - 1938

Boston Hears Symphony With Helsinki Chorus in 'Sibelius'

By BERNARD FREEMAN

Boston, Jan. 8 (AP).—If past musical history is any precedent, the original

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

[illegible]

Lost Symphony May Reappear

By United Press

BOSTON, Jan. 8.—If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius' early

---

CHICAGO, ILL.

JAN 10 1938

Sibelius Radioed

Nearly two months ago the mu[illegible] of Jean Sibelius' Origin of Fire, carefully wrapped in two separate packages, was mailed by Leipzig Publishers Breitkopf & Haertel to Boston Symphony's Conductor Koussevitzky. Last week, with the U. S. première of the famed Finn's work scheduled for immediate performance, Boston Symphony officials, still awaiting the appearance of one of the packages, telegraphed frantically to Leipzig. The publishers, equally frantic, located the only other copy in Europe, telephotoed it to Berlin, whence it was transmitted by radio facsimile to the U. S. Relieved Koussevitzky hired transcribers, got the parts copied just in time for its joint performance by the Boston Symphony and the Helsinki University Chorus, making its U. S. debut.

THE STAGE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN - - 1938

Music on the Map

By MARCIA DAVENPORT

Carnegie Hall and the Metropolitan look like the zoo these winter evenings, a remark not intended to insult the human race, but prompted by the millions of foxes, ermines, minks, and sables (maybe pussies, too) who meet not altogether for music's sweet sake. The season is burgeoning with fat houses and big names. The orchestra situation in its local manifestations is to be summed up about as follows: Philharmonic, static; Philadelphia, variable; NBC Symphony, challenging; Boston, a wow. Working backwards (and most symphony concerts are work), the Boston's first New York concerts under Serge Koussevitzky packed an impressive wallop. The first program was imposingly simple: the Eroica, and the Sibelius Second. For me the Eroica was not so much a communion with Beethoven as it was a re-taste of the rare tonal delight of this extraordinary orchestra. This is sound to be reveled in, rolled on the tongue, savored in every detail and nuance. The polish and sheen of the strings, the glow of the horns, and the tenderness of the exquisite woodwinds are all triumphs of individual playing and meticulous ensemble discipline. This is such a proud accomplishment that it seems like quibbling to question Dr. Koussevitzky's personal dicta on Beethoven. But question I do; there are points of tempo and phrasing that do not sound altogether orthodox to me. The Sibelius Symphony was a sensation, the real thing, and the first such thrill that has brought a Carnegie Hall audience cheering to its feet in a long time. This unregenerate individual has slept through a great deal of Sibelius, as I have often confessed, and, I fear, will sleep through a good deal more, average performances being what they are. But the Boston's performance was not average, it was super-super, in the language of fruit-packers; it was both beautiful and exciting. This is, of course, the most dramatic of Sibelius' symphonies, and its last two movements, played as one, are big music in its most climactic mood. At the point where the big brasses blared out the stunning finale theme in major resolution, your humble penitent was perched on the edge of the glory-seat in a fine state of revivalist excitement.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

[illegible]

Noted Chorus In Boston

When the 55 singers in the Helsinki (Helsingfors, Finland) University Chorus give a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, this afternoon, a real treat in male singing is in store for music lovers.

"This chorus can be ranked among the first of the best choruses in the world," an Italian critic wrote during their preceding European hour. A Hungarian reviewer stated that: "One seldom hears such pure resonance in a male chorus, such fine crescendos, such soft and gentle pianissimos."

When they made their rst American appearance last week in Symphony Hall with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they were admired for exceptional strength and quality of tone combined, for tonal shading, and for notable precision. Koussevitzky praised them for "youthful spirit and elemental force."

Sibelius and Palmgren will be well represented among the compositions on Sunday's program. To lovers of the music of Sibelius, it is worthy of note that the composers will include two who pointed the way for Sibelius in the infusion of the national patriotic spirit and folk literature into music. These were Emil Genetz, writer of many choral works; and Robert Kajanus, creator of orchestral works. Kajanus wrote two Finnish Rhapsodies, and a dramatic episode, "Kullervo," inspired by the national epic, "Kalevala." Following this example, Sibelius composed a "Kullervo" Symphony, and went repeatedly to "Kalevala" for inspiration, as in his symphonic poems, "Pohjola's Daughter," "Tapiola," and "The Swan of Tuonela;" and "The Origin of Fire," for orchestra with chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

JAN 9 - 19[illegible]

an envelope which advertises a famous brand of silk stockings—but instead of saying "Buy!" when the envelope gets to you, it reads "Boycott!" That's catching it on the bounce! . . . (Maybe it's a rubber stamp.) . . . In the paintings of Picasso one major element is always left unfinished—let a good dialectician tell you why. . . . Fascists picketed Koussevitzky's recital at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening because members of the Boston Orchestra had joined the Musicians Committee for Spain. The pickets were the orneriest dames that have appeared in public in years. They gave up when a young feller marched along with them to howl maliciously but accurately: "Don't read their signs! You'll learn more from their faces!"

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 9 - 1938

MUSIC

Lost Symphony Recalls Disappearance Of Other Works

By BERNARD FREEMAN

Boston, Jan. 8. —(AP)— If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius' early choral symphonic work "Origin of Fire" which vanished mysteriously while en route from Europe last month, will turn up in a half-century or so in somebody's attic.

The composition, of which the 'cello, viola and bass viol parts were radioed across the Atlantic in time for a performance last week by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Helsinki chorus, recalls tales of numerous other original manuscripts that had an uncanny way of disappearing—and later reappearing.

Famous Scripts Vanished.

The manuscripts of some of the world's greatest music—Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and his overture and ballet music to "Rosamunde," Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," and several of Muzio Clementi's symphonies have disappeared or lain in oblivion for long stretches, only to reappear and achieve widespread popularity.

After the first performance of "Midsummer Night's Dream" in London in 1829, Mendelssohn entrusted the score for safekeeping to a friend, who stammered out the next day that he left the manuscript of the overture in a public coach.

Approximately 10 years ago, after nearly a century's absence, it turned up in London in the Royal Academy of Music, of which the apologetic friend had been a director.

The work, of course, achieved great favor in the intervening years—but only because Mendelssohn, who possessed an amazing memory, wrote out a new score as easily as if he were copying scales.

Symphony Gone 43 Years.

Schubert's most beloved work, "The Unfinished Symphony," was laid aside in 1822, six years before his death, with only two of the customary four movements completed. Not until 1865 did musicologists finally uncover the masterpiece from an old-fashioned chest in the home of a friend.

The same composer's score for the beautiful "Rosamunde" music disappeared soon after its second performance in 1823 and wasn't heard from again until 1867. Then Arthur Sullivan, of the famed English comic opera team of Gilbert and Sullivan, found the unpublished score in a cupboard in the Vienna home of Schubert's nephew. Not a musician, the nephew had been unaware of its existence.

Unlike his successful son, Johann Sebastian Bach was not apprecioated until after he died; consequently few knew the "St. Matthew Passion," describel by Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky as "the greatest composition in all musical literature."

Century Old Gem.

After receiving its first performance on Good Friday, 1729, the score lay in a son's attic for nearly a century. Then, the elder Bach having come into his own, young Mendelssohn and a group of friends revived it exactly one century later—on Good Friday, 1829.

When the Italian pianist Clementi died in England in 1832, he was known to have written some 20 symphonies. Yet, although his estates and papers were in perfect order, the symphonic manuscripts were missing. Not until 1917, when a Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, were they found in a trunk in the attic.—And then they were incomplete and in utter disorder. How they reached there remains a mystery.

Alfredo Casella pieced them together with parts he found in the library of Congress in Washington, and thus they were given to the world.

Robert Schumann's violin concerto, which recently was played for the first time although written in 1853, has been called erroneously the "Lost Concerto."

Though unperformed, music lovers had known of its existence. They did not hear it, until 1937, however, because the manuscript's owner, Violinist Alfred Joachim had decreed in his will the concerto should not be played until a century after the composer's death, which would be 1956. The German government permitted the performance last year.

177

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

JAN 9 - 1938

LOST SCORE MAY LAND IN ATTIC

Other Famous Musical Manuscripts Have Turned Up in Strange Places.

BOSTON, Jan. 8.—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent,

---

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

JAN 9 - 1938

MUSICAL HISTORY MAY BE REPEATED

"Origin of Fire," Lost Last Last Month, Will Probably Be Found in Next 100 Years

By BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Jan. 8.—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius' early choral

---

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

JAN 9 - 1938

20

Jan Sibelius Manuscript Is The Latest 'Missing' Score

BOSTON, JAN. 8.—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent,

---

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

JAN 9 - 1938

Manuscript Is Expected To Appear Again

By BERNARD FREEMAN

Boston—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the origi-

---

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

JAN 9 - 1938

Lost Musical Compositions Have Habit of Reappearing

Boston, Jan. 8.—(AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius'

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Morning Star - Telegram

JAN 9 - 1938

Jan Sibelius' Symphonic Work May Turn Up Yet—In Somebody's Attic

BOSTON, Jan. 8 (AP).—If past musical history is any precedent, the unpublished manuscript of Jan Sibe-

---

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

JAN 9 - 1938

Boston Hears Symphony With Helsinki Chorus in 'Sibelius'

By BERNARD FREEMAN

Boston, Jan. 8 (AP).—If past musical history is any precedent, the original

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1938

Lost Symphony May Reappear

By United Press

BOSTON, Jan. 8.—If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius' early

---

CHICAGO, ILL.

JAN 10 1938

Sibelius Radioed

Nearly two months ago the music of Jean Sibelius' Origin of Fire, carefully wrapped in two separate packages, was mailed by Leipzig Publishers Breitkopf & Haertel to Boston Symphony's Conductor Koussevitzky. Last week, with the U. S. première of the famed Finn's work scheduled for immediate performance, Boston Symphony officials, still awaiting the appearance of one of the packages, telegraphed frantically to Leipzig. The publishers, equally frantic, located the only other copy in Europe, telephotoed it to Berlin, whence it was transmitted by radio facsimile to the U. S. Relieved Koussevitzky hired transcribers, got the parts copied just in time for its joint performance by the Boston Symphony and the Helsinki University Chorus, making its U. S. debut.

THE STAGE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN - - 1938

Music on the Map

By MARCIA DAVENPORT

Carnegie Hall and the Metropolitan look like the zoo these winter evenings, a remark not intended to insult the human race, but prompted by the millions of foxes, ermines, minks, and sables (maybe pussies, too) who meet not altogether for music's sweet sake. The season is burgeoning with fat houses and big names. The orchestra situation in its local manifestations is to be summed up about as follows: Philharmonic, static; Philadelphia, variable; NBC Symphony, challenging; Boston, a wow. Working backwards (and most symphony concerts are work), the Boston's first New York concerts under Serge Koussevitzky packed an impressive wallop. The first program was imposingly simple: the Eroica, and the Sibelius Second. For me the Eroica was not so much a communion with Beethoven as it was a re-taste of the rare tonal delight of this extraordinary orchestra. This is sound to be reveled in, rolled on the tongue, savored in every detail and nuance. The polish and sheen of the strings, the glow of the horns, and the tenderness of the exquisite woodwinds are all triumphs of individual playing and meticulous ensemble discipline. This is such a proud accomplishment that it seems like quibbling to question Dr. Koussevitzky's personal dicta on Beethoven. But question I do; there are points of tempo and phrasing that do not sound altogether orthodox to me. The Sibelius Symphony was a sensation, the real thing, and the first such thrill that has brought a Carnegie Hall audience cheering to its feet in a long time. This unregenerate individual has slept through a great deal of Sibelius, as I have often confessed, and, I fear, will sleep through a good deal more, average performances being what they are. But the Boston's performance was not average, it was super-super, in the language of fruit-packers; it was both beautiful and exciting. This is, of course, the most dramatic of Sibelius' symphonies, and its last two movements, played as one, are big music in its most climactic mood. At the point where the big brasses blared out the stunning finale theme in major resolution, your humble penitent was perched on the edge of the glory-seat in a fine state of revivalist excitement.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 9 - 1938

Noted Chorus In Boston

When the 55 singers in the Helsinki (Helsingfors, Finland) University Chorus give a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, this afternoon, a real treat in male singing is in store for music lovers.

"This chorus can be ranked among the first of the best choruses in the world," an Italian critic wrote during their preceding European hour. A Hungarian reviewer stated that: "One seldom hears such pure resonance in a male chorus, such fine crescendos, such soft and gentle pianissimos."

When they made their rst American appearance last week in Symphony Hall with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they were admired for exceptional strength and quality of tone combined, for tonal shading, and for notable precision. Koussevitzky praised them for "youthful spirit and elemental force."

Sibelius and Palmgren will be well represented among the compositions on Sunday's program. To lovers of the music of Sibelius, it is worthy of note that the composers will include two who pointed the way for Sibelius in the infusion of the national patriotic spirit and folk literature into music. These were Emil Genetz, writer of many choral works; and Robert Kajanus, creator of orchestral works. Kajanus wrote two Finnish Rhapsodies, and a dramatic episode, "Kullervo," inspired by the national epic, "Kalevala." Following this example, Sibelius composed a "Kullervo" Symphony, and went repeatedly to "Kalevala" for inspiration, as in his symphonic poems, "Pohjola's Daughter," "Tapiola," and "The Swan of Tuonela;" and "The Origin of Fire," for orchestra with chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

JAN 9 - 1938

an envelope which advertises a famous brand of silk stockings—but instead of saying "Buy!" when the envelope gets to you, it reads "Boycott!" That's catching it on the bounce! . . . (Maybe it's a rubber stamp.) . . . In the paintings of Picasso one major element is always left unfinished—let a good dialectician tell you why. . . . Fascists picketed Koussevitzky's recital at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening because members of the Boston Orchestra had joined the Musicians Committee for Spain. The pickets were the orneriest dames that have appeared in public in years. They gave up when a young feller marched along with them to howl maliciously but accurately: "Don't read their signs! You'll learn more from their faces!"

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 2 - 1938

Ravel Dies, Music Loses Vital Figure

By JACK MASON

The death of Maurice Ravel this week gave the world pause. When a genius dies, there is a moment when all of his achievements surge into perspective, and last week, the life of the celebrated Frenchman became known to many for the first time.

They learned the romantic incidents surrounding his "Bolero"; his American tour; his innovation in music, "Histoire Naturelles," musical sketches of animals, which was published in 1907 and raised such a storm among critics; and they learned about the man himself, his vitality, his wit and originality.

COMPOSER EXPLODED

He was not a quiet man at all times. Although on his tour of America he was content to forego triumphant appearances in order to introduce his ideas quietly and sincerely, his anger at Toscanini when the conductor presented the "Bolero" in Paris, indicates that Ravel had as much gusto as any of his brother Frenchmen.

The story goes that Ravel disagreed violently with the tempo chosen for the number, and was restrained only by force from shouting out at the orchestra.

The "Bolero" was in reality an experiment in crescendo. Ravel did not dare hope it would be taken seriously, and was delighted to find it had taken an eminent place among his works.

Others of Ravel's works best known to the public included "Jeux d'Eau" and "Miroirs," the string quartet, "Quatuor en Fa"; and the symphonic works, "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and "La Valse" and a late piano concerto. All well-known are his song set "Sheherazade" for voice and orchestra and his widely-played musical comedy "L'Heure Espagnole."

COLORFUL PERIOD

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, says the "passing of Maurice Ravel is the passing of one of the most brilliant and colorful periods of orchestral composition."

Ravel, on his visit to the United States about 10 years ago, was a guest conductor of Koussevitzky, directing some of his own compositions.

A prolific composer, Ravel claimed that in the warmth of inspiration, he composed steadily for weeks with only a couple of hours for sleep at night. The world can use more men of his stamina, whether they be musicians or laymen. Ravel will be missed; his music will survive.

Maurice Ravel, 62, French composer, died this week. In this best available picture, he is shown as he appeared in London in 1928.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD - TIMES

JAN 9 - 1938

A New Anthem?

Musicians attending the convention of the Music Teachers' National Association cannot agree about the national anthem. Of late "The Star-Spangled Banner" has been under fire from several sources. The words have been condemned as too arrogant and provocative, and also as tending to glorify war unduly. The criticism has some basis, undoubtedly; and, in fact, most national anthems not only exalt the nation whose people sing them, but assert its prowess in battle.

The air to which the United States anthem is sung has long been criticized as being too difficult for popular rendition. Having that in mind, Arthur Fiedler, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, has suggested a musical operation which will bring it within the capacity of the average singer. One of the teachers in the national association thinks the air should be changed and would like to see some of the "militaristic bunkum" taken out. Another calls for a complete new anthem, words and music. The majority of those whose opinions were expressed wanted no change whatever.

The latter have on their side two important considerations. One was well put by a musician who said "the strength of the song lies in a sympathy and emotion accumulated during the years of its application." In other words, "The Star-Spangled Banner," which came to be the anthem not by government or musical fiat, but by common consent, is now so firmly imbedded in tradition that most people are averse to a change. The other consideration may be even weightier than this—namely the difficulty, almost the impossibility, of writing an anthem to order. A composer might provide an air having merit, a lyricist might write verses avoiding all the criticism to which those of Francis Scott Key have been subjected, and Congress might declare this was the national anthem, but if the people did not take to it, it would be an anthem in name only.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1938

CONDUCTORS IN PARIS

PARIS.

A PERFORMANCE of Schumann's "Manfred" was given by the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire under the direction of M. Henri Rabaud, who, looking not a bit older than he did when he used to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also gave a fine reading of Beethoven's Second symphony.

Alfred Cortot gave a splendid interpretation of Ravel's magnificent concerto for the left hand at a recent concert of the Colonne Orchestra. It was amazing to realize that on the same piano which had served M. Cortot earlier in the program for his beautiful and ardent reading of Beethoven's concerto in E flat, he should be able in the Ravel concerto to produce, with one hand only, such waves and floods of sound greater in volume than that which his two hands procured in the Beethoven work. Not that the quantity of sound is in itself a superiority, but it indicates in this work a definite recognition of the true nature of the modern piano. The manner in which M. Cortot was acclaimed after the concerto showed that it mattered not a whit to the audience that he had played with Ravel's score before him on the piano.

Paul Paray's remarkably fine rendering of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" bore witness to the fact that he is becoming one of the outstanding figures among European orchestra conductors. His accuracy of rhythm is an unending delight; never is his beat a fraction of a second too early or too late. One selfishly fears that one of these days Paray will be spirited away by some foreign orchestra. He has a faithful public which packs the Théâtre du Chatelet twice a week to hear his programs.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 9 - 1938

Mme. Jarnefelt Plans Reception At Legation for Helsinki Chorus

Finnish Minister's Wife Returns from New York to Make Arrangements for Entertainment of Visiting Musical Group.

MME. JARNEFELT, the Finnish Minister's wife, who returns from New York today, will be very busy this week making arrangements for the reception she is giving at the legation on January 15 in honor of the Helsinki Chorus, and also for the buffet luncheon which she is planning for them next Sunday, January 16, before their appearance at Constitution Hall that afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Both she and the Minister were in New York last week for the appearance of the group at Carnegie Hall.

The Minister, who studied at Helsinki University, has even more than the usual interest of a "grad" for the visiting chorus. He, himself, was a member of the organization (he says that in Finland, "everybody loves music"), and his father before him was also a member. Armas Jarnefelt, one of the composers whose works will be performed by the chorus and who is one of its honorary members, is an uncle of the Minister. The former is now artistic manager and conductor of the Finnish Opera in Helsinki, and from 1907 to 1932, directed the Royal Opera in Stockholm.

* * * *

JEAN SIBELIUS, world famous composer and honorary sponsor of the Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat, (in English that still means Helsinki University Chorus) is the Finnish Minister's uncle—by marriage. Marti Paloheimo, grandson of Sibelius, is at present a member of the chorus.

The Minister confesses to not having been able to "keep up" his singing, but both he and Mme. Jarnefelt now and then have a touch and go at the piano.

The United States Minister to Finland, H. F. Arthur Schoenfeld, is an honorary sponsor of the group. Among its many other patrons and patronesses are Eero Jarnefelt and Mme. Jarnefelt and Emil Hurja.

* * * *

THE CHORUS . . . an internationally minded organization . . . has sung its way all over Europe and has appeared in concert in Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Hungary and Italy.

On Saturday evening, January 15, the American Finns will also fete the 60 young men at a dance at the Lee House. During their free time in Washington . . . one wonders what free time . . . they will get in a sightseeing tour of the town.

They serve as avant couriers for the Finnish delegation to the Delaware Tercentenary festivities this coming June, at which time the establishment by Swedes and Finns of the first permanent settlements in the Delaware River Valley will be celebrated.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JAN 10 1938

USES RAILROAD TIE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECITAL (U.P.)

BOSTON, Jan. 10—When Conductor Daniele Amfitheatrof arrived today to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks, he surrendered most of his luggage to Red-Caps but insisted on personally carrying a small paper-wrapped package.

Later he explained the package contained a 36-inch section of railroad tie which is beaten with a hammer in a portion of his symphonic orchestration "American Panorama."

He brought the tie, he said, so symphony officials would not be inconvenienced in obtaining the proper type of wood for the purpose.

[Not tie, but rail!]

Notes of Music and the Dance

B. Trans. Jan. 12/38

Manhattan Receives Boston Orchestra and the Touring Finnish Chorus; Programs at Hand

When Dr. Koussevitzky took the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York last week for its second visit of the season, he introduced the Helsinki Chorus in that city as he had in Boston the previous week. The program on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall added the Third "Brandenburg" Concerto of Bach to the list heard in Symphony Hall. The debut of the chorus evoked enthusiastic praise from the reviewers. Several of them pointed out that "The Origin of Fire" was introduced to America by the Schola Cantorum, under the direction of Hugh Ross on Jan. 19, 1931, and not at this concert, as Mr. Burk's printed notes stated

Concerning the performance of two choral works, "The Captive Queen" and "The Origin of Fire," an excerpt from Pitts Sanborns review in the World-Telegram may be quoted:

"Each piece is eminently effective and the exceptional quality of the performances last evening was due not only to the magnificence of the Boston orchestra and the inspiriting energy contributed by Mr. Koussevitzky, but also to the extraordinary proficiency of the chorus.

This stalwart choir of men seems to posses unlimited tonal resources, and the unanimity and distinctness of its enunciation is positively phenomenal. The huge audience was most enthusiastic."

Olin Downes of the Times saved Brahms for the end of his long notice. "The dominating orchestral effect was the Brahms Symphony No. 3, which powerfully impressed the audience. The music glowed with full measure of its energy, health and romantic feeling. Seldom have we heard the lightning of the first theme so leap from the instruments, or the three-note motive represented by the great swelling introductory chords given such passionate strength. The tempo was a real allegro con brio, which is what the composer asks, though Dr. Koussevitzky found it expedient to modify this in certain places.

"The orchestral tone was a glory to the ear, whether it was that of strings, wood or brass. Who is there, at all familiar with the symphony, who will forget the twilight progressions that bring the end of the second movement? The tempo of the third movement was somewhat too fast—perhaps to counteract the general tendency of musicians to drag and sentimentalize this part of the symphony. But is was too fast for the theme to be fully sung, while it emphasized the undercurrent of agitation which tinges Brahms's melancholy.

"The essence of the music was recaptured in the finale, rugged and glorious, 'echt Brahms'—the music of a bear and also a dreamer. Delighted, the audience applauded for minutes, and the conductor shared its approval with the unsurpassed orchestra."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

119

JAN 9 - 1938

'THE MASS OF LIFE'

Largest Choral Work of Delius to Be Performed by Schola Cantorum

By OLIN DOWNES

WE read Mr. Eric Fenby, whose memoir, "Delius as I Knew Him" (G. Bell & Sons, London, 1937), is a record of a singularly intimate and self-sacrificing friendship with the composer in his last years of pain and physical disability. Mr. Fenby, acting as musical amanuensis, enabled Delius, who was practically paralyzed, to resume composition by dictation.

Mr. Fenby deplores Nietzsche's influence upon the composer, especially as reflected in the score of "The Mass of Life," the work which will be performed this week for the first time in America, it is said, by Hugh Ross and the Schola Cantorum. "Already, as a youth, when he had left Bradford on his first visit to Florida, Delius was at heart a pagan. . . . When, one wet day . . . he was looking for something to read in the library of a Norwegian friend with whom he was staying during a walking tour and had taken down a book, 'Thus Spake Zarathustra'—a book for all and none—by one Friedrich Nietzsche, he was ripe for it. That book, he told me, never left his hands until he had devoured it from cover to cover. It was the very book he had been seeking all along, and finding that book he declared to be one of the most important developments of his life. Nor did he rest content until he had read every work of Nietzsche that he could lay his hands on; and the poison entered his soul."

On a Christmas Day Delius sent Fenby a copy of "Zarathustra," saying, "I do not subscribe to everything Nietzsche said, but I hail him as a sublime poet and a beautiful nature. I want to make myself very plain to you as regards religions and creeds. Personally, I have no use for them. There is only one real happiness in life, and that is the happiness of creating."

Some anti-Nietzschean, with whom our biographer seems to feel a sneaking sympathy, said the "Mass" should be called "The 'Mess' of Life!"

* * *

"It was not," says Mr. Fenby, "until Delius told me that it had been his habit over a period of a great many years, to open 'Thus Spake Zarathustra' at random, take a chapter and ponder it sometimes for weeks together, then, when he had extracted its essence, turn to another and do likewise, that I realized something of the influence Nietzsche had exercised over him, and something of his disappointment in my polite refusal to follow his example."

It is good to know that the erring Delius could not contaminate Fenby, and that Nietzsche could not either. Says Fenby, "I did not get along very well with Zarathustra. I was prejudiced before I started, for it was my misfortune to come across some of Nietzsche's music! Whatever he may have been as a philosopher, whatever he may have been as a poet, the Reverend John Bacchus Dykes, that infallible touchstone in matters of this kind, and without mention of whom no essay on Delius would be complete, was a veritable Mozart compared with Nietzsche as a composer. Since then I have never been able to take the fellow seriously." It is good to know that, too.

"The Mass of Life" is the setting, for chorus, orchestra and solo voices, of lines selected and arranged from Nietzsche's "Also Sprach Zarathustra" by Fritz Cassirer. This, Delius's largest choral work, has waited long for presentation here. Mr. Ross, and others, have performed his "Sea-Drift," and shorter choral pieces by Delius are known. "The Mass of Life" is his most ambitious production in choral form, as it has also proved the most debatable.

* * *

Delius's setting of Zarathustra's "Night-Wanderer's Song" was composed in 1898. It became a part of the greater score of the "Mass," which was not finished till 1905, and not heard till Thomas Beecham gave it its first complete performance in London in 1909. "The Mass of Life" contrasts sharply with "Sea-Drift," which, as Philip Heseltine remarks in his book on Delius, is essentially lyrical, while the music inspired by Nietzsche is epic in proportions and spirit.

Had the brilliant and unfortunate Heseltine heard this work when he wrote his book? He says "it would last perhaps an hour and a half in performance, exclusive of intervals." According to the Universal Edition of the published score for voices and piano, which, through the courtesy of the Associated Music Publishers, is before us, this is a poor guess. The score says 135 minutes. The impression of the printed page tends to justify Mr. Ross's decision to take out two of the later movements which could be a little redundant in character and lengthy in effect.

Mr. Heseltine was not as worried over Delius's religion as Mr. Fenby appears to have been. The former biographer even goes so far as to say that "The Mass of Life" "is, in the fullest sense of the word, a deeply religious work, and one can imagine a more spiritually enlightened generation performing it as a solemn ritual in some gigantic open-air theatre, year after year at the coming-in of Summer." In fact, Heseltine went farther, much farther, in estimating the composition. He calls it "a colossal work, without a doubt the greatest achievement since Wagner, a Mass worthy to range beside the great Mass of Sebastian Bach!!"

These be tall words, and a good deal of water has passed under the bridge since John Lane published Heseltine's book in London in 1923. Enough that the technically irreligious, the mystical, pantheistic Delius, has set Nietzsche's words with more vigor and breadth than he has shown in any other choral work. It is time we heard a score so audacious in conception for its period. Nietzsche, at the least, stirred the imagination of one of the most distinctive figures among modern English composers.

* * *

The composition begins with an imposing hymn to the will of life and the birth of God in man, scored for double chorus. "Oh thou my will," cries Zarathustra, "preserve me from all trivial victories. Preserve me for the one great and final triumph; that at the great noontide I may be ready to answer the call of myself and of my most secret will." Then comes the baritone solo: "Now lift up your hearts, all, lift them, brothers, high! . . . Laughter I pronounce holy. Ye higher mortals, learn of me—to laugh."

The next movement, for three solo voices and double chorus, is Man's pursuit of Life, his beloved. It begins with a mysterious rocking motion and with distant calls from afar — background for the solo voices. The pace quickens, the rhythm changes, with the introduction of an archaic, Celtic kind of dance tune. There is a crescendo as voice parts accumulate, and the music gains momentum coincidentally with fugal development. A quieter mood ensues. The alto solo, the voice of Life, calls prophetically to Zarathustra. There is the thought of the tolling bell, and the chorus, under the solo voice, intones words of the Night-Wanderer's Song, "O man, take heed. What saith the deep midnight?" The ending is peaceful. Gazing over the meadow, Zarathustra and his Love sigh and weep together.

A baritone solo questions. "How is the time fled?" The chorus answers, "The world sleeps, the hound howls, the moon shines." The ripple of waters is imagined. What follows is poetical apostrophe to the night. This is the end of the first part of the composition.

The second part is introduced by a simple orchestral prelude, "On the heights." There is a great double chorus, a greeting to nature and sea and sun. "O come, my companions, that our stillness may be yet more blessed. For these are our heights, our homeland, and we are neighbors of the eagles, neighbors of the snow, neighbors to the very sun itself." The second dance song is to be omitted in the coming performance. Zarathustra finds the young girls dancing, comforts them, and praises the tiny winged god. The mood becomes more ecstatic. The bell tolls. There is a tumultuous conclusion, a hymn of joy, which moves, with many elaborations, from climax to climax. After a double fortissimo has been reached the music quickly subsides. Last heard is a distant whisper, very softly, on a B major chord, "Ewigkeit."

* * *

Another work new to this public will be given the same evening when Delius's is performed. The composer is Vladimir Dukelsky—to you—but Vernon Duke to Broadway and its musical playhouses, for which he has written the music for nine revues. But if Jekyll Duke has his revues, Hyde Dukelsky has had big and serious scores played by the Boston and Chicago Symphony Orchestras, the League of Composers, the Diaghileff Russian Ballet and other American and European organizations of equal importance.

Dukelsky's composition, also a choral work, is "The End of St. Petersburg," and the conception is of the crises of the life of the old Russian capital from its founding by Peter the Great to the time of the last revolution.

YOUNG AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 14 1938

AT HOME

Music Is Radioed to Boston Orchestra

Over the cold, Atlantic air between Leipzig, Germany, and Boston, went a high-pitched radio wave. This single note was carrying all the tones of the "Origin of Fire," a symphony by the famous Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius.

The score of the symphony was needed for a New Year's Eve performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sibelius' publishers, in Leipzig, had mailed two packages, one containing the original score and the other some arrangements of it for various parts of the orchestra, last November. But the package containing the original score was lost in the mails.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony, tore his hair in despair. He gloomily planned to substitute another piece of music for the Sibelius "Origin of Fire." Then someone said, jokingly, "That music will have to be rushed over here by radio."

"It is possible nowadays to have a musical score sent by radio!" Dr. Koussevitzky shouted. In all, 14 copies were sent over the wire. The little pages of the radio telegrams were then enlarged by photography, and each member of the orchestra and chorus who needed a copy had one. The Helsinki University Male Chorus, from Sibelius' own country, sang with the orchestra.

The "Origin of Fire" was written in 1902, but had not previously been played in America. It takes but 10 minutes to play. The words and the theme were taken from Finland's epic poem, "Kalevala."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS PHILIPP BACH

D Major Concerto, Arranged by Steinberg, and Mozart Work Are Offered

EMMA BOYNET IS PIANIST

Koussevitzky Concludes His Program With the Fifth Tchaikovsky Symphony

By OLIN DOWNES

The first half of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was worth a long journey. It consisted of Philipp Emanuel Bach's D major concerto for stringed instruments arranged for full orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg and Mozart's piano concerto in C major (K. 467) incomparably played by Emma Boynet.

The orchestra sounded gloriously in both these compositions, for the accompaniment of the concerto was as admirable as the playing of the pianist. The Steinberg arrangement of the Bach would be justified if only on the ground of the scoring for the wind instruments in the slow movement. This slow movement, beautifully played by the oboist, and other solo parts in the piece could almost come from some dolorous Passion-music by the elder Bach.

Its depth of feeling and composure reminded the listener again how sadly and how strangely the long-breathed tempo and the broad, melodic line essential to a real slow movement are lacking in music of the modern period. How did the eighteenth century artists produce such serene beauty? A commonplace answer to this question is that there was more unused material of music in their day; that the older masters had not yet exhausted the melodic capacities of the major and minor scales and the common chords; with the inference that we of today must find new musical material before we can again present some real musical invention.

Whole Composition Pleases

But it is not so. The possibilities of the familiar scales and chords are limitless. It is something else that is lacking, and that cannot be found by such a feverish and unquiet period as ours. The more welcome, and wonderful, was this movement, indeed the whole composition, though it is nowhere else so distinguished, of Philipp Emanuel Bach.

Miss Boynet capped this by her adorable performance of Mozart's concerto. She could do her finest because of the opportunity Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave her for the utmost delicacy, on the one hand, and a brilliancy that was wholly without coarseness or the slightest exaggeration or hardness on the other. She kept her scale of dynamics and her technical style entirely to those of Mozart's period and the spirit of his music.

She has a purling scale which was one of the things the divine master pronounced indispensable for the finished performer; a legato, when so she chooses, that is like sustained song; a staccato as crisp and neat as the old music requires. The articulation of each tone is perfectly clean; at the same time Miss Boynet does not disdain a discreet and well judged use of the pedal. As a result there is the exact distinction between this music, which is just a little fuller and anticipative of the modern piano than genuine harpsicord music, and the first distant dawn of piano virtuosity in Mozart's day.

Applause Is Stifled

This for technique and style. Then we come to the inner spirit of the music. It was charged with an ineffable grace, sparkle, tenderness and poetry. The audience listened breathless to the slow movement. It was unfortunately prevented from breaking into applause by the new and increasingly snobbish tendency in the concert room to abolish applause between movements of a symphonic composition. This is rather absurd.

We are fairly certain that Mozart himself was not above stopping and bowing to applause when he had finished a movement of his concert, and we fancy he might even have been chagrined if there had been no such response to his playing and his music.

The concert ended with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, with its great triumphant finale; a work, however, which, with the other two popular symphonies of Tchaikovsky, Dr. Koussevitzky has played many, many times in this city. With such an orchestra and conductor we could spare a few repetitions of Tchaikovsky in exchange for more varied and progressive programs, of the sort for which we look to the Boston Symphony, and usually hope for in vain from orchestras nearer home.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

JAN 10 1938

Koussevitzky Directs Concert of Boston Symphony at Carnegie---Philharmonic Bill Features Violinists

By PITTS SANBORN.

Week-end music and dance events included, on Saturday afternoon, the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall; "Il Trovatore" at the Metropolitan, and the piano recital of Robert Casadesus at the Town Hall; on Saturday evening the Toscanini broadcast, "Aida," at the Metropolitan, the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, and the song recital of Colette d'Arville at the Town Hall; yesterday afternoon the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, the piano recital of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, and the New Friends of Music concert at the Town Hall; and last evening the dance program of Doris Humphrey and Charles Weidman and their Dance Group at the Guild Theater, the violin recital of Gloria Perkins at the Town Hall, and the Federal Symphony concert at the WPA Federal Music Theater.

* * *

Bach and Mozart.

Serge Koussevitzky devoted the first half of his Boston Symphony program to two masterpieces of eighteenth century music—C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D major for strings as skillfully arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, and Mozart's piano concerto in C major (K. 467).

The two Allegros of the former work are admirable each in its way and the intervening Andante is one of the most beautiful movements that any member of the Bach family gave to the world. The concerto was played exceedingly well, though one may question whether the new seating of the orchestra, with the two violin sections side by side and the violas where the second violins used to sit, is not detrimental to tonal quality and balance.

In Mozart's enchanting composition Emma Boynet, a pianist from Paris, made her local debut (she had played in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra in November, 1935, and again last month). After a slight initial raggedness she performed the solo part with finish and elegance and an intimate understanding of Mozart's style, the orchestra proving an excellent collaborator.

For the second half of the program Mr. Koussevitzky selected Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, which he read in a highly individual fashion, evoking from his band all sorts of splendor.

* * *

Solos by Violinists.

Violin soloists occupied places of honor on the week-end Philharmonic-Symphony programs, in one case the executant being none other than Georges Enesco, the Society's present ~~conductor.~~

Mr. Enesco was heard yesterday in two numbers—Bach's A minor concerto for violin and string orchestra and the Chausson "Poeme" —exchanging the baton for the bow with Mishel Piastro, the concertmaster.

Authority, musicianship, and warm, substantial tone went into the playing of each. The Bach number earned a well-paced and energetic reading, and towards the end of the Chausson piece orchestra and soloist rose to such a pitch of emotional intensity that at the end the audience burst into excited applause.

Yvonne Astruc, a Parisian violinist and one-time pupil of Mr. Enesco, made her local debut on Saturday night in an unfamiliar "Invention" in B flat major (arranged by Mr. Enesco), attributed to Bach, and a new concerto by Germaine Tailleferre, the French composer.

Mme. Artsuc showed technic enough besides tone, which, though far from pure, was strong and penetrating enough to come through the often loud and elaborate orchestral web being spun about her. The work itself is pleasant enough, if lacking in any striking originality or force.

The other numbers on both programs were the "Symphonic Piece" from Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

L. B.

Amfitheatroff with Symphony; Boston S

B. Herald — Jan. [illegible]/38

Jesus Maria Sanroma, young Spanish American pianist, who will make two appearances in Boston this week. This afternoon he will take part in the second Flute Players' Club concert at the Hotel Vendome, playing Hindemith's Sonate for Flute and Pianoforte with Georges Laurent, and Tuesday evening he will be the assisting artist at the final concert this season of the Boston String Quartet at Jordan Hall.

Daniele Amfitheatroff, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week and next. He will conduct the Thursday night concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts and the Monday evening, Tuesday afternoon, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, Jan. 17, 18, 21 and 22.

RECORD CROWD AT SYMPHONY

Menuhins in Piano and Violin Recital

B. Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The largest audience that Symphony Hall has known in some time, which filled not only the auditorium but most of the stage, assembled yesterday afternoon to hear the Menuhins, Yehudi and Hephzibah, in a recital of conatas for violin and piano. The brother is a familiar figure here; his 17-year-old sister was making her Boston debut. The programme consisted of Bach's Sonata No. 3 in E major, Beethoven's Sonata in G major, Opus 96, and the Sonata of the Belgian Guillaume Lekeu, who died in 1894 in his 25th year.

Beethoven's Sonata in G major has become suddenly popular hereabouts. The other night it was played in Jordan Hall by Busch and Serkin, and it will be played there again Jan. 31 by Einar Hensen and Jeannette Giguere. This belated discovery of one of Beethoven's most gracious works is most welcome. Its performance at the hands of the youthful Menuhins yesterday was tasteful and discreet, beautiful in sound but lacking, and not unnaturally, the authority, the interpretative insight which Mr. Busch and Mr. Serkin brought to it. An extremely talented pianist, for one of her years, Miss Hephzibah hardly commands Mr. Serkin's brilliance.

As a pupil of Franck and D'Indy, Lekeu was plainly influenced by both of them in the composition of his once highly acclaimed but now generally neglected Sonata. Rossini once remarked that the operas of Wagner had their moments and their bad quarters of an hour. With appropriatet modifications, this witty criticism might be applied to Lekeu's Sonata. One of these moments comes at the end of the last movement, and here the hitherto cautious Menuhins played with fire and verve and aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. To return to the work itself, one can find in it, for the most part, agitation without passion, cantileva without melody, pensiveness without poetry. The Sonata of Bach is not one of his most inspired compositions, and the most conspicuous feature of yesterday's performance of it was the aforementioned beauty of tone, which was evident throughout the afternoon.

Finns Give All Vocal Program

Helsinki University Chorus At Symphony Hall Sing National Music a Capella

New Bedford Mercury — Jan 12/38

Completely sold to Finland, one returns from the unaccompanied vocal concert of the Helsinki University Chorus given in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon before a capacity audience made up almost entirely of fellow-countrymen and neighboring Scandinavians. Their sponsorship is exceptional — the great in education, music and finance in the home country including Jean Sibelius, whom Serge Koussevitzky has interpreted so nobly for America and Europe; on this side of the Atlantic, all the famous symphony conductors of this country with many prominent Finns here and in Canada and the foremost American music critics. Finland's honorable discharge of war debts alone would secure them favorable reception. They come as the first contribution of Finland to the Delaware Tercentenary next June.

They have had the added publicity of the lost orchestral score and the scientific association with the trans-Atlantic radio photographing of missing string parts to insure performance of the Sibelius "Origin of Fire," one of the two choral-symphonic numbers in which they made their American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 31. This note for future reference was made at the time:

"The Helsinki University Chorus thrilled the Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall with brilliant, heroic utterance of two epics of Finland. The usual program contained a leaflet giving the entire texts in the original and in English translation. The lights were left nearly full for following during the Sibelius choral numbrs by the fine body of 50 selected male singers and Finnish was discovered to be an easily flowing language in their beautiful enunciation.

"An instrumental interlude for the coming of the true knight to free 'The Captive Queen' and the sound picturing of the Maiden of the Air rocking the new-struck flame in 'The Origin of Fire' were portions of highly picturesque imagry."

Such virility, resonance, and beauty of tone must have many of the subtleties in reserve, it was realized and in the concert Sunday they were revealed. A study of the program book in advance found gratefully large type; a broad, conveniently handled format; notes on the all-national composers and their likenesses; the original Finnish and a free translation; a history of the chorus; the story of early Finnish contributions to America before the "melting pot" began to overflow; and a sketch of the new Finland that is one of the most advanced countries in Europe. Maps and choice selections of scenery complete a booklet designed to create the mood in which this article was begun.

It is the language that fairly nestles into the imagination. Side by side with the English it is possible to follow and appreciate its compact, suggestive character; its highly singable qualities often alliteratively presented. It flows, it yields to the tongue, it seems to be of infinite variation. Thorborg, Marian Anderson have sung to us in Finnish to our pleasure; now these vigorous men with their arms-swinging, athletic stride come as the perfect apostles of their speech. Through the ample aids they bring, we may enjoy the beauties of their national music.

They sang many quiet things of lingering loveliness: Haapalainen's "Pan"; Kuula's "Evening Reverie"; Kajanus' "I Sing to You, Fair Maiden"; Sibelius' "My Heart's Song"; Palmgren's "Summer Evening" and "Tuutulaulu" (Cradle Song). At a third demand this second Palmgren was given in English.

Language formation induces a sound sequence class—Jarnevelt's "Sirkka" (The Cricket); Maasalo's "Tullallaa" (Chubby - cheeked); Palmgren's "Paimenen Ilo" (The Shepherd's Joy). Aksel Tornudd was represented by one of his characteristic comic pieces—"Prokko" who got drunk and set his farm in a turmoil and, in gorgeous contrast —"Loitsu" (Conjuration) "Away, disappear, thou evil spirit."

To Sibelius' "Fire on the Island" and "Venematka" (The Boat Trip) in the Kalevala metre Longfellow borrowed from this Finnish epic, the chorus gave possibly the most evanescent treatment of all their light, skillful, opalescent interpretations. The spectacular piece was "The Song of the Slaves of Hiisi"—gold, hammers, mountain; work, work; the world is beautiful, beautiful is the sun. Ha haa! Here was an example of the suggestive, half revealed character of the poetic thought of Finland.

Two strictly national tributes by Genetz and Oskari Merikanto opened and closed the program which had included one sweeping crescendo, incredibly fading pianissimos, blends, marvelously rapid arment for calling you a barbarian when you didn't want to put on your dinner coat. I haven't even energy enough to comb my hair."

MUSIC

B. Trans. Jan. 1938

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

YEHUDI MENUHIN HEPHZIBAH MENUHIN

Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin gave a concert of sonatas for violin and piano yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was a capacity audience present to hear the following program.

Bach..........Sonata No. 3 in E major
Beethoven......Sonata in G major Op. 96
Lekeu...............Sonata in G major

Great interest attached yesterday to the first appearance of this talented brother and sister together in Boston. We have, of course, long appreciated the genuis of Yehudi Menuhin, and reports had reached us of the remarkable ability of his sister. But there is nothing like finding out for one's self; and for that reason an audience, so large that extra seating space had to be found on the stage, assembled yesterday to listen and applaud.

If it were for the music alone, a fastidious public would find satisfaction enough in the artistry of their playing. But capacity audiences do not gather purely for music, or musicians like Messrs. Busch and Serkin would also sell out Symphony hall. It was rather the appeal of youth, together with exceptional gifts, that drew yesterday's public. But in fairness it should be added that the occasion musically was of a high order and that the audience duly grasped that fact.

Brother and sister play together with marvellous co-ordination, both from a technical and an emotional standpoint. It is possible that Mr. Menuhin has been the dominating influence in the partnership and that his ideas on interpretation are carried out. The only criticism that can be offered was that the restraint, which Miss Menuhin so properly exercised in the Bach, could have been more decisively put aside in the Beethoven. In consequence the Sonata, though beautifully polished, lacked vitality.

Perfection of ensemble was never absent from their playing and was really astonishing, when it is recalled that good chamber music performances are not supposed to be readily acquired by young musicians. But, just as there has never been any question about Mr. Menuhin's maturity of outlook in music, so too his sister has achieved that quality. Whether in the classical lines of Bach or the romantic, almost sentimental, Sonata of Lekeu, it was first rate playing and musicianship that we heard yesterday

The Lekeu Sonata was an odd, though not a bad, choice for a concert. Guillaume Lekeu was a Belgian composer, who belonged to the Franck circle, as this music would at once reveal. In 1894 he had the misfortune to die of typhoid at the age of 24, thereby cutting off a career which his contemporaries regarded as exceptionally promising. If there are dull passages in this work, set it down to the composer's immaturity. He only began to study music seriously when he was 18, and great violin and piano sonatas are not usually written without practice. This was, in effect, a courageous choice for a program. Among the many other compliments which the Menuhins will receive, there should be one on this head. The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic and was rewarded with several encores.

TO GIVE DINNER FOR SYMPHONY

Harvard Club Host—Dr. Angell Principal Speaker

Jan. 20 38

Dr. James Rowland Angell, former president of Yale University, will be the principal speaker Jan. 28 at the dinner to be given by the Harvard Club of Boston in honor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky.

The dinner will serve as partial recognition of the orchestra's artistic contribution to Harvard's recent tercentenary celebration. Edward A. Taft, toastmaster, will be on familiar ground as president of the club, trustee of the orchestra and President of the Friends of the Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky, recipient in 1929 of an honorary degree of doctor of laws conferred upon him by Harvard University, will speak for the orchestra, and Bentley W. Warren, president of the trustees, will represent his associates. Mark Anthony deWolfe Howe, who wrote the orchestra's history, has composed a poem to be read by Prof. E. K. Rand of Harvard.

Henry Lee Higginson, whose grandfather founded the orchestra and was the first president of the Harvard Club, will be present as a guest. Among the club members who will attend to act as hosts to the musicians are the following:

James Adams, Charles R. Apted, Dr. John L. Ames, E. W. Atkinson, Paul V. Bacon, George S. C. Badger, Theodore L. Badger, G. M. Balboni, J. Colby Bassett, Dr. J. V. Blasi, J. H. Blodgett, William B. Breed.

G. W. Briggs, Jr., Walter D. Brooks, C. Rodgers Burgin, Allston Burr, Stephen E. Cabot, Z. Chafee, Jr., A. P. Chittenden, Joseph . Cohen, W. H. Coolidge, Jr., Barton Crocker, Arthur P. Crosby, Louis Curtis, Carl J. Dinic, Dr. Albert Ehrenfried, Henry S. Forbes, Lee M. Friedman, Horace W. Frost, Seth T. Gano, Walter W. Gaskill.

Basil Gavin, Hollis T. Gleason, Jerome D. Greene, William C. Greene, Henry Greenough, Murray F. Hall, N. Penrose Hallowell, Charles J. Hamlin, C. H. Hare, G. W. B. Hartwell, William C. Heilman, Robert Herrick, Adams S. Hill, Arthur D. Hill, Edward B. Hill, Harold D. Hodgkinson, Edward J. Holmes, William P. Homans, M. A. deW. Howe, W. D. Howe, Joseph Hudnut, Frederick L. Jack.

Henry Jackson, E. S. Johnson, George E. Judd, Arthur J. Kelly, Franklin King, Roger I. Lee, Herbert Lyman, Alden H. MacIntyre, E. L. Mark, K. McLeod, J. H. Means, Alton L. Miller, Robert C. Morse, Henry A. Morss, Jr., Hugh Nawn, James B. Noyes, Robert B. Osgood, Calvin G. Page, Robert E. Peabody, Donald P. Perry, Walter Piston, E. K. Rand, Harry Seaton Rand, Robert Rantoul, J. Stewart Rooney, Philip Rubenstein, Jean Paul Sams, Dr. David D. Scannell, Richard Sears.

Louis Shapiro, Thomas Mott Shaw, Philip L. Spalding, Richard P. Strong, E. A. Taft, Louis B. Thacher, Arthur A. Thomas Quincy W. Wales, Charles Walker, C. H. Watkins, John G. Whitham, Jr., Joseph Wiggin, Philip W. Wrenn, Edward L. Young, Jr., Edward L. Young, III, James F. Dwinell, Alexander Lincoln, Robert Walcott, Dwight P. Robinson, Jr., Joseph G. Brent.

Jan 19

121

Debut of a Guest Conductor with the Symphony Orchestra

Daniele Amfitheatrof, Russian Out of Italy, Begins a Fortnight at Sanders Theater

Jan. 14/38 Trans.

By Moses Smith

Daniele Amfitheatrof, who made his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening, is as spectacular a figure as Dimitri Mitropoulos, the midwinter guest of the last two seasons and colleague of Amfitheatrof in charge of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. In physical appearance they are sharply contrasting figures: the one tall, the other short, the first boasting a fine head of hair, the second bald—to mention the most obvious differences. But they are alike in that each is prone to uneconomical gesture during the process of conducting.

The movements themselves are not alike, however. Amfitheatrof combines what seems to be a pose of studied grace, at moments when the music is more or less in repose, with not merely sweeping movements of the arms in many directions but also assorted bodily contortions, when the music becomes more exciting. Compare him with a conductor like Karl Muck, who did most of his directing from the wrist. Amfitheatrof's conducting scarcely stops at the heel. The spectator is conscious of joints ranging from the elbow to the shoulder to the base of the spine to the knees.

This is not to say that his movements are not "natural." They are as natural as the movements of the old-fashioned band-conductor or of that dignitary's successor, the typical contemporary symphonic conductor. Audiences are likely to "love" such postures, professional musicians to hate them, each for their own reasons.

But generalizations are unsafe. In one conductor the movements may be the result of exhibitionist tendencies, a desire to be sensational at any price to the music. In another they may be due to what the music does to him. I could not tell, in a single evening, in which category Amfitheatrof belongs. At times—as when the movements were least beautiful—he seemed to be expressing his intentions to the orchestra in the only way possible to him in relation to the music. At other times, as when he raised both arms to high heaven during the course of the performance of the Beethoven Symphony in A major, he seemed to be merely theatrical.

His way with the music left similar doubts, which presumably will be resolved after an opportunity to hear almost the same program again in Symphony Hall this afternoon.. The broad outlines of his version of the Beethoven Symphony were substantially those indicated by the score, including a faster Trio for the Scherzo than most conductors, except Toscanini, employ. But his prevailing tendency was to emphasize dynamic contrasts, particularly in the direction of loudness. The orchestral climaxes were repeatedly so sonorous and brilliant that after a while the music seemed merely noisy.

I think that much of this unfortunate result would have been avoided if the conductor had been sufficiently warned as to the exceptional resonance of Sanders Theater, or if he himself had noted that the place, as an orchestral concert-room, is relatively small. In one event or the other he might have toned down the orchestral crashes in the opening number, Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," the violent contrasts of which were intended obviously for the opera house, where you have almost to hit a man on the head to attract his attention.

More suitable and natural was the treatment of a Suite for strings made out of three movements from string quintets by Boccherini. (The program annotator, John Burk, ventured some interesting general observations about Boccherini and his music, but very little about the particular work of the evening, not even including the name of the editor responsible for the composite Suite.) Here the strings of the Boston Orchestra, under Amfitheatrof's ministrations, sounded graceful and expressive. The music itself also obviously pleased an audience that applauded the proceedings vigorously through the evening. I should not take the whole Suite for a few measures of Boccherini's celebrated—and now trite—Minuet.

The playing of the only other number on the program, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, gave rise to doubts, too, in spite of—perhaps because of—the sheer brilliance of the orchestral playing. I think I have never heard the Boston Orchestra or any other orchestra dispose of any composition with such eclat, such dazzling brightness of orchestral tone, always true and, in its own fashion, expressive. But the brightness was again too much for Sanders Theater, even though, for curiosity's sake, the unique experiment was worth while. The prevailing tempo was a little too fast. It was not that the instruments did not execute their passages clearly and even magnificently. It was rather that the architecture of the work was disturbed. If one of the elements in a climax is going to be acceleration—as it is here—you have got to start more slowly.

But a musician is not to be pigeon-holed after a single performance. Fortunately there will be sufficient opportunity in the next two weeks, to observe Amfitheatrof anew and in perhaps more congenial environment.

Globe Jan. 18/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Not to be outdone by the regular Friday-Saturday series, the Monday evening listeners of the Boston Symphony concerts had their taste of the conducting of Daniele Amfitheatrof, guest here for a fortnight of concerts.

It was obvious, from the beginning, that his audience warmed to him—a natural response to his sincere, unaffected, sympathetic performance as a conductor. Though it is perhaps too easy, in evaluating the work of a great orchestra under the hand of several conductors, to perceive fanciful differences in the effects obtained, one felt unmistakably that Mr. Amfitheatrof at times obtained from the orchestra a dryly brilliant resonance which struck one as a new color to Boston's palette, and one which was employed to remarkably good effect in the "Semiramide" overture, and to somewhat less good effect in the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

Despite the orthodox excellence of Mr. Amfitheatrof's reading of the Beethoven symphony—a performance of which it seemed that the dominating quality was youth, with all the merits and condescencions of the label—it was the conductor's particularly affectionate and intuitive shepherding of the Boccherini Suite for strings that drew forth the most genuine admiration from his audience.

Mr. Amfitheatrof's own "American Panorama" draws occasional broad and unfeigned smiles from the listener; yet one cannot help finding it akin to the statements about America the visiting English lecturers make when they get back to the Isles—the ones who saw Broadways and billboards, but neglected to have a look at the Mississippi and the Grand Canyon.

Enesco Conducts in Manhattan

Trans. Jan. 15/38

View of the Composer-Violinist as He Becomes Guest-Leader of the Philharmonic

NEW YORK—As a composer Georges Enesco is familiar figure enough. His prowess with the violinist's bow has long since passed into the realm of things expected and accomplished. But as conductor of a full-length symphony program, which he is to be in Boston when he takes over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a week in March, he is an imagined talent—or rather was for this writer until Friday afternoon of last week here in Carnegie Hall.

When Mr. Enesco stepped from the wings and strode through the applauding members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society to his place on the podium, it was at once evident that the packed house remembered his brief appearance last season with pleasure and was heartily anticipating a month's stay of the distinguished musician. Aware of his listeners only as a necessary and valued reason for music-making. he proceeded immediately to the first score on his list—the "Fidelio" Overture of Beethoven. One step from his authoritative height, an absorbed bow to audience and orchestra, and he was deep in Haydn's great "London" Symphony. After the interval, a symphonic poem, "Acteon," by a disciple, the Rumanian Alessandresco, was followed by the "Grande Fete at Capulet's House" from the Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," of Berlioz.

Enesco is your awkward conductor par excellence. Only the excited motions in which he singles out particular instruments for the high point of a climax surpass the general ungracefulness. But through the very lack of ease one recognizes almost at once the extraordinary concentration of this peculiarly musical intellect. The man exists in a world of tone and has his being in a land that knows no other language than that of music. Barbirolli stands before this audience as its symbol, looking upon the music with it, listening with it—an objective approach which he justifiably inherits from Toscanini. Enesco, on the other hand, dwells within the very heart of the music; he looks out from the precise wellspring of its existence.

If his gestures lack the charm of proportioned rhythm and elegance, it is because he has no thought or mind for such inconsequentials. He is so deeply absorbed in the music in hand that the strangely unreal world of the theater is lost in the illusion it has sought to capture. For as Enesco has intuitive spirit and sense of style, and is the knowing intermediary between composer and hearer, so he is the most learned of musicians, the least spectacular, the most inherently musicianly.

The Haydn "London" symphony was a perfect foil for such powers. Seldom does the slow movement sound so rich, so poignant against the broad gaieties of the first and third movements, the finale so characteristically folk-like with its authentic Croatian melody. But in spite of this "pure spirit" of musicianship, a single sense could well be added to Mr. Enesco's powers: the sense of drama. He might acquire sufficient objectivity to mold his performances with a longer view, to design his climaxes more significantly so that each point may be made as inevitably individual as it is inevitably a component factor in a transcendant scheme. It is in the role of interpreter that Mr. Enesco is weak. But it is so rare to find a conductor who allows the music to sound out of its impersonal self that one hesitates to remind him to lay hands upon it.

Alfred Alessandresco's "Acteon," heard for the first time in America, was composed as long ago as 1914, and sounds of its period. Although the score won the Rumanian National Composition Prize, which was established by Enesco, in 1915, it is clearly the work of a student of D'Indy and Vidal. Bearing striking resemblance to Dukas' "La Peri," it deals with the classical huntsman who unintentionally surprised Diana's nymphs bathing with the goddess.

The unfamiliar excerpt from "Romeo and Juliet" proved engaging enough, but there is reason for a complete performance of Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony —certainly a more extensive portion than this attractive fragment.

G. H. L. S.

Mr. Amfitheatrof as Guest

Monitor Jan. 15/38

The Arts in Boston

Daniele Amfitheatrof, of whom much had been heard in advance, appeared yesterday afternoon for the first time in Boston. He is acting as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during Dr. Koussevitzky's winter vacation. For his first Symphony Hall program, he had selected the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven as centerpiece. It was preceded by Rossini's "Semiramide" Overture and followed by a Suite for strings made by Johan Lauterbach from string quintets of Boccherini, and by the conductor's "American Panorama." These last two works were heard for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Amfitheatrof is associate conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, under Dimitri Mitropoulos, who has had a considerable success as guest leader in Boston. Their association is not inappropriate. Both are muscular conductors whose vigorous conception of a score is made evident to the eye as well as to the ear. Mr. Amfitheatrof has a distinctive baton technique. He starts off conventionally enough, with stick poised in his right hand while his left stands by as a regulator, but as he warms to his task, he often shifts the wand to his left hand or discards it altogether, while his right hand traces upon the air the course of the music. The left hand meanwhile remains idle for the most part, or is used to turn pages or to brush back the hair. In climaxes, both hands are flung to the heavens. So far as visual aspect is concerned, Reginald Gardiner is the nearest analogy.

The visual side of conducting, however, is the least important. It is not really necessary that a conductor should shake his hand violently at the first violins or employ toward the woodwind the gesture known in football as the straight-arm. In fact, it doesn't matter at all, unless it disconcerts the players. What does matter is the musical result obtained. Mr. Amfitheatrof, as the phrase runs, knows what he wants and knows how to get it. The question is, what is it that he gets, and is it desirable? What he got yesterday was a performance of violent contrasts in pace and dynamics, effective in the theatrical sense but wanting in clarity of exposition, in proportion, in balance, in modeling, in nuance, in the expression of the melos. Mr. Amfitheatrof knows his job in a technical sense, and knows how to make an effect, but so far as he indicated yesterday he has not penetrated deeply beneath the surface of music.

As a program maker he did not distinguish himself, either. Beethoven was not very appropriately companioned. Mr. Amfitheatrof is said to be half Russian, half Italian, and he now lives in Italy. That, presumably, is why Rossini's overture and the Boccherini item found a place on the program. The overture is not one of the major achievements of music, and its performance yesterday did it small service. The transcription of chamber music for string orchestra is of doubtful utility at best, and there is nothing in this Suite from Boccherini to persuade us that it needed to be added to the orchestral repertory. If Mr. Amfitheatrof felt that he ought to play some Italian music, he might have made a better choice.

Finally, the conductor as composer. The "American Panorama" was composed before Mr. Amfitheatrof had been in America. Using an orchestra of huge size, which includes a Hawaiian guitar, a steel bar and an automobile siren, he has made a pastiche of jazz, blues, spirituals, and popular and patriotic songs, producing a terrific din. In other words, he has used a formula which was outmoded before the work was written. It is a stunt piece which has no place on a symphony program.

L. A. S.

B. Globe Jan. 15/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For some years it has been the well-considered custom of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to depart in mid-January for a two weeks' respite from his arduous labors as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In his absence the orchestra is conducted by invited guests, by whose presence Boston concert-goers are privileged to enjoy the novelty of a newcomer exerting his personality upon one of the finest symphonic organizations of the world.

Daniele Amfitheatrof, the guest leader for this season, yesterday afternoon made his first appearance at Symphony Hall. His actual debut with the orchestra had, however, been at the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening. Mr Amfitheatrof, a Russian, who has for a number of years made Italy his home, is the youngest conductor to substitute for Dr. Koussevitzky in several seasons.

The primary characteristic of his musical temperament, to judge by a single concert, is the natural characteristic of youthful vigor. The word dynamic, where Mr. Amfitreatrof is concerned, ought to bear the additional emphasis of a capital D. This conductor is evidently partial to insistent, buoyant rhythm, vivid contrast of instrumental shadings based upon a scale of values in which his forte is more than conventionally loud. His feeling for the right tempo, as shown in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, is sound. Neither the first nor the last movement went too fast, although not a measure lagged. The pace of the allegretto, sometimes a cause of dispute, found a happy and a proper medium. If Mr. Amfitheatrof is inclined to overstress the volume when all the instruments are heard, it must be recorded that the strings, for which he seems to have especial regard, were by themselves in a balance crystal-clear.

Each conductor has his own way of signaling his desires to the players before him. Those of Mr. Amfitheatrof are startling to the point of flamboyancy, since they are not limited to arms, hands and head, but extend to the rest of his body. By the testimony of lobby conversation, there were some yesterday afternoon who found more pleasure in listening than in watching. All a matter of taste, no doubt.

He began his program (which will be repeated tonight and at the concerts next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon) with the Overture from Rossini's "serious" opera, "Semiramide," bringing forth this emaciated tonal wraith from the limbo of disuse in a rousing interpretation. A Suite for Strings, drawn from string quintets by Boccherini, was heard for the first time in Boston. The Suite was assembled by Johann Lauterbach, a Bavarian violinist who lived from 1832 to 1918 and who, on the word of the reference books, was eminent in his day. Gracious music, but no more than that, the Suite was as graciously played.

Mr. Amfitheatrof's own "American Panorama," a vast and breezy work, claimed the most topical interest of the afternoon. It was presented for the first time in Boston. Here is expressed the composer's interest in the United States, which he had not visited when he wrote the work some five years ago. He based his music upon pictures, gramophone records, stories told him by American friends, and upon his own imagination.

Since he spoke in a preface to the score of "vital energy . . . strength, action and gain . . . sentiment and nostalgia," and since he directed that the horns play for several measures with reversed mouthpieces to simulate hissing steam, and that the violinists are to hum while playing, it is apparent that our spiritual side has been sacrificed to glorification of the machine and the cocktail hour. Others in past years, when such a type of music was new, have done the same.

Not only a large conventional orchestra, but a Hawaiian guitar, auto siren, two pianos and sundry percussion are needed to publish this jazzy account of these puzzled United States. Can it be that in the eyes of Europe we are still busy cultivating an untamed oat or two?

Next week Mr. Amfitheatrof will play Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3; the "Divine Poem" of Scriabin, and for the first time by the Boston Symphony, the "Summer Concerto" of Ildebrando Pizzetti.

C. W. D.

EAGLE

* * * * *

AUDIENCE ETIQUET

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because late-comers were bustling in to their seats while the music was being played.

oew's State and

B. Post

MUSIC

Jan. 15/38

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Daniele Amfitheatrof was the guest-conductor. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Semiramide"	Rossini
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.	Beethoven
Suite for strings	Boccherini
"American Panorama"	Amfitheatrof

Mr. Amfitheatrof provided some surprises for his audience yesterday, particularly when he unleashed the forces of his own music. This "American Panorama" was conceived in a quaint fashion, for the composer ventured to set down his impressions of a place and a people before he had ever looked upon the real thing. The result is highly diverting, both directly and indirectly. American Panorama is a grab-bag of all the ear-tickling cliches of the day. But, if it is rubbish, it is also entertaining and effective rubbish. We can imagine Mr. Amfitheatrof returning one evening from seeing some Hollywood film an reflecting, perhaps, as follows: "America must be a frightening place, with all the feverish haste of a mechanized civilization. No wonder they have to spend their relaxation in night clubs listening to jazz and waiting for the police cars, with sirens (good idea, that!) to come and raid the place. Of course they are grossly sentimental and are constantly crooning (why not three saxophones?) Then there are the Negroes (Swanee River ought to fix that) and Hawaii (steel guitar). I think I'll write a symphony!"

Some such facile reasoning may have occurred to the composer; at any rate that is a rough sketch of the emotional qualities of American Panorama. Well, why not? Benny Goodman is bringing "swing" to Carnegie Hall, why can not Mr. Amfitheatrof expose his bag of tricks in Symphony Hall? The answer is that he did so with great success and that it was very good fun indeed. If asked to name a preference we should plump for the noisy sections. The sentimental side becomes rather tedious before it is finished.

Mr. Amfitheatrof does not carry the vulgarity of this example of his creative activity over into his interpretations of other music, or at least only rarely. He certainly belongs to the dynamic school of conducting and he is not free from its faults. He is concerned with the minute details of the score, but does not neglect the whole. At the moment it can be said that he is an interesting conductor, with a career worth watching.

His best work of the afternoon came in the Rossini overture, which he projected with a brilliance that was astonishing. After such a performance it was not hard to understand Rossini's unique popularity in his day. The Beethoven Symphony was in many ways a fine performance. It is true that he permitted the trumpet tone to be outrageously forced in some of the accompaniments. You might almost have thought that those bits were meant by Beethoven as a trumpet concerto, whereas it should blend with the other instruments. The speed of the last two movements is less of a subject of controversy nowadays, since no less a man than Mr. Toscanini has set the seal of his approval on the procedure by playing those movements faster again than anybody else.

Mr. Amfitheatrof also lays himself open to the criticism that he is a somewhat mannered conductor. He can, of course, do all the calisthenics he wants in rehearsal, but he would be well advised to writhe as little as possible at the concert. The audience, clearly, found him a stimulating leader; and at that we may, for the present, leave the discussion.

The Boccherini Suite contains some delightful music, especially in the minuet and rondo. Mr. Amfitheatrof may have gingered it up in performance; but for that there is always the excuse that Boccherini is apt to sound a little time without such manipulation. There is the danger that this can be carried too far and that Boccherini can be jerked out of his period too radically. But the Suite yesterday sounded well, and that is perhaps the real test.

The concert will be repeated tonight, Monday night and Tuesday afternoon. Next Friday and Saturday Mr. Amfitheatrof will conduct Beethoven's 3rd Leonore Overture, Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate and Scriabin's Divine Poem.

SYMPHONY'S 'AMERICAN PANORAMA'

B. — Post

Noisy Jazz Piece From Hand of Guest Conductor

Jan. 15/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Once the naive European thought that he would encounter cowboys on Broadway and that to walk down Tremont street was to brave the scalping-knife. Today the fanciful picture of us is a composite of jazz, riveting machines and gunmen. That, with the thoughtful omission of the gunmen—though a few pistol shots would not have been out of place—is how Daniele Amfitheatrof sized us up in his "American Panorama," which, as guest director, he conducted at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

IMPRESSIONS FROM AFAR

Mr. Amfitheatrof, who comes to Boston from a five weeks' engagement in Minneapolis, is a naturalized Italian citizen of Russian parentage and birth. His Italian sympathies are disclosed in the programme of this week's concerts which, besides the "Panorama Americana" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, includes Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide" and a suite for strings adapted from the quintets of Boccherini. Next week we will get both the Italian Pizzetti and the Russian Scriabin.

Dedicated to the conductor-composer's "American friends," otherwise unspecified, the "American Panorama" adds to the usual full modern orchestra such unusual embellishings as an Hawaiian steel guitar, an automobile siren, a steel bar, a vibraphone, three "saxes" and a brace of pianos. We are told in Mr. Burk's programme notes that at times the horns are played with mouthpiece inverted, to simulate the noise of a steam engine, and that the tuba player at one juncture achieves the imitation of a boat siren by the vocal emission of a bass note through his instrument.

What It's All About

And here, by the way, is Mr. Amfitheatrof's preface to his score: "Vital energy, optimistic strength, youthful thoughtlessness mixed with an intense desire for action and gain—against a background of sentiment and nostalgia which flowers in moments of complete rest—these are the elements of the North American spirit which have arrested the attention of the musician in his setting of his 'Panorama.'

"It is the tumultuous, brisk life of across the ocean, as seen from Europe. To these elements, showing the actual living American, are added the songs and dances of the Negro population, once slaves. The spirit of the active Americanisms — shrieking sirens, the confusion of marts and docks, cyclones and the noise of the steam-drill—all blended with the now wild, now melancholy native songs and dance rhythms. In the finale, the various themes of the 'Panorama' return, and are brilliantly woven and intensified to the point of enthusiasm and passion."

A McCoy of Jazz

Most symphonic jazz is synthetic jazz, but Mr. Amfitheatrof's is the genuine article, the real McCoy. One might have expected the audience to go wild over it, but the enthusiasm was only moderate. A few years ago such invasion of the sanctity of a symphony concert would have occasioned more disturbance. We are becoming hardened.

It is scarcely to be expected that a musician who could concoct such a farrago of vulgarities would prove to be a conductor of fine taste. And Mr. Amfitheatrof, by token of yesterday's concert, is not. Distinctly, he is a pepper-upper. He put Beethoven through his paces and made Rossini sound even hollower and tinnier than was really necessary.

Restless on Podiun

In the pleasant music of Boccherini, Mr. Amfitheatrof conducted with more musical and physical discretion. A tall and broad young man with unruly black hair, he put on more of a show as director than any conductor we have yet seen in Symphony Hall. First his baton was in his right hand, then in his left, and at times it reposed on the stand before him.

Sometimes Mr. Amfitheatrof led the orchestra with his head and sometimes with his body, which he swayed elegantly from the waist. Yet when it came to the "Panorama Americana," these things fitted into the picture. The conductor explained the composer—and vice versa.

Symphony Concert

B. Trans Jan. 15/38

Amfitheatrof, Guest Conductor, Introduces His "American Panorama" at Symphony Hall

By Moses Smith

Daniele Amfitheatrof, Russian-Italian conductor appearing as guest for a fortnight with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made almost as pronounced an impression upon yesterday's matinee audience in Symphony Hall as he had the previous evening in Sanders Theater, on his first appearance hereabouts. There was yesterday, perhaps, not the same degree of cordiality and enthusiasm as on the earlier occasion. But the reception seemed clearly favorable.

The impression on this writer was less favorable. It was no longer possible, as it had been in Sanders Theater, to charge noisiness in performance to the conductor's ignorance of the acoustical properties of the small, exceptionally resonant Cambridge auditorium. Symphony Hall, approximating in size and shape many an auditorium in which Amfitheatrof must have worked, is not difficult for a visiting musician to "learn," by the evidence of many such who have preceded him here. If the performance of Rossini's "Semiramide" Overture, which began the concert, and that of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, following immediately upon the Overture, were still prevailingly too resonant—even though the condition of the preceding evening had been modified—the responsibility was clearly to be placed on the broad shoulders of the conductor. Evidently he likes to make music that way.

The rest of the program, which was better balanced and arranged than the similar list proffered in Cambridge, consisted of the Boccherini Suite for strings and, for the first time in Boston, the conductor's own "American Panorama." The Boccherini concoction sounded better somehow than it had on Thursday, probably because it was more advantageously placed on the program. The conductor's composition, employing a swollen orchestra, brought a rousing conclusion to the proceedings.

Amfitheatrof is clearly of the stuff of which conductors are made. He is still young, yet he maintains an authoritative position with relation to both the musicians before him and the audience behind him. He conducts because the music at hand does things to him which, in turn, he wants to transmit to the listeners. He conducts, that is, from the heart; how much from the head is, at this point, a debatable matter. In his eager enthusiasm for the music he seeks to drive home to the listener its power or beauty, its light and shade. Frequently, in this enthusiasm, he overlooks some of the finer nuances. But this is a fault of youth. In any event, it is not the principle trouble with Amfitheatrof.

That trouble, rather, is that he overdoes the contrasts, particularly the larger dynamic contrasts. (For the most part, let it be said to his credit, he leaves the rhythmic outlines alone, or treats them with proper care.) A forte still tends to mean a fortissimo to him, a piano a pianissimo. In this regard, if not in the matter of tempo-variations, he exhibits something of his twofold national heritage, Russian and Italian.

Thus, one of the most objectionable features of a largely faithful version of the Symphony was a dynamic distortion, which, for the first variation of the second movement, resulted in over-emphasis of the counter-theme at the expense of the persisting principle subject—a familiar distortion at other hands, by the way. The treatment becomes unbearable when the conductor monkeys with the rhythm as well. To his credit Amfitheatrof spared us this irritation.

"American Panorama", presenting the visitor in a creative as well as executant capacity, is one of your bang-up closing numbers. In the huge orchestra for which it is written there is almost everything but kitchen utensils—and perhaps a suggestion of them. Besides the instruments of the classical orchestra there are two pianos, three saxophones, Hawaiian guitar, automobile siren, steel bar and a wide variety of other percussion. The instruments themselves, normally used, do not suffice. Directions are given some of the musicians to hum; to the bass-players to slap their instruments, jazz-fashion; to the horn players to turn their mouthpieces about so that they may simulate the noise of steam engines; to the tuba player to sing, rather than blow, into his instrument.

The function of this enormous battery is to simulate the American scene as imagined by one who knew it only at second hand. (It was written in 1933, while the conductor did not arrive on these shores until last fall.) The musical material includes familiar American tunes, like "Swanee River;" semblances of Negro spirituals; jazz and the like.

Jazz prevails, but warmed-over jazz. Few European serious musicians have succeeded at this sort of thing. Most of them, including Amfitheatrof, have failed abysmally. In fact, if this is what American jazz does to them, the sooner Congress decrees an embargo upon its exportation, the better.

America in Symphony

Am. Jan. 1938

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

SYMPHONY HALL has been resounding with some extraordinary music of late. Particularly since the dynamic young Russian-Italian composer-conductor, Daniele Amfitheatrof, descended upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra to take up his duties as guest conductor.

The music to which we refer is called "American Panorama." It is the work of Mr. Amfitheatrof himself, and it was presented for the first time in America when its composer made his bow to Boston audiences conducting the regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

We had expected to find an interesting personality in one who, as associate conductor with Dimitri Mitropoulos, has done much to create news value in the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra since his arrival in America last fall.

* * *

WHAT we did not expect to find was a siren in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was just an ordinary police siren, but there it was. And doing a lot to create atmosphere too.

There was also a steel rail, allegedly from the Milwaukee Railroad. When struck with a hammer this also does a lot to create the atmosphere proper to a tonal picturization of the contemporary American scene.

It is not more or less original, however, than having the violinists hum while playing, than having a tuba player sing through his instrument, or the horns blown with mouthpieces inverted.

But the results attest to the soundness of the reasons behind such instructions in the score.

The composer wanted the sound of steam engines, fog horns, sirens, machinery, construction work. And he got them.

The methods which he employed were ingenious. That they also have an amusing aspect does not, however, detract from the seriousness of the work itself.

That it is music intended to be taken seriously is obvious. As obvious as are the jazz rhythms upon which it is built.

Mr. Amfitheatrof saw the American people as restless—energetic and nostalgic at the same time. And that is precisely what the music so convincingly expresses.

The audience was amused, invigorated, and enthusiastic.

SALZBURG FESTIVAL PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

B. Globe Jan. 16/38

Festspielhaus Enlarged to Twice Its Size

The official program of the Salzburg Festival for 1938 has been announced. The festival, generally conceded to be the most important music festival of our times, will open July 23 when the Vienna State Opera presents "The Magic Flute," with Arturo Toscanini conducting the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. In the course of the festival, which will continue with daily performances from July 23 through Aug. 31, the Vienna State Opera will present 10 different operas. Of these, Arturo Toscanini will conduct five.

The premiere conductor of the world will wield the baton at the following performances: "The Magic Flute," July 23 and Aug. 13; "Falstaff," Aug. 6 and 23; "Fidelio," Aug. 31; "The Meistersingers," Aug. 10, 19 and 29; "Tannhauser," July 29, Aug. 4, 16 and 26. Bruno Walter will conduct "Cosi fan Tutte" Aug. 18; "Don Giovanni," July 25, Aug. 3 and 15; "Le Nozze de Figaro," Aug. 1, 11 and 25; 'Orpheus and Eurydice," July 30, Aug. 8 and 20. Hans Knappertsbusch will conduct "Rosencavalier" July 26, Aug. 2, 12 and 22.

The cast of singers is especially brilliant, including Lotte Lehmann, Ezio Pinza, Elizabeth Rethberg and Kirsten Thorberg.

Von Hofmanstahl's "Everyman," as presented by Reinhardt, will be given on Sundays throughout the season in the great cathedral square. The Reinhardt production of Goethe's "Faust," with music by Bernard Paumgartner, will be given on the Holzmeister set which is incorporated into the old Prince-Episcopal Riding Academy on July 28, Aug. 5, 9, 17, 24 and 30.

Of special interest is the concert program. Toscanini will give two concerts at the Festspielhaus, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" Aug. 15 and a Debussy concert Aug. 28. Bruno Walter will give the Beethoven-Schubert concert at the Festspielhaus Aug. 7 and a Mozart concert at the Mozarteum July 31. Hans Knappertsbusch will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Festspielhaus Aug. 24 and a Beethoven-Brahms' concert at the Mozarteum July 27. Arthur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a concert of contemporary music at the Mozarteum Aug. 21. The superb, "Bach, Art of the Fugue," performance by Heinz and Robert Scholz on two pianos, will take place at the Mozarteum Aug. 14. The Scholzes are on a tour of the United States. Mme. Lehmann will

---

LAST WEEK OF THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Lowell Telegram Jan. 1

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens tomorrow its second and last week under the guest conductorship of Daniele Amfitheatrof. The Russian-Italian conductor will direct the orchestra in the third pair of concerts of the Monday and Tuesday series tomorrow evening at 8.15 and Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock. The 13th pair of the Friday and Saturday series will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts Mr. Amfitheatrof will present the "Divine Poem," the Third Symphony of Alexander Scriabin. The "Divine Poem" has not been played by this orchestra since 1925. Ildebrando Pizetti's "Concerto dell' Estate" will also be played. This will be the first hearing of music of Pizetti upon the programmes of the Symphony orchestra. The Italian composer is well known by his orchestral and chamber works, and his operas which have been produced in Europe and America. The "Summer" Concerto is an orchestral piece in three parts, entitled "Morning," "Nocturne," and "Gagliarda." The programme will open with Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

A programme for the concerts of Monday and Tuesday will consist of Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide"; a Suite for string orchestra, drawn from the string quintets of Boccherini; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, and the conductor's own "American Panorama," a musical projection of this country as he imagined it, although

Lowell Y. W. C. A. announce as their speaker for their annual meeting on the evening of January oew's State and

B. Post Jan. 15/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Daniele Amfitheatrof was the guest-conductor. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Semiramide".........Rossini
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92. Beethoven
Suite for strings...............Boccherini
"American Panorama".......Amfitheatrof

Mr. Amfitheatrof provided some surprises for his audience yesterday, particularly when he unleashed the forces of his own music. This "American Panorama" was conceived in a quaint fashion, for the composer ventured to set down his impressions of a place and a people before he had ever looked upon the real thing. The result is highly diverting, both directly and indirectly. American Panorama is a grab-bag of all the ear-tickling cliches of the day. But, if it is rubbish, it is also entertaining and effective rubbish. We can imagine Mr. Amfitheatrof returning one evening from seeing some Hollywood film and reflecting, perhaps, as follows: "America must be a frightening place, with all the feverish haste of a mechanized civilization. No wonder they have to spend their relaxation in night clubs listening to jazz and waiting for the police cars, with sirens (good idea, that!) to come and raid the place. Of course they are grossly sentimental and are constantly crooning (why not three saxophones?) Then there are the Negroes (Swanee River ought to fix that) and Hawaii (steel guitar). I think I'll write a symphony!"

Some such facile reasoning may have occurred to the composer; at any rate that is a rough sketch of the emotional qualities of American Panorama. Well, why not? Benny Goodman is bringing "swing" to Carnegie Hall, why can not Mr. Amfitheatrof expose his bag of tricks in Symphony Hall? The answer is that he did so with great success and that it was very good fun indeed. If asked to name a preference we should plump for the noisy sections. The sentimental side becomes rather tedious before it is finished.

Mr. Amfitheatrof does not carry the vulgarity of this example of his creative activity over into his interpretations of other music, or at least only rarely. He certainly belongs to the dynamic school of conducting and he is not free from its faults. He is concerned with the minute details of the score, but does not neglect the whole. At the moment it can be said that he is an interesting conductor, with a career worth watching.

His best work of the afternoon came in the Rossini overture, which he projected with a brilliance that was astonishing. After such a performance it was not hard to understand Rossini's unique popularity in his day. The Beethoven Symphony was in many ways a fine performance. It is true that he permitted the trumpet tone to be outrageously forced in some of the accompaniments. You might almost have thought that those bits were meant by Beethoven as a trumpet concerto, whereas it should blend with the other instruments. The speed of the last two movements is less of a subject of controversy nowadays, since no less a man than Mr. Toscanini has set the seal of his approval on the procedure by playing those movements faster again than anybody else.

Mr. Amfitheatrof also lays himself open to the criticism that he is a somewhat mannered conductor. He can, of course, do all the calisthenics he wants in rehearsal, but he would be well advised to writhe as little as possible at the concert. The audience, clearly, found him a stimulating leader; and at that we may, for the present, leave the discussion.

The Boccherini Suite contains some delightful music, especially in the minuet and rondo. Mr. Amfitheatrof may have gingered it up in performance; but for that there is always the excuse that Boccherini is apt to sound a little time without such manipulation. There is the danger that this can be carried too far and that Boccherini can be jerked out of his period too radically. But the Suite yesterday sounded well, and that is perhaps the real test.

The concert will be repeated tonight, Monday night and Tuesday afternoon. Next Friday and Saturday Mr. Amfitheatrof will conduct Beethoven's 3rd Leonore Overture, Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate and Scriabin's Divine Poem.

SYMPHONY'S 'AMERICAN PANORAMA'

B. —Post

Noisy Jazz Piece From Hand of Guest Conductor

Jan. 15/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Once the naive European thought that he would encounter cowboys on Broadway and that to walk down Tremont street was to brave the scalping-knife. Today the fanciful picture of us is a composite of jazz, riveting machines and gunmen. That, with the thoughtful omission of the gunmen—though a few pistol shots would not have been out of place—is how Daniele Amfitheatrof sized us up in his "American Panorama," which, as guest director, he conducted at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

IMPRESSIONS FROM AFAR

Mr. Amfitheatrof, who comes to Boston from a five weeks' engagement in Minneapolis, is a naturalized Italian citizen of Russian parentage and birth. His Italian sympathies are disclosed in the programme of this week's concerts which, besides the "Panorama Americana" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, includes Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide" and a suite for strings adapted from the quintets of Boccherini. Next week we will get both the Italian Pizzetti and the Russian Scriabin.

Dedicated to the conductor-composer's "American friends," otherwise unspecified, the "American Panorama" adds to the usual full modern orchestra such unusual embellishings as an Hawaiian steel guitar, an automobile siren, a steel bar, a vibraphone, three "saxes" and a brace of pianos. We are told in Mr. Burk's programme notes that at times the horns are played with mouthpiece inverted, to simulate the noise of a steam engine, and that the tuba player at one juncture achieves the imitation of a boat siren by the vocal emission of a bass note through his instrument.

What It's All About

And here, by the way, is Mr. Amfitheatrof's preface to his score: "Vital energy, optimistic strength, youthful thoughtlessness mixed with an intense desire for action and gain—against a background of sentiment and nostalgia which flowers in moments of complete rest—these are the elements of the North American spirit which have arrested the attention of the musician in his setting of his 'Panorama.'

"It is the tumultuous, brisk life of across the ocean, as seen from Europe. To these elements, showing the actual living American, are added the songs and dances of the Negro population, once slaves. The spirit of the active Americanisms—shrieking sirens, the confusion of marts and docks, cyclones and the noise of the steam-drill—all blended with the now wild, now melancholy native songs and dance rhythms. In the finale, the various themes of the 'Panorama' return, and are brilliantly woven and intensified to the point of enthusiasm and passion."

A McCoy of Jazz

Most symphonic jazz is synthetic jazz, but Mr. Amfitheatrof's is the genuine article, the real McCoy. One might have expected the audience to go wild over it, but the enthusiasm was only moderate. A few years ago such invasion of the sanctity of a symphony concert would have occasioned more disturbance. We are becoming hardened.

It is scarcely to be expected that a musician who could concoct such a farrago of vulgarities would prove to be a conductor of fine taste. And Mr. Amfitheatrof, by token of yesterday's concert, is not. Distinctly, he is a pep-per-upper. He put Beethoven through his paces and made Rossini sound even hollower and tinnier than was really necessary.

Restless on Podiun

In the pleasant music of Boccherini, Mr. Amfitheatrof conducted with more musical and physical discretion. A tall and broad young man with unruly black hair, he put on more of a show as director than any conductor we have yet seen in Symphony Hall. First his baton was in his right hand, then in his left, and at times it reposed on the stand before him.

Sometimes Mr. Amfitheatrof led the orchestra with his head and sometimes with his body, which he swayed elegantly from the waist. Yet when it came to the "Panorama Americana," these things fitted into the picture. The conductor explained the composer—and vice versa.

Symphony Concert

B. Trans. Jan. 15/38

Amfitheatrof, Guest Conductor, Introduces His "American Panorama" at Symphony Hall

By Moses Smith

Daniele Amfitheatrof, Russian-Italian conductor appearing as guest for a fortnight with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made almost as pronounced an impression upon yesterday's matinee audience in Symphony Hall as he had the previous evening in Sanders Theater, on his first appearance hereabouts. There was yesterday, perhaps, not the same degree of cordiality and enthusiasm as on the earlier occasion. But the reception seemed clearly favorable.

The impression on this writer was less favorable. It was no longer possible, as it had been in Sanders Theater, to charge noisiness in performance to the conductor's ignorance of the acoustical properties of the small, exceptionally resonant Cambridge auditorium. Symphony Hall, approximating in size and shape many an auditorium in which Amfitheatrof must have worked, is not difficult for a visiting musician to "learn," by the evidence of many such who have preceded him here. If the performance of Rossini's "Semiramide" Overture, which began the concert, and that of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, following immediately upon the Overture, were still prevailingly too resonant—even though the condition of the preceding evening had been modified—the responsibility was clearly to be placed on the broad shoulders of the conductor. Evidently he likes to make music that way.

The rest of the program, which was better balanced and arranged than the similar list proffered in Cambridge, consisted of the Boccherini Suite for strings and, for the first time in Boston, the conductor's own "American Panorama." The Boccherini concoction sounded better somehow than it had on Thursday, probably because it was more advantageously placed on the program. The conductor's composition, employing a swollen orchestra, brought a rousing conclusion to the proceedings.

Amfitheatrof is clearly of the stuff of which conductors are made. He is still young, yet he maintains an authoritative position with relation to both the musicians before him and the audience behind him. He conducts because the music at hand does things to him which, in turn, he wants to transmit to the listeners. He conducts, that is, from the heart; how much from the head is, at this point, a debatable matter. In his eager enthusiasm for the music he seeks to drive home to the listener its power or beauty, its light and shade. Frequently, in this enthusiasm, he overlooks some of the finer nuances. But this is a fault of youth. In any event, it is not the principle trouble with Amfitheatrof.

That trouble, rather, is that he overdoes the contrasts, particularly the larger dynamic contrasts. (For the most part, let it be said to his credit, he leaves the rhythmic outlines alone, or treats them with proper care.) A forte still tends to mean a fortissimo to him, a piano a pianissimo. In this regard, if not in the matter of tempo-variations, he exhibits something of his twofold national heritage, Russian and Italian.

Thus, one of the most objectionable features of a largely faithful version of the Symphony was a dynamic distortion, which, for the first variation of the second movement, resulted in over-emphasis of the counter-theme at the expense of the persisting principle subject—a familiar distortion at other hands, by the way. The treatment becomes unbearable when the conductor monkeys with the rhythm as well. To his credit Amfitheatrof spared us this irritation.

"American Panorama", presenting the visitor in a creative as well as executant capacity, is one of your bang-up closing numbers. In the huge orchestra for which it is written there is almost everything but kitchen utensils—and perhaps a suggestion of them. Besides the instruments of the classical orchestra there are two pianos, three saxophones, Hawaiian guitar, automobile siren, steel bar and a wide variety of other percussion. The instruments themselves, normally used, do not suffice. Directions are given some of the musicians to hum; to the bass-players to slap their instruments, jazz-fashion; to the horn players to turn their mouthpieces about so that they may simulate the noise of steam engines; to the tuba player to sing, rather than blow, into his instrument.

The function of this enormous battery is to simulate the American scene as imagined by one who knew it only at second hand. (It was written in 1933, while the conductor did not arrive on these shores until last fall.) The musical material includes familiar American tunes, like "Swanee River;" semblances of Negro spirituals; jazz and the like.

Jazz prevails, but warmed-over jazz. Few European serious musicians have succeeded at this sort of thing. Most of them, including Amfitheatrof, have failed abysmally. In fact, if this is what American jazz does to them, the sooner Congress decrees an embargo upon its exportation, the better.

America in Symphony

Am. Jan. 1938

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

SYMPHONY HALL has been resounding with some extraordinary music of late. Particularly since the dynamic young Russian-Italian composer-conductor, Daniele Amfitheatrof, descended upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra to take up his duties as guest conductor.

The music to which we refer is called "American Panorama." It is the work of Mr. Amfitheatrof himself, and it was presented for the first time in America when its composer made his bow to Boston audiences conducting the regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

We had expected to find an interesting personality in one who, as associate conductor with Dimitri Mitropoulos, has done much to create news value in the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra since his arrival in America last fall.

* * *

WHAT we did not expect to find was a siren in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was just an ordinary police siren, but there it was. And doing a lot to create atmosphere too.

There was also a steel rail, allegedly from the Milwaukee Railroad. When struck with a hammer this also does a lot to create the atmosphere proper to a tonal picturization of the contemporary American scene.

It is not more or less original, however, than having the violinists hum while playing, than having a tuba player sing through his instrument, or the horns blown with mouthpieces inverted.

But the results attest to the soundness of the reasons behind such instructions in the score.

The composer wanted the sound of steam engines, fog horns, sirens, machinery, construction work. And he got them.

The methods which he employed were ingenious. That they also have an amusing aspect does not, however, detract from the seriousness of the work itself.

That it is music intended to be taken seriously is obvious. As obvious as are the jazz rhythms upon which it is built.

Mr. Amfitheatrof saw the American people as restless—energetic and nostalgic at the same time. And that is precisely what the music so convincingly expresses.

The audience was amused, invigorated, and enthusiastic.

LAST WEEK OF THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Lowell Telegram Jan. 1

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens tomorrow its second and last week under the guest conductorship of Daniele Amfitheatrof. The Russian-Italian conductor will direct the orchestra in the third pair of concerts of the Monday and Tuesday series tomorrow evening at 8.15 and Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock. The 13th pair of the Friday and Saturday series will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts Mr. Amfitheatrof will present the "Divine Poem," the Third Symphony of Alexander Scriabin. The "Divine Poem" has not been played by this orchestra since 1925. Ildebrando Pizetti's "Concerto dell' Estate" will also be played. This will be the first hearing of music of Pizetti upon the programmes of the Symphony orchestra. The Italian composer is well known by his orchestral and chamber works, and his operas which have been produced in Europe and America. The "Summer" Concerto is an orchestral piece in three parts, entitled "Morning," "Nocturne," and "Gagliarda." The programme will open with Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

A programme for the concerts of Monday and Tuesday will consist of Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide"; a Suite for string orchestra, drawn from the string quintets of Boccherini; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, and the conductor's own "American Panorama," a musical projection of this country as he imagined it, although Amfitheatrof had not yet visited these shores when the music was written. The work requires a large orchestra, with saxophones, Hawaiian guitar, and two pianos added for jazz effects.

SALZBURG FESTIVAL PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

B. Globe Jan.

Festspielhaus Enlarged to Twice Its Size

The official program of the Salzburg Festival for 1938 has been announced. The festival, generally conceded to be the most important music festival of our times, will open July 23 when the Vienna State Opera presents "The Magic Flute," with Arturo Toscanini conducting the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. In the course of the festival, which will continue with daily performances from July 23 through Aug. 31, the Vienna State Opera will present 10 different operas. Of these, Arturo Toscanini will conduct five.

The premiere conductor of the world will wield the baton at the following performances: "The Magic Flute," July 23 and Aug. 13; "Falstaff," Aug. 6 and 23; "Fidelio," Aug. 31; "The Meistersingers," Aug. 10, 19 and 29; "Tannhauser," July 29, Aug. 4, 16 and 26. Bruno Walter will conduct "Cosi fan Tutte" Aug. 18; "Don Giovanni," July 25, Aug. 3 and 15; "Le Nozze de Figaro," Aug. 1, 11 and 25; 'Orpheus and Eurydice," July 30, Aug. 8 and 20. Hans Knappertsbusch will conduct "Rosencavalier" July 26, Aug. 2, 12 and 22.

The cast of singers is especially brilliant, including Lotte Lehmann, Ezio Pinza, Elizabeth Rethberg and Kirsten Thorberg.

Von Hofmanstahl's "Everyman," as presented by Reinhardt, will be given on Sundays throughout the season in the great cathedral square. The Reinhardt production of Goethe's "Faust," with music by Bernard Paumgartner, will be given on the Holzmeister set which is incorporated into the old Prince-Episcopal Riding Academy on July 28, Aug. 5, 9, 17, 24 and 30.

Of special interest is the concert program. Toscanini will give two concerts at the Festspielhaus, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" Aug. 15 and a Debussy concert Aug. 28. Bruno Walter will give the Beethoven-Schubert concert at the Festspielhaus Aug. 7 and a Mozart concert at the Mozarteum July 31. Hans Knappertsbusch will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Festspielhaus Aug. 24 and a Beethoven-Brahms' concert at the Mozarteum July 27. Arthur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a concert of contemporary music at the Mozarteum Aug. 21. The superb, "Bach, Art of the Fugue," performance by Heinz and Robert Scholz on two pianos, will take place at the Mozarteum Aug. 14. The Scholzes are on a tour of the United States. Mme. Lehmann will

TAYLOR BOOK ON MUSIC A WINNER

Post — Jan. 19/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

TO WRITE about an art, especially the art of music, in a manner to interest both the layman and the professional—to steer a safe course between Scylla of dry technicality and the Charybdis of condescension —is a difficult task, and no one has done it more successfully than has Deems Taylor in his "Of Men and Music," recently published by Simon Schuster, New York. "Musical shop-talk on a non-professional plane" the jacket calls it, and no better description could be found. Many, if not most of these sketches, which run from one to 20 pages in length, originated in Mr. Taylor's radio talks in elucidation of or gloss upon the Sunday afternoon concerts of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, and the reader, if he has listened to these engaging dissertations, may encounter quips and sagacities already familiar to him. Nor will he object.

If music had more advocates like Mr. Taylor, it and the public would be greatly benefited. He is a composer himself, and a good one, but thanks to a general newspaper and magazine background and to the possession of a keen sense of humor, he sees life whole and music, too. His brief introduction concludes with the following sane observation. ". . . music is written for our enjoyment, and only incidentally for our edification; and . . . many a potential music-lover is frightened away by the solemnity of music's devotees. They would make more converts if they would rise from their knees.

"Behind every musician," thinks Mr. Taylor, "lurks a man who is fully as interesting as the trade he follows." Some so-called artists and some composers, too, are dull customers, personally; but many of them are not, and Mr. Taylor gets some, though not too much of his copy from personalities. It undoubtedly aids our understanding of a work, and hence, our enjoyment of it, to know something of the man who wrote it. In the end, however, it is the music itself that stirs or bores us.

Reviewing Bernard Shaw's collected music criticisms, your correspondent had an overpowering desire to quote the whole book. "Of Men and Music" presents a similar temptation. It would be a pleasure even to cull from Mr. Taylor's unflattering but scarcely overdrawn portrait of Wagner the man, in the chapter entitled "Monster"; from his account of afternoon tea with the Strauss family in "Richard Himself"; from his wise observations on the predicament of opera in a country where, generally speaking, no one knows the words; or from his devastating dismissal of the child-prodigy in "The Chick and the Egg." It is probably better, and certainly easier to advise the reader to procure "Of Men and Music" for himself. He will not regret it.

Before coming to the concerts in immediate prospect here, and they are many, mention must first be made of a quite important event somewhat further off, the concert which the Cleveland Orchestra, under Arthur Rodzinski, will give at Symphony Hall on Feb. 10. On that occasion Boston is promised its first hearing of the magnificent final pages of Strauss' "Salome." The soprano will be Rosa Pauly, who is singing the role of Electra with the Metropolitan Opera Company this season, and who was heard by listeners all over America when she sang the music last season at a New York Philharmonic concert with Mr. Rodzinski conducting. To those who heard that performance, whether in their own homes or in Carnegie Hall, the mere mention of it should suffice. Neither Mr. Rodzinski nor Miss Pauly need any further recommendation. The "Dance of the Seven Veils" will also be played.

At the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and of the following Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Daniele Amfitheatrof will be guest conductor. The programme for all four concerts will consist of Rossini's overture to "Semiramide," a suite for string orchestra arranged from the Quintets of Boccherini, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and the conductor's own "American Panorama," which was written, singularly enough, before ever he set foot on these shores.

This afternoon at Symphony Hall the Helsinki University Chorus, which made so striking an impression at a recent pair of Symphony concerts, will present a programme of Finnish music.

Chamber music for wind instruments is so rarely heard in public that especial interest attaches to the concert to be given at Jordan Hall tomorrow evening by Reginald Boardman, pianist, with the assistance of the Pro Arte Woodwind Ensemble. Mozart's Quintet in E flat, piano pieces by Schumann, Bloch and others make the programme.

MUSIC

Globe Jan. 18/38

SYMPHONY HALL
Menuhins' Sonata Recital

A sonata recital can be just that, and upon occasion it can be something more. But one by the young violinist, Yehudi Menuhin, and his even younger sister Hephzibah, who plays the piano, is evidently to the general public an event of first importance. Symphony Hall was, accordingly, sold out to the last extra seat put upon the stage for the Menuhins' recital yesterday afternoon. An audience whose impressive numbers were balanced by equally impressive and courteous silence between movements, listened most attentively to sonatas by Bach, Beethoven and the Flemish Lekeu, and received both musicians with extreme cordiality.

Since only a chosen few of the musical alert have been able to pack Symphony Hall since the days of 1929, Hephzibah may find an added pleasure in the fact that her Boston debut was one such occasion. She is 17—four years younger than her famous brother—and her public career has consisted of only a few appearances, chiefly in New York. Like her brother, she has no mannerisms—which unfortunately cannot be said of all musicians of approximate age who perform in public. She plays simply and accurately, reflecting good taste and sound musical training.

Perhaps she was a little nervous when she first entered hand in hand with Yehudi, for the opening number, Bach's E major Sonata, No. 3, found her share of the performance rather subdued. Thereafter, in Beethoven's idyllic masterpiece, the G major Sonata, Op. 96, she gained in firmness, and her playing was in a finer balance with that of the violinist. Both Yehudi and Hephzibah brought out the irresistible lyricism of this work, which suggests the same adoration of Nature that Beethoven expressed orchestrally in the "Pastoral" Symphony. On the other hand, both violinist and pianist will undoubtedly interpret the work differently 20 years hence. There are qualities of intellect and emotional fire denied to youth, even to extraordinarily talented youth.

If Yehudi Menuhin seemed more restrained than at his solo recital at the Statler a few weeks ago, the impression was banished when he and his sister launched impetuously into the G major Sonata of Guillaume Lekeu. This early and immature work of a composer who died tragically at the age of 24, is with its sensuous melody and garish harmony, music that undoubtedly requires less intellectual perception than Bach or Beethoven, though some of its technical problems may be as exacting. At any rate, it received a performance that matched it own inherent warmth.

At the end of the program the audience not only brought Hephzibah and Yehudi back to the stage many times, but refused to budge without encores. The Menuhins obliged, to the number of three.

C. W. D.

CRESTON, IOWA
NEWS ADVERTISER

DEC 30 1937

MUSIC NEWS

By Chas. A. Hayden.

The Boston orchestra recently gave a concert dedicated to the great violin maker, Antonius Stradivarius, on the two-hundredth anniversary of Stradivarius' death. Jasha Hiefetz played two complete concertos with the orchestra on his own Strad., a fine example of the master, made in 1731.

MU

Her. Jan. 18

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third concert in the Monday-Tuesday series was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. Daniele Amfitheatrof was the guest-conductor. The program was as follows:

Rossini .... Overture to "Semiramide"
Beethoven,
Symphony No. 7 in A major Op. 92
Boccherini ....Suite for Strings
Amfitheatrof ...... "American Panorama"

It was extremely interesting to listen to Mr. Amfitheatrof conduct the same program last night with which he had somewhat startled the audience on Friday. Undoubtedly the spectacular and shoddy tone poem about America, though in itself an effective piece of display, prejudiced many people by a process of inverse reasoning against the conductor's interpretations earlier in the concert. We have now listened to his ideas about Beethoven's 7th Symphony enough to be able to declare that the performance was in no sense unorthodox or, with one or two minor details, in bad taste.

His tempi are certainly not radical departures from custom. You have only to listen on the radio Saturday nights to the Toscanini broadcast to hear liberties as far as speed is concerned which would get short critical shrift under less august auspices. Moreover, the Beethoven symphonies are played so often that critical comparison of this or that reading becomes far too finical and tends to disparagement of an aggressive conductor in favor of some respectable academic. Mr. Amfitheatrof's interpretation of the Rossini Overture seemed to us no more operatic than the spirit of the music allows. There is no reason to suppose that Mr. Amfitheatrof is not a sincere and studious musician. He is entitled to an unbiased hearing.

One word more about his own composition. M. Georges Duhamel once made a flying visit to this country and on his return to France wrote a cross, superficial and shrewd book about us. In his "Scenes de la vie future" he said some silly things and likewise offered some pertinent criticisms. Unquestionably in Mr. Amfitheatrof's superficial summing-up of our civilization he has hit upon some flagrant characteristics. It was a pity that he wrote down anything about the score in words, for there was nothing that needed such explanation as he felt called upon to make. Anyone, furthermore, is rather badly off if he cannot get some quiet and ironical amusement out of listening to this anthology of cliches!

Esplanade Concertorium Conception

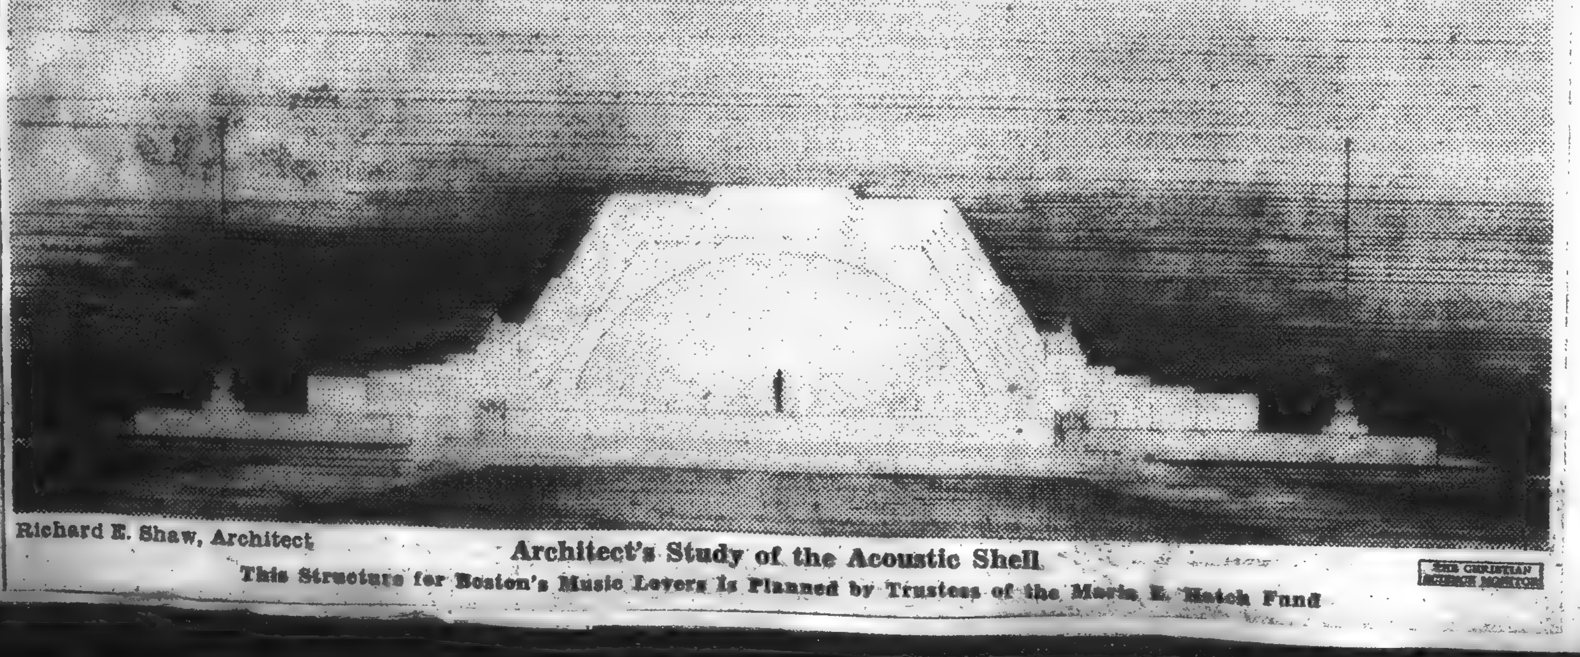
B. Trans. - Jan. 19/38

THE EDWARD HATCH MEMORIAL MUSIC SHELL

On the Charles River Esplanade came a little closer to realization today with the perfection of a preliminary architectural study of the proposed "Concertorium," as it will be termed, drawn by Richard E. Shaw. The design was developed to blend with the forms characteristic of the Beacon Hill sky line. Trustees of the $500,000 Maria E. Hatch Fund stated today construction of the building "may start this spring."

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1938

'Concertorium' for the Esplanade



Richard E. Shaw, Architect

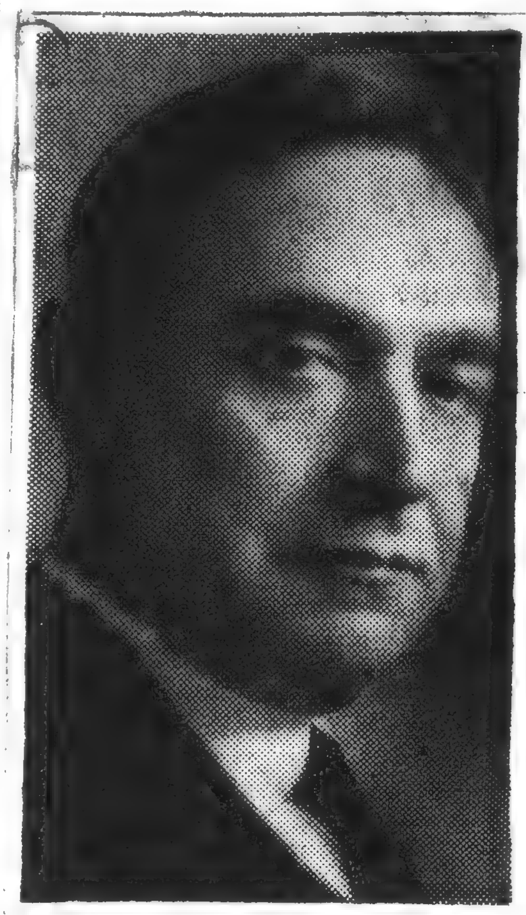
Architect's Study of the Acoustic Shell

This Structure for Boston's Music Lovers Is Planned by Trustees of the Maria E. Hatch Fund

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 2 - 1938



Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert for the FoFrum on Wednesday.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

JAN 1 - 1938

Opinions

Thinking goes wrong, one might say, because it is beset by temptations, by human urges, desires, prejudices that are as strong as they are irrational. —JOSEPH JASTROW.

Music is not a matter of the length of time it takes to play, but rather of its thoroughness of expression. —SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY.

The United States is the only independent nation in the world today, self-supporting, powerful and wealthy. —J. B. PRIESTLEY.

The church places the human personality upon the summit of the political order. —CARDINAL VERDIER.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

DEC 2 6 1937

Audience Etiquet

THE good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because late-comers were bustling in to their seats while the music was being played.

This, probably, was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament; but it was also a richly-deserved rebuke for the tardy, and if more performers would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goer would be much pleasanter.

The starting-time of any concert is always announced in advance. If a patron can't get there in time, it's up to him to stand and wait until there is an intermission before hunting for his seat. By barging in while the music is being played he makes an unmitigated nuisance of himself. Mr. Koussevitzky did a good job in dramatizing the annoyance that the tardy arrival causes.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.
Evening News Press

DEC 27 1937

BRUCE CATTON SAYS—

AUDIENCE ETIQUET

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZONA REPUBLIC

DEC 29 1937

Choral Score Sent By Radio

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean tonight, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola, and bass viol— of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

DEC 28 1937

Manuscript Of Symphonic Score Has Disappeared

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP).—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZONA REPUBLIC

DEC 28 1937

Famed Choral Work Missing

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed today.

The unpublished work, "Origin of Fire," written in 1902 and received with success in Europe, was to have received its first performance in America on Friday by the orchestra and the Helsinki (Helsingfors) university chorus.

Two packages—one containing the original score and the other some of the choral and instrumental parts—were mailed from the composer's publishers in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18 in time to catch the liner Europa, John N. Burk, the orchestra's program annotator said.

The package containing the parts arrived "about two weeks ago," but the complete score hasn't turned up yet, and postal authorities have been asked to investigate the possibility of theft or loss.

"It is unlikely the package fell into the ocean," Burk said, "and the sad thing about it is the possibility the score may be lost forever."

Sibelius has left several of his great works unpublished, Burk said, among them the Kullervo symphony for chorus and orchestra.

"Origin of Fire," he added, was a comparatively short piece, requiring only 10 minutes to perform, and was taken from the text of "Kalevala," Finland's great national epic, the peculiar rhythmic pattern of which Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appropriated for his American poem, "Hiawatha." Burk said he doubted that Breitkopf and Haertel, the Leipzig publishers, made a copy.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN

8 1937

Radio to Flash Photo Of Lost Opera Score

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsic, Germany.

The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

The orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsic, music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Two packages were mailed from Leipsic November 18, but only one was received.

This contained only separate orchestral parts.

The orchestra management referred to the situation as a "desperate emergency" and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Orchestra officials said four sheets of the score, reduced to a page 8½ x 11 inches, would be transmitted at a time. In all, 14 pages of the original must be transmitted, they said. Upon receipt, they explained, the miniatures must be enlarged to conventional size.

MONTEREY, CAL.
PENINSULA HERALD

DEC 28 1937

Orchestra Score Coming By Radio

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Radio was called upon today to rescue

RENO, NEV.
GAZETTE

DEC 29 1937

TEMPERAMENT A LA MODE

A CRISIS in musical history has been met by means of the transatlantic radio.

From Berlin came the choral parts and score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," written years ago but preserved for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to present its premier next Friday. Part of the manuscript arrived, but the musical score was lost in the mails. The greatest fear was expressed that this was the only copy of the score in existence, since the composition was never published. But there came, on the heels of the announcement that the opera house in Boston might have to be dark next Friday night, a statement by the Berlin agents of Sibelius that the score was being sent by radio. There were fourteen pages of it, and they must be condensed, one page at a time, to the conventional letter size of 8½ by 11 inches. These could then be stepped up by photographic reproduction to the required size for the orchestra members and printed.

Considering the vogue of Sibelius, Danish composer who has taken the world by storm, the rescue of his precious work came just in time.

But Sibelius, temperamental and mysterious, might have had his work published and copies of it in the hands of music lovers everywhere. Instead he hid his precious treasure until the eve of its presentation — and save for the precaution of his publishers in copying the score by hand, the work, whatever its merit, might have been lost to the world.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION - STAR

DEC 29 1937

Musical Score Crossing Ocean On Ether Waves

Pictures of Finnish Composer's Work Being Rushed to Boston

BOSTON, Dec. 29—(AP)—Radio has been called upon to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composers' work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

Two packages were mailed from Leipsig November 18, but only one was received. This contained only separate orchestral parts. Failure to receive the complete score already had caused Serge Koussevitzky, director of the orchestra, to rearrange the Friday program.

Symphony officials had expressed the fear that the only copy of the unpublished manuscript had been shipped, but when advised of the radio transmission they realized this was not the fact. Management of the orchestra referred to the situation as a "desperate" emergency and said it was the first time radio photographic transmission had been resorted to under such circumstances.

Sibelius, regarded as Finland's national composer, recently observed his 72nd birthday. His "Origin of Fire" never has been heard in America.

Orchestra officials said four sheets of the score, reduced to a page 8½ by 11 inches, would be transmitted at a time. In all, 14 pages of the original must be transmitted, they said. Upon receipt, they explained, the miniatures must be enlarged to conventional size and sufficient copies made to accommodate the orchestra.

FARGO, N. D.
MORNING FORUM

DEC 29 1937

Missing Musical Score Radioed Across Ocean

Boston, Dec. 28.– (AP) –Missing parts of an early choral–symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan

---

EVANSVILLE, IND.
PRESS

DEC 29 1937

To Send Musical Score by Radio

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 29.—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Sym-

---

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
CHRONICLE

DEC 29 1937

Radio Is Called Upon To Rescue Lost Music

BOSTON, Dec. 28. (AP)—Radio was called upon today to rescue

BAKER, ORE.
DEMOCRAT-HERALD

DEC 29 1937

Radio is Rescuing Symphonic Score

BOSTON, Dec. 28. — (AP) — Radio was called upon today to rescue for

---

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC 29 19

Lost Symphonic Parts Radioed Across Ocean

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic

---

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 29 1937

RADIO has been called upon to rescue for the Boston Symphony orchestra the symphonic-choral score of Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," yesterday reported lost in the mails somewhere between Boston and Leipsig, Germany. The score is two weeks overdue.

Fortunately there is another copy of the score in Leipsig. This will be sent . . . but not through the mail. Photographic radio transmission was completed sometime yesterday . . . a factor some possible thief may have overlooked.

HOQUIAM, WASH.
WASHINGTONIAN

DEC 29 1937

Missing Sibelius Score Radioed Across Ocean

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan

---

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

DEC 29 1937

Lost Sibelius Score Sent By Radio for Hub Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—(UP)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train to-day.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

DEC 29 1937

take the solo part.

Boston Programs.

The programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be notable in that they

---

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

DEC 29 1937

Russian Woman 'Cellist Assists Boston Symphony

Rayn Garbousova Plays Splendidly Tschaikowsky's Variations and Boccherini's B-Flat Major Concerto at Supplementary Concert.

Chivalry and the evidence of her muscial talent make it fitting that comment on the Tuesday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the supplementary series should begin with recognition of the sterling qualities of the Russion cellist, Raya Garbousova, who was the assisting artist.

To one of the concertos of Luigi Boccherini, that in B-flat major, she turned for her first number. Compared with some of the other items on the program this was naive and simple music. And the cellist chose to allow its melodies and strains to speak for themselves without any attempt, save perhaps in the cadenzas which were supplied by the editor of the music, to make a show piece of it. Flexibility and clarity marked her playing.

Naturally there was more opportunity for color and warmth in Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme which she played later on. Here the theme appears in various decorative guises, to each of which the artist lent its particular atmosphere. There were opportunities for the songful melodies which are most grateful for the cello, while the embellishment of them was deftly and at times brilliantly managed. Seldom do we hear a woman who handles the instrument so skilfully and discerningly.

Michael Starokadomsky's Concerto for Orchestra, recently given its first American performance in the regular series, was repeated. The young Russian composer's studies of the organ were reflected in his designation of the middle movement as a Passacaglia and of the final movement as a Toccata and also by a use oft he basses and notably of the woodwinds in brief effects which suggested organ tones. On the whole, the music was less acrid than that of some of the moderns heard in Symphony hall on occasion. In the final movement the brasses pierced through the instrumental texture with an effect that was strident but not without its thrill.

It has sometimes seemed to this reviewer that Tschaikowsky's music provides the golden mean between the older classics and the atonalities and dissonances of the extreme modernists. It has richness, color and melody and a knowledge of the possibilities of the orchestra. That impression was confirmed by Dr. Koussevitzky's scintillating interpretation of the Overture-Fantasia,

---

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

DEC 29 1937

Missing Parts of Symphony Score Radioed Over Sea to U.S.

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic Ocean tonight, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said, in time for its first American performance Friday afternoon.

The lost parts—for cello, viola and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipzig, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided today a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early tonight, and were to be taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

* * *

AUDIENCES WITNESSING a play in China laugh only at the comedy in the lines but a Chinese play presented in this country provides rollicking amusement through the antics of the propertymen and the quaint customs of the Chinese-stage.

This is being indicated currently at Philharmonic Auditorium where "Lady Precious Stream," Chinese comedy spectacle in English is now playing nightly.

35

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 29 1937

MUSIC

FIRST—THE PIANO

News of holiday season purchases of pianos for homes where children will begin their individual study of music at home upon this instrument, gives indication of the wider recognition of the piano as "first aid" to the musical education.

Since music has become a fixture in the schools and its importance in the training of children recognized, the piano's supremacy has been proved. School training in music for the musical child is not enough. It should be augmented by home study of an instrument, preferably the piano. Simplest of all to play, it offers more than all to the student.

Singer, soloist of other instruments, elementary composition, light or grand opera, orchestral works are all indebted to the piano for their perfection.

"THE STUDIO AUDIENCE"

Recalling the recent and justified indignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, at the behavior of an audience in a city visited during the recent tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it was interesting to read the story of "the unique character and the unparalleled behavior of the studio audience" as told by Olin Downes in the New York Times, from his observations of radio studio audiences.

"The manners of this audience are like none other on this side of the water," said Mr. Downes. To quote him further: "The studio audience for example is never late. The reason for this is that the doors of the auditorium are closed while the music is being played, and are not opened till the performance is over.

"The people are not there apparently to bang seats or chatter as they go down the aisle, or walk over your toes, or differ audibly with the ushers. They do not go to preen or stare, they do not crane and twist to look at the boxes. They seem to have come to listen to music."

JUNIOR DEPARTMENT

Under the sponsorship of the Junior Department of the National Federation of Music Clubs, boys and girls from the primary grades to the late 'teens are to be taught music appreciation. The department's medium for reaching them will be through 2210 junior musical clubs in 48 states, Alaska and the Canal Zone, which have an aggregate membership of some 200,000.

HELSINKI CHORUS

The Helsinki university chorus will be heard in choral music of Sibelius at the Boston Symphony concerts of Dec. 31 and Jan. 1. The Finnish master, Sibelius, come to be regarded by many as the greatest creative musician now alive, is known to concert goers through his symphonies and other orchestral works, but the first performance in Boston of his choral works will be by the Helsinki chorus, on their first tour of this country.

The student singers from the University of Helsinki and other higher educational institutions there, will number about 55, chosen from a home group three times larger. The university was founded in 1883; the chorus is something of an outgrowth of interest in music that flourished during the existence of the much older University of Turku.

Sibelius has written a number of pieces for this chorus, whose fundamental purpose has always been the stimulation of native Finnish choral music. For the past six years the director has been Martti Turunen. The young musician, born in 1902, is also a teacher and has written about music.

E. B. F.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

1938

RENO, NEV.
STATE JOURNAL

DEC 30 1937

Sibelius Symphony Score, Carried Over Atlantic by Radio Waves, to Receive American Premiere Friday

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—(UP)—The lost score of an Jan Sibelius sym-

Left . . . SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reading the radioed score of Jan Sibelius's unpublished "Origin of Fire" sent from Europe by air when the original score was lost en route to this country by mail.
—Wide World photo

MAYFIELD, KY.
MESSENGER

Over the Ocean.

BOSTON, Dec. 30- (AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean Tuesday night, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said in time for its first American performance tomorrow afternoon.

The lost parts for 'cello, viola and bass viol of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipsiz, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publisher.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, viola and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early Tuesday night, and were taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

BOSTON GLOBE—
JANUARY 20, 1938

Harvard Club Host to Symphony Group

The Harvard Club of Boston will be host to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Jan. 28, in appreciation of the generous artistic contribution of the orchestra to the recent Harvard tercentenary celebration.

Dr. James Rowe Angell, former president of Yale, will be the guest speaker. Edward A. Taft, president of the Harvard Club, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and president of the Friends of the Orchestra, will preside.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, on whom Harvard conferred an honorary doctor of laws degree in 1929, will be spokesman for the orchestra, and Bentley W. Warren, president of the trustees, will speak for his associates. An original poem, written for the occasion by Mark Anthony de Wolf Howe, historian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be read at the dinner by Prof. E. K. Rand of Harvard.

Henry Lee Higginson, whose grandfather, Maj. Higginson, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was also first president of the Harvard Club of Boston, will be one of the guests.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

DEC 30 1937

Bassoonist to Perform On Symphony Broadcast

SOMETHING of a musical innovation will be presented to radio listeners Thursday at 6 p. m. when a bassoon solo is featured on the weekly "Backstage With the Symphony" program over station KPRC.

The soloist will be Austin Ledwith, first bassoonist and assistant conductor of the Symphony. He will play the "Solo de Concert," by Charles Rene, and a ballade and waltz by Charles Hurlstone.

The radio presentation is under direction of Conductor Ernst Hoffmann, who believes that a demonstration of the tone, range and technical possibilities of the bassoon will prove one of the most interesting glimpses yet given the public of the elements that enter into the production of a symphony program.

The weekly "backstage" broadcasts were inaugurated last month with the idea of giving the Houston radio audience a better understanding of the part played by individual performers in a large orchestra.

Mr. Ledwith is a graduate of Yale university and is a member of Pi Kappa Lambda, national honorary musical fraternity. He holds a bachelor of music degree from the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

A student of all branches of music, Mr. Ledwith is the author of a treatise, "A Physical Approach to Harmony," which has been widely read and discussed. He specialized in bassoon under Lous and Gillett of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and played with that organization in the outdoor concerts which won such acclaim for Conductor Arthur Fiedler. He was also first bassoonist of the New England Conservatory orchestra and the Commonwealth symphony of Boston.

Austin Ledwith

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

DEC 31 1937

WORK ON BERKSHIRE MUSIC SHED BEGUN

Pittsfield—Ground was broken today for the Berkshire symphony festival's gigantic music shed at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge. As soon as plans are approved by the state building inspector, work will start on the steel framework. The building, to seat 5,000, will be ready for the six concerts in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Tanglewood, 200-acre estate, was given to the orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline as a permanent home for the festival. It is where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived 85 years ago. The building, in the shape of a fan, will be open on the sides. A tuning room will be built in back of the stage.

ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

DEC 31 1937

GROUND BROKEN FOR THE NEW MUSIC SHED

Pittsfield, Mass., Dec. 31.—(AP)—Ground was broken today at Tanglewood for the Berkshire

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 29 1937

MUSIC SCORE SENT BY RADIO

Lost Parts Are Duplicated from Leipzig to U. S.

By United Press

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here today by

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER

Radio Photos to Send Lost Symphony Score

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston

---

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

DEC 30 1937

Lost Symphony Score Sent by Radio

Boston—(U.P.)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train yesterday.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, since the Helsinki University Chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via RCA, took a total of more than 12 hours.

125

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 29 1937

MUSIC

FIRST—THE PIANO

News of holiday season purchases of pianos for homes where children will begin their individual study of music at home upon this instrument, gives indication of the wider recognition of the piano as "first aid" to the musical education.

Since music has become a fixture in the schools and its importance in the training of children recognized, the piano's supremacy has been proved. School training in music for the musical child is not enough. It should be augmented by home study of an instrument, preferably the piano. Simplest of all to play, it offers more than all to the student.

Singer, soloist of other instruments, elementary composition, light or grand opera, orchestral works are all indebted to the piano for their perfection.

"THE STUDIO AUDIENCE"

Recalling the recent and justified indignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, at the behavior of an audience in a city visited during the recent tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it was interesting to read the story of "the unique character and the unparalleled behavior of the studio audience" as told by Olin Downes in the New York Times, from his observations of radio studio audiences.

"The manners of this audience are like none other on this side of the water," said Mr. Downes. To quote him further: "The studio audience for example is never late. The reason for this is that the doors of the auditorium are closed while the music is being played, and are not opened till the performance is over.

"The people are not there apparently to bang seats or chatter as they go down the aisle, or walk over your toes, or differ audibly with the ushers. They do not go to preen or stare, they do not crane and twist to look at the boxes. They seem to have come to listen to music."

JUNIOR DEPARTMENT

Under the sponsorship of the Junior Department of the National Federation of Music Clubs, boys and girls from the primary grades to the late 'teens are to be taught music appreciation. The department's medium for reaching them will be through 2210 junior musical clubs in 48 states, Alaska and the Canal Zone, which have an aggregate membership of some 200,000.

HELSINKI CHORUS

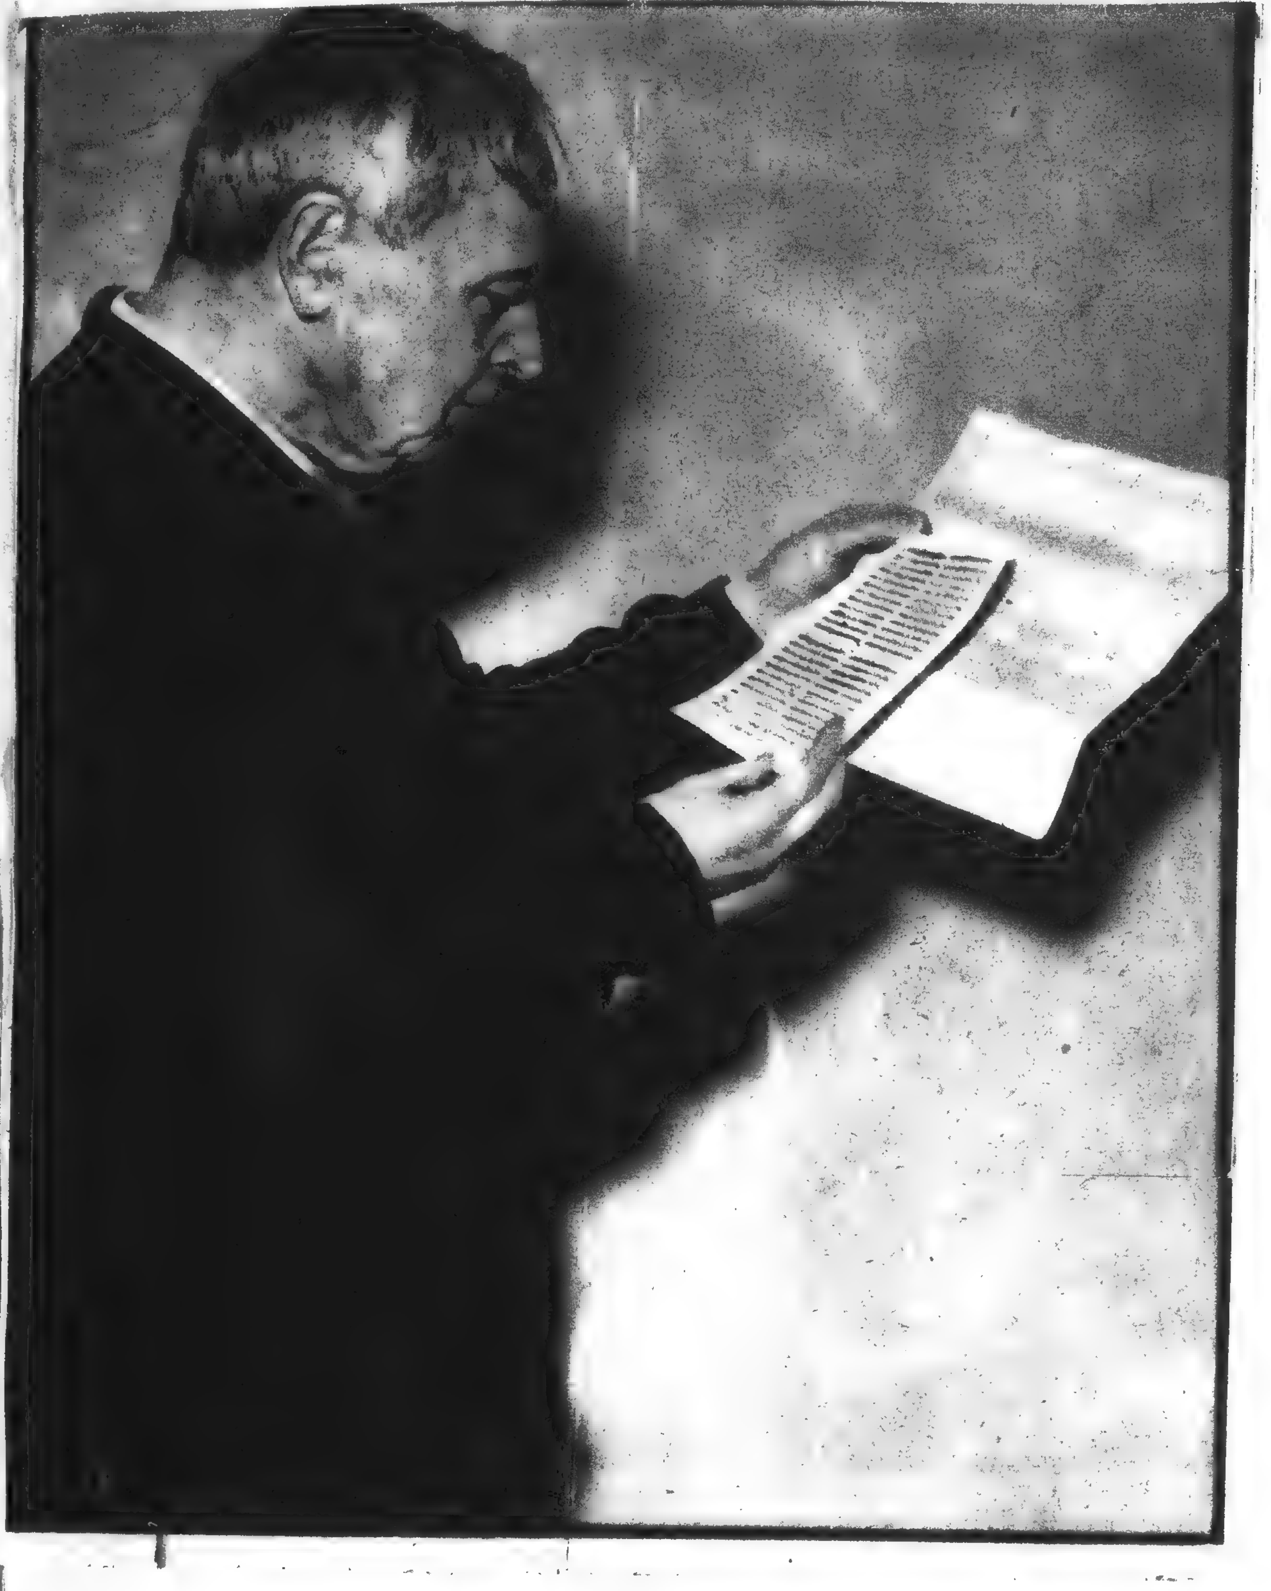
The Helsinki university chorus will be heard in choral music of Sibelius at the Boston Symphony concerts of Dec. 31 and Jan. 1. The Finnish master, Sibelius, come to be regarded by many as the greatest creative musician now alive, is known to concert goers through his symphonies and other orchestral works, but the first performance in Boston of his choral works will be by the Helsinki chorus, on their first tour of this country.

The student singers from the University of Helsinki and other higher educational institutions there, will number about 55, chosen from a home group three times larger. The university was founded in 1883; the chorus is something of an outgrowth of interest in music that flourished during the existence of the much older University of Turku.

Sibelius has written a number of pieces for this chorus, whose fundamental purpose has always been the stimulation of native Finnish choral music. For the past six years the director has been Martti Turunen. The young musician, born in 1902, is also a teacher and has written about music.

E. B. F.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 9 - 1938



Left . . . SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reading the radioed score of Jan Sibelius's unpublished "Origin of Fire" sent from Europe by air when the original score was lost en route to this country by mail.

—Wide World photo

RENO, NEV.
STATE JOURNAL
DEC 30 1937

Sibelius Symphony Score, Carried Over Atlantic by Radio Waves, to Receive American Premiere Friday

BOSTON, Dec. 29.— (UP) — The lost score of an Jan Sibelius syb-

---

MAYFIELD, KY.
MESSENGER
DEC 30 1937

Over the Ocean.

BOSTON, Dec. 30—(AP)—Missing parts of an early choral-symphonic work by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, were radioed across the Atlantic ocean Tuesday night, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials said in time for its first American performance tomorrow afternoon.

The lost parts—for 'cello, viola and bass viol—of "Origin of Fire" vanished along with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript of the complete score, after being mailed in Leipsiz, Germany, on November 18, by the musical publishers.

A second package, mailed at the same time and containing parts for chorus, horns, violins and other instruments, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided a satisfactory performance could be given from the choral score if the missing parts could be obtained. The choral score, he said, provides the cues for instrumentalists.

"It was fortunate," he said, "the publishers made copies of the parts. I only hope the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The pictures were received in New York early Tuesday night, and were taken to Boston on a midnight train.

It was believed the first time a symphonic score ever was flashed across the ocean in that manner.

BOSTON GLOBE—
JANUARY 20, 1938

Harvard Club Host to Symphony Group

The Harvard Club of Boston will be host to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Jan. 28, in appreciation of the generous artistic contribution of the orchestra to the recent Harvard tercentenary celebration.

Dr. James Rowe Angell, former president of Yale, will be the guest speaker. Edward A. Taft, president of the Harvard Club, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and president of the Friends of the Orchestra, will preside.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, on whom Harvard conferred an honorary doctor of laws degree in 1929, will be spokesman for the orchestra, and Bentley W. Warren, president of the trustees, will speak for his associates. An original poem, written for the occasion by Mark Anthony de Wolf Howe, historian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be read at the dinner by Prof. E. K. Rand of Harvard.

Henry Lee Higginson, whose grandfather, Maj. Higginson, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was also first president of the Harvard Club of Boston, will be one of the guests.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
DEC 30 1937

Bassoonist to Perform On Symphony Broadcast

SOMETHING of a musical innovation will be presented to radio listeners Thursday at 6 p. m. when a bassoon solo is featured on the weekly "Backstage With the Symphony" program over station KPRC.

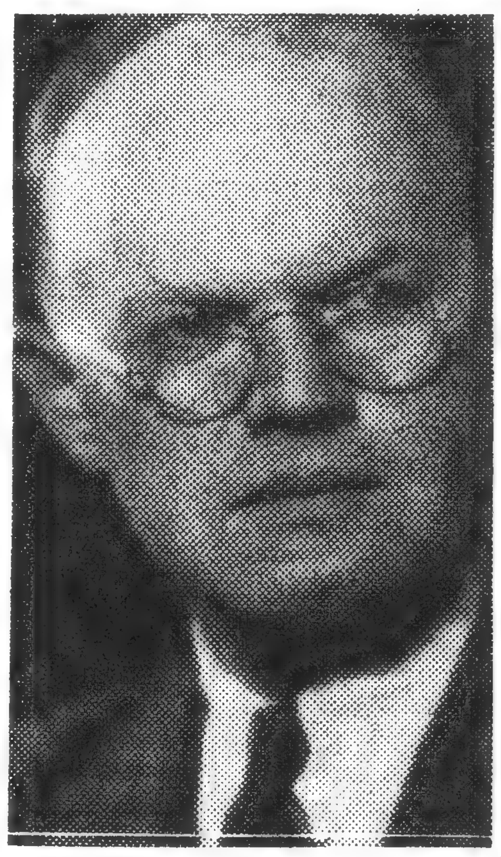
The soloist will be Austin Ledwith, first bassoonist and assistant conductor of the Symphony. He will play the "Solo de Concert," by Charles Rene, and a ballade and waltz by Charles Hurlstone.

The radio presentation is under direction of Conductor Ernst Hoffmann, who believes that a demonstration of the tone, range and technical possibilities of the bassoon will prove one of the most interesting glimpses yet given the public of the elements that enter into the production of a symphony program.

The weekly "backstage" broadcasts were inaugurated last month with the idea of giving the Houston radio audience a better understanding of the part played by individual performers in a large orchestra.

Mr. Ledwith is a graduate of Yale university and is a member of Pi Kappa Lambda, national honorary musical fraternity. He holds a bachelor of music degree from the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

A student of all branches of music, Mr. Ledwith is the author of a treatise, "A Physical Approach to Harmony," which has been widely read and discussed. He specialized in bassoon under Lous and Gillett of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and played with that organization in the outdoor concerts which won such acclaim for Conductor Arthur Fiedler. He was also first bassoonist of the New England Conservatory orchestra and the Commonwealth symphony of Boston.



Austin Ledwith

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
DEC 31 1937

WORK ON BERKSHIRE MUSIC SHED BEGUN

Pittsfield — Ground was broken today for the Berkshire symphonic festival's gigantic music shed at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge. As soon as plans are approved by the state building inspector, work will start on the steel framework. The building, to seat 5,000, will be ready for the six concerts in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Tanglewood, 200-acre estate, was given to the orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline as a permanent home for the festival. It is where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived 85 years ago. The building, in the shape of a fan, will be open on the sides. A tuning room will be built in back of the stage.

ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL
DEC 31 1937

GROUND BROKEN FOR THE NEW MUSIC SHED

Pittsfield, Mass., Dec. 31.—(AP)—Ground was broken today at Tanglewood for the Berkshire

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 29 1937

MUSIC SCORE SENT BY RADIO

Lost Parts Are Duplicated from Leipzig to U. S.

By United Press

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here today by

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER
DEC 30 1937

Radio Photos to Send Lost Symphony Score

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP).—Radio was called upon today to rescue for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral-symphonic score of Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," which went astray in the mails while en route from Leipsig, Germany. The orchestra, scheduled to present the Finnish composer's work Friday, said it was advised photographic radio transmission would begin "immediately."

Members of the orchestra staff said they were advised by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipsig music publishers, that they were "sending immediately pictures of the score" to New York, where they would be picked up and rushed to Boston.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
DEC 30 1937

Lost Symphony Score Sent by Radio

Boston—(U.P.)—The lost score of a Jan Sibelius symphony, duplicated by transoceanic radio photography in the first process of its kind in history, arrived here by train yesterday.

The Finnish composer's unpublished and little-known "Origin of Fire" was rushed here from a New York music publisher for its American premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night.

The orchestral parts of the performance became lost in the mails en route from Germany to Boston, while a second package, containing choral parts, arrived two weeks ago.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said a satisfactory performance could be given with two rehearsals, since the Helsinki University Chorus, which opens its American tour with the performance, is familiar with the music.

"I only hope," Koussevitzky said, "that the original manuscript is not lost forever."

The lost score, of which copies had been made in Leipzig, Germany, before it was mailed, was transmitted four pages at a time on 8½ by 11-inch paper to the Associated Music Publishers of New York. It was being enlarged and duplicated here for distribution to the musicians.

Transmission from Leipzig over telephone wires to Berlin and thence by radio to New York, via RCA, took a total of more than 12 hours.

3

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 31 1937

GROUND AT TANGLEWOOD BROKEN FOR BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL MUSIC SHED

Steel Work To Start as Soon as Plans for Pavilion To Seat 5000 Have Been Approved by State Building Inspector—Construction To Be Rushed to Completion in Time for Concerts Next Summer by Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ground was broken this morning for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's gigantic music shed at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge and as soon as plans have been approved by the State Building Inspector, work will start on the steel framework. The building, to seat 5000, will be rushed to completion in time for the six concerts to be given in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Graves & Hemmes of Great Barrington have the general contract.

Tanglewood, 200-acre estate was given to the orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline as a permanent home for the Festival. It is where Hawthorne, lived in the Berkshires 85 years ago. The building in the shape of a fan will be open on the sides. A tuning room will be built in back of the stage.

Committee's Decision

The decision to break ground now was made by the executive committee so that there will be no delay in erection of the steel. It will take 15 weeks for the Bethlenem Steel Company to deliver and erect the framework. Delivery of steel will be simplified if the ground is frozen. There is very little frost in the ground now to interfere with excavation.

Graves & Hemmes will employ 15 men now and will add to this force later.

TULSA, OKLA.
TRIBUNE

DEC 31 19[illegible]

AUDIENCE ETIQUET

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because latecomers were bustling in to their seats while the music was being played.

This, probably, was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament; but it was also a richly-deserved rebuke for the tardy, and if more performers would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goer would be much pleasanter.

The starting-time of any concert is always announced in advance. If a patron can't get there in time, it's up to him to stand and wait until there is an intermission before hunting for his seat. By barging in while the music is being played he makes an unmitigated nuisance of himself. Mr. Koussevitzky did a good job in dramatizing the annoyance that the tardy arrival causes.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 31 1937

THE world lost one of its great musicians this week when Maurice Ravel, French composer, died in Paris at the age of 62. Born in the Basque country in France, near the Spanish border, he was known as Joseph Maurice Ravez until he was brought to Paris at 12 years old for his preliminary piano work. It was not until he was twenty-four that he began to study composition. Then he went to the Paris Conservatory and was a student of the late master, Gabriel Faure, whose beautifully defined style undoubtedly affected his pupil's work. The early influence of his Spanish associations also colored Ravel's future compositions. His work best known to America is "Bolero," which was inspired by the throb of machinery in motion. Several of his creations were called revolutionary by critics but others almost proved that he was a traditionist with an unusual sense of invention. Whatever it was, Ravel possessed an amazingly creative mind and his works are considered among the finest in French musical literature. One of his masterpieces was the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which was performed by Nijinsky and the Ballet Russe in Paris and created a sensation in musical circles. Another exceptional work was his fairly recent piano concerto which was writen especially for Paul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, in which the left hand plays the theme and the accompaniment. Ravel was not only a famous composer but was a recognized conductor and pianist. He received many honors from the French government and as recnetly as 1934 was named head of the American Conservatory of Music at the Fontainebleau Palace.. oryv Hl"sUr

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger

JAN 1 - 1938

Boston Symphony Here Wednesday

Next Wednesday evening at 8:30 in the Academy of Music the Philadelphia Forum will sponser the only appearance in this city during the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

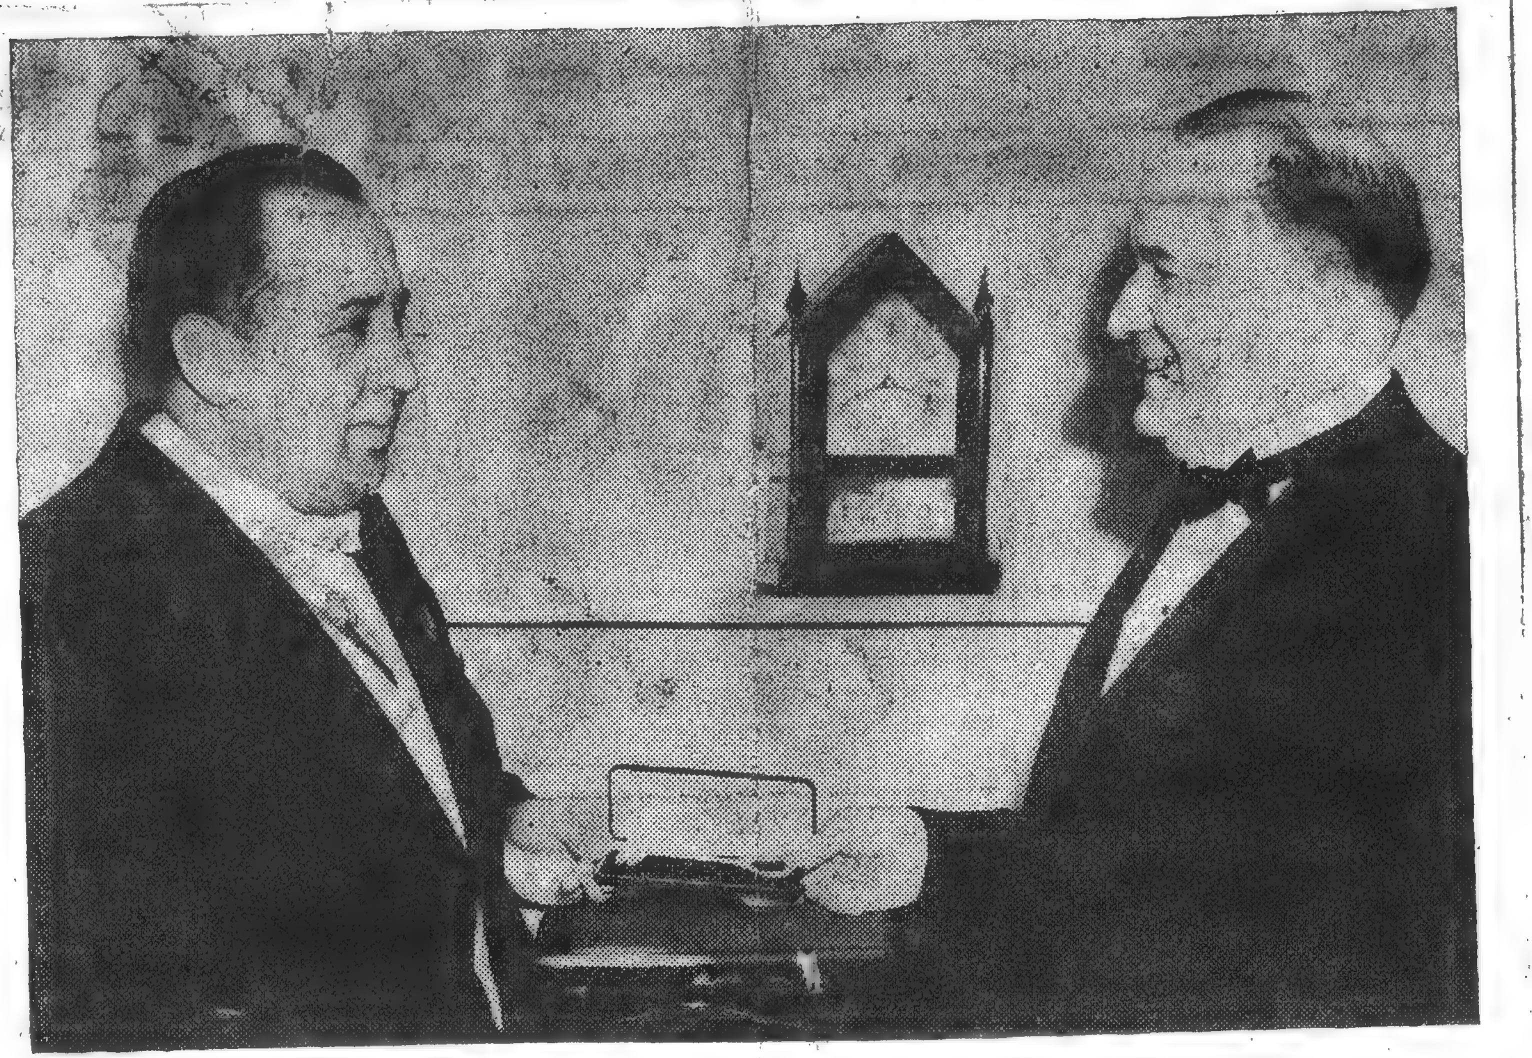
The program to be given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra will open with Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 58 (in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition No. 13), to be followed by Sergei Prokofieff's suite, "Lieutenant Kije," in five short movements, and concludes with the symphony in C minor (No. 1) of Brahms.

* * *

ON TUESDAY the original manuscript of an unpublished choral-symphonic work of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston. It was on its way to America to be played by the Boston Symphony and was called, "Origin of Fire." Two packages, one containing the original score and the other the separate part for all the instruments except cello and viola, were mailed by tre German publishers from Leipzig on November 18. On Wednesday the missing parts were radioed across the Atlantic to Koussevitsky for the performance of the orchestra in Boston tonight. By working over the separate parts, the conductor was able to figure out most of the ideas of the composer. It is hoped that this manuscript has not been lost forever. The government is investigating to discover what might have happened to the small package between Germany and America. Fortunately, the publishers had copied the various parts of the manuscript so the work can be completely performed without the original.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

DEC 31 1937



KEY TO CITY FOR CHORUS LEADER

Mayor Sullivan presents the key to the city to Martti Turunen, conductor of the Helsinki University Chorus, just before this famous organization made its American debut in Memorial Auditorium last night.

Finnish Composer's Score Arrives via Radio

Boston Symphony Experts Transfer Photoed Bars to Sheets of Paper For Hub Concert

Martti Turunen, conductor of the famous Helsinki University Chorus of Finland was a happy man last night as he and his men made their American debut at the Auditorium. The score of his beloved Jean Sibelius' early choral-symphonic score, thought lost in transit, had been found in Leipsig, Germany, and radiophotoed to Boston.

"Thank God for the great science of radio", the conductor, himself a noted composer, said through an interpreter just a few minutes before he stepped to the stage. "Now we can play that score at our concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston tomorrow."

Mr. Turunen disclosed that several experts of the Boston Symphony worked until after 2 o'clock Thursday morning to copy the score which, as it came over the radio, was somewhat blurred. They used magnifying glasses and then transferred the bars to sheets of paper.

The conductor was happy also because among the sixty members of the chorus was Sibelius' young grandson, Martti Paloheimo, whom he proudly introduced. And as he spoke of the famous Jean Sibelius through his interpreter and American manager, George Sjoblom, a note of reverence crept into his voice.

Friend of Sibelius

"I have the great honor of having him as my friend," he said, "and for some years now I have seen him nearly every week. I consider myself a very fortunate man in knowing the master, for he sees few people, not because he is unfriendly, but simply because music is everything to him. To us in Finland he is something more than a man—he is the spirit of our country, her inspiration and her beloved son. Through his superb music he has brought happiness not only to our people but to the people of the whole world.

"And I am sure you will want to know that he has a very deep affection for America and Americans. Just a few days before we left for your country I saw him and he told me how pleased he was that we were bringing the chorus here. 'You will like America and she will like you', he assured me. I have not seen much of your country yet, but I like your snow-capped hills, and this splendid auditorium."

Just before the concert Mr. Turunen was presented the key to the city by Mayor Sullivan, who made a brief speech, and evidently it was a new experience for the Finnish conductor who opened the case several times and inspected the gleaming key before he turned, raised his hands and led this superb chorus in the haunting melody of his country, "Hail Suomi, My Native Land."

Earlier in the day upon their arrival here from Boston the members of the chorus were guests of Rev. and Mrs. Viljo Heiman at a lunchein in the Finnish Lutheran Church, Laurel street, of which Mr. Heiman is pastor, followed by a reception and afternoon coffee at the Heiman home, 187 Eastern avenue. Following the concert there was a reception for the chorus at Finnish Temperance Hall, Laurel street.

It was the interest and energy of Rev. Mr. Heiman and Mrs. Heiman in supporting the chorus' American tour that brought the premier to Worcester—combined, as the chorus leaders put it, with Worcester's cultural reputation and the large Finnish-American colony here.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 31 1937

Gigantic Music Shed Begun in Berkshires

Special to The Hartford Times

Pittsfield—Ground was broken this morning for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's gigantic music shed at

Cont. as one on ← opposite page.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 31 1937

Finnish Chorus Concert Hailed as Gem of Music

By WALTER W. FARMER

The Helsinki University Male Chorus of Finland, Martti Turunen, conductor, gave a concert in the Auditorium last night under auspices of the Finnish Lutheran Church and other local Finnish organizations. The concert was the first in an extended tour that will take the chorus to 19 of the principal cities of United States and Canada. The chorus is appearing with Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts today and tomorrow in Boston. Before the program last night, F. W. Bjorkman, presiding speaker, introduced Mayor Sullivan, who extended the city's welcome and presented the conductor a key to the city. Prof. K. T. Jutila, official representative of Finland on the concert tour, responded.

It must be stated without reservation that this chorus provided the finest singing by male voices that the writer has ever heard. The appeal was entirely musical, not depending for interest on violent fluctuations between the extremes of expression; there was no unnatural use of voice and no attempt to gain sensational effects by striking costumes or other unmusical devices. In a word, there was pure vocal tone of extraordinary richness, with an incredibly perfect blending that resulted in a composite quality of rare beauty. Furthermore, the exquisite shading and subtle gradations in dynamics were so remarkable that it seemed hardly possible that human voices could attain such sensitive expressiveness. A Finnish man who sat next the writer, justly proud of the art of his countrymen, exclaimed:

"They are like beautiful instruments—only better!"

Mr. Turunen conducted with the quiet authority of a fine musician, while the superb artistry that resulted from his skilled leadership spoke with true eloquence.

The music, with the exception of one number, was composed by Finnish writers, most of whom are unknown to American music lovers. Sibelius and Palmgren are familiar figures here, but the names of Kajanus, Tornudd, Pesola and Madetoja are strangers.

Variety in Selections

The selections, all of them brief, were strongly contrasted and included humorous folk songs, such as "Prokko," which relates the misadventures of a man who carried home a drunken companion on his back and the welcome he received from the domestic animals. In contrast, was the old conjuration that begins with a gentle prayer to the Virgin and ends with the violent exorcism of malignant spirits. Of extreme pathos was "My Heart's Song," in which a sorrowing mother hopes for the happiness of her dead child: "Grove of death, grove of peace, my dear, one would be happy there, rocking in his golden cradle, listening to the hummingbird." Thus it may be seen that the content of this music brings to American listeners a new and fresh note and reveals the soul of a great people sensitive to the poetry of life and gifted with the power to express it with intensity and reality.

One of the features was the handsome program-book that contained, besides excellent translations of the songs, portraits of the composers and strikingly beautiful views of Finland—"the land of sixty thousand lakes."

It is said that one of the purposes of the American tour is to cement more firmly the warm friendship now existing between Finland and this country. Unquestionably, this will be accomplished and the thrilling singing of the national anthems of the two countries at the opening and close of the concert suggested the powerful influence of music in increasing the spirit of good will and mutual affection.

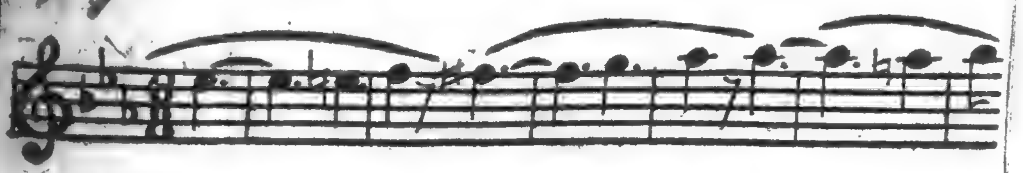
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS

DEC 31 1937

127

Music in Milwaukee

By Ralph Tillema



Brahms, Symphony in C Minor, Opus 68.

One of my favorite books, first read in years gone by, is an autobiography: "The Americanization of Edward Bok." Christmas week I renewed my acquaintance with that staunch offspring of Netherlander stock, whose entire career in this country was full to overflowing with all that makes this existence interesting and of value.

His life—so complete with wife and children, well chosen friends and friendly books, and withal, full days of constructive work both for his own gain and in payment of his debt to society—his life, I say, can go far in pointing the way to all young Americans who are seriously desirous of "Making the world a bit more beautiful and better because you have been in it"—a quotation in which Mr. Bok himself appears to have believed and one that is to be found in the introduction of his book.

In his early days as a member of the house of Scribner's—and even before—this young editor-to-be was a firm believer that part of a broad education was obtained through association with prominent characters of the age in which ones lives.

He Met the Famous Folk of His Day

And by the use of much resourcefulness, even at the age of 16, he already had made contact with such public celebrities as President Garfield, General Grant, General Sherman and President Hayes. Likewise, on a trip to Boston, he had had friendly chats with the great New England writers: Henry W. Longfellow, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Phillip Brooks and Louisa Alcott. And to these may be added an extremely close association with the great Henry Ward Beecher.

By what great fountains of inspiration was young Edward Bok influenced!

In one respect, however, this boy's education was completely neglected and that was in the field of music. Apparently his home life and early training brought him not at all any understanding of this wonderful art and as he grew to manhood he became very much aware of this misfortune.

He realized then the tremendous influence it had in the cultural life of many so in 1889 when he became editor of the Ladies Home Journal one of his policies was to foster music in every possible way. This magazine introduced many new compositions by eminent writers, among them being Richard Strauss, Paderewski, Moskowski, Josef Hofmann, John Philip Sousa and De Koven. Special articles too by leading critics of Boston, Chicago and New York were included, as well as piano lessons by Hofmann and voice by Madam Marchesi.

Meeting Changed Orchestra's Future

And through Josef Hofmann this musically-untrained journalistic editor met Leopold Stokowski the then recently appointed conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, a meeting which, strange to say, most likely changed the entire future of that famous orchestra which is to visit Milwaukee next Thursday.

First of all, Mr. Bok was made aware of the power of symphonic music by attending the concerts following this introduction to Stokowski; and this in turn, in 1913, led to his accepting a place on the board of directors.

In studying the financial sheet of this musical organization he was surprised to find wealthy deficits and at first attributed this to faulty management. On a more careful investigation, however, this newly appointed director found that no great orchestra, in the nature of things, could be self-sustaining.

Furthermore, he found that this annual deficit which amounted to thousands of dollars was covered by a small group of faithful guarantors, while the Boston Symphony and the New York ~~Philharmonic~~ had their deficits met by one individual in each case.

Thought Both Systems Wrong

Neither system did Mr. Bok approve. In the first instance, it made the orchestra a too exclusive an organization with the general public hardly considered; and, in the second, the whole existence of this symphonic body was dependent on the continued interest of one man, which was even worse.

Mr. Bok's solution of the financial difficulties of the Philadelphia orchestra was a novel one—and one that was made at considerable cost to himself. While this solution is lightly touched upon in the "Autobiography" in a chapter headed, "A Bewildered Bok," the story is told in detail in Frances Anne Wister's "Twenty-five Years of the Philadelphia Orchestra."

Miss Wister stresses how difficult at the time it was becoming to secure an adequate guarantee fund, and how hopeless it appeared to solicit both a permanent fund and beg enough to meet current deficits.

It was then in 1916 that a very civic minded "Unknown Donor"—in 1920 found to be Edward Bok—came to the rescue with an exceedingly generous offer to pay all deficits for the next five years if an endowment fund of $100,000 annually for five years would be created. This amount was quickly subscribed by the enthusiastic citizens of Philadelphia and extended, in fact, to seven years making a total of close to $800,000. This was the first battle won under the leadership and inspiration of a newly converted but far-seeing and practical-minded disciple of the arts.

Million Dollar Fund Is Raised

Then again during the World war, when costs were higher, the musical standards again were in jeopardy and came another call to arms. In this instance, with Bok as chairman, Philadelphians raised the magnificent sum of over one million dollars! This, with the previous $800,000 has given the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra an endowment which is likely to be sufficient for all times.

The creating of it I consider one of the most thrilling of all events in musical annals, and is a perfect example of what can be accomplished when a whole community under competent and sacrificing leadership is aroused to combine in a worthy cause.

Some day Milwaukee will need an Edward Bok.

TODAY'S THEME.

The subordinate theme of Brahms "First"—first movement—is given by the oboe, richly supported by full orchestra. Not the similarity between this and the Basic Motive, that important phase which opens the symphony. Brahms completed this masterful work in 1876.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 1 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS SIBELIUS

"The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen" Here for First Time.

BOSTON, Dec. 31 (AP)—An American audience today heard for the first time two early choral-sym-

---

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 1 - 1938

Festival, Museum Op

30,000 at Tanglewood Offer Added Impetus To Plans for Future

Fund for Permanent Building for Symphonic Series Grows—Crane Memorial Addition to Museum Increases Interest, Facilities—"Many Mansions" Premiere High Lights Theatrical Season

Berkshire's cultural year, rising as always to its peak during the summer months, was featured by two events of outstanding significance in the history of the county.

Festival at Peak

The fourth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival, held for the first time at its new home at Tanglewood and lengthening its program from three concerts to six over two week-ends, definitely established itself as a musical institution of national importance.

Less spectacular, perhaps, but of equal significance in the cultural history of the county, was the formal opening of the addition to the Berkshire Museum given by Mrs. Samuel G. Colt and the late Z. Marshall Crane in honor of their mother, Ellen Crane.

These two "firsts" were memorable in a year which saw the successful continuance and development of the county's broad program of musical, artistic, literary and theatrical events. Established programs, both winter and summer, either gained or held their own in popularity, attendance and receipts.

MUSIC

Of first importance in the county's 1937 musical history was, of course, the Festival. Acquiring geographical permanence after three seasons in which the locale changed twice, this precocious addition to the Berkshire calendar of events proceeded in its fourth year to convince the musical world that it represents an historic step in popularizing fine music in America. In the perfect setting of wooded Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate on Stockbridge Bowl given by Mrs. Gorham Brooks, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave six concerts covering two week-ends in August. A total attendance of approximately 30,000 magnificently vindicated the decision to expand the three-concert schedule of the previous seasons.

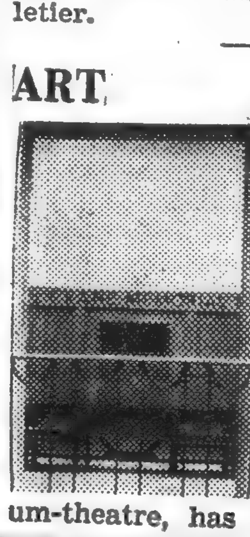
Out of the unqualified success of the 1937 series, augmented by poignant memories of thundering rain on the huge tent, came the decision to campaign actively for funds with which to provide a permanent building for the Festival. The year's end finds more than $80,000 of the desired $100,000 subscribed, and plans moving ahead toward erection of the shed before the 1938 concerts.

Old Events Continue

The summer chamber music season continued its quietly succesful way, with Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge's Temple on South Mountain and Jacques Gordon at Falls Village conducting their regular Sunday afternoon concerts. Duets replaced trios at the Music Box at Cummington. Among the solo summer visits was that of Marjorie Edwards, young violinist, to Stockbridge.

The winter season, consisting for purposes of this review of the last part of last season and the beginning of this one, brought Jose Iturbi, Lotte Lehmann, the Vienna Choir Boys and Josef Hofmann under the Community Concerts banner. The Berkshire Musical Association gave a miscellaneous program for its spring series, while the local field was excellently represented at the beginning of this season by the Stanley Club Junior Orchestra under Alphonse Pelletier.

ART



If not with complete accuracy the reopening of the Berkshire Museum nevertheless falls most easily into the art category. The beautiful memorial addition featured by the Ellen Crane Memorial Room and the auditorium-theatre, has already extended its usefulness into a variety of cultural fields. The opening, however, was marked particularly by a landscape exhibition which brought together in one spot more masterpieces than had ever before been available to Berkshire art lovers. The Memorial Room provides one of the most impressive backgrounds for the exhibition of art works to be found in Western Massachusetts and its presence has already attracted outstanding exhibitions, both local and imported.

The completion of the addition brought one major change in the established summer art schedule—the shifting of the annual Stockbridge Art Exhibition to Pittsfield. The success of this change, together with a rearranging of the dates to coincide with the Festival, was unfortunately none too brilliant. The move northward apparently cut down the number of south county visitors, while Pittsfield residents stayed away in large numbers. It is probable that the show will return to its former stamping ground in the Berkshire Playhouse next summer.

Succession of Shows

Starting with the landscape and Stockbridge Art Association shows, the Museum housed a succession of annual and new exhibitions. In the former category was the Pittsfield Art League, which this year successfully inaugurated a new policy of inviting a number of non-league, out-of-town artists to participate. This was followed by a number of other shows worth recording, among them one of the work by the pupils in the Pittsfield Schools; another of paintings by children in New York City WPA classes; and two one-man shows by Robert Talcott Francis and Augustus Vincent Tack. There were also a number of art lectures in the auditorium, including visits by Professor Karl Weston of Williams College and Stefan Hirsch, head of the Bennington College art department. Stuart C. Henry, curator of the Museum art department, gave two lectures based on the reproductions of famous paintings being offered for sale by The Eagle.

THEATRE

The Berkshire Playhouse at Stockbridge continued to hold its place as the top-ranking theatrical event of the year. Under the direction of William Miles, the summer theatre increased its schedule to 10 plays for the first time since 1932. Undoubted highlight of the season was the premiere of "Many Mansions," by Eckert and Jules Goodman, with Alexander Kirkland and Flora Campbell in the leading roles. After hanging up a seasonal record in

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 5 - 1938

Koussevitzky Is Dazzling In Sibelius

Boston Symphony Burnishes Brilliantly Trio of Shorter Works by Finnish Composer

Conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its second appearance of the season here, in the third of the Bushnell Memorial concerts, Tuesday night. The program:

Pavanne For a Dead Infanta	Ravel
Symphony No. 3 in F Major	Brahms
Pohjola's Daughter	Sibelius
The Swan of Tuonela	Sibelius
Finlandia	Sibelius

Dr. Koussevitzky dearly loves Sibelius, likewise he dearly loves his extraordinary orchestra. And when the three virtuosities are in conjunction, as they were last night, there is no doubting but that you've got something there.

Out of an alarming prospect—Sibelius's dog-eared Introduction to Northern Mythology—Dr. Koussevitzky brought an incredible performance. With all due respect to Sibelius's Symphonies, as well as to the sheer writing of last night's legends, there is reason to suspect that "Finlandia," "Pohjola" and "The Swan" are in reality but glamour music for a waxworks museum of Finnish gods and heroes. However that may be, they are definitely the kind of writing that can be burnished to dazzling degree by virtuoso orchestral playing, and they were fabulously polished off by Dr. Koussevitzky and his men last evening. We well know with what gusto and patent pleasure he sends his orchestra steeplechasing over the most terrifying technical complexities, and we know too that prideful beaming smile of his when to a man they surmount all obstacles, poised, perfect, and triumphant. His confidence and pride have seldom been better served than in last evening's Sibelius. The audience's ovation completely corroborates this.

Wondrous Swan Song.

"The Swan of Tuonela" never recited its sad lament with more unstopped grief and melancholy than it did upon the tones of Mr. Speyer's cor anglais. That plaint which has risen upon midsummer nights from our city park orchestras to the deriding shrilling of roller-skating children, took on a new-found beauty. While the soloist took his three bows from a clamoring audience, Dr. Koussevitzky stood with parental tenderness in the background, smiling more. It was an evening of miraculous horns altogether, for in the "Pohjola" there was some stunning work by this choir, as well as by the 'celli and the woodwinds. Even "Finlandia," that fearsome bit of super-Sousa, came off with recovered luster. It simply goes to show that under the master hand and the master orchestra, things are never as bad as they may seem in prospect.

In view of all this, it seems a bit anti-climactic to speak of the Brahms Third Symphony, in reality the major offering of the evening, but not so glowing a performance as Dr. Koussevitzky can give to this composer. In Stockbridge this summer, his presentation of Brahms were overwhelmingly incandescent, in color and in temper. They were possessed of a luxurious rhapsodizing which the F Major lacked.

Brahms—In Part.

Perhaps it requires a special setting to establish vividly and intensely the peculiar messages of Brahms—the stifling summer heat, the festive tempered crowd, the shirt-sleeved orchestral effort. Some maintain there can be no Brahms without a setting. Be that as it may, the opening movement last night did not speak so eloquently as one [illegible] hoped especially from Dr. [illegible]evitzky, nor did the final sec[illegible] which seemed to close weakly and too unexpectedly. The middle two sections were more glowing, the andante in particular presenting a moving mysterious landscape with sudden dazzling mirages. But all in all, Brahms has had more superlative an interpretation and performance from this orchestra than it gave last evening.

In place of the programed Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 by Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky paid tribute to Ravel who died last week, with that [illegible]mposer's "Pavanne." It was not [illegible] first time a composer's own [illegible] has served as his marche [illegible]e. While it was a finely sub[illegible] interpretation and not without poetry, like the Brahms, perhaps it might have more inner warmth and inspiration.

128

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 1 - 1938

Missing Symphony Manuscript Radioed Across Sea to Players

Parts Arrive in Time for Boston Orchestra to Present Two Early Works of Finnish Composer on Schedule; Lost En Route from Germany

Boston, Dec. 31.—(AP)—An American audience today heard for the first time two early choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete, "The Origin of Fire," for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra—was written in 1920 soon after his second symphony.

The second Sibelius work, new to this country, was "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, which was warmly received by the capacity audience.

Rugged, and at times exciting, "The Origin of Fire" was sung with brilliance by the Helsinki (Helsingfors) University Chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed Nov. 18. Fourteen pages of copies manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin and the facsimilies enlarged here in time for today's performance.

Serge Koussevitzky, who directed, used the choral score which provided the instrumental cues.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JAN 1 - 1938

Boston Applauds 2 Sibelius Works In U. S. Premiere

Boston, Jan. 1.—(AP)—An American audience yesterday heard for the first time two early choral-symphonic works of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, missing parts for one of which were radioed across the Atlantic to enable the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform it on schedule.

The one that arrived incomplete, "The Origin of Fire," for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra—was written in 1920 soon after his second symphony. The second Sibelius work, new to this country, was "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chórus and orchestra, which was warmly received by the capacity audience.

"The Origin of Fire" was sung by the Helsinski (Helsingfors) University Chorus, which opened an American tour with this appearance. An early baritone solo sung by Helge Virkkunen tells of the disappearance of light and how Ukko, lord of the gods, traversed heaven and earth in search of it.

The original manuscript of the score disappeared, along with parts for viola, cello and bass viol, while en route here from Leipzig, Germany, where it was mailed November 18. Fourteen pages of manuscript were transmitted by radio from Berlin and the facsimiles enlarged here in time for today's performance.

Serge Koussevitzky, who directed, used the choral score which provided the instrumental cues.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER - PRESS

JAN 2 - 193

TODAY'S POPULAR CONCERT by the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra in Northrop auditorium at the University of Minnesota, with Daniele Amfitheatrof, associate conductor, on the stand, will be given at the unusual hour of 5:15 P. M., to accommodate arrangements for a radio broadcast to follow immediately. Those attending the first program will be privileged to remain for the broadcast, but there will be no admission to the latter alone.

This will be Mr. Amfitheatrof's last appearance with the orchestra before his journey eastward to fulfill an engagement as guest-director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Later in the season, it is reported, he will return to Minneapolis. Today's programs are arranged as follows:

1. Overture to "The Secret of Susanne" .... Wolf-Ferrari
2. Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian") .... Mendelssohn
   Alegro Vivace
   Andante con moto
   Con moto moderate
   Saltarello (Presto)
3. Polovetsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .. .. Borodin

Program for radio broadcast:

1. March, "Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
2. Valse Triste (Kuolema) .... Sibelius
3. Pacific 231, a symphonic Movement" .... Honeggr
4. Overture to Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 2 - 1938

Forum Hears Bostonians

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its only appearance of the season here with a concert on Wednesday evening in the Academy of Music, for the members of the Philadelphia Forum.

The program is headed by the Symphony No. 1 in C minor by Johannes Brahms, which will occupy the second half of the concert. The first half will be devoted to the Symphony No. 88 in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 13) by Franz Josef Haydn, and Prokofieff's orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Bije," Opus 60. The suite comprises five movements—the Birth of Kije, Romance, Kije's Wedding, Troika and the Burial of Kije.

This will be the third successive season that the Forum has sponsored the appearance of the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitky directing. It will be the first of two concerts by visiting orchestras which Forum members will hear this year. The Cleveland Orchestra, with Dr. Artur Rodzinski conducting, is scheduled to give its first Philadelphia concert on March 24.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 3 - 1938

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
(Boston Globe)

With a minimum of fuss ground has been broken for what is sure to be an important addition to the attractiveness of New England as a cultural recreational center. The projected "music shed" that is to shelter 5000 auditors at the August concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been begun at Tanglewood, the beautiful estate given as the permanent home for this festival.

The structure between Lenox and Stockbridge will add to the distinction already gained by the Berkshires as a wonderful summer resort. Already the festival has made a name for itself among music lovers far and wide. As the years pass a steadily increasing patronage may be expected. It may be that an even larger building will be required in the not too distant future, but those responsible for the beginning deserve congratulations now for what they are accomplishing both for music in America and for New England.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Program Tuesday To Feature Compositions by Sibelius

Three of the most beautiful of the compositions of Sibelius are included in the program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening of this week. They are "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia."

The symphony on this program is the Brahms Third, a work that has not previously been played in the Bushnell Concert Series. This concert is the third event of the current series.

Sibelius, the son of a medical officer in the Finnish army, was born at Tavastehus, Finland, December 8, 1865; he now lives at Jarvenpaa He was left an orphan at an early age, and was educated by his grandparents, who intended for him a classical training with the ultimate aim of the boy becoming a lawyer. Even as a child, however, Sibelius, according to a biographical note by Charles O'Connell, determined to become a musician, and though he obediently went to school and later to the University of Helsingfors, from which he was graduated, he began, immediately he was his own master, to study the violin. But from boyhood he had, informally but intensely, studied music, and was in some degree prepared for the strenuous work which he now began.

Goes To Berlin.

In 1889 Sibelius left Finland for Berlin, to study composition; two years later, he went to Vienna, where he was a pupil of Karl Goldmark. He remembers that the first performance of any of his works was given at Helsingfors, in 1887; it was a series of variations for string quartet.

The composer soon developed a highly individual style, founded, it is true, upon the music of the classical masters, yet so informed with Sibelius' own unique spirit and character as to seem very far removed from the compositions of the nineteenth century. His is a music which, fortunately, cannot be at once assimilated; yet even regarded superficially, it has a strange charm which deepens to fascination the more the music is heard. Sibelius' music has been the dubious beneficiary of a powerful propaganda, both in America and England. This has brought about more frequent playing of his works, but has also aroused the scepticism of a considerable section of the discriminating public—a scepticism, let it be added hastily, which is only in rare instances justified. He has suffered, too, from quasi-authoritative interpretations by completely unskilled and inferior conductors, both in Europe and America—a circumstance which contributes little to the impression his enthusiastic but misguided propagandists seek to create for his music.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 3 - 1938

Ravel Work To Be Played As Memorial

Boston Symphony Lists 'Pavane for a Dead Infanta'

As a memorial to Maurice Ravel, who died last week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the famous French composer's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" in its concert at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow evening.

It is recalled that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, has consistently been one of the most enthusiastic interpreters of Ravel's music. Among the compositions which Koussevitzky has helped to make famous in America are "Bolero" and the brilliant "Daphnis et Chloe" suite.

The Third Symphony of Brahms in F major will complete the first part of the program. The second portion will be devoted to the music of Jean Sibelius, the great Finnish composer. It will consist of the tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter", "The Swan of Tuonela" and the symphonic poem "Finlandia".

The Bach Brandenburg Concerto previously announced has been dropped to make place for the Ravel number.

"Pavane pour une Infanta Defunte" was composed by Ravel as a piece for piano in 1899. In 1910 he set the work for orchestra.

The title of this work suggests to John N. Burk, of the Boston Symphony, "an elegy for a princess in the old courtly Spain where this dance was much cultivated in its time. The pavane, known in England as 'pavan' or 'pavin', was a grave and ceremonious dance of the 16th and 17th centuries. It was often followed by a lively galliard, a succession which was later supplanted in instrumental suites by the saraband and the gigue."

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE - DEMOCRAT

JAN 2 - 1938

TRANSATLANTIC

A treat for Boston music lovers had been planned when the Boston Symphony Orchestra included on its Friday program an opus from the pen of a Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, called "Origin of Fire." The orchestration was mailed from Leipzig, Germany, on November 18 by the publishers. One package containing parts for the cello, viola and bass viol, together with what is believed to be the composer's original manuscript, vanished en route.

Tuesday, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky decided the performance could be given satisfactorily if the choral score of the missing parts could be obtained, since it contained the cues. So the missing parts were received in Boston by train from New York—after pictures of them had reached the latter metropolis from Europe via radio.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 4 - 1938

Ravel Number On Program At Bushnell Tonight

Boston Orchestra to Play 'Pavane for a Dead Infanta'

In honor of Maurice Ravel, Dr Serge Koussevitzky has changed the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Bushnell Memorial tonight so that the Bach concerto previously announced as the opening number will be replaced by Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta." The Third Symphony of Brahms in F major will complete the first part of the program. The second portion will be devoted to the music of Jean Sibelius, the great Finnish composer. It will consist of the tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Swan of Tuonela," and the symphonic poem "Finlandia." "Pohjola's Daughter" and "The Swan of Tuonela" were both inspired by episodes from the "Kalevala," the mythological saga in verse which tells of Finland's origins, and early Gods and heroes.

Of the famous French composer, Olin Downes writes in his "Symphonic Broadcasts":

"Ravel is the smallest and the most debonair individual I ever saw. One day I lunched with him in a Paris Garden. In a newspaper article that I wrote, commemorating that repast, I had a word that pleased a reader. I wrote that a hummingbird would have been maladroit by the side of him. This small and astute man looks like a miniature of an eighteenth-century aristocrat or savant. Ravel should have worn knee-breeches and ruffles and frills. I have been told that each room of his house outside Paris is decorated in baroque style, and that he raises curious vegetables of an appearance that is leprous. His physique may be to him a secret bitterness. It surely imposes a series of what the psychoanalysts call 'defences.' Are not these defenses also in Ravel's music? Among them are a rapier wit, a marvellous lightness and precision. Thus would a gallant aristocrat have played his rapier against the revolutionary mob in the streets of Paris, and smiled as, his back to the wall, he pinked an assailant. Personally I find in much of Ravel's music more style than substance—intentionally more style than substance, as one who would make a trifle of emotions and catastrophes, and say, 'Let us amuse ourselves.' This music is not and is Ravel: is not Ravel because it carefully conceals the real man; it is Ravel because the reality of the man is his masque."

SOMERVILLE, N. J.
Semi-Weekly Messenger

JAN 7 - 1938

Negro Contralto Will Sing Tonight

NEW BRUNSWICK — Marian Anderson, famous Negro contralto, will be the artist at the third concert of the current services at Rutgers University this evening. The performance will begin at 8:30 in the Rutgers Gymnasium here.

Acknowledged by critics as "one of the greatest singers of our time," Miss Anderson has met with remarkable success in almost every music center of the world. Three sold-out Carnegie Hall recitals in one season attest to her popularity in this country.

Explaining this success, Olin Downes, American critic, describes Miss Anderson's voice as "a contralto of stunning range and volume, managed with suppleness and grace." Praise of her voice and personality comes from Russia, Spain, Scandanavia, Vienna, Egypt and Palestine.

Miss Anderson's career started in a church choir in her native Philadelphia, where she sang as a child. Her vocal training began with a Negro teacher and later she became a pupil of the well-known Guisseppe Boghotti.

Tonight's concert will be one of the first appearances of her third transcontinental tour of the United States, which began this week in Boston.

The other concerts in the Rutgers series for this season will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 8, and a string trio of Albert Spalding violinist; Harold Bauer, pianist, and Gaspar Cassado, 'cellist, who will appear in the gymnasium February 21.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 7

Brooklyn Society Hears Concert Tonight

A new score introduced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in this country during the current season will be a feature tonight of the second Brooklyn concert of the 1937-38 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin will be the hostess in the box of the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. The series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra now in its fifty-second season in Brooklyn is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee.

Other boxholders will be Col. Fay W. Brabson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. James Maclay and Miss Mary E. Mills.

The new score is an orchestral suite by Prokofieff, as drawn from the incidental music to the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije." The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character—the movements describing the "Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika" and "Burial of Kije." The Lieutenant was an imaginary figure, springing from a misunderstood remark made by a military aid to the Czar. The obsequious courtier, fearful of pointing out to the Czar the mistake he had made, invents an officer by that name.

129

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 7 - 1938

Screen Notes

Many to Entertain at Concert; Edwin L. Garvins to Give Dinner Before Boston Symphony Event

Former Federal Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin will entertain at dinner to-night at their home, No. 1 Grace court, preceding the season's second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Mrs. Garvin will be hostess in the box of the sponsoring committee.

The guests of Judge and Mrs. Garvin will be Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. William H. Good, William M. Parke and Mr. and Mrs. Butler Graham of Manhattan.

Another dinner will be given by Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson at their home, No. 135 Eastern parkway. Later in the evening the party will occupy the box of the hosts at the concert. The guests will include Justice and Mrs. Albert Conway, Mr. and Mrs. John Stillwell and Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Conroy.

Colonel Fay W. Brabson, commanding officer of Fort Hamilton, and Mrs. Brabson will have as their box guests Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs. Floyd Carlock, Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs. H. W. Jones, and Major and G. W. Lester.

Box guests of Mrs. Benjamin Prince will be Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff, and Theodore Fitch, director of the Brooklyn Music School Settlement.

In the box of the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy will be Miss Adeline Pettit, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Scott, and Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart.

Other boxholders for the concert are Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives.

Prokofieff's orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kije" to be played for the first time in this country will be a feature of the program, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Other works to be played are Beethoven's Third Symphony in E-flat major, ("Eroica") and the tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" of Richard Strauss.

The fifty-second annual series of five concerts is being given here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Brooklyn Committee headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, with Mrs Henry J. Davenport as acting chairman and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R Huntington Woodman is chairman

CONCERT HOSTESS

Wide World Photo.

Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, who will be hostess in the committee box to-night at the Boston Symphony concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will give a dinner earlier in the evening at her home, No. 1 Grace court.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 6 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra At Academy Tomorrow Night

For his second Brooklyn concert of the season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a well-rounded and representative program, for which he has become famous. The concert, to be held in the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8:30 o'clock, opens with Beethoven's Third Symphony in E-flat major, "Eroica."

Following the Beethoven Symphony, a new score will be played, introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky in this country during the current season. It is the Orchestral Suite by Prokofieff, as drawn from the incidental music to the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije."

The concert oloses with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulensuiegel's Merry Pranks," which si subtitled "After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner."

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in their fifty-second season, are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and a Brooklyn committee, headed by Adrian Van Sinderen.

Dr. Koussevitzky will devote half of his third Brooklyn concert on Thursday evening, Feb. 10, to the memory of the late Maurice Revel, great French composer who died recently.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 7 - 1938

Boston Symphony Plays At the Academy Tonight

For his second Brooklyn concert of the season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a well-rounded and representative program. The concert, to be held in the Brooklyn Academy of Music this evening at 8:30 o'clock, opens with Beethoven's Third Symphony in E flat major, "Eroica." Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score has been acclaimed for its majestic sweep and fullness of orchestral color.

Following the Beethoven symphony, a new score will be played, introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky in this country during the current season. It is the Orchestral Suite by Prokofieff, as drawn from the incidental music to the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije." The film, and consequently the music, is light and satirical in character—the movements describing the "Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika" and "Burial of Kije." The lieutenant was an imaginary figure, springing from a misunderstood remark made by a military aide to the Czar. The obsequious courtier, fearful of pointing out to the Czar the mistake he had made, invents an officer by that name.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert closes with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which is subtitled "After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner."

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in their 52d season, are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and a Brooklyn committee headed by Adrian Van Sinderen.

Word has been received that Dr. Koussevitzky will devote half of his third Brooklyn concert on Thursday, Feb. 10, to the memory of the late Maurice Ravel, great French composer who died recently. In November, 1937, it will be remembered, Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Ravel's Piano Concerto for the left hand to a Metropolitan audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, with Jacques Fevrier, French pianist and friend of Maurice Ravel, as guest soloist. The itemized program for the Brooklyn concert on Feb. 10 will be announced late this month.

PRESS

JAN 7 - 1938

MARIAN ANDERSON APPEARS IN CONCERT AT RUTGERS TONIGHT

Marian Anderson, famous Negro contralto, will be the artist at the third concert of the current series at Rutgers University this evening. The performance will begin at 8:30 in the Rutgers Gymnasium in New Brunswick.

Acknowledged by critics as "one of the greatest singers of our time," Miss Anderson has met with remarkable success in almost every music center of the world. Three sold-out Carnegie Hall recitals in one season attest to her popularity in this country.

Explaining this success, Olin Downes, a leading American critic, describes Miss Anderson's voice as "a contralto of stunning range and volume, managed with suppleness and grace." Praise of her voice and personality comes from Russia, Vienna, Spain, Scandanavia, Egypt and Palestine.

Miss Anderson's career started in a church choir in her native Philadelphia where she sang as a child. Her vocal training began with a Negro teacher and later she became a pupil of the well known Guisseppe Boghetti.

Her musical education was financed from the proceeds of benefit concerts and from contributions by music-lovers of her own race. After further education, Miss Anderson appeared in Paris where she was well received and urged to make a continental tour.

The New Brunswick concert will be one of the first appearances of her third transcontinental tour of the United States, which began this week in Boston.

The other concerts in the Rutgers series for this season will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 8th and a string trio of Albert Spalding, violinist, Harold Bauer, pianist and Gasper Cassado, 'cellist, who will appear in the gymnasium on February 21st.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

IAN 7 - 1938

Wire-Photo Aids Debut Of Chorus

By GRENA BENNETT.

An unusual circumstance saved the day (or the evening) for the Boston Symphony Orchestra program which was presented last night in Carnegie Hall. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky had planned the American debut, some days ago, of the Helsinki University Male Chorus of Finland in a group of new compositions by the Finnish composer, Sibelius.

The singers arrived but part of the choral score of the novelty, "Ukko, the Fire Maker" had disappeared in transit. Frantic messages were flashed by wireless to Berlin and Leipsig music publishers, and, profiting by a modern miracle, the score was transmitted photographically to this country and "the show went on."

The program last night began with Bach's G major Brandenbury Concerto which was followed by Brahm's Third Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's genius for interpretation and guiding directions set forth the sheer beauty and emotional eloquence of the symphony, beguiling the ears and the imagination of the audience. One may state in all seriousness and honesty that only rarely has that work been performed with the smooth well-co-ordinated musicianship and genuine sincerety that was realized last evening.

The Sibelius group consisted of the Symphonic Fantasia "Pohjola's Daughter;" "The Captive Queen" and "The Origin of Fire," the last two numbers for Chorus and Orchestra. Unfortunately the program-maker placed these novelties at the end of the list, necessitating their presentation too late to be included in this review.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 7 - 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Finnish Chorus Is Heard With Boston Symphony

Mr. Koussevitzky Introduces Sibelius' "Captive Queen" and "Origin of Fire"

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

The visit of the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night brought with it the first appearance of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland in some choral works of Sibelius never before heard in New York, and pickets who walked Fifty-seventh Street bearing placards which called attention to the non-union character of the famous orchestra. Inside, the hall was jammed with admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky and his band, and no doubt of the works of the Finnish Beethoven. The eminent conductor, sartorially perfect, was rapturously applauded throughout the evening, and the visiting male choristers from Finland came in for a good share of the pervading enthusiasm. Since Finland is our only debtor nation that comes across with regular payments the advent of the Helsinkis was doubly welcome.

One of our leading exponents of the works of Sibelius Dr. Koussevitzky this time stole a march on fellow exponents by importing the master's "The Captive Queen" a ballad for chorus and orchestra, Op. 48. and a piece called "The Origin of Fire," for baritone, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 32. The text of the former was supplied by Paavo Cajander, a popular Finn poet, that of the latter by the "Kalevala," the great Finnish saga. "The Captive Queen" is a thinly disguised patriotic lament for Finland under the foreign yoke, though its heroine is a medieval lady who is oppressed by an insensitive tyrant. It is melodious stuff, both for chorus and orchestra, conceived in the early style of the Sibelius of "Finlandia." "The Origin of Fire," which is even earlier Sibelius, tells the story of the legendary Louhi who seized both moon and sun and hid them away, thereby plunging the land in darkness, and of Ukko, the Lord of the Gods, who sought to restore the purloined light. Both compositions are tuneful and forceful, but not very distinguished, so that lovers of Sibelius will hardly claim them as additions to the known masterpieces of their idol. The new Finnish chorus sang in them lustily and with precision, and in "The Origin of Fire" Mr. Helge Virkkunen, a stalwart and stentorian baritone, sang away with a good deal of conviction.

The choral works were preceded by the more familiar "Pohjola's Daughter," a trite orchestral narrative, and this in turn was preceded by Brahm's Third Symphony. The orchestra played everything magnificently, but I found, much to my surprise, that Dr. Koussevitzky's Brahms failed to stir me as it did the rest of the huge assembly. The "Andante," in fact, taken "Adagio," was so gentle and lifeless that it induced a state between waking and dreaming, and for all one knows to the contrary that was Brahms' very intention.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS

Finns to Sing At Chicago

Traditional music of Finland will make its Mid-western debut in a concert to be presented by the Helsinki university chorus of Helsinki, Finland, in Chicago, Sunday, Jan. 23, at 3 p. m. The concert will be held in Orchestra hall.

Composed of a group of 69 student singers, the chorus made its American debut in joint concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston and New York. There the chorus gave America her first presentation of Jean Sibelius' composition, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen." The performances will be repeated in the Chicago concert.

William Henrics, 2702 N. Twenty-sixth st., is in charge of reservations here.

PASADENA, CAL.
STAR - NEWS

JAN 8 - 1938

Bookman's Notebook

HENRY TAYOR PARKER, drama and music critic of the Boston

Henry Taylor Parker, drama and music critic of the Boston Evening Transcript for many years, was famed also for the program notes he wrote for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addi[illegible]his he edited two pages of material for the Transcript's weekly magazine section. How he found time to keep up with his reading and to attend to a large correspondence his friends never knew.

Parker always signed his critical reviews "H. T. P.", and many Transcript readers probably never knew his name until he died three years ago and an entire page was given over to an account of his life and to tributes from writers, musicians, playwrights, actors and critics who had known him.

He did most of his writing late at night during the winter months. After the concerts and plays were over, he would walk a good three miles to his office, shut himself up in what was called by the staff "Parker's cubby-hole," and turn out his copy in longhand, for he never learned to operate a typewriter. His penmanship was such that only two or three of the linotype operators upstairs could read it, and then sometimes even those experts in the art of decoding and decyphering, when they came to French, German and Italian titles and words which Parker sprinkled liberally in his reviews, couldn't tell a "u" from an "n", or a "g" from a "p" or a "t" from an "f."

WHEN his nightly stint was done Parker would take his copy to the composing room and "hook" it for the man who was to put it in type, and then betake himself to his bachelor's apartment at the Hotel Vendome. At 10:30 or 11 o'clock in the morning, an office boy would arrive with the proofs, and Parker, sitting up in bed, would correct them. Some of his marginal notes "ringed" only for the benefit of the typesetters became classic comments. Foreign words which were really only scrawls on the copy would be misspelled in type. Parker would correct them, and then write a scolding comment on the margin of the proof. One of the most celebrated was: "What in hell is the matter? Isn't there anybody down there who understands English?"

Although he was kind and friendly with everyone in the composing room, he would sputter and fume whenever typographical errors crept into his columns after he had made the corrections. "H. T. P." stood for music and drama criticism in New England, but a composing-room wag said he was sure the initials meant "Hell-to-Pay." As in most such cases, the sobriquet stuck, and whenever Parker popped into the composing room to make some last-minute correction, deletion or addition, someone would whisper, "Here come Old Hell-to-Pay. Someone must have got one of those Hungarian rhapsodies crossed with an Italian fugue."

HOW many million words Parker wrote in his lifetime will never be known; but a friend of his once calculated that in 30 years he wrote the equivalent of 300 full-length novels.

The memory of this noted critic has been enshrined by David McCord in a brochure entitled "H. T. P.: Portrait of a Critic" (Coward-McCann). In a vivid sentence Mr. McCord evokes the figure of Parker at the Symphony: "His seats are in the front row of the first balcony, just to the right and above the orchestra, where he perches, a small and bitter gargoyle above the Brahmin Sea." Brief as it is, the pamphlet is a warm and glowing tribute to a man who left his impress on musical New England.

130

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 7 - 1938

Chorus Assists Bostonians

Helsinki University Singers Join With Orchestra in Sibelius Works.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

A new Boston-Helsinki axis was traced large upon the map of music in Carnegie Hall last night, but not without bringing in Tavastehus, the birthplace of Jean Sibelius. Just what may be the Finnish capital's equivalent for Back Bay can be left to globe-trotters to determine, but its Harvard made itself known through the sixty stalwart sons who strode out on the platform to sing music by their country's foremost composer.

Soon to give their own concert in Carnegie Hall under their own conductor, Martti Turunen, the Helsinki University Chorus made its first appearance in New York on this occasion with the Boston Symphony, thereby enabling ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky to perform for the first time here "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra which Sibelius composed some thirty-odd years ago. Also announced as a "first time," though mistakenly so, was "The Origin of Fire," in which the chorus again participated, with Helge Virkunen singing the part for solo baritone. New York's first experience with this work, a product of 1902, must be credited to the enterprise of the Schola Cantorum, which presented "The Origin of Fire" at a January concert seven years ago.

Besides the two choral compositions, Mr. Koussevitzky's program included "Pohjola's Daughter," so that the entire second part of the concert was given over to an exposition of scores by the Finnish master. Before the intermission came Bach and Brahms, the one speaking in the hearty and virile voice of the G major Brandenburg concerto, the other in the Jovian accents of his third symphony. The cumulative effect of the program was unmistakably that of momentous music, and in this the university singers from Helsinki played a substantial part.

The Boston string players went expertly about the business of giving the Bach work a thewy and even a burly performance. The spirit of the playing was rather more stimulating than was the quality of the sound, which had in some measure the roughness of its muscularity. But it was playing brilliantly co-ordinated and propulsively led.

Eventually, every devotee of the Brahms symphonies wearies of even his own hairsplittings over tempi, while remaining convinced that the only right pace is the one a conductor scrupulously avoids. If there were reservations on this score last night, particularly with regard to the two middle movements, they were secondary ones. Though it was possible to wish for a tonal quality less persistently bright and aggressive, the performance was one of sweep and conviction.

"Pohjola's Daughter" is not a work to challenge the Sibelius symphonies in the import of its ideas, but the beauty of its scoring makes an effect when such skill and affection are lavished upon it as was true in this instance. The two choral works, which came into being when the upsurgence of Finnish national feeling exerted its strongest influence on Sibelius, are of sturdier fiber, but more conventional in style. Though the choral writing gives to "The Captive Queen" its heroic basic character, the orchestration proffers many felicities to catch the ear. The flute has enchanting figurations; there is some fine singing by the cellos. In this work and in "The Origin of Fire," which builds up something of drama as the flame of the Finnish gods goes hurtling through the "six spangled vaults of heaven," the collaboration of the orchestra and chorus was of the most conspicuous unity and balance.

The Helsinki singers, relying, of course, on their native tongue, produced a body of tone at once solid and sonorous, with attacks that were razor-edged and vital with the exuberance of youth. The mass quality was rich, if on the thickish side, and unmistakably North Europe in its suggestion. These young men plainly had been diligently prepared, and so far as the opportunity permitted they justified the good words said of them in advance of their coming. As an organization they really should be addressed as Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat. They don't mind being called just Y. L.

A half-century of activity, carried on with an annual turnover in the student personnel, lay behind last night's admirable singing. Besides shaking hands with individual members of the choir, Dr. Koussevitzky summoned Mr. Turunen from the wings to share the bows. Applause was plentiful also for the baritone soloist, whose part in "The Origin of Fire" was ably sung.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

JAN 14 1938

PRINCETON CONCERT SERIES OPENS WITH FINNISH SINGERS

PRINCETON, Jan. 14. — The Helsinki University Chorus of Finland will inaugurate the second annual concert series sponsored by the Princeton University Glee Club with a concert in McCarter Theatre here tomorrow night at 8:30.

The "Ylippilaskunnan Laulajat," or "YL", as the chorus is known in its own country, has already given concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in Montreal and Toronto, and has earned the unqualified praise of music critics everywhere. It has held a preeminent position in Finland since its organization 54 years ago.

Tonight's program is made up entirely of works by Finnish composers. One set of songs was written by the famous composer Jean Sibelius, an honorary sponsor of the organization.

Leading the chorus, which is made up of 54 choristers, will be conductor Martti Turunen.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

JAN 7 - 1938

Carnegie Hall Concert by Boston Symphony

Bach, Brahms and Sibelius Drawn Upon for Brilliant Program; Chorus Arouses Enthusiasm

By PITTS SANBORN.

Bach and Brahms, in the alphabetic orthodoxy, occupied the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall program last night. The second half was given over to the undisputed composer of the hour, the Finnish Jean Sibelius.

The third of Bach's "Brandenburg" concertos, in G major, for string orchestra, showed off the surpassing brilliance of the Boston strings. Serge Koussevitzky read the two Allegros with tremendous spirit.

There was any amount of brilliance, too, in the F major symphony of Brahms. But the reading was at times spasmodic, and some of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretative notions are scarcely easy to accept.

* * *

Opening Is Thrilling.

Thus, after a thrilling treatment of the heroic opening, the second subject emerged flabbily and, per contra, there was a disruptive violence in the working-out section. Nor in the finale did I like his accentuation of the figure for violins and violas in the concluding "Un poco sostenuto."

In the Sibelius half the orchestra had the assistance of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland, with Helge Virkkunen as baritone soloist. The first number, however, was purely orchestral, the symphonic fantasia "Pohjola's Daughter," which has not been played here often and for reason. Though telling after a fashion, it is flashily showy to the point of gaudiness.

The first of the two choral numbers that filled out this half seems not to have been given in the United States till the present winter. "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, was composed in 1906. The music in its stirring manner follows closely the strongly rhythmed poem of Paavo Cajander symbolizing the plight of Finland under a foreign yoke and her eventual liberation.

* * *

Baritone Solo a Feature.

In the case of the other, "The Origin of Fire," sung here in 1931 by the Schola Cantorum, the words are taken from the Finnish epic "Kalevala." Here a long baritone solo precedes the entrance of the chorus. This work dates from 1902. Each piece is eminently effective and the exceptional quality of the performances last evening was due not only to the magnificence of the Boston orchestra and the inspiriting energy contributed by Mr. Koussevitzky but also to the extraordinary proficiency of the chorus.

This stalwart choir of men seems to possess unlimited tonal resources, and the unanimity and distinctness of its enunciation is positively phenomenal. The huge audience was most enthusiastic.

"Carmen" Performed At Metropolitan

Georges Bizet wrote an opera called "Carmen," most everyone knows. And when properly put on, taking into consideration all the elements that go into operatic production, it can be a most engaging, entertaining, provocative and thoroughly satisfying work.

Regrettably, the Metropolitan's version of that Gallic-Hispanic creation last evening had little in it to stimulate the observer-auditor. It was an uncommonly dull affair for the most part. The first act might have plausibly been labeled "Apathy," the second "Lethargy," the third "Fifty-fifty Listlessness" and the fourth — mirabile visu and thanks to the brilliant choreography and dancing—"Life Begins."

In the principal singing roles there was no one to distinguish himself or herself. In fact, it was an off-night of off-nights. For the sake of the record be it stated that Gertrud Wettergren appeared in the name part, and her best contribution was the fair-to-middling delivery of the "Card Song," which any first-year voice student can do something with, after all. Rene Maison as Don Jose was distinctly in poor voice, his moment of acceptable singing coming in the "Flower Song."

John Brownlee, replacing the indisposed Ezio Pinza, won no new honors in ~~his first~~ local joust with Escamillo, though, of course, his French was good, and Natalie Bodanya gave us a thin-voiced Micaela. Gennaro Papi conducted as only he can when he is not in the mood. And the chorus people, besides standing around like a lot of hitching posts, sang as if nothing mattered.

There is, however, not enough praise to heap upon George Balanchine's arrangement of the dances, upon Rosita Ortega and Cesar Tapia for their marvelous solos, and upon the rest of the American Ballet Ensemble, who, despite the musical recession, performed with enthusiasm, technical skill and co-operative excellence.

R. C. B.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 7 - 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony in Top Form on Second Visit, Introduces Helsinki University Chorus Of Finland at Carnegie Hall

One of those electrifying concerts, often hoped for but not so frequently experienced, took place in Carnegie Hall last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived for its second visit. Enthusiasm ran high because of Dr. Koussevitsky and his musicians' superlative performance, one to place this orchestra foremost among its peers this season, and because of the superior singing of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland in two compositions being heard in this country for the first time.

The perfectly balanced program was built around three great composers: Bach of the eighteenth century, Brahms of the nineteenth, and Sibelius of the twentieth; while their works were equally outstanding: the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, the Third Symphony, and "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Captive Queen" and "The Origin of Fire," all by Sibelius. Music such as this was inspiring in itself, but glowed more brightly when its intensity was heightened by a luminous performance.

In an age wrapped up in the expression of rhythm, the vitality, virility, and power of the rhythms of Bach's concerto made a strong appeal. As played by the marvelous strings of this orchestra, the music more than stirred the audience, it rekindled their awareness to the forcefulness of and the intense beauty of Bach. But that was only one of the exhilarating moments of the concert.

In interpreting Brahms last night, Koussevitsky excelled himself in attaining ensemble effects of extraordinary texture. The orchestra played as one man in a profoundly moving performance, reaching not only the depths of the music but the hearts of the audience. There will be some to cavil with certain details of reading the score, there always are; but the sheer beauty of sound combined with that refinement of playing so necessary to clarifying some of Brahms' orchestration, swept everything else before it.

The second half of the evening belonged to Sibelius. All the color of the score found expression in an outstanding performance of "Pohjola's Daughter" which is characteristic Finnish music imbued with folk-lore tradition. More absorbing was the first hearing of the two choral works which had their American premiere in Boston on Dec. 31, after the original manuscript of one had disappeared while enroute here from Leipsig. Fourteen pages of "The Origin of Fire" were transmitted by radio in time for the concert. Both works were written early in the century and have the stamp of the Sibelius of the "Finlandia" period of nationalistic and patriotic fervor.

Based again on folk and epic tradition, this music is a study of "gradual emergence from the atmosphere of darkness and gloom into radiance and glow." Powerful in scope and writing, it has a grandeur in performance that was made more significant by the brilliant singing of the Helsinki University Chorus. Helge Virkkunen was the baritone soloist in the "Origin of Fire." More can be said about this group of singers after their concert on Jan. 10. The applause for them was hearty.

was pleasing to the ear, but the Brahms called for more insight, the Bruch more brilliance, and the De Falla more awareness of the stylistic phrasing of this particular brand of music.

Frederick V. Sittig, father of the violinist, played the accompaniments. An appreciative audience was disposed to encouraging applause.

Leads Symphony

Copyright by Bachrach

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony-Orchestra tonight in its second concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

MECHANICSBURG, PA.
LOCAL NEWS

JAN 15 1938

ORDS
WITHOUT
MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

Music Features & Photo Syndicate

ACCORDING to Broadway statisticians, there are enough singers of Negro "spirichels" at present on the payrolls of concert managers and broadcasters to fill three blocks of Harlem's Lenox Avenue.

Louis Reid

Probably the most popular writer of "spirichels" is white, Missouri - born, Willard Robison; popular because his music not only tells a story, reflects the people he has known, but because he sings and plays it with ingratiating quality. Religion is definitely a part of Robison's songs—the religion of the comm-

tion not enough credit has been given to the cafes which line the Danube's banks. In the old days —it is probably true today—any Viennese with a fair imagination and music in his soul had only to gaze at the Danube and lo, an operetta with a langourous waltz or two sprang to life.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra remains the ~~only notable~~ musical group in the country that is consistently silent at the crossroads' loudspeakers. So exclusive, these Bostonians!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1938

131

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WITH CHORUS

Helsinki University Singers Heard Here for the First Time at Carnegie Hall

SIBELIUS PROGRAM GIVEN

'Origin of Fire,' Billed as a Local Premiere, Presented by Ross in 1931

By OLIN DOWNES

The brilliant concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall was distinguished by the presence and the first public appearance in this city of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland, which took part in the performances of unknown or unfamiliar works of Sibelius. The performances of the chorus, like those of the orchestra, aroused immense enthusiasm, felt alike for the singing and the heroic music.

The Sibelius composition referred to were "The Captive Queen," ballad for chorus and orchestra, and "The Origin of Fire," for baritone, male chorus and orchestra. Both were announced as performed for the first time in New York. This is an error. "The Origin of Fire" was performed for the first time in this city, and probably in this country, by Hugh Ross, the Schola Cantorum and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 19, 1931. The performance was extensively reported at the time. One rises to ask by what facile process of assumption this score was announced as unheard in this country, and even as about to be performed in Boston for the first time in America.

The "first performance" for New York was that of "The Captive Queen," and a thrilling experience it was. This is, in essence, patriotic music. The Captive Queen is Finland, long under Russian misrule. George Sjoblom of THE TIMES, whose words are quoted in the Boston Symphony program book, tells us that "the symbolism of Cajander's poem was clear to every Finn. . . . The music of the 'Captive Queen' belongs in the same category as 'Finlandia' and several other works of Sibelius which caused feelings to blaze like lightning."

Prophecy of Freedom

The poem ends with the prophecy of the freedom which came to Finland after Cajander's death. It inspired in Sibelius simple, powerfully rhythmed, earnest and wildly exciting music. The artistic means employed are more elaborate, as the workmanship is far more advanced than that of "Finlandia." And this involves the remarkable use of Sibelius's special resource — the orchestra. The orchestra, now with dirgelike chords underlying the verses of lamentation; the orchestra, now skirling and rumbling like a volcano—"ancestral voices prophesying war" — then setting the rhythm of the march that carries forward the voices so irresistibly in its stride.

Some may say that this music is simple to the point of obviousness. In that very fact lies much of its greatness. It is for men and a nation, not only connoisseurs and critics. It is quite unabashedly a music that communities and armies could sing. Sibelius, the author of symphonies which have much that represents the most profound and original elements in modern music, shows here where his roots are, and it is from those roots that he draws his strength. Moreover, and notwithstanding the simplicity and straightforwardness of it all, there isn't a measure which fails to reveal the workmanship of the great artist. It is a pity that no composer in America is able to do something as simple and great as that—in America, or in defeatist Europe either. But every bush doesn't bear a Sibelius.

Singing Matches Music

It may be said that the quality of the singing matched that of the music. All were moved by the sound, by the resonance and metal of the voices, the earnest faces, the rhythm and power of it all. The singers meant what they sang, and the audience knew it. Dr. Koussevitzky, obviously delighted with this performance, saluting and congratulating the singers, was fortunate indeed in their collaboration and in the opportunity they provided for introducing such music.

Perhaps the last measures of sustained and unsupported song in this composition are a trifle anti-climactic. That is a detail which did not stand in the way of the overwhelming effect of this performance.

"The Origin of Fire" is also of the Finnish people, in that the verses are from the Kalevala, and the style that of legends and of the Finnish runes. There is the thought of the earth plunged in darkness and cold, the heavens robbed by Louhi of sun and moon, and the search of Ukko, lord of all the gods, to find and restore the flame. Then Ukko strikes new fire, which falls through the "six spangled vaults of heaven."

The music begins in simple narrative fashion, in the folk-rhythm of the Kalevala, which Longfellow adopted for his "Hiawatha." The narrative is begun by the baritone; and the part was taken last night with obvious sincerity and feeling by Helge Virkunnen, the possessor of a very resonant voice if not of the most finished vocal style. The orchestra acquires constantly more color and rhythm. The modal harmonies with which the chorus takes up the tale are singularly naive and impressive. There is a magnificent peroration for voices and instruments.

Tone Poem Also Given

These two choral works, and the short tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter," made the second half of the program and contributed a highly suggestive grouping of compositions. "Ukko the Fire-maker" was written in the period of the early symphonies of Sibelius, in 1902. The "Captive Queen" and "Pohjola's Daughter" came in 1906. But in ways of national feeling and folklore the three are of a piece. "Pohjola's Daughter" represents one of Sibeliu's most poetical works for orchestra. The sledge-ride of Wainomoinen; the coquetting of the daughter of the North, who sits weaving and mocking him on the rainbow; the chagrin of the magician who unsuccessfully woos her; the resumption of the ride; the disappearance of the figure in the distant landscape—this is sheerly of fantasy and folk-lore, and most beautifully mythical music. We do not, however, agree with Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music. We find his tempi too fast, and the style not sufficiently simple and "volkstuemlich."

The concert began with a rousing performance by the magnificent string section of the Third Brandenberg Concerto of J. S. Bach, which was followed by Brahms's Third Symphony. The strings played with exemplary gusto and vividness and rhythm in Bach's work. But an experiment made by Dr. Koussevitzky was not wholly successful. He shifted second violins over with the firsts at his left, leaving violas and 'cellos on the other side. Whether the result was due to the F-holes of the violas facing away from the audience, or to the reinforcements of the choir on the left by the basses back of them, the effect was that violas and 'cellos were over-balanced by the others, so that all passages of imitation or of independent counterpoint for the lower instruments were not heard in their proper tonal proportion. Meanwhile the brilliancy of the violins was excessive from the standpoint of tone-color. This did not inhibit some superb playing, but it was not the perfect effect.

The dominating orchestral effect was the Brahms Symphony No. 3, which powerfully impressed the audience. The music glowed with full measure of its energy, health and romantic feeling. Seldom have we heard the lightning of the first theme so leap from the instruments, or the three-note motive represented by the great swelling introductory chords given such passionate strength. The tempo was a real allegro con brio, which is what the composer asks, though Dr. Koussevitzky found it expedient to modify this in certain places.

The orchestral tone was a glory to the ear, whether it was that of strings, wood or brass. Who is there, at all familiar with the symphony, who will forget the twilight progressions that bring the end of the second movement? The tempo of the third movement was somewhat too fast—perhaps to counteract the general tendency of musicians to drag and sentimentalize this part of the symphony. But it was too fast for the theme to be fully sung, while it emphasized the undercurrent of agitation which tinges Brahms's melancholy.

The essence of the music was recaptured in the finale, rugged and glorious, "echt Brahms"—the music of a bear and also a dreamer. Delighted, the audience applauded for minutes, and the conductor shared its approval with the unsurpassed orchestra.

WAUKEGAN, ILL.
NEWS - SUN

JAN 17 1938

A talk on "Orchestra Conductors of Today" was given by Mrs. T. C. Camp at the general business meeting of the club last Tuesday. In her discussion Mrs. Camp gave a resume of the life and work of various outstanding conductors in such classifications as the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, and others.

Mrs. George Stalhuth presided during the business session. Announcement of the annual dinner and meeting of the Y.W.C.A. board of directors to be held Wednesday at the Congregational church was made by Miss Florence Denison.

Newcomers' Club Will Have Tea At Y. W. C. A.

Home Department Will Be In Charge; Mrs. Carol Lockwood Is Chairman.

Members of the home department, of which Mrs. Carol Lockwood is chairman, will be in charge of the informal afternoon program to which all members of the Newcomers' club are invited at 2 o'clock tomorrow at the Y.W.C.A. The afternoon will be spent in sewing and knitting and tea will be served.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 7 - 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony and Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat Give a Concert Here

Second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor, assisted by the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland and Helge Virkkunen, barytone. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach....Brandenburg concerto No. in G major for string orchestras.
   Allegro moderato
   Allegro
2. Brahms....Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 30
   I Allegro con brio
   II Andante
   III Poco allegretto
   IV Allegro

Intermission

3. Sibelius...."Pohjola's Daughter," symphonic fantasia, Op. 49.
4. Sibelius...."The Captive Queen," ballad for chorus and orchestra, Op. 48.
5. Sibelius...."The Origin of Fire," for barytone, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 32.
   Barytone solo, Helge Virkkunen

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA and Mr. Koussevitsky came to town yesterday and gave their second evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. They were accompanied by Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat—which, as of course no one needs to be told, is the Finnish name for the famous Helsinki University Chorus. The Boston Symphony Orchestra habitually does very well without assisting artists of any kind, choral or solo; but it needed a chorus on this occasion in order to perform certain works which Mr. Koussevitzky desired to let his audiences hear; and so it invited the splendid body of student choristers from the University of Helsingfors who are now touring America.

One may well be glad of the excuse; for this chorus is an extraordinary one, and their presence on the stage of Carnegie Hall last evening, with Mr. Koussevitzky's baton integrating their voices with his orchestra in the stirring music by Sibelius that they sang, was something to remember.

* * *

It may astonish the average American music lover to know that the Finnish people have been educated in the making of music for centuries. As long ago as 1556, it is said, the university city of Turku maintained an orchestra, and by the middle of the seventeenth century that university was giving courses in music, and sponsoring musical research. No wonder music stirs so deeply the natures of these people, and springs so puissantly and movingly from their imaginations and their throats.

* * *

The chorus known as the Student Singers of the University of Helsinki was founded more than half a century ago. From the beginning, its chief aim has been the development of Finnish choral music, and within recent years it has drawn much of its musical nutriment from their great national master, Jean Sibelius, who has composed for them his best known choral works. The singers in the Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat (generally referred to, it is comforting to know, as the Y. L.) are students in the university or in other educational institutions in Helsingfors, and they contribute voluntarily their services. They are said to number usually more than a hundred. Last evening there seemed to be fewer than that on the stage of Carnegie Hall.

They sing with exceptional vitality, precision, and power, with a youthful élan that is a delight to the spirit. There were certain crescendi and fortissimi in the two Sibelius numbers that they helped us to hear—"The Captive Queen," Op. 48, and "The Origin of Fire" (with barytone solo), Op. 32—that were electrifying in their effect beyond that of any choral singing achieved in New York for some time.

Jean Sibelius

Whose choral works were sung at Boston Symphony concert

* * *

These choral pieces of Sibelius were uncommonly interesting to hear. One, "The Captive Queen," was new, so far as this town is concerned. The other, "The Origin of Fire," was not, as the program alleged, "the first performance in New York," for it was sung here by the Schola Cantorum (under its alternative title, "Ukko the Fire-Maker") in January, 1931. Both are works of Sibelius's middle period; they date from the early years of the century, from the decade that produced the Second Symphony, the Violin Concerto, and the symphonic fantasia "Pohjola's Daughter."

They are inferior to all those works. They followed on last night's program "Pohjola's Daughter"; and it was startling to observe the difference in creative intensity and power between the choral pieces and the orchestral work. Is the imagination of Sibelius, one wonders, hampered by the act of setting words to music? Does it work with the maximum of power only when it is free from what, for a certain type of musical mind, is the thralldom of a verbal pattern?

* * *

With Bach, Schubert, Wagner, Wolf, Strauss, the closest possible alliance with the word was fructifying, releasing, creative. Bach, for example, could submit himself to a verbal image of grief or pity or compassion or exultation, and the word would pierce to the very center of his creative will, and unloose all that it could give of beauty and profundity and expressiveness. Another type of musical mind is uneasy in any such association, and perhaps this is the case with Sibelius. All he needed for his symphonic fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter," were the mental pictures that he found in the episode from the "Kalevala": the maiden seated on the rainbow, spinning, sharing its iridescence with her loveliness; and the toiling hero Väinämöinen, made drunk by her beauty—these, or whatever else he drew from the legendary source, were all that his imagination required to produce the vivid beauty and witchery of the music in which they have been fused.

* * *

But what a master the man is, no matter what he undertakes! What enormous intensity and strength this music holds at its greatest, and how complete is its integrity, its loneliness, its magic!

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)

JAN 14 1938

Noted Artists to Appear In Unity Series Tonight

Elizabeth Rethberg, Ezio Pinza Will Give Recital.

The third Unity Concert Course program for the current season will be presented by Elizabeth Rethberg, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Ezio Pinza, the noted Don Giovanni, at the Montclair High School auditorium at 8:30 o'clock tonight. The two artists will return to Salzburg next Summer to take again the leading roles in the opera "Don Giovanni," in which they have appeared at the festival for three seasons.

The extra event on the Unity Concert Course program this year, which is not included in the regular series, will take place on Feb. 9, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be presented. The organization is considered the outstanding orchestra of the country and one with which everyone should be familiar.

On March 4 the fourth and last concert in the series will be a violin recital by Georges Enesco, the distinguished violinist, conductor and composer, who conducted and also gave a violin solo at the recent performance of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Enesco is present guest conductor of that orchestra.

Tickets for these three events are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street. Telephone Montclair 2-6770. 9 to 11 A. M.

.BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 8 - 1938

Second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Given At Academy Last Evening

Brooklyn society attended the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. A capacity audience appreciatively received the well-rounded and representative program conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who introduced a new score, an orchestra suite by Prokofieff as drawn from the incidental music to the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije." The concert opened with Beethoven's third symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," and closed with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin was hostess in the Brooklyn committee box. She and former Judge Garvin entertained their box guests at dinner at their home, 1 Grace Court, before the concert. The guests included Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. William H. Good, William M. Parke and Mr. and Mrs. Butler Graham of Manhattan.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince was hostess in a box to Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff and Theodore Fitch, director of the Brooklyn Music School Settlement.

Col. Fay W. Brabson, commandingofficer at Fort Hamilton, and Mrs. Brabson were box hosts to Lt. Col. and Mrs. Floyd Carlock, Lt. Col. and Mrs. H. W. James and Major and Mrs. G. W. Lester.

In the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy box were Miss Adeline Pettit, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Field Scott and Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart.

Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson entertained at dinner at their home, 135 Eastern Parkway, for the box guests, who included Judge and Mrs. Albert Conway, Mr. and Mrs. John Stillwell and Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner Conroy.

Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman of the Brooklyn committee which, with the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, sponsors the series of concerts given by the orchestra in Brooklyn.

Mrs. Walter M. Bristow entertained for her daughter, Miss Dorothy Bristow, at dinner at their residence, 174 8th Ave., before the concert. The guests were the Misses Janis Baker, June Baker, Kathleen Barron, Elizabeth Behr, Dorothy Bierwirth, Marion Brockway, Marian Carpenter, Katharine Davidson, Elizabeth Engel, Marion Ingersoll, Lillian Kraus, Dorian Moorhead and Sally Sloane.

At the third Brooklyn concert on Thursday evening, Feb. 10, half the program will be devoted to the memory of the late Maurice avel, French composer, who died recently.

131

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WITH CHORUS

Helsinki University Singers Heard Here for the First Time at Carnegie Hall

SIBELIUS PROGRAM GIVEN

'Origin of Fire,' Billed as a Local Premiere, Presented by Ross in 1931

By OLIN DOWNES

The brilliant concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall was distinguished by the presence and the first public appearance in this city of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland, which took part in the performances of unknown or unfamiliar works of Sibelius. The performances of the chorus, like those of the orchestra, aroused immense enthusiasm, felt alike for the singing and the heroic music.

The Sibelius composition referred to were "The Captive Queen," ballad for chorus and orchestra, and "The Origin of Fire," for baritone, male chorus and orchestra. Both were announced as performed for the first time in New York. This is an error. "The Origin of Fire" was performed for the first time in this city, and probably in this country, by Hugh Ross, the Schola Cantorum and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 19, 1931. The performance was extensively reported at the time. One rises to ask by what facile process of assumption this score was announced as unheard in this country, and even as about to be performed in Boston for the first time in America.

The "first performance" for New York was that of "The Captive Queen," and a thrilling experience it was. This is, in essence, patriotic music. The Captive Queen is Finland, long under Russian misrule. George Sjoblom of THE TIMES, whose words are quoted in the Boston Symphony program book, tells us that "the symbolism of Cajander's poem was clear to every Finn. . . . The music of the 'Captive Queen' belongs in the same category as 'Finlandia' and several other works of Sibelius which caused feelings to blaze like lightning."

Prophecy of Freedom

The poem ends with the prophecy of the freedom which came to Finland after Cajander's death. It inspired in Sibelius simple, powerfully rhythmed, earnest and wildly exciting music. The artistic means employed are more elaborate, as the workmanship is far more advanced than that of "Finlandia." And this involves the remarkable use of Sibelius's special resource—the orchestra. The orchestra, now with dirgelike chords underlying the verses of lamentation; the orchestra, now skirling and rumbling like a volcano—"ancestral voices prophesying war"—then setting the rhythm of the march that carries forward the voices so irresistibly in its stride.

Some may say that this music is simple to the point of obviousness. In that very fact lies much of its greatness. It is for men and a nation, not only connoisseurs and critics. It is quite unabashedly a music that communities and armies could sing. Sibelius, the author of symphonies which have much that represents the most profound and original elements in modern music, shows here where his roots are, and it is from those roots that he draws his strength. Moreover, and notwithstanding the simplicity and straightforwardness of it all, there isn't a measure which fails to reveal the workmanship of the great artist. It is a pity that no composer in America is able to do something as simple and great as that—in America, or in defeatist Europe either. But every bush doesn't bear a Sibelius.

Singing Matches Music

It may be said that the quality of the singing matched that of the music. All were moved by the sound, by the resonance and metal of the voices, the earnest faces, the rhythm and power of it all. The singers meant what they sang, and the audience knew it. Dr. Koussevitzky, obviously delighted with this performance, saluting and congratulating the singers, was fortunate indeed in their collaboration and in the opportunity they provided for introducing such music.

Perhaps the last measures of sustained and unsupported song in this composition are a trifle anti-climactic. That is a detail which did not stand in the way of the overwhelming effect of this performance.

"The Origin of Fire" is also of the Finnish people, in that the verses are from the Kalevala, and the style that of legends and of the Finnish runes. There is the thought of the earth plunged in darkness and cold, the heavens robbed by Louhi of sun and moon, and the search of Ukko, lord of all the gods, to find and restore the flame. Then Ukko strikes new fire, which falls through the "six spangled vaults of heaven."

The music begins in simple narrative fashion, in the folk-rhythm of the Kalevala, which Longfellow adopted for his "Hiawatha." The narrative is begun by the baritone and the part was taken last night with obvious sincerity and feeling by Helge Virkunnen, the possessor of a very resonant voice if not of the most finished vocal style. The orchestra acquires constantly more color and rhythm. The modal harmonies with which the chorus takes up the tale are singularly naive and impressive. There is a magnificent peroration for voices and instruments.

Tone Poem Also Given

These two choral works, and the short tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter," made the second half of the program and contributed a highly suggestive grouping of compositions. "Ukko the Fire-maker" was written in the period of the early symphonies of Sibelius, in 1902. The "Captive Queen" and "Pohjola's Daughter" came in 1906. But in ways of national feeling and folklore the three are of a piece. "Pohjola's Daughter" represents one of Sibeliu's most poetical works for orchestra. The sledge-ride of Wainomoinen; the coquetting of the daughter of the North, who sits weaving and mocking him on the rainbow; the chagrin of the magician who unsuccessfully woos her; the resumption of the ride; the disappearance of the figure in the distant landscape—this is sheerly of fantasy and folk-lore, and most beautifully mythical music. We do not, however, agree with Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music. We find his tempi too fast, and the style not sufficiently simple and "volkstuemlich."

The concert began with a rousing performance by the magnificent string section of the Third Brandenberg Concerto of J. S. Bach, which was followed by Brahms's Third Symphony. The strings played with exemplary gusto and vividness and rhythm in Bach's work. But an experiment made by Dr. Koussevitzky was not wholly successful. He shifted second violins over with the firsts at his left, leaving violas and 'cellos on the other side. Whether the result was due to the F-holes of the violas facing away from the audience, or to the reinforcements of the choir on the left by the basses back of them, the effect was that violas and 'cellos were over-balanced by the others, so that all passages of imitation or of independent counterpoint for the lower instruments were not heard in their proper tonal proportion. Meanwhile the brilliancy of the violins was excessive from the standpoint of tone-color. This did not inhibit some superb playing, but it was not the perfect effect.

The dominating orchestral effect was the Brahms Symphony No. 3, which powerfully impressed the audience. The music glowed with full measure of its energy, health and romantic feeling. Seldom have we heard the lightning of the first theme so leap from the instruments, or the three-note motive represented by the great swelling introductory chords given such passionate strength. The tempo was a real allegro con brio, which is what the composer asks, though Dr. Koussevitzky found it expedient to modify this in certain places.

The orchestral tone was a glory to the ear, whether it was that of strings, wood or brass. Who is there, at all familiar with the symphony, who will forget the twilight progressions that bring the end of the second movement? The tempo of the third movement was somewhat too fast—perhaps to counteract the general tendency of musicians to drag and sentimentalize this part of the symphony. But it was too fast for the theme to be fully sung, while it emphasized the undercurrent of agitation which tinges Brahms's melancholy.

The essence of the music was recaptured in the finale, rugged and glorious, "echt Brahms"—the music of a bear and also a dreamer. Delighted, the audience applauded for minutes, and the conductor shared its approval with the unsurpassed orchestra.

WAUKEGAN, ILL.
NEWS - SUN

JAN 17 1938

Newcomers' Club Will Have Tea At Y. W. C. A.

Home Department Will Be In Charge; Mrs. Carol Lockwood Is Chairman.

Members of the home department, of which Mrs. Carol Lockwood is chairman, will be in charge of the informal afternoon program to which all members of the Newcomers' club are invited at 2 o'clock tomorrow at the Y.W.C.A. The afternoon will be spent in sewing and knitting and tea will be served.

A talk on "Orchestra Conductors of Today" was given by Mrs. T. C. Camp at the general business meeting of the club last Tuesday. In her discussion Mrs. Camp gave a resume of the life and work of various outstanding conductors in such classifications as the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, and others.

Mrs. George Stalhuth presided during the business session. Announcement of the annual dinner and meeting of the Y.W.C.A. board of directors to be held Wednesday at the Congregational church was made by Miss Florence Denison.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 7 - 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony and Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat Give a Concert Here

Second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergi Koussevitzky, conductor, assisted by the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland and Helge Virkkunen, barytone. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach....Brandenburg concerto No. in G major for string orchestras.
   Allegro moderato
   Allegro
2. Brahms....Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 30.
   I Allegro con brio
   II Andante
   III Poco allegretto
   IV Allegro

Intermission

3. Sibelius...."Pohjola's Daughter," symphonic fantasia, Op. 49.
4. Sibelius...."The Captive Queen," ballad for chorus and orchestre, Op. 48.
5. Sibelius...."The Origin of Fire," for barytone, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 32.
   Barytone solo, Helge Virkkunen

Jean Sibelius

Whose choral works were sung at Boston Symphony concert

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA and Mr. Koussevitsky came to town yesterday and gave their second evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. They were accompanied by Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat—which, as of course no one needs to be told, is the Finnish name for the famous Helsinki University Chorus. The Boston Symphony Orchestra habitually does very well without assisting artists of any kind, choral or solo; but it needed a chorus on this occasion in order to perform certain works which Mr. Koussevitzky desired to let his audiences hear; and so it invited the splendid body of student choristers from the University of Helsingfors who are now touring America.

One may well be glad of the excuse; for this chorus is an extraordinary one, and their presence on the stage of Carnegie Hall last evening, with Mr. Koussevitzky's baton integrating their voices with his orchestra in the stirring music by Sibelius that they sang, was something to remember.

* * *

It may astonish the average American music lover to know that the Finnish people have been educated in the making of music for centuries. As long ago as 1556, it is said, the university city of Turku maintained an orchestra, and by the middle of the seventeenth century that university was giving courses in music, and sponsoring musical research. No wonder music stirs so deeply the natures of these people, and springs so puissantly and movingly from their imaginations and their throats.

* * *

The chorus known as the Student Singers of the University of Helsinki was founded more than half a century ago. From the beginning, its chief aim has been the development of Finnish choral music, and within recent years it has drawn much of its musical nutriment from their great national master, Jean Sibelius, who has composed for them his best known choral works. The singers in the Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat (generally referred to, it is comforting to know, as the Y. L.) are students in the university or in other educational institutions in Helsingfors, and they contribute voluntarily their services. They are said to number usually more than a hundred. Last evening there seemed to be fewer than that on the stage of Carnegie Hall.

They sing with exceptional vitality, precision, and power, with a youthful élan that is a delight to the spirit. There were certain crescendi and fortissimi in the two Sibelius numbers that they helped us to hear—"The Captive Queen," Op. 48, and "The Origin of Fire" (with barytone solo), Op. 32—that were electrifying in their effect beyond that of any choral singing achieved in New York for some time.

* * *

These choral pieces of Sibelius were uncommonly interesting to hear. One, "The Captive Queen," was new, so far as this town is concerned. The other, "The Origin of Fire," was not, as the program alleged, "the first performance in New York," for it was sung here by the Schola Cantorum (under its alternative title, "Ukko the Fire-Maker") in January, 1931. Both are works of Sibelius's middle period; they date from the early years of the century, from the decade that produced the Second Symphony, the Violin Concerto, and the symphonic fantasia "Pohjola's Daughter."

They are inferior to all those works. They followed on last night's program "Pohjola's Daughter"; and it was startling to observe the difference in creative intensity and power between the choral pieces and the orchestral work. Is the imagination of Sibelius, one wonders, hampered by the act of setting words to music? Does it work with the maximum of power only when it is free from what, for a certain type of musical mind, is the thralldom of a verbal pattern?

* * *

With Bach, Schubert, Wagner, Wolf, Strauss, the closest possible alliance with the word was fructifying, releasing, creative. Bach, for example, could submit himself to a verbal image of grief or pity or compassion or exultation, and the word would pierce to the very center of his creative will, and unloose all that it could give of beauty and profundity and expressiveness. Another type of musical mind is uneasy in any such association, and perhaps this is the case with Sibelius. All he needed for his symphonic fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter," were the mental pictures that he found in the episode from the "Kalevala": the maiden seated on the rainbow, spinning, sharing its iridescence with her loveliness; and the toiling hero Väinämöinen, made drunk by her beauty—these, or whatever else he drew from the legendary source, were all that his imagination required to produce the vivid beauty and witchery of the music in which they have been fused.

* * *

But what a master the man is, no matter what he undertakes! What enormous intensity and strength this music holds at its greatest, and how complete is its integrity, its loneliness, its magic!

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)

JAN 14 1938

Noted Artists to Appear In Unity Series Tonight

Elizabeth Rethberg, Ezio Pinza Will Give Recital.

The third Unity Concert Course program for the current season will be presented by Elizabeth Rethberg, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Ezio Pinza, the noted Don Giovanni, at the Montclair High School auditorium at 8:30 o'clock tonight. The two artists will return to Salzburg next Summer to take again the leading roles in the opera "Don Giovanni," in which they have appeared at the festival for three seasons.

The extra event on the Unity Concert Course program this year, which is not included in the regular series, will take place on Feb. 9, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be presented. The organization is considered the outstanding orchestra of the country and one with which everyone should be familiar.

